Both men galloped out of the path and trampled through the puddles of water. They had already arrived at the foot of Cizhou’s city walls. Kong Ling hugged the neck of the horse, his energy all spent. He smoothed his goatee to tidy it up, then lifted his head to shout in a hoarse voice, “It’s me!”

Heads popped out above the battlement of the city walls. A military officer was shocked to see Kong Ling and could not help but blurt, “Mister Chengfeng!”

“Quick! Go get His Excellency!” Kong Ling dismounted the horse with trembling legs. He handed the reins to Piaopo. “Tell him I’m back!”

“Open the city gate immediately.” Piaopo said. “Mister, then—”

Kong Ling nodded in response at the same time he gasped for breath. He bent over, with his hands on his knees, and said with a bitter smile, “Let me catch my breath. We are going to enter the city soon. It’s only when we meet His Excellency that we can clear all suspicions of you. Otherwise, we will still end up delayed by the city officer’s interrogation of you.”

Not long after, Zhou Gui hurried over. When he saw Kong Ling from above, he immediately said, “Chengfeng, what’s going on? Quick, open the gate!”

The city gate made a dull noise as several soldiers from within lifted the horizontal bar and pushed the city gates open, letting through the first rays of the morning sun through the gap. Kong Ling wiped his sweat and moved to stride in first. There was a section of bridle path behind the city gate. Zhou Gui hurriedly descended from the city gates and led his man to the head of the bridle path, wanting to meet and receive Kong Ling.

But Kong Ling, who had been walking in front, abruptly changed countenance and bellowed, “Shut the gates!”

The soldiers behind him who were still pushing against the city gate froze. But in that instant, Piaopo had already burst forth. He grabbed hold of Kong Ling’s back collar and dragged him back in a swift retreat. However, Kong Ling staggered and half-kneeled on the ground, dragging his body and waving his hands as he shouted at Zhou Gui, “This man is up to something! Zhou Gui, tell the men to release the arrows! You mustn’t let him go free!”

Zhou Gui had already taken a step forward. He shouted, "Take him down!"

That originally docile horse suddenly neighed. It raised its hooves and turned around to trample over the soldiers who were pushing against the gate. Piaopo flipped atop the horse, and the horse instantly crashed its way out of the city gate. He hauled Kong Ling with just one hand, causing Kong Ling's entire body to be partially suspended at one side of the saddle with his legs and feet scraping across the ground as he was forcibly dragged along.

Excellent strength!

Such strength was by no means inferior to Xiao Chiye.

Kong Ling was unable to break free as he was dragged along at high speed. His back hit the iron buckle at the side of the saddle, which knocked the wind out of him. That thin and frail chest of his seemed as if it was about to be perforated from the strikes. He was forced to look at the sky while he struggled with his arms and kicked out with both legs as the man's grip on him tightened increasingly. He said, "Zhou Gui... release... the arrows! This man has reinforcements!"

An irritated "tsk" escaped between Piaopo's lips. He suddenly lifted Kong Ling up by the neck and hollered at the soldiers surging out from the city gates, "Go ahead! Zhou Gui, release the arrows! We'll see if I die first or Mister Chengfeng dies first!"

Zhou Gui was but a mere civil official. At this startling change, he pushed away the guards and shouted, "Stop!"

Kong Ling had been strangled until his face had gone all red. He clawed at his collar with his ten fingers. Piaopo moved his head closer to him and said with a smile, "Mister is truly sharp. Weren't you still regarding me as a righteous man on our way here? So why have you turned against me?"

"Tantai, Tantai Long's soldiers!" Kong Ling gasped and said with difficulty, "are all from the three, three prefectures in the east. None of them is familiar with, with the roads in Cizhou!"

Piaopo burst out laughing. He settled down on the horse and said, "So I see. Mister is truly formidable. You were still acting with such sincerity earlier. But since I've already arrived at Cizhou, do you think you can simply settle the matter by tricking me into the city and killing me?"

He turned his head to the side and spat.

“Too late!”

With that, those pursuing soldiers who had vanished earlier came forth from behind. Although they did not have the uniformed armor expected of a regular army, their numbers were terrifying. They were all dressed in various kinds of clothes, holding up their broadswords and swords as they urged their horses through the woods and grasses in a straight charge forth. Kong Ling could not even catch sight of the end of their line.

“I told Lei Changming to tell you people a few months back that we want grains. Instead, you let the Imperial Army into the territory and let Xiao Chiye take over our granary.” Lei Jingzhe flung Kong Ling to the ground. Reining in the turning horse, he motioned to Zhou Gui, “Do you think you can scare me into retreating by relying on Xiao Chiye’s 20,000-strong Imperial Army? I repeatedly sent men to persuade you to surrender and pledge allegiance to me, but you keep putting off giving me an answer! Zhou Gui, you are now a traitor who financially aids the rebels. I’ll rid the people of a scourge by massacring Cizhou today!”

Zhou Gui looked at those more than 10,000 men, and his heart went half-cold. He even felt a little dizzy. He hastily held on to the person beside him for support and squeezed out the words through gritted teeth, “I can open the granary and give you grains. But you mustn’t hurt the commoners of Cizhou!”

Lei Jingzhe cracked the whip, and the bandits behind him roared with laughter. The hooves of his horse trod around Kong Ling, and those people surrounded Kong Ling, forcing him to roll and crawl. Lei Jingzhe pointed to Kong Ling on the ground with his horsewhip and said, “Now I’m the host, and you’re the guest. The granary is already mine, whether or not you open it up. The fuck you still dare to negotiate with me when I’m taking my men home to eat?”

Zhou Gui staggered a few steps and fumed, “We have already filled up half a granary worth of grains for you Mount Luo bandits last year when Cizhou was hit with famine. If not, how many people on Mount Luo would have starved to death?! Can’t you spare the commoners of Cizhou on account of this favor we’ve done you?”

“What nonsense are you spouting?” Lei Jingzhe’s expression suddenly underwent a change. He said coldly, “Lei Changming bought those grains last year with money at my behest.”

That was right. Lei Changming did indeed pay for the grains last year. But he bought half a granary worth of fine rice in Cizhou at the dirt-cheap price of unpolished rice. The total amount paid was so meagre that it was not even enough to send away a beggar in Cizhou.

Zhou Gui was so stunned by his brazenness and shamelessness that he could not breathe. Thumping his chest and stamping his foot in anger, he said, "You! Are you people still human?! Don't even think of entering the city today!"

Lei Jingzhe had already run out of patience. He knew that he would not be able to hide the truth at Lei Changming's end for long. The Imperial Army was very likely to be on the way already. So he lowered his voice and growled, "Zhou Gui, I merely want to enter the city to play for a few days. Must you insist on fighting with me against overwhelming odds like you would throw an egg against a rock?!"

Kong Ling trembled as he hunched over in the mud and let loose a sneer. With a fling of his sleeve, he pointed at Lei Jingzhe and let fly a torrent of curses, "Play for a few days? When have you ever kept your men under control of all the times you people entered the city? For each time Lei Changming comes, more than ten of the womenfolk in Cizhou would meet their end! Bah! You're clearly all rotten eggs, so what benevolent and righteous act are you putting on?! Everyone will die if we let you enter the city today, so we the folks of Cizhou might as well fight you to the death together!"

The horsewhip at the rear struck Kong Ling so hard on his back that his skin and flesh split apart. Kong Ling initially thought that they could take this man down at the city gate, but he never expected the other party's soldiers to be following right behind them. He was very much aware that his gullibility this time had brought a catastrophe upon Cizhou. Overwhelmed with grief and sorrow, he bent over the ground and started vomiting.

Lei Jingzhe rode his horse out and led his men in a straight charge towards Zhou Gui. He said, "Kill our way into the city. Once the imperial court's appointment order is issued, we will become the garrison troops of Cizhou who have eliminated the rebels for the imperial court!"

Zhou Gui saw that fierce horse charging right for him and those countless blades reflecting the morning rays behind him. With an unexpected burst of strength, and despite knowing that he should not do so, he still spread his arms apart and bellowed, “Even if I die today, I cannot let you enter the city!”

Sunlight pierced through the clouds on the horizon, and that wave of golden light broke through the darkness like the raging tides. With his eyes wide open, Zhou Gui watched as those blades came rushing right towards him. In that moment, the ear-piercing sound of a string being pulled rang out, and that “twang” from close to the ground reverberated through the air as an arrow hurtled right for Lei Jingzhe’s head with a violent gust of strong wind following in its trail!

The Conqueror Bow stood firm and steady in the wind. Under the shocked gazes of all those around him, Xiao Chiye held his pose of pulling the bow. The opening of the bone ring on his thumb shifted, revealing the penetrating and forbidding eyes behind the bowstring.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Thanks to Alex and Ami for the help! Muacks! <3

Footnotes

1. 亩, mu, or Chinese acre, measure of land equal to 0.0667 hectares
2. 瓢泼 his name literally means “heavy downpour”.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 110 : SON OF A CONCUBINE

Lei Jingzhe did not dare to be too complacent. Unable to dodge in time in his haste, he could only brandish his broadsword to ward off the blow. The arrow struck the blade with a loud clang, and the impact numbed Lei Jingzhe's entire arm. He promptly and decisively spurred his horse past Zhou Gui in an attempt to lead his men into charging into the city.

"Shut the gates quick—!" Zhou Gui was swept off his feet and thrown to the ground. Paying no mind to the sorry sight he presented, he lifted the hem of his robe and shouted at the city soldiers.

Pressing their shoulders against the city gates, the city soldiers bellowed in unison and shoved the gates towards the center to shut it. But Lei Jingzhe's horse was faster. His blade arrived at the same time as his horse, cutting down the men who were pushing away at the gates. He was just about to drive straight in to take over Cizhou, but in that critical moment, Lei Jingzhe felt a chill at the back of his head and swiftly bent the upper half of his body over. Following right after, the back of the horse sank as a youth of about sixteen or seventeen of age climbed onto it.

Ding Tao's slashed his palm towards Lei Jingzhe's neck. Lei Jingzhe turned aside to dodge it and backhandedly made a stab at Ding Tao's chest and abdomen. Ding Tao clung onto the saddle and slid down to evade the blade. His legs touched the ground, and he raced along with the madly galloping horse for a few moments before he hoisted himself up with his arms and clambered back up again.

"Hey!" Ding Tao gripped Lei Jingzhe's arm and raised a hand to fling a brush worth of ink onto Lei Jingzhe's face when he turned back.

For all Lei Jingzhe's plotting, he never expected such a move from the youth who had come to the rescue. He could no longer see his surroundings with the ink splashed in his eyes, but he had a keen sense of hearing. The instant Ding Tao launched a sneak attack on him, he sensed Ding Tao's movement, and in their confrontation, he hauled Ding Tao by the collar and flung him off the horse.

Ding Tao fell heavily on the ground and felt the stab of pain in his back. He yelled out in pain, but before he was done yelling, a horse's hoof came aiming right for him. Ding Tao hurriedly rolled over to dodge the hoof. But as he rolled over, his back was inadvertently exposed right under Lei Jingzhe's eyes.

It's now or never!

Lei Jingzhe promptly hurled his steel blade out.

Ding Tao wanted to evade it, but a bandit who had caught up with them from behind grabbed hold of his ankle. He was forced to sprawl flat in the muddy water. He propped himself against the ground with both arms, wanting to lift himself up, but he was dragged down again. The steel blade was already right behind him. With his face all smeared with filthy mud, Ding Tao gritted his teeth and straightened up his upper body to shout at those in the city, "Open up the south gates! The reinforcements are here!"

Lei Jingzhe cursed in fury. But then he saw the steel blade he had hurled out intercepted mid-air by an extremely narrow sheath. The impact of the collision sent his blade hurtling off-course until it stabbed into the ground at a slanting angle and remained there.

Ding Tao was still badly shaken as he turned back for a look. The bandit who had been yanking his ankle earlier was already dead, his head separated from his body. Ding Tao immediately crawled up from the ground, hopped several times in succession, then poked his head out from behind Shen Zechuan and said to Lei Jingzhe, "You're dead meat!"

One side of the city gates had already been shut. Lei Jingzhe led his men to crowd at the entrance of the bridle path to squeeze their way through but was obstructed. He recognized the man blocking his path. The entire outfit of white peeking out from under the cloak was a color the other man had not changed out of after leaving Qudu. Lei Jingzhe's horse took a few steps back, but then, in the next instant, he brandished his whip and barged his way over. Shen Zechuan pulled off his cloak and tossed it into Ding Tao's arms, Lang Tao Xue Jin raised its hooves and charged forth. In the split second the wind rose, Yang Shan Xue had already left its sheath.

Lei Jingzhe's broadsword slipped out of his hand. Right before he was about to collide with Shen Zechuan, he drew out his subordinate's broadsword in passing. The neighing of the horse was just like the sounding of a war horn. The forces of both powers collided as the edges of their blades met and let out a shrill shriek in unison, the sound so piercing that it made one quake with fear.

Lei Jingzhe had encountered an opponent who was completely different from the ones he had faced in the past. That terrifying strength of his seemed to have plunged into water. No matter how forceful and fierce he was in wielding his blade, it would all be neutralized by a force as gentle as water until it eventually dissolved into nothingness. The more he went all out, the more it felt like he was being led around by the nose by Shen Zechuan. Gradually, he found himself trapped into a vicious cycle in which he could never escape from.

Lei Jingzhe was very shrewd. He held up his broadsword and pushed back, pretending as though he was going to launch a sudden strike, but in the next instant, he turned around and fled.

The earlier opportunity had already slipped him by. He was already harboring thoughts of retreating at Ding Tao's "reinforcements are here" earlier, and it was also evident that his men had already been surrounded by Xiao Chiye. If he did not withdraw posthaste and insisted on staying on to attack the city, then he would be trapped in a situation where he was besieged on all sides; he would not be able to hold out for long!

"Retreat!" Lei Jingzhe took the lead and turned his horse in the southeast direction.

Shen Zechuan did not give chase. Xiao Chiye, who was still in the east, leaped onto his horse and led his men to follow after Lei Jingzhe in hot pursuit. Lei Jingzhe whipped his horse and tore off at great speed. Amid all the jolts and bumps, he looked back and pointed at Xiao Chiye from afar, then at Shen Zechuan, and bellowed savagely, "We will meet again!"

The bandits wore no armors, so their speed was faster. Plus, they were already good at fleeing to begin with. All of them dashed back to the mountain forest without any regard for battle formation. In the blink of an eye, all of them had fled helter-skelter, shouting loudly as they hid among the undergrowth.

Once again, Xiao Chiye lifted the Conqueror Bow. The sound of the string being drawn on that powerful bow that weighed a hundred catties was bone-chilling. Xiao Chiye's eyes stared fixedly at Lei Jingzhe's back. Lei Jingzhe was about to dart into the mountain forest, yet Xiao Chiye still seemed to have no intention of releasing the arrow.

With a cry, Meng whirled around and nosedived down to pounce right at Lei Jingzhe with its sharp talons held in a hook, aiming right for Lei Jingzhe's eyes. Lei Jingzhe knew that this did not bode well, and he was forced to slow down. He waved his hands to cover his face and turned around to dodge the incoming blow. At this precise instant, Xiao Chiye, who was behind him, released his fingers. The arrow burst forth like a golden ray shooting out from the blazing sun, its afterimage and the wind trailing closely behind its tail. In just the moment it took to gasp for breath, it had already arrived right before Lei Jingzhe's eyes.

In this perilous juncture of life and death, Lei Jingzhe dragged over his subordinate beside him and leaned the entire half of his body back at the same time he exerted all his strength to shove the man before his own body. The arrow pierced through the chest of the subordinate, and the force of it sent Lei Jingzhe falling off his horse. He rolled on the ground, climbed to his feet, and tossed away the body, then got on his horse and continued to flee.

Zhou Gui met Shen Zechuan at the foot of the city gates. Not knowing if he should cry or laugh, he wiped his face and said, "What perfect timing! You came just in time!"

Shen Zechuan dismounted to help Kong Ling up personally. He said remorsefully, "I'm sorry to have made Mister Chengfeng suffer."

Seeing his impeccable etiquette, Kong Ling waved his hand. Supporting himself up, he looked at the Imperial Army and said, "There's no need for the Vice Commander to take it to heart. I'm willing to do whatever it takes to take down the bandits."

"But when all is said and done, I did not inform you in advance." Shen Zechuan turned his head back to call out to Ding Tao, "Go get a clean robe for Mister, and call the physician over too."

For Cizhou's sake, Kong Ling would not hold a grudge against Shen Zechuan. Although he still had some ill-feeling, he understood that there was a reason for Shen Zechuan's actions, and so he let Ding Tao support him as he bowed to Shen Zechuan. Xiao Chiye, who had also gotten off his horse, walked swiftly towards them.

"I never thought there would be another person behind Lei Changming." Kong Ling looked at the mountain forest. He had just survived a great catastrophe, yet he was still plagued by worries and anxiety. He said, "This man is heartless and skilled at disguises. He's also cautious to boot. Now that we have let him escape today, there will surely be trouble again in the future."

"If His Lordship and the Vice Commander had not arrived in time, Cizhou would not have escaped this calamity." Zhou Gui put down his sleeves and gave both of them a long, deep bow.

“It was because Your Excellency showed no fear in the face of danger that bought us time.” Xiao Chiye turned his head aside to wipe away the dust off his face. He said, “The Imperial Army still has troops lying in ambush at the public road south of Cizhou. There are also troops stationed at the old camp Lei Changming left behind in the east to stand guard. He is already surrounded by the Imperial Army. It won’t be easy for him to escape.”

“It’s all thanks to Your Lordship’s reinforcements from the south that he eventually retreated.” Kong Ling sighed with emotion. “Your Lordship is wise. We’ll send someone to open the south gate right away.”

Xiao Chiye laughed and looked at Shen Zechuan. But he did not say a word.

Shen Zechuan said, “There’s no need for Your Excellency and Mister to rush. The Imperial Army’s reinforcements are still on the public road more than ten li away.”

Stunned, Zhou Gui looked at Ding Tao and said, “Then, that means...”

Ding Tao’s back was still hurting. When he saw everyone looking at him, he hurriedly nodded his head solemnly and replied, “They are still on the public road and are not heading towards Cizhou. On our way here, Young Master told me to yell that phrase when I’m in a desperate situation, saying that it’s a magical weapon that would lead us to victory. Sure enough, that man fled after I shouted it!”

Kong Ling faced Shen Zechuan and made to bow again. He said, “Vice Commander, please accept this bow of mine.”

Lei Jingzhe wanted to lure the Imperial Army away and charge right into Cizhou all because he feared a confrontation with Xiao Chiye head-on. This man was very smart. He did not know if Xiao Chiye had real capabilities to speak of, but he was unwilling to stake his troops on this gamble with Xiao Chiye at this point in time. That was why Shen Zechuan knew for certain that he would flee instantly as soon as he thought there were still reinforcements at the south. However, if an adult among them were to speak of “reinforcements”, they would not be able to convince Lei Jingzhe right away. Only Ding Tao, who yelled it out at the most critical juncture when his life was hanging in the balance, would be able to make Lei Jingzhe believe him without a doubt.

“My good lad.” Zhou Gui liked Ding Tao so much at this moment that he wanted so much to acknowledge the latter as his son. He patted Ding Tao several times and praised, “You make it sound so convincing that even I believed it!”

Ding Tao’s back was in pain, but he did not dare to voice it out, and so he could only endure it and nodded his head vigorously.

“I initially thought he was merely a bandit who had forcibly occupied the mountain forest.” Kong Ling walked into the city with them and said, “But his way of speaking throughout the journey here was really out of the ordinary. Although he claimed to be from a poor and humble background, I don’t think that’s the case. He had control over Lei Changming, yet he’s a generation younger than Lei Changming. I made several attempts to guess who he is, but I couldn’t figure it out.”

“He let Lei Changming be the chief, yet he could freely deploy these bandit-soldiers. This is a clear indication that this man is someone who moves around Lei Changming year in and year out. Seen from an outsider’s perspective, this man is likely a trusted subordinate or equivalent.” Xiao Chiye lifted his hand to lead Lang Tao Xue Jin.

“Not only that.” Shen Zechuan, who had given it some deep thinking last night, added, “Given Lei Changming’s headstrong character, he would not be willing to lower himself to be someone else’s chess piece. The fact that this man has such power and influence among the bandit-soldiers shows that Lei Changming had never suspected him before and believed in him completely. It’s much easier for blood kin to achieve such a level of trust with Lei Changming. Mister Chengfeng, does Lei Changming have any relatives?”

Kong Ling thought for a moment before he replied, “Lei Changming’s family is poor. I only heard that he has a younger sister who married the commander of Duanzhou’s Garrison Troops as a concubine. Later, Biansha invaded, and his younger sister and the commander were both massacred...” He sucked in a breath and said, “That’s it. His younger sister bore the commander a son.”

“The son of a concubine from the Zhu clan in Duanzhou.” Zhou Gui added. “I remember it now. When I was still a tax circuit intendant during the reign of Yongyi, I followed His Excellency to participate in the baby’s one-month celebration banquet. Although the child Lei Changming’s younger sister gave birth to was a son of common birth born of a concubine of the Zhu clan, he was the eldest son—the first son of Zhu Jie, the commander of Duanzhou at that time.”

“If it’s really him, then it’s not surprising for him to have that kind of shrewdness.” Kong Ling turned his head to explain to Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye. “The value of the mother depends on her son, and mother and son lived well in the Zhu’s residence. But after Zhu Jie’s principal wife gave birth to a legitimate son of direct descent, they were both disdained and spurn by Zhu Jie.”

Just as Shen Zechuan was about to ask the name of this person, Zhou Gui suddenly exclaimed aloud and stared dazedly at Shen Zechuan.

“The Vice Commander’s mother was also present at the full month celebration banquet!”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 111 : MOTHER

The moment the words left Zhou Gui's mouth, he felt he had been too presumptuous.

Shen Zechuan's birth mother was called Bai Cha, but she was not a lady of the Bai clan from the Qidong Cejun Commandery. She was called by this name because when she was still in the establishment, someone praised her for being "as pure as white jade, as if made out of porcelain; whether her face is heavily or lightly painted, she beats them all in the establishment." At that time, Duanzhou was still a well-known red-light district in Zhongbo, where the world's beauties gathered. The literati vied with each other to organize banquets to critique these "flowers", and came out with a "ranking list" for those in the establishments. Every season, they would deliberate over the commentaries and adjust the ranking of the beauties on the list.

Bai Cha was the "most popular flower" during the reign of Yongyi, and in all of five years, she was never dethroned from her top rank. Each time she listened to the commentary of the courtesans through the screen, everyone in Duanzhou would turn out en masse. When she danced for the Prince of Jianxing, Shen Wei, there would be huge crowds of people thronging the streets of the establishment. Countless people climbed onto the ridges of roofs or stepped on the shoulders of others, all just to catch a glimpse of that faint figure of hers through the layers upon layers of hanging drapes. Her beauty became more and more legendary in those odes of the flowers that others fall over themselves to sing. Even Emperor Guangcheng, who resided deep in the imperial palace, had heard of her. Wanting to take advantage of the emperor's inspection tour to catch a glimpse of this beauty in person, he had repeatedly asked Hai Liangyi, who was still the Grand Secretariat Deputy Grand Secretary back then, "when will the inspection tour be scheduled?"

Zhou Gui had previously seen Bai Cha during the Zhu clan's newborn baby boy's full-month celebration banquet, but he had only sneaked a peek at that legendary beauty through a gap in the screen. Lei Changming's younger sister was initially from the establishment too. Before she was taken as a concubine by the Duanzhou commander, she was an old-hand who could be considered a "mama" when coaching the fledglings. It was on behalf of the girls of the establishment that Bai Cha went to attend the banquet and send congratulations.

This had all happened many years ago, and Zhou Gui's memory of it was already pretty vague. But when he looked at Shen Zechuan earlier, he realized that Shen Zechuan's side profile was rather similar to Bai Cha's, and so in a moment of excitement, he had inadvertently blurted it out.

Without a change in expression, Shen Zechuan said, "Then that's really a coincidence."

He was not intrigued, nor was he worked up. His memory of his birth mother was a blank piece of paper. Even though he had heard hundreds of rumors about her, there was no trace of her in his mind that was worth remembering. The role of "mother" in his life belonged to his shiniang, Hua Pingting, just like the role of the father belonged only to his shifu, Ji Gang. That was why he would go to great lengths to kill and destroy Ji Lei, who had harmed Hua Pingting. The two people who gave him life were never involved in Shen Zechuan's life. Bai Cha died early and never left so much a word for Shen Zechuan, while Shen Wei detested Shen Zechuan. The Princess Consort of Jianxing was in charge of all domestic matters in the residence. Before the age of seven, Shen Zechuan and Shen Wei had only met a grand total of seven times, and all of that had been during the family feast during the Spring Festival celebration. He and Shen Wei never even had an exchange of words that would have been expected between a father and son.

Shen Wei's loathing of him, however, was evident.

They were not like father and son; rather, they were more like mortal enemies born to abhor each other. Shen Zechuan's life in the Prince of Jianxing's residence was confined to a corner of an eave in the inner courtyard; he could not leave his own courtyard arbitrarily. His daily leisure activity was to sit on the veranda and count the white clouds that drifted past that small corner of the blue sky every day. When he was seven years old, he could already recognize a lot of words, and he learned all these on the sly by digging his way out of the dog hole in the courtyard every month to eavesdrop under the windows of the school Shen Zhouji and his other older brothers attended.

At that time, the power struggle between several of his older brothers, who had already come of age, was extremely intense. Even the various concubines of his father were scheming against one another. It was pandemonium in the entire inner courtyard, so much that even Shen Wei himself was reluctant to return home and stay. He kept a mistress outside the residence, and lived there for several months in a year, turning a blind eye to the strife within the residence. Later, Shen Zhouji, who was a son of direct descent born by the principal wife, emerged victorious and sent all his brothers, who were born by the concubines and who had already come of age, away to the various prefectures to take up various respectable sinecures. The Princess Consort of Jianxing was worried that those sons born of concubines who had yet to grow up would later cause trouble again in the future. So she decided to send them away, ostensibly to settle them down in their ancestral home in Chazhou with a teacher hired to teach them. In truth, however, it was to eliminate the possibility that a son born of a concubine could ever compete for power again.

Shen Zechuan was the only son whom Shen Wei personally issued a directive to have him sent to the old residence in Duanzhou. Shen Wei even refused to let him attend school or even hire a teacher for him. In that residence, he was taken care of by a deaf and dumb old woman servant who was also hard of seeing, while a maidservant his mother had left in the old residence would take over the job if he stepped out of the residence. That woman was greedy for money. Every month, she would siphon off the silver allocated by the Prince of Jianxing and cut down on Shen Zechuan's meals. Three meals a day gradually became two meals a day until it eventually became one meal a day. What's more, these were all cold leftovers.

Shen Zechuan felt the hunger in his tummy when he thought to this point. He loosened his grip on Yang Shan Xue and said, "Ding Tao, help Mister Chengfeng inside to have a change of clothes. Ce'an and I will play the host today and invite both gentlemen to a meal. We will talk about it in detail during the feast."

Zhou Gui was not an articulate speaker, and Kong Ling was afraid he might say something else to incur Shen Zechuan's displeasure, so he hurriedly grasped Zhou Gui by the arm and let Zhou Gui support him into the city.

Zhou Gui was still turning around in circles after Kong Ling finished changing his clothes. He said anxiously, "Say, why did I go and mention that?"

“Really.” Kong Ling said, “Of all things to mention, you had to go and mention that. Doesn’t bringing it up make it seem like you are suspecting him of being involved with the traitors? Fortunately, both of them are not suspicious by nature. Otherwise, we would be in a quandary.”

“It was a slip in a moment of haste. I’ll have to apologize to the Vice Commander later during the feast.” Zhou Gui sighed and said, “He came to help Cizhou out of a fix. I can’t trample on his goodwill like this.”

“Don’t make a conscious effort to bring it up during the feast.” Kong Ling sat up and thought for a moment before saying, “If Shen Zechuan is such a narrow-minded person, he wouldn’t have come. If you take this matter too seriously and insist on apologizing to him, then it’d look like you and I are the ones who are bothered by it. Besides, he might not really care about this matter. Compared to his mother, Shen Wei is the one who is truly abominable.”

It was not appropriate for them to let Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye wait for long. So they only took a short break before setting off for the feast.

Despite it being called a feast, it was actually just a simple lunch. Everyone had been rushing on their way over last night, and then they had engaged in close combat with the bandits at the foot of the city today. Shen Zechuan took Kong Ling’s age into consideration and did not keep them further for social engagement. Once they were done with their meals, he let Kong Ling head back early for a rest.

Xiao Chiye had to make arrangements for the Imperial Army’s patrol, and he still had to dispatch someone to the old camp to keep in touch with Tantai Hu. By the time he was done busying around, it was nearly dusk. He searched around and found Shen Zechuan at the top of the city walls.

“There’s still work to be done after tonight.” Xiao Chiye climbed up to the top of the city wall and said, “I thought you were still taking a short break in the courtyard.”

“I slept for an hour.” Shen Zechuan turned his head back to gaze at Xiao Chiye. “There is still something on my mind. I won’t be able to sleep even if I try.”

Xiao Chiye inclined his head and patted Meng, who was perched on his shoulder, to tell it to go and play by itself. He did not have the time to change his clothes, and so there was still dust and dirt on him as he stood beside Shen Zechuan. He asked, “What can you see from here?”

Shen Zechuan looked at the rise and fall of the mountain forest. The impending darkness that was about to blanket the sky was still huddled among the shade of the trees, while the inclining orange-red sunset shone in the sky at a side. Meng soared among them, like a pebble running rampant among a sea of silk-tree flowers, stirring up clouds of waves.

“The future.” Shen Zechuan answered calmly. “In the future, Cizhou will be the button that connects the Libei’s merchant route. We’ll open up a bridle path in the southwest that leads straight to Hezhou, and it’ll end at the entrance of the berth in Hezhou. That way, from dismounting to embarking, all the commercial goods can arrive at Yongyi Harbor in half a month. The Xi clan’s fleets of ships can open up trading opportunities with local specialties internally and exotic rarities externally. The silver warehouses that had been cleaned out can one day fill up again. I do not begrudge those money or where they have gone; we will have even more in the future. Cizhou is also behind Dunzhou and Duanzhou, which have become the ‘gates’ of Zhongbo. If they want access to the grains and commodities in the future, then they can only live in harmony with Cizhou.”

“No doubt there is a need to strengthen defenses after the reclamation of Dunzhou and Duanzhou. The rebuilding of the garrison troops is of urgent priority. You have to be very careful in your choices. Let those you can trust and who are up to the task attend to garrison duties. But those who are capable might not necessarily be willing to submit to another. When the time comes...” Xiao Chiye turns around and points in Libei’s direction. “I’ll build an armored cavalry barracks on the southeast of the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path. If anyone dares to mess around, just send me a whistle, and I’ll lead my men right over.”

Shen Zechuan laughed and said softly, “Cizhou is too important to you and me. This city cannot be ceded over to anyone else. Zhou Gui is a good official, but he isn’t suited to be the prefectural prefect of an entire prefecture. He can’t save anyone by relying on zeal alone, especially in this situation where he is surrounded by a pack of wolves lying in wait on all sides.”

“We are short of people.” Xiao Chiye had been thinking about this matter ever since he left Lei Changming’s old camp.

If Cizhou were to be the starting point for both of them, then they would be increasingly stretched as the territory expanded. This strain referred to the lack of capable, right-hand men to administer official affairs.

If Qiao Tianya or Chen Yang was still around, then the perilous situation of Cizhou today might not have materialized, but their position that was currently not obvious would still gradually go on to reveal contradictions.

“Zhou Gui is suited to be the Tax Circuit Intendant of the Six Prefectures. His love for the people is fundamental. A man like this would never let officials and merchants collude for selfish gains when he goes around on an inspection tour. But he’s also too benevolent. He won’t and won’t dare to mete out severe punishments, that’s why he can’t suppress the local hoodlums. It was precisely because Kong Ling has an assessment of Zhou Gui’s character that he went to him to help him get rid of the obstacles in his way and to help him handle matters efficiently.” Shen Zechuan spoke unhurriedly. “If both of them can continue to work as one, then they would still be able to achieve plenty in the future.”

“That Lei Jingzhe.” Xiao Chiye asked. “What do you think of him?”

“This man must be defeated without a doubt.” Shen Zechuan moved along the battlements of the city wall and took a few steps forward. He said, “I also thought he was something when we left the camp. But I no longer think so after seeing his bearing and behavior today.”

“As expected, you and I are on the same wavelength.” Seeing as it was getting dark, Xiao Chiye moved next to Shen Zechuan and walked together with him. He said, “Lei Changming is his uncle related by blood. In order to get a head start in Cizhou, he left Lei Changming behind at the camp as an abandoned chess piece. In doing so, he might not be able to win his men over. And in his attempt to dodge the arrow when he was fleeing, he used the henchman by his side as a shield. From these two incidents, we can see that this man has no lack of shrewdness but is severely lacking in benevolence. If he wants to submit and pledge allegiance to Qudu and obtain an official position there, he will have to turn the bandits under his command into a regular army. But he still doesn’t seem to understand yet that being a bandit is very different from being a general. Prestige and trust are not something that can be accumulated by brutality alone. He keeps changing his orders again and again on the battlefield. As they say, a general does not retract the order he has given; he has to be impartial in dishing out rewards and punishments; and he must remain steadfast and unwavering, only then will he be able to lead and command the soldiers.<sup>1</sup> He is simply not cut out to be a general at all.”

“That’s why I’m more worried about Qi Zhuyin than this man.” Shen Zechuan hesitated before the stairs. He said, “The marriage alliance between Qidong and the Hua clan cannot be reversed. Now that Libei has rebelled, Qidong is the last crutch that Qudu has left to rely on. Within the next few days, Qi Zhuyin will no doubt receive a promotion and a noble rank. The empress dowager already has great admiration for her to begin with. Once her noble title is confirmed, it would be time for her to deploy troops north. No matter what, I have to turn Cizhou into an impregnable fortress before Qi Zhuyin arrives.”

“The Commander-in-Chief isn’t an easy one to fight. My eldest brother is the heavy cavalry, Lu Guangbai is the guerilla, while Qi Zhuyin is the cavalry and infantry combined. Having resided in the Cangjun Commandery for a long time, she won’t deploy the troops easily, but she has a tendency to launch a violent assault and storm the enemies. Back then when she penetrated deep into the desert to save Qi Shiyu, she was like the sudden onslaught of rainstorm that gave her opponents a jolt. It’s her usual practice to cut down foes with one blow to strike fear in the heart of others, so that when they faced her in battle, they will not help but be frightened.” Xiao Chiye mulled it over for a moment. “I want to fight a battle with her.”

Shen Zechuan looked at him.

Xiao Chiye patted his shoulder and said, “It’s not like I want to fight her now. The way you look at me is so fierce.”

Shen Zechuan took a step down the stairs. As if remembering something, he looked back and asked, “Where’s my fan?”

Xiao Chiye pinched his chin and strode down three steps with one stride. Then he crouched down before him and said, “Come on up, and I’ll give it to you.”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 将无还令，赏罚必信，如天如地，乃可御人; From the Three Strategies-Upper Strategies 《三略·上略》 by Huang Shigong (黄石公)

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 112 : CHASING THE STARS

The setting sun faded away, replaced by a scattering of stars that adorned the sky peeking through the tree branches. The Imperial Army's patrol squad made their rounds around the streets and alleys. Giving Shen Zechuan a piggyback, Xiao Chiye walked along the street shrouded under a cloak of shadows. It was a little hot this summer night, and Xiao Chiye had his ceremonial outer garment open as he walked at a speed that was not fast.

Shen Zechuan lifted his head high and put his chin on top of Xiao Chiye's hair. Xiao Chiye was too tall, causing the upper half of Shen Zechuan's body to be exposed to the moonlight. He only had to turn his head, and he would have been able to look over the wall into other people's courtyards.

"I'll head for the old camping grounds tomorrow morning and intercept his escape route from the east. He won't dare to head north, and there are troops lying in ambush to the south. I'll be back in three days, at the very latest." Supporting Shen Zechuan, Xiao Chiye said, "It has been a long time since we last got news of Qudu. We have to send someone to make inquiries as soon as possible. Only then will we know of Qi Zhuyin's movements."

"The marriage between Hua and Qi has been delayed again and again. To seek external aid, the empress dowager will not let Qi Shiyu wait any longer." Shen Zechuan estimated the dates and said, "The wedding will not be delayed beyond the eighth month at the very latest."

"Hua Xiangyi can go right ahead and marry all she wants." Xiao Chiye said. "As long as she doesn't have an heir, it's still Qi Zhuyin who has the final say in Qidong. She's going there to be the second wife,<sup>1</sup> and she's even younger than Qi Zhuyin. If she gives birth to a son, he will be Shi Shiyu's legitimate son of direct descent. Once Qi Shiyu croaks, mother and son will be the hidden obstacle that stands in the way of Qi Zhuyin from holding on to military power."

"The prestige of the commander-in-chief among the troops cannot be underestimated. Will she really fear a brother of direct descent who is younger than her by so many years?" Shen Zechuan thought and said, "If she seeks peace back at home and lives in harmony with Hua Xiangyi, then she would instead save herself a lot of trouble.”

“It hasn’t been easy for Qi Zhuyin to be conferred a title. It’s evident from the setbacks she faced when she took over Qidong’s Five Commanderies. Not only is Qudu deeply uneasy over her gender, but even Qidong internal military administration officials had also begun to stir.” At this point, Xiao Chiye paused for a moment before he continued, “Besides, I have already handed over the genealogy records that I got someone to copy to Qi Zhuyin a long time back in Qudu. Just with this alone, she will never let Hua Xiangyi give birth to a child.”

As long as Hua Xiangyi’s standing in Qidong remained shaky, the empress dowager would never be able to turn the Qidong’s Garrison Troops into her own right-hand men. However, this was all based on the premise that Qudu still had no real emperor. If Qudu were to push forth a new emperor before winter arrived, then Qi Zhuyin would be on track to face off Libei.

“I’m worried about Lu Guangbai.” Xiao Chiye kept his relaxed expression in check and said, “After autumn, the Biansha Cavalry will cross the boundary into our territories to plunder food. This is the time when their horses are plump and well-fed, and they will choose to take a risk in order to better survive the winter. The Bianjun Commandery relies on Dazhou to allocate and distribute their military provisions. The Twelve Tribes of Biansha are well aware that they are poor, and they also know that the granary is built right in Bianjun, and it’s close to the camps. That’s why they would go after Lu Guangbai every time. Qidong’s military provisions this year were cut by half. He’s by far the worst off when it comes to surviving and defenses. My leaving of Qudu only serves to exacerbate the situation and make matters worse for him.”

But this was something that even Shen Zechuan had no way to help. If Bianjun’s position had not been so far east, and if there had not been Tianfei Watchtower and Suotian Pass stationed on both sides, then perhaps they could still send a message to Ge Qingqing, who was still in Juexi’s Yongyi Harbor, and get Xi Dan to think of ways to buy a batch of grains from Juexi and send it to Qidong through Hezhou as an emergency measure for Lu Guangbai. But Bianjun just had to be to the east of Cangjun. There were obstacles both to the left and right, and there was no other passage unless they transported it right under Cangjun’s nose. Qidong was not Juexi either.

Qi Zhuyin had set up layers upon layers of impenetrable defenses there. It was simply impossible to think of passing through it without so much a sound.<sup>2</sup>

Bianjun was just like the night watchman standing on the edge of a cliff. It was a place similar to a desperate and hopeless situation.

Finding the atmosphere heavy, Xiao Chiye turned a circle with Shen Zechuan on his back and said, "The utmost priority now is still to pursue and attack Lei Jingzhe. Once we manage to secure Zhongbo, it'll be easier to help Bianjun. As long as we can cross over Tianfei Watchtower, we will be able to arrive there directly. Why are you still sniffing when I'm reeking of sweat all over?"

Shen Zechuan wiped off the beads of sweat on the side of Xiao Chiye's neck with his fingers. He snuggled against his cheek and said, "Start running."

Xiao Chiye jerked him once and answered, "Too tired to run."

Shen Zechuan pinched Xiao Chiye's cheek and said, "If the Second Young Master can't do it, then I'll do it."

Xiao Chiye made a show of going to put him down and said, "Get down. This Second Young Master shall see how you are going to carry me back tonight."

Shen Zechuan tightened his arms around him. As he lifted his legs up, he said in all seriousness, "Why get so fired up over a minor matter? You can do it."

Xiao Chiye lifted him up again.

Shen Zechuan clung onto his back and edged his fingertips down along the front flaps of his clothes, pulling it down as he said into his ear, "Why can't Er-lang do it? Er-lang can do anything."

Xiao Chiye turned his head. He was surprisingly calm as he asked, "Where to?"

Shen Zechuan said, "To—"

Shen Zechuan had not finished his words when Xiao Chiye took a stride out with his long legs and broke into a run. Carrying Shen Zechuan on his back, he ran past the tree shades, stepping upon the moonlight of the summer night as he made his way into the alley where the lights were already extinguished. The patrol squad came and went, but they never noticed both men's figures. Xiao Chiye easily leaped across the small steps, where dappled shadows of trees fell upon his hair. There was a clatter as their shadows crashed into and broke up the starlight on the ground, like the free and reckless wind among heaven and earth.

The young servant boy guarding the door to the small courtyard was still yawning. When he heard the knock on the door, he thought the marquis and vice commander had returned. With his clothes draped around him and with a lantern in hand, he went to open the door with a smile on his face. But it was empty on the other side of the door.

“A poltergeist?” The young servant boy blurted in a soft voice and poked his head out, but he did not see anyone to his left and right, so he quickly shrank back and trotted back to his room with his outer garment wrapped tightly around him.

The corridor was dark, with no lit lanterns. Shen Zechuan’s footsteps were in such disarray that he almost tripped Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye pressed Shen Zechuan up against the door panel and pulled off the ribbon, which Shen Zechuan had used to tie up his hair, as they kissed. The kisses left Shen Zechuan gasping for breath. He reached out both hands behind his back and felt around in search of the door lock.

“No key.” Xiao Chiye lifted Shen Zechuan slightly. His eyes pressed in close before him, and he looked greedily at Shen Zechuan. “Can’t enter.”

Shen Zechuan’s heels slid down along the back of Xiao Chiye’s waist, but then he raised his hand and pressed his palm against Xiao Chiye’s approaching chin to stop it in place. He breathed out a double entendre, his breath hot, “If you can’t enter, then you can’t enter.”

Xiao Chiye pinched Shen Zechuan’s mouth open and lowered his head to take in that sliding tongue. All of last night’s exhaustion from the rushed journey seemed to have been swept away clean. Shen Zechuan swallowed the saliva and listened to the creaking of the door panel from the bumps. He wanted to ease that jarring sound, so he pulled Xiao Chiye closer until the latter was right on him without the slightest gap between them.

“Let’s build a home.” Grinding against soft flesh, Xiao Chiye’s throat tightened as he said with a sigh that had escaped, “Here. Or anywhere else.”<sup>3</sup>

Shen Zechuan was sweating as he raised his head with misty eyes blurred by tears. He did not make a sound. He had not done it for a very long time, and he was being so stimulated tonight that he was trembling slightly. Just a few times, and it was all about to come out. He clenched the clothes on Xiao Chiye’s shoulder, creasing it as his chest heaved violently.

It was only when he calmed a little after a while that he said under his breath, “No. Can’t. In, into the room...”

But Xiao Chiye took this “no” as a reply to his earlier question and abruptly straightened his back, almost causing Shen Zechuan to cry out involuntarily.

“Why can’t Er-lang do it?” Xiao Chiye held Shen Zechuan firmly in his arms and pinched the latter’s face to correct its position. Then he said, ruthlessly and wickedly, “Er-lang can do anything.”<sup>4</sup>

Shen Zechuan’s words were cut off by Xiao Chiye’s kiss. The corners of his eyes quickly reddened, and even his half-exposed neck had gone red. He opened his mouth several times in an attempt to answer in between the kisses, but Xiao Chiye would not give him the chance. All he could do was to let other kinds of sounds loose. Sweat drenched through his clothes, and Shen Zechuan gradually found it hard to breathe. His forehead pressed against Xiao Chiye’s chest as the waves of ecstasy crashing over him made him dizzy. It was not even an hour, and he had already surrendered twice.

Xiao Chiye was done taking his bath only after Shen Zechuan fell asleep. Seeing the first glimmer of dawn outside the window, he did not take a rest but instead drank a cup of strong tea and crouched by the bedside to watch Shen Zechuan sleep soundly.

He still fell asleep, after all.

Xiao Chiye raised his hand to caress Shen Zechuan’s cheek.

Once he returned to Libei, he had to invite the Venerable Yigui over. Having turned it over in his mind from different angles after the episodes, his conclusion was that the frequent recurrence of Shen Zechuan’s illnesses – whether it was the cold or the epidemic disease – definitely had something to do with that medicine.

Too thin.

Xiao Chiye gazed at Shen Zechuan and thought in the silence that reigned.

Although he had also previously found Shen Zechuan thin back in Qudu, it was still much better than now. Shen Zechuan’s bout of illness after Qi Huilian’s death came and went quickly, but he had still yet to be fed back to health. There was nothing the entire journey here. Xiao Chiye held him, watched him, protecting his growing reliance on him every way he could.

Shen Wei and Bai Cha did not matter.

Xiao Chiye lowered his head and pressed up against Shen Zechuan's cheek as he stared, with deep hostility, at the sunlight which was attempting to cloak Shen Zechuan.

Shen Lanzhou was his—Xiao Ce'an's.

When Xiao Chiye spurred his horse out of the city, Zhou Gui and Kong Ling saw him off. Reining in the reins, he said, "I will return in three days, regardless of success or failure. The Imperial Army stationed here will stay put for the time being. The instant they detect Lei Jingzhe's trail, send someone to inform me posthaste. Although Cizhou's city walls are old and worn-out, you cannot simply just let it be and brush it aside. Lanzhou will explain the specific arrangements for reinforcements to both of you later."

"Rest assured, Your Lordship." Zhou Gui said. "All our men in Cizhou will go along with the Vice Commander's arrangements."

"As for matters relating to the reconstruction of Cizhou's garrison troops..." Xiao Chiye paused for a moment and said, "I won't concern myself with it. That will be military affairs Lanzhou will be deliberating over with both of you. The Imperial Army is only standing in as the authority on patrols. I can't overstep authority to handle it. So if there are any issues, please discuss them over with Lanzhou. I'm not at liberty to decide."

Kong Ling felt a warm buzz in his heart before it went cold again. They were originally worried that Xiao Chiye would use the patrols he was standing in for as an excuse to interfere with the reconstruction of the Cizhou's garrison troops. So he was relieved to hear him say so, but following right after, worries overtook him again. Xiao Chiye did not want Cizhou's military power. He would not accept Cizhou's remuneration, nor would he take Cizhou's grains. Then why did he go to the trouble of running all over to duke it out with Lei Jingzhe? He might as well head north and return home to live a free and unfettered life.

Kong Ling deliberated over his words, but before he could speak, he heard Xiao Chiye continue, "Since I've agreed to suppress the bandits for both gentlemen, I'll not renege on my promise. Your Excellency Zhou is willing to risk his head to let the Imperial Army pass through Cizhou. I naturally have to reciprocate this friendly sentiment. Moreover, the Imperial Army's food supply these few days is being borne by the common folks of Cizhou. We have eaten your rice, so we will surely fight the battles."

Zhou Gui bowed to him in farewell and said, "Then we shall wait here for Your Lordship to return in triumph."

"There are a few more matters I'll just tell both of you at the same time." Xiao Chiye's horse took a few steps around as he looked at Zhou Gui and Kong Ling and said, "I do not have the intention to take a concubine in this life. Now that I'm temporarily residing at Your Excellency Zhou's residence, there's no need to send any more people to the courtyard. Man or woman, I don't want any of them. Moreover, we are currently bogged down with work; I don't have the spare energy to beat around the bush with you both. So I'm throwing this out here today to make it clear to both of you."

Kong Ling knew he was referring to the incident the last time, and he could not help but look embarrassed, stuck in a predicament where it would be inappropriate for him to smile or answer.

"Lanzhou has lived in Zhongbo for a long time, and it's inevitable that there will be someone bringing up old affairs. But, he, Shen Zechuan..." Xiao Chiye raised the horsewhip and pointed in the direction of Qudu, "... is the student of Qi Huilian, the Grand Mentor of the Crown Prince in the Eastern Palace; the last disciple of Ji Gang of Duanzhou; the former Northern Judge-cum-Vice Commander of the Imperial Bodyguards; and the head of household of my – Xiao Ce'an's – future residence. He has nothing to do with any other names."

This time, even Zhou Gui did not know how to answer. He was not a person who would fob others off or give others the run-around to begin with, and Xiao Chiye's words had rendered him dumbstruck. His mouth opened and closed as he said, "Uh, uh..."

Xiao Chiye turned his horse around and rode away with his gyrfalcon in tow.

It was a long time before Zhou Gui returned to his senses. Clutching his sleeves, he asked Kong Ling, "What, what did His Lordship mean by this? Then the Prince of Libei..."

"He has already laid out his cards on the table this clearly. He doesn't give a hoot about the troops in Cizhou. But don't mention Shen Wei." Kong Ling calmly wiped his sweat and said, "And don't bring up Bai Cha again."

This is the uncensored version with additional text from revised version thrown in (unless otherwise stated).

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Thank you Peach for pointing out the typo! <3

Footnotes

1. 继室 specifically the second wife after the death of the first principal wife. She will have legitimate status, unlike a concubine, and her son will be a di and not a shu.
2. Map
3. In the revised version, it is:
4. “Let’s build a home.” Xiao Chiye said in a low and deep voice right close to Shen Zechuan, with a tenderness he himself had never realized. “Here. Or anywhere else.”
5. The words Xiao Chiye left unsaid: Including do you.
- 6.
7. The can’t do (不行) mentioned throughout their conversation not only refers to Ce’an’s physical abilities (e.g., carry Lanzhou and run) but is also an insinuation of his sexual prowess, i.e., he can’t get it up/can’t do Lanzhou (◡‿◡)

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 113 : REUNION

Ding Tao sat cross-legged on the veranda, moving aside the fruits on the silver plate as he counted them over and over again. He stood guard here, preventing anyone from coming near. It was getting late, with a few rays of the evening sun still adorning the courtyard walls as bits and pieces of the setting sun peeked through the leaves of the Chinese scholar trees.

Shen Zechuan had just awoken. He had slept for too long and too soundly, so his back and waist were sore and aching. He felt exceptionally tired. He opened the door, blanking out for a moment when he saw Ding Tao.

Ding Tao scratched his cheek, feeling uncomfortable with the way Shen Zechuan was staring at him. He put the hand that was still grasping the fruit behind his back and asked with apprehension, “Young Master, d-dinner?”

Shen Zechuan held onto the door and stood there for a little while, before asking in a hoarse voice, “... What time is it?”

“It’s the hour of you.”<sup>1</sup> Ding Tao was surprisingly aware today, and he quickly followed up with, “Young Master has slept for the entire day! Master left the city at the hour of mao<sup>2</sup> earlier. His Excellency Zhou and Mister Chengfeng went to send him off together.”

The corners of Shen Zechuan’s eyes were still a little red, and under the lingering reddish-orange glow of the evening sun, he looked as if he was drunk. He was pale to begin with, and Ding Tao found the way he looked when he lowered his eyes to slip on his shoes really handsome.

“Still no word from Juexi?” Shen Zechuan went down the steps, but he was not in a hurry to leave. Instead, he stood under the Chinese scholar tree and tilted his head up slightly to look at the sky as he slowly recovered from the lingering effects of last night’s exertion.

“No.” Ding Tao followed behind Shen Zechuan. Seeing as Shen Zechuan did not look back, he seized the opportunity to hastily stuff the other uneaten half of his fruit into his mouth and gobbled it down ravenously.

Shen Zechuan did not see any sign of Meng, and knew that Xiao Chiye had brought it along with him. He turned back, startling Ding Tao so much that the latter choked and coughed. Shen Zechuan paused for a moment, then said, "No one is going to snatch it away from you. Take your time."

Ding Tao was choking so much his eyes teared up. As he waved his hand, he tugged at the front of his clothes and said with difficulty, "Y-young Master, cough! Are we going to look for His Excellency Zhou? His Excellency and Mister Chengfeng had taken their dinner in the front hall and are presently discussing matters."

Shen Zechuan nodded and said, "Let's go."

Zhou Gui had just finished his meal. At present, he was having a discussion in the study with Kong Ling and the various Cizhou officials of differing ranks. When he heard that Shen Zechuan had come, he immediately got up and dismissed the others.

"His Lordship has told us that the Vice Commander is feeling unwell today, so we thought that we would only be able to discuss military affairs tomorrow. We didn't expect the Vice Commander to come over today still." Kong Ling showed Shen Zechuan a seat, then sat down after him so that he would not feel awkward. He faced them slightly and continued, "Although it's still the sixth month, the trees we have planted in the residence are all tall, lush trees; it's often cold at night. The Vice Commander is used to Qudu after staying there year in year out. Now that you're here, you have to take care of your health."

Shen Zechuan took a sip of tea to moisten his throat, easing up the dryness and hoarseness a little until it was not as obvious. Only then he said, "Mister Chengfeng is right. Mister said that we would be able to discuss military affairs tomorrow. Have both of you already drawn up a charter today?"

"Ever since the Vice Commander agreed on a treaty of alliance with us, I have gathered the advisors along with the various ranking officials in Cizhou over these few days to draft up a simple copy." With a hand on his knee, Zhou Gui watched as Kong Ling got up to hand a book to Shen Zechuan. He continued, "These are all tentative. We will still need the Vice Commander's approval for the specifics. Take a look. If there's anything inappropriate, we can lay it all out for further discussion tonight."

Although he said that they were waiting for Shen Zechuan's approval, he also said they could "lay it all out for further discussion". This meant that most of the content within this book was actually already finalized.

Such was the awkward situation in which Shen Zechuan had found himself in right now. He had the money, but no other real powers on hand to speak of; Xiao Chiye's attitude was the key to the fact that he could even be at the discussion table with these two. Zhou Gui could thank him or even hold him in high esteem, but he would not hand over Cizhou's policy-making power to him. Because what they had agreed upon was a treaty of alliance, not a pledge of allegiance.

Shen Zechuan read the book amidst the silence in the study. Only Ding Tao was on the outside, teasing his sparrow; there were no servants walking about to disturb them. As Kong Ling drank his tea, a sudden uneasiness overtook him. He maintained his composure as he studied Shen Zechuan's expression, but he could not discern any sentiments on Shen Zechuan's face. He then looked at Zhou Gui, who was already letting his expression betray his urgency. He could not help but think to himself.

This Shen Zechuan was still young, yet he was an extremely deep and shrewd one. After spending several days together, Kong Ling still could not tell whether he was a willing party or not; there was no way they could find an appropriate way to deal with him. So the drafting of this book was also meant to sound out his intention as well.

It was only when the sky had slightly darkened that Shen Zechuan closed the book. He rubbed his fingertips against the teacup without saying a word.

Kong Ling was the adviser, so when they were engaged in a serious discussion of official affairs in the study, he could not overstep his authority and bypass Zhou Gui. At the same time Zhou Gui got him to light the lamps, he turned slightly to his side to face Shen Zechuan and deliberated over his words, "So what does the Vice Commander His Excellency think?"

"Your Excellency has also recorded the price fluctuations of the daily necessities of fuel, rice, oil, and salt in Cizhou over the past few years in the book, and the accounts are all clear enough that there won't be a problem estimating next year's approximate expenditure. I've also seen that Your Excellency has also written about the proportion of military pay and provisions to be allocated for the garrison troops in the future. Your Excellency has worked day and night tirelessly, taking all the various aspects into consideration." Shen Zechuan said with a smile.

Zhou Gui let out a light sigh of relief; he did not know why he was so strung up. Upon hearing Shen Zechuan, he then replied, "This book is not something I alone can write; I still have Chengfeng and my fellow officials to thank for this. Then, shall we begin to discuss the defenses of the city walls?"

Shen Zechuan's fingertips paused in place. He said, "There's no rush. I have some questions."

To which Zhou Gui hurriedly prompted, "Please, go on."

"Going by Your Excellency's estimation of Cizhou's next year approximate expenditures, there is also a remuneration of 16,000 dan<sup>3</sup> of grains for the 20,000 Imperial Army troops other than the rebuilt garrison troops. The total sum for both armies is 110,000 dan of grains." Shen Zechuan pondered it over. "This is allocated according to the amount of bumper harvest in Cizhou last year, and it's also what had been saved up for the original number of people in Cizhou at present. But I can see that Your Excellency still has a remaining ten thousand dan of grains left unmarked."

"That's right." Zhou Gui answered.

Although Xiao Chiye said he did not want any remuneration, they could not really not give any for real. This 16,000 dan of grains was only enough to last the 20,000 Imperial Army troops two-and-a-half months. This was more than the monthly amount they allocated to the 20,000 Cizhou garrison troops. Although they were unable to supply a year worth of grains, they had already done their best.

Zhou Gui was worried that Shen Zechuan found it too little, so he said with sincerity, "It is with the hope that the Vice Commander and His Lordship can understand that I showed Cizhou's accounts to the Vice Commander today. Because of the instability in Dazhou this year, our grains from last year were all successively allocated to Libei and Mount Luo. This is something that we could not have foreseen. We had the Juexi's granaries to assume responsibility for the supply of military provisions in the past years, but now this responsibility has been split between the two prefectures of Cizhou and Huaizhou. I don't know about Huaizhou, but our Cizhou really had to skimp and save in order to be able to ship out the grains. It's not that I'm complaining to the Vice Commander, but to tell you the truth, we are gritting our teeth as we shoulder the burden of the temporary supply of grains from Cizhou to His Lordship's 20,000 Imperial Army. But even then, we will only be able to hang on for a couple of months. Fortunately, it's nearing the autumn harvest, and we will be able to make it till then after counting the days, that's why we are still not at the stage where we are at the end of our rope. I would like to ask the Vice Commander to intercede with His Lordship on behalf of Cizhou regarding this 16,000 dan of grain. It's not that we want to go back on our words by shifting it to next year, but there is really too much to consider."

There was already an imprint of a frown permanently etched between Zhou Gui's eyebrows given how he was always knitting his brows in worry. He rose to his feet and paced for a few steps in the open space before he said to Shen Zechuan.

"Cizhou is a place where the people's livelihood is at the mercy of the elements. But who could say if Heaven would still be willing to grant us food next year? Seeing as Dazhou has already come to this stage, I fear that once war arises next year, the fertile farmlands that Cizhou had just cultivated would be destroyed in just a moment. When the time comes, even the common folks in the city will not be able to eat their fill. And we won't be able to afford to provide for the garrison troops even if we established one. We kept a surplus of military grains not only to keep them as emergency life-saving food relief but also as preparation for the Libei Armored Cavalry. Vice Commander, it's not that we are not willing to take out big sums of money for His Lordship to use, but the Libei Armored Cavalry is the first line of defense guarding against the Biansha Hanshe Tribe. It's a fact that they are more important than the 20,000 Imperial Army troops."

"Half of the reason why Cizhou is willing to sign a treaty of alliance with both of you is that I was thoroughly heart-broken and disillusioned by the Wei clan's military provision case. It's also because His Lordship is the second young master of the Xiao clan that dispelled many of my misgivings. I did this favor not just for both of you, but also for the Hereditary Prince. Although the Vice Commander has promised that we can still continue to use the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path, I still have to leave myself a way out. After all, Juexi is Dazhou's granary. To the various clans, that is a place of strategic importance. The Vice Commander covets it, and the Empress Dowager, even more so."

"Everything I have just said to the Vice Commander is heartfelt words from the bottom of my heart." Zhou Gui finally paused. He slowly bowed to Shen Zechuan and continued, "No one has it easy trying to make a living in turbulent times. I'm the Prefectural Prefect of Cizhou, and to me, Cizhou's safety is of utmost importance and priority. His Lordship and the Vice Commander have helped Cizhou out of a spot this time, and I will not hesitate to go through fire and water for both of you. If Cizhou still has a bumper harvest this year, then we can still add on to this 16,000 dan of grains next year. But Cizhou really can't supply the Imperial Army in the same way we are supplying to the Libei Armored Cavalry. I'll be frank with you. If Biansha were to invade us in autumn, or if Libei is hard-pressed for grains next year in spring, then Cizhou will allocate the grains to Libei Armored Cavalry first before we allocate it to the Imperial Army."

The candle flames in the study were not very bright. Zhou Gui lived frugally, eating and dressing simply. Other than the time he had to entertain Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye, his entire family would usually have common dishes for their meals. They even cooked tree barks during the years they were hit with disasters. Cizhou currently seemed to be the most prosperous and well-off place in Zhongbo, but in truth, it was still in shambles compared to compared to the other lands. His willingness to take out the grains was a great load of pressure on his shoulders. Zhou Gui's suggestion that they request the aid of the Libei Armored Cavalry the first time Xiao Chiye left the city was not made on the spur of the moment; it was an idea that was already deeply ingrained in his mind.

The defeat of Zhongbo's troops had been said countless times, both implied and stated, but outsiders would never experience and share the same pain as those who had been through it. Zhou Gui even developed posttraumatic symptoms because of the troop defeat case. If he so much heard a whistle at night, he would toss and turn all night in a constant state of anxiety. The defeat of the Chashi River along the boundary was really too tragic. Massacre, massacre—this word made its way back to Qudu from Duanzhou. Everyone was reading this word aloud back then. But to Qudu, bloodbath was merely a smudge of ink on the memorial. To Zhongbo, however, the destruction of properties, loss of lives, and ruin of families were all too real.

It was all because of the Libei Armored Cavalry that Cizhou had a narrow escape. In the eyes of Zhou Gui and everyone in Cizhou, the Libei Armored Cavalry was far more important than the Imperial Army. Xiao Jiming led his godly troops down to save them, and "River of Ice Armored Cavalry" was thus the death exemption token in the face of the Biansha

Cavalry at the two borders to Dazhou's north and east. Lei Jingzhe dared to angle for Cizhou, but he did not have the intent to settle down for long; he was even ready just to rob Cizhou's grains and leave to seek credit right away from Qudu. What he feared was precisely Xiao Jiming's deployment of his troops south again.

Xiao Jiming suffered a loss and was wounded in the military provisions case. But none of them had seen it with their own eyes. Those who were waiting for him did not dare to believe it, while those who feared him did not dare to bet on it. If the old-school senior officials headed by Hai Liangyi feared Xiao Fangxu, then the one those juniors down the ranks feared more was Xiao Jiming.

Silent reigned in the study. The candlelight flickered.

Shen Zechuan felt his back and waist aching. There were still traces of Xiao Chiye's bites on his collarbone, which had been covered up by his collar. Strangely enough, even at such a serious and solemn moment, he remembered Xiao Chiye's sweat-drenched face, Xiao Chiye's strong arms, and Xiao Chiye's kisses that wandered around his neck as Xiao Chiye gasped for breath.

He remembered everything about Xiao Chiye. The only thing he could not think of was a way in which Xiao Chiye was inferior to Xiao Jiming.

Shen Zechuan was silent for only a few moments, and his mind wandered for only a fleeting instant. He said, "I understand all that Your Excellency has said. We will return the exact same amount of the grains that Ce'an and I have temporarily borrowed after our arrival here next year."

The color promptly drained from Zhou Gui's face. He tried to explain, "Vice Commander, that's not what we..."

"The issue I wanted to discuss with Your Excellency is not that the grains you are allocating to the Imperial Army are too little, but that it's too much." Shen Zechuan motioned for Zhou Gui to sit and lay it out with clear reasoning, "The fact that Cizhou is willing to allocate so much grains for the Imperial Army's use is proof enough of your sincerity. But as we mentioned at the beginning, the Imperial Army will only use the grains from Cizhou at this point in time. The Imperial Army has a supply channel for future military provisions, so it doesn't need to draw from Cizhou's granary."

Zhou Gui felt foolish and did not dare to interject arbitrarily, so he looked at Kong Ling and said, "Chengfeng is the one who supervised the drafting of the book, so there are some matters that he understands better than I do. Chengfeng, explain to the Vice Commander.”

Holding on to the back of the chair for support, Kong Ling rose to his feet. Instead of explaining, he asked, “The Vice Commander is so certain that the Imperial Army would not lack grains in the future, and you also said that the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path can still be used as usual. We really can’t think of any countermeasure that would allow us to do this. Would the Vice Commander be so kind as to explain to us? Otherwise, we will still have to ask the Imperial Army to accept this batch of grains.”

Shen Zechuan gently stirred the tea in the teacup with the lid and said, “Before this, I still want to ask both of you if Cizhou is going to live off the land in the future?”

Kong Ling replied, “Cizhou is limited by its geographical position. If not, then how can we survive?”

“What I see is the exact opposite of Mister.” Shen Zechuan put down the teacup and said, “It’s true that Cizhou was initially in a non-ideal position. There’s Libei to the north and Chazhou to the south. It is obstructed by Dunzhou and Duanzhou to the east and restricted by Dancheng to the west. It doesn’t dare to move as it pleases, and it can’t move at will either. But that was when Cizhou was still subordinated to Qudu. You are now on good terms with Libei. Dancheng can no longer rely on Qudu’s power and influence to force Cizhou to carry out orders. Meanwhile, Dunzhou has been occupied by the bandits, and a purge is imminent. With these, the three-sided walls enclosing Cizhou have already collapsed. The remaining Chazhou is not an obstacle, but an opportunity.”<sup>4</sup>

Zhou Gui wanted to get up again. His robe had already gone all creased from his kneading of it. He asked cautiously, “You mean...”

“Chazhou lies along the waterway that can lead right to Hezhou. After the defeat of the troops, the merchants in Hezhou who had come from all over took advantage of the opportunity to peddle the grains at exorbitant prices in Zhongbo, earning quick and huge profits from bandits of all sizes. It would be truly a shame if this route is only used to make someone else rich.”

“But bandits are also currently in power in Chazhou. What’s more, Chazhou has relations with the Yan clan of Hezhou. They won’t let our Cizhou use the route to do business without good cause.” Kong Ling was growing anxious as he spoke. “Besides, what can we sell? Compared to Hezhou, Cizhou is a remote hinterland.”

“Grains.” Shen Zechuan said.

The moment he said that, Zhou Gui jerked to his feet and exclaimed, “No! Isn’t that the same as those conscienceless thieves who conspire with the Juexi officials and merchants to resell public grains for profit?”

“Your Excellency, please calm down.” The expression in Shen Zechuan’s eyes was too calm; so calm that Zhou Gui could not help but sit back down. He said, “The reason why there are people in Juexi and Hezhou reselling grains at exorbitant prices is that there is a shortage of grains in the various lands of Zhongbo, of which Chazhou is the worst hit. In Qudu, one tael of silver can buy you two dan of grains, while the same tael of silver in Juexi can buy you one dan and five dou<sup>5</sup> of grains. But in Chazhou, one tael of silver can buy you only two dou of grains. The money the bandits in Chazhou have on hand is all fleeced from the remaining commoners in Chazhou. Because of this, the law-abiding citizens registered on the household register cannot survive, and consequently, they are forced to take risks out of desperation. The number of people who are reduced to being bandits will only increase with time. Your Excellency, this is also the fundamental reason why Lei Changming—that is, Lei Jingzhe, is able to rapidly expand his troops to this number within six months. So, if Cizhou is willing to sell grains to Chazhou at a fair price slightly higher than Qudu, it would be helping Chazhou instead.”

“But,” Kong Ling frowned slightly. “If we sell the grains to Chazhou, then there will no doubt be a shortage in the granary. If we only have silver in our hands, then won’t we be in the same plight as Chazhou is in now? When the time comes, the conscienceless grain merchants in Juexi and Hezhou go even further in trying to fleece money from us.”

“Hezhou is far away. Even if Cizhou wants to do business with it, there’s no hurry to do so in these one or two years. I had some understanding of Huaizhou when I left Qudu. Huaizhou contributed half the effort in the preparation of the military provision this time, and they have an abundance of grains in their granary. Dicheng, which is on the outskirts of Qudu, lies to the southwest of Huaizhou, and it leads directly to Juexi’s harbor too. Huaizhou just happens to lack money if it wants to conduct businesses through Dicheng. Cizhou can first sell the grains to Chazhou, then buy it back from Huaizhou at a price lower than Chazhou. The surplus silver can be used as a subsidy for other areas, while the granary can maintain its abundance of grains at all times. This can give the Libei Armored Cavalry, or Cizhou, some leeway at the crucial moments.”

The Imperial Bodyguards had an assignment to “keep track and record”, which is to take detailed records of the commodity prices in the streets and alleys. When Shen Zechuan was in office as the Northern Judge, he was in charge of the Imperial Bodyguards’ military craftsmen and could leaf through the Imperial Bodyguards’ annual records of the various areas. Ge Qingqing initially wanted to have it copied down, but Shen Zechuan spent the entire night memorizing it all down. He had been prematurely on guard against the unknown future and had not been willing to put all the important stuff down on paper that easily. As it turned out, he did right. They left Qudu in such haste that they had no time to bring anything else along. But all the records, files, and old registries and books he had read before went with him when he left.

Zhou Gui was lost in thought. He contemplated it over and over again, then said, “If Huaizhou isn’t willing...”

“It’s feasible! Luoxia Pass lies to the east of Huaizhou. It can transfer out local specialties from the frontiers of Libei, and it’s a linear route to have them transported to the harbor.” The more Kong Ling thought, the more excited he became. He could not help but walk a few rounds, then he slapped his thighs and said, “That’s right! We should have done it a long time ago! If Cizhou still doesn’t know how to adapt to the circumstances, then won’t it still be trapped in the same cage as before? This is workable!”

Shen Zechuan never answered the question of how he would keep the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path in use, but Kong Ling was already too preoccupied to bother about it. In the candlelight, he seemed to see a new lease of life for Cizhou. From what had happened with Lei Changming, he had thought Shen Zechuan to be a man who would stoop to deception and trickery. But now, he had forgotten all about it. He wanted to grab hold of Shen Zechuan to say his proper thanks, but then, when he extended his hand, he remembered Xiao Chiye, and so he hurriedly retracted them and said, “If we do this, then even if we have an over-surplus of grains in the next few years, we would not have to fear it growing mold in the granary.”

“Then, let’s discuss the garrison troops.” Zhou Gui said from across the table. “And the defenses of the city walls.”

Shen Zechuan drank his hot tea. He had yet to open his mouth when he saw Ding Tao, who had been outside the study, poked his head in and waved his hand vigorously at him.

“What’s the matter?” Shen Zechuan rose to his feet and walked over to the door.

Ding Tao had gone out earlier, and he had been running until his entire head and face were drenched in sweat. He opened his mouth and said, “Young Master, Young Master! They’re here!”

Zhou Gui and Kong Ling came closer too. One moment, they saw a very worked-up Ding Tao. The next moment, he suddenly closed both eyes and burst out crying. As if sensing something, Shen Zechuan walked out of the door in a daze. Sure enough, Ding Tao said as he choked with sobs, “Young Master! The brothers are back! Qiao Tianya is back too! And that Ji —”

Shen Zechuan was already taking large strides out to the courtyard. It was already completely dark outside, and he was still holding the teacup in his hand. As he walked, the tea spilled and scaled his fingers until they were slightly red, but he did not seem to notice; he had completely forgotten about it. He pressed on and walked outside the residence. It was a short journey, but he was sweating all over.

There were several carriages for the transportation of goods parked outside the residence, and a few tall figures were standing all spread out under the lanterns. The shorter one still in his cloak was turned sideways as he stood while resting beside the carriage.

Shen Zechuan’s chest heaved. The rims of his eyes were already reddened, but he forcibly held himself back, unwilling to lay his emotions bare here.

Ji Gang turned around for a look on hearing the movements and saw Shen Zechuan. He forgot all about the stone steps before him and nearly tripped. He revealed a headful of disheveled white hair and opened and closed his lips. Before he had even called out the name, he was already in tears.

“Chuan...” Ji Gang was just like a child with white hair. Even as he was miffed with himself for being inarticulate, he was also anxiously beckoning to him. “You, you...”

Shen Zechuan descended the stairs in two steps and stepped forth to support Ji Gang by the arm. Ji Gang turned his hands around to grab hold of Shen Zechuan's arms instead and sized him up and down. In this life, he was first an Imperial Bodyguard in Qudu and then a blacksmith in Duanzhou. Later, a great catastrophe befell him, and he lost both of his wife and son to the grim reaper. Even so, he would still push himself to put on a tough act before others. But now, on seeing Shen Zechuan, he could not control the tears from gushing from his eyes.

"Chuan-er..." Ji Gang wiped his tears with his rough fingers and looked at Shen Zechuan over and over again. All the thousands of words he had to say became a single line of "as long as you're fine."

He was travel-worn, and he had thinned down quite a bit. Qi Huilian was dead, and he had been feeling apologetic about it. At the same time, he feared Shen Zechuan would have a rough time after leaving Qudu, and so he had traveled at top speed the entire journey, unable to eat and sleep well. All those suffering piled up over his already hunched back. He had long ceased to be the Ji Gang who was renowned in the world. But this emaciated body of his was still willing to shelter and shield Shen Zechuan from the elements. For this son, he could travel thousands upon thousands of li, and he could fight the great heroes of the world. He really had nothing else to ask for; he only wanted to see Shen Zechuan alive and well.

"Why have you become so thin?!" Ji Gang could barely control himself from saying.

"Shifu." Shen Zechuan's voice trembled. "Why has shifu lost so much weight?"

"I'm too old to bear any torment." Ji Gang hastily wiped his tears and said happily, "I'm all good now that I've seen you!"

Qiao Tianya brushed the shattered teacup aside and knelt on one knee. With the intent to ease the poignant moment, he said with a smile, "Although it was a few extra months worth of journey, this mission was smoothly accomplished. Master, how about a reward of a meal and wine? Shifu, let's take a seat before we talk!"

The courtyard that was not big to begin with was all filled with people. Kong Ling told the kitchen to cook up some hot dishes and set up a table in the courtyard, whereupon he used "On Horseback"<sup>6</sup> to treat the newly arrived Imperial Bodyguards and Libei guards to a dinner.

Qiao Tianya chased after Ding Tao's plump sparrow with a pair of chopsticks and said, "We've all gone thin from the running, but you fed it until it's all fat. Are you planning to make it into a dish for us to enjoy with wine?"

Ding Tao was initially happy. But on hearing him, he scooped up the sparrow and said sharply, "No!"

Gu Jin was starving. Even in the intervals when he was busy shoving rice into his mouth, he did not forget to extend his chopsticks and hit Qiao Tianya's chopsticks back. He said in a muffled voice, "You need a spanking or something? Why do you have to insist on bullying a kid?"

"Your share of the food during the journey was never deducted." Chen Yang said as he sat and drank the wine. "So why are you still this hungry?"

"Brother Gu gave out all his food to the children begging along the way." It was then Fei Sheng socialized with them. He knew that everyone would be fellow comrades in the future, so he chose his words and picked the nice things to say, "Brother Gu is quite the chivalrous one to dig out a good amount of copper coins to buy steamed buns for them."

"Help others in an emergency, but not if they are in constant poverty," Chen Yang said earnestly with good intentions. "You really have to change that habit of yours where you go all soft-hearted when you see others weep. There's a shortage of food everywhere now. I'm not telling you to refrain from doing kind deeds, but you really need to know your limits."

"You spent all your money?" Ding Lai sprawled over the side of the table and said, "Jin-ge, didn't you say the last time that you would hand it over to me? I'll save it all up for you to marry a wife. I've long said to leave it with me. I remember it very clearly." As he spoke, he fished out his little book. "It's still written here that you drank wine and borrowed three copper coins from me during the spring festival three years ago. Of course, I don't care about this bit of money. I don't care. Really, ge, I'm just..."

Gu Jin ate to his heart's content. He stuffed the cotton he always brought along with him into his right ear, then turned to the left and said, "Wine from back home? Give me a jar."

"Only three cups." Qiao Tianya had already stopped eating earlier. He said, "You have to go with me to report to my master in a moment. Look at you drinking yourself drunk. Are you forgetting how His Lordship punished you the last time? At this time, I'd advise you to act with prudence."

He was usually laughing and joking. But he was the Vice Commander of the Imperial Bodyguard in the past, and he really gave off an imposing air when he played the part now. His tone was mild, but his words were not as pleasant to the ears.

Gu Jin frowned in irritation, but he still nodded his head and said, "It's just a craving; I haven't had a drink for months."

Gradually, Ding Tao stopped chattering. He was the youngest among these people, and they usually saw and treated him as a younger brother. None of the elder brothers had ever been stingy in buying him candy. As such, he was not afraid of anyone and would dare to get close with everyone. He was born a discerning person, one who was particularly sensitive to the exchange of emotions between people. He could sense that the various older brothers did not seem to be as relaxed as they looked on the surface, so he held his little sparrow in both hands and behaved himself while he sat at the side, making neither noise nor fuss.

When they were almost done with their meals, Kong Ling arranged for some people to clear out the courtyard so that the guests who had been on the road all this while could rest. As it was already midnight, Shen Zechuan sent Ding Tao to lead Ji Gang away for a rest. The few at the head all had matters to report, and so they stood in successive order on the veranda and prepared to take turns to enter.

"Come on in all at once and take a seat. We can discuss it together if there's something you need to say." After all of them had entered, Shen Zechuan sat in the main seat and asked Chen Yang first, "Did the preparation of the military provisions go smoothly?"

Chen Yang sat upright and organized his choice of words for a moment before he said, "No. As Young Master had expected before I left, the officials of Huaizhou tried every means and way to stonewall and stall the preparations. The war in Libei was intense at that time, and Master's two-days deadline was just around the corner. I was burning with anxiety. It was a guard of Luoxia Pass, His Excellency Jiang, who stepped forth to vouch for me that Huaizhou was finally willing to release the grains. Fortunately, we made it in time for the deadline, and the Provisions Bridle Path leads right to Libei, so the military affairs were not held up." At this point, he fell silent for a moment before he continued, "I saw the Hereditary Prince back in Libei. He's severely injured. When he heard that Master was caught in a heavy siege back in Qudu, he wanted to lead the troops over to receive him. Unfortunately, His Lordship the Prince overruled him."

Shen Zechuan did not ask for further details. Instead, he turned to Gu Jin and said, "You came to Cizhou to transfer grains back then. Zhou Gui isn't that hard to deal with compared to the Huaizhou Prefectural Prefect. So why are you still looking troubled now?"

Gu Jin looked somewhat taken aback to be called. Everyone present could notice his absent-mindedness. Shen Zechuan looked at him. Gu Jin replied, "... It's true that I did not encounter any difficulties when I came to Cizhou to supervise the preparation of military provisions. I went along with the troops to deliver it to the frontline well in advance, and I even saw His Lordship the Prince at the eastern range of Hongyan Mountains."

He did not speak quickly, and when he stopped, he hesitated for a very long time.

"I heard that Master had left Qudu, so I've been waiting for him to return home. It was when I saw Chen Yang in the army later that I knew Master had stopped over in Cizhou. And so I rushed over."

Libei was just to the north of Cizhou. By all reasoning, they should have been faster than Qiao Tianya.

Shen Zechuan tapped his fingertips lightly on the tabletop. He skipped over it and said to Qiao Tianya. "How about you? Tell me the details."

Qiao Tianya propped up his arm on the chair handle and answered very quickly, "I hurried on my way to search for shifu and teacher on Master's order. I traced the trail in the inner chamber of the Xue's residence and discovered that Xue Xiuzhuo had moved shifu over to the Donglong's broker house, but there was no trace of Mister. We were a step late... and we could not get out of the city gate, so we could only go into hiding in Qudu." As he spoke, he looked at Fei Sheng. "It just happened that he was also leading his men to hide from the noble clans' searches. We tried every means possible to get out of the city, but Han Cheng had the city so tightly guarded that not even a drop of water could get through. We really had nowhere to go, so we hid at His Lordship's Plum Blossom Residence. As luck would have it, it was in the Plum Blossom Residence that I found the layout blueprint of Qudu's public ditches that His Lordship had tricked out of the Pan clan."

This item was obtained by Xiao Chiye from Pan Lin when he had hosted a banquet after being promoted to a nobility rank. At that time, he was prepared to keep it for himself as a contingency measure. But by some unexpected turn of events, it became the key for Qiao Tianya and the rest's escape from Qudu.

"We crawled our way out from the public ditches." As Fei Sheng spoke, he reached a hand out to gesture with his fingers. "The public ditches in the various streets are all newly dug. I don't know if this was His Lordship's intent, but they are all narrow on the outside and wide inside. There are even candles and field rations stored in the dry spots. Over fifty of us relied on these field rations to circle around the Eight Great Training Divisions for more than ten days before we finally came out of Qudu at a place near Mount Feng."

"After we emerged, we realized that there were strictly enforced checks on public roads between Qudu and the eight cities. So we pawned off the gold, silver, and jade pendants on us and disguised ourselves as traveling merchants. We made a detour from the south of Chuancheng to Chazhou, then hurried from Chazhou over to Cizhou." Qiao Tianya said. "When we arrived at Chazhou half a month earlier, we heard that Han Cheng had already sent the imperial heir into the palace. But news was sparse after leaving Chazhou, so we lost track of what happened after. As for other details, we'll have to wait for Ge Qingqing's letter."

No one disturbed Shen Zechuan as he contemplated it over. He heard the sound of Ding Tao walking on the veranda and waited until Ding Tao walked to the door before he said, "Both of you are tired. So go with Ding Tao and take a rest for tonight."

Fei Sheng was a discerning man who could take his cues. He was not in a hurry to lay his loyalty bare tonight either, so he rose in one smooth move, took his leave of the master together with Qiao Tianya, and withdrew out of the room.

The candle flame flared a little and flickered for a moment.

Gu Jin never lifted his head to utter another sound. He sank in the darkness, with the shadows from the candle flame cast upon the side of his face like two of villains scuffling with one another.

Shen Zechuan was surprisingly cool-headed as he said, "Did something happen to both of you in Libei?"

Chen Yang lifted a hand to partially cover his face and propped up his elbow on the chair handle. He said, "... I've been staying close to the Hereditary Prince, so nothing really happened to me. It's Gu Jin."

Gu Jin undid his clasps in the unbearable silence, took off his upper garment, and turned around, thereby exposing his entire back right before Shen Zechuan. He said, "These matters should have been reported directly to Master, but Master will only be back a few days later. As per Master's instruction back in Qudu, I can report to Young Master's first. I arrived at the area where the war was the most intense. His Lordship and Commander-in-Chief Zuo are both safe. After the conclusion of the military provisions investigation, I temporarily took up my original position as the vanguard of the reconnaissance squad, dealing with the cavalry of the Hanshe Tribe every day. I can't remember which day, but we ran into an ambush when I was leading the squad back from the eastern mountain ranges."

That back was already festered. The more severe spots had already been scraped away. Blood could still be seen seeping through the bandaged areas.

"I was hit by an arrow, but I managed to escape. I initially thought it was someone from the Hanshe Tribe, so I led the remaining 200 men and skirted around the grasslands where the Hanshe Tribe lurks to make our way back through the Tudalong Banner's<sup>7</sup> swamps. But who knew, we got ambushed again that very night at Tudalong Banner." Gu Jin pulled up his clothes over him. As he secured the clasps, he said, "Young Master, I was initially a scout. It's because of this pair of eyes and ears that I could be chosen by His Lordship the Prince as a guard. I may not be as good as I was before in all these years I've stayed in Qudu, but after Master's admonition, I no longer dared to be negligent, especially on the battlefield where I tread with a lot more caution. That night, my marching route order was directly issued. I've never discussed it with anyone. Yet we got ambushed both times. So I started to suspect that there's a spy from the Hanshe Tribe in the squad."

"While escaping the second time, I discovered there was snake venom on the arrow. This poison had been smeared on Ding Tao's steel needles in the past. It's something that came from the Hongyan western mountain range. My back was festering pretty badly, and we were being closely pursued through the swamps. Then I was also bitten by some poisonous bugs. I couldn't hold out, and a fever broke out at dawn."

At this point, Gu Jin stopped.

He spoke dully, and he paused many times as if repeatedly confirming to himself in case he said one word wrong. He knew the implications of his upcoming words.

“Our horses all drowned in the swamp. I couldn’t walk on anymore. The Libei Armored Cavalry’s Changzhu camp lies about ten li or so south of Tudalong Banner. Strangely enough, no one was on patrol that day. I had my trusted junior general head back first while I remained where I was to wait for reinforcements. But no one came even after I waited from dusk to dawn the next day. I was worried that the spy would make use of this chance to enter Changzhu camp, so I pushed myself to hurry back. I barely escaped by the skin of my teeth back to the camp, but I was stripped of my blade and held in custody. I spent the entire night in the prison shack where the Biansha prisoners-of-war were detained. On the second day, I was taken to the front tent to be put on trial with the general of Changzhu camp, Guo Weili, presiding over it.”

Gu Jin omitted the details of the trial. He had no wish to recall it either. That was, to him, not physical pain, but a mental collapse of sorts.

He continued in a very, very soft voice. “They said I was in covert communication with the Hanshe Tribe to wipe out the vanguard squad even further east in the Tudalong Banner. They stripped me of my rank in the military and wanted me to confess if I had done so on someone else’s instructions. I can’t confess to something I have never done. I questioned Changzhu camp why they overlooked both of my consecutive requests for reinforcements, and they claimed that they never received it. According to military law, I would have to undergo a joint trial by three generals and have the current commander-in-chief give the go-ahead in person before I can be executed. But Guo Weili kept insisting that the Hereditary Prince have yet to recover from his severe injuries, and they had the authority to act on his behalf. If not for Chen Yang arriving in time that day, I would not be standing here before Young Master now.”

Shen Zechuan picked out the candle wick with a silver needle, and the flame extinguished. He stared at that candle, which seemed to be shedding tears. In just an instant, countless thoughts had already flashed through his mind. He did not even need to be reminded by Chen Yang and Gu Jin to remember, from the letter of appointment by the Ministry of War, that this Guo Weili was a person Xiao Jiming had single-handedly promoted.

Xiao Chiye followed the trail left by Lei Jingzhe and pursued him all the way to the north of the old camping grounds. He dismounted to grab a handful of soil, then looked ahead and slightly narrowed his eyes.

Tantai Hu surveyed the mountain range and said, "They are going to step across Libei's boundary line if they continue on north; they won't dare to head there, so they can only split up and flee. Master, I suspect he is leading us on a wild goose chase. It's too strenuous to keep chasing after them like this."

"He's indeed doing just that." Xiao Chiye loosened his grip. "And they are fleeing in small groups. Naturally, we can't catch them all in one fell swoop with a large net. But if we split up now, we will fall into the other party's trap. He's unwilling to fight me head-on because he can't handle the momentum of the Imperial Army. He's worried that his own men will lose focus and morale. They are familiar with this area, so they try every means possible to lure us into splitting up into small groups so that they can break through our defenses one by one."

"We don't have enough cavalry." Tantai Hu examined the terrains. "This brigand is really too crafty!"

"No rush." Xiao Chiye stood up.

Meng returned from his patrol and landed on Xiao Chiye's shoulder. It stood together with Xiao Chiye in the night breeze. The wind rustled the grass, scattering a few strands of willow leaves before him.

"Of the five arms, only fire is the most intense."<sup>8</sup> Once again, Xiao Chiye got on his horse. "I want a fire so blazing that he has nowhere to hide."

Tantai Hu followed suit and got on his horse. He said, "But there are more lands than trees here. If set aflame, I fear the fire will spread to the grasslands of Libei."

Xiao Chiye laughed out loud on the horse and said to Tantai Hu, "I'm not asking you to burn this place down. Go to the big towns and small villages along the way and get them to put up bulletins announcing that whoever harbors the bandits will be executed with immediate effect. If they inform the Imperial Army, they will be rewarded copper coins per bandit reported. I'll pay as much as they report. And tell them too, Cizhou is about to issue a conscription notice. If they go, three meals a day will be provided if nothing else, and informants who have been rewarded cash from the Imperial Army will be given priority. Since Lei Jingzhe doesn't want to be found by us, I'll make him expose himself."

Tantai Hu was hesitant, but still said, “But didn’t we run out of money...”

“Go report the figures to Lanzhou.” Xiao Chiye urged his horse on, then reined it in and looked back to say, “This Second Young Master can’t even dig out some copper coins?”

Tantai Hu looked embarrassed.

Xiao Chiye twirled his thumb ring and said with an unfeeling expression, “Oh.”

T97’s Words:

Three chapters in one.

A word about the grains. Here, 1 dan ≈ 90kg. Qudu has a special supply granary, so the price of grains generally will not fluctuate too drastically. Officials have monthly income subsidies. In comparison, the price of goods in Juexi is high. 16,000 dan can roughly last the 20,000 Imperial Army troops 2.5 months. But this is based on the premise that there’s no war and the Imperial Army has no cavalry and will not be on the move constantly. It’s a rough calculation I made. Of course, it’s also possible that I was off in my calculation orz.

Thank you for reading.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO

CEO Lanzhou + All of Zhongbo Mart’s minions

Eggy, Rie, Lam, Lin, Yunyun, Dee, Lianyin

+ Alex for burning brain cells!

Footnotes

1. 酉时 hour of you, i.e., 5-7 pm based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times
2. 卯时 hour of mao, i.e., 5-7 am based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times
3. 石 dan, dry measure for grain equal. 1 dan = approximately 90kg (see author’s note)
4. Map

5. 斗 dou, a dry measure for grain equal to one-tenth of a 石 dan
6. A strong wine from Libei, as mentioned in Chapter 102
7. 旗 qí banner, administrative subdivision in inner Mongolia equivalent to county in China
8. 五兵之中，惟火最烈 From Jixiao Xinshu; New Treatise on Effective Military Discipline 《纪效新书》 by Qi Jiguang (戚继光). It is a military treatise or manual written in 1560 by Qi Jiguang, a Ming Dynasty General famous for defending China from the Japanese pirates' invasion.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 114 : INTENSITY OF FLAMES (REVISED)

Guest Translated by: Tea<3

Edited by: Lianyin

Having gone hungry for a whole day, Lei Jingzhe squatted beside the pigsty with a bowl in hand. He shoved those hard-earned corn<sup>1</sup> noodles into his mouth and gulped them down. One of his subordinates was also squatting next to him. He was a little imp around the same age as Ding Tao, but as strong as a young ox. He gobbled down his food just as ravenously as Lei Jingzhe did.

A head poked out of the opened kitchen window, and the man used a stir-fry spatula to bang on the pot rim and yelled, “There’s some soup broth left. Do you want to drink it? If you do, then get your ass over here quick!”

“Yes, yes, we want it!” Before Li Xiong had even finished swallowing the noodles in his mouth, he was already hurriedly running to the window. He wiped his mouth with the back of his hand as he brought his bowl next to the pot. His eyes never once left that clear soup.

“You have quite the appetite there.” The cook scraped the bottom of the pot. “Tell your older brother to get down to work and find some honest job to do. Then you wouldn’t have to starve to this extent!”

“My bro is going to do great things!” Li Xiong saw the soup was about to drip from the side of the bowl, so he swiped his fingers around it and put his finger into his mouth to suck it clean.

The cook was a strong man in the prime of his life, too. He pulled his apron and wiped the sweat on his forehead. Looking at how strong and good-natured Li Xiong was, he wiped the sweat off for him too while he was at it and said with disapproval, “Your face is as dark as the bottom of a pot, and there’s no one at home to take care of you. Hey, you there. What are you busy with all day? At least clean this kid up a bit!”

Lei Jingzhe smiled simply at the cook. He was still chewing the pickled vegetables. Li Xiong trotted over and poured the soup into Lei Jingzhe’s bowl as if he was offering up a treasure. He said solicitously, “Bro, you eat it!”

“Good lad!” Lei Jingzhe did not stand on ceremony as he tilted his head back and drank it in one gulp. When he finished drinking, he looked up at the sun above his head; it was so scorching that it was making him sweat. He squeezed his stinging eyes shut, shifted his feet, and cursed under his breath, “Fuck his mother!”

“Fuck his mother,” Li Xiong imitated him. He stood up and shielded Lei Jingzhe from the sunlight.

Lei Jingzhe propped up an arm on his knee and asked, “How is it outside?”

Li Xiong stretched his neck out and looked around. He answered in a small voice, “They’re still searching!”

Looking irritable, Lei Jingzhe hung his head down, exposing a scorpion tattoo on the back of his neck that was currently dripping with sweat. He had dispersed his people after he had fled from Cizhou, taking only this silly lad he had raised from childhood with him as he sneaked his way into a small town along the public road. He had sat and watched as the Imperial Army was led on a wild goose chase all over. He was waiting for Xiao Chiye to run out of patience so that he would disperse his own soldiers and come after him himself. Who knew Xiao Chiye was not impatient in the slightest? Instead, he had set this fire along this road, letting it blaze until all the people were burning with anxiety and panic everywhere.

“Bro, the reward money of the Imperial Army’s money is so pathetic.” Li Xiong said with bewilderment. “It’s not enough to even get the brothers some wine. Why are there still so many people going?”

“It’s precisely because the reward is small.” Under Lei Jingzhe’s sweat-sheened brows were a pair of extremely bright eyes. “The price he’s offering is exactly right.”

If Xiao Chiye set the reward money right at the price of a couple of taels of silvers, then the commoners would not necessarily be willing to be his informants. Zhongbo had been hit with many disasters in recent years. The bandits ruled by force, so the higher the reward, the more it suggested that it was no easy feat to do what was asked of them—that it was a task that might jolly well cost them their lives. But a few copper coins were worthwhile. They only had to inform the Imperial Army upon discovering traces of the bandits, and no one would know about it. It was just a few copper coins, and it was normal to spend it all in an instant. Even if this group of bandits came back to seek vengeance, they would not be able to track anyone down.

“Then what should we do?” Li Xiong drenched in sweat from head to toe. He looked at Lei Jingzhe. “Bro, why don’t we just fucking go ahead and do it! He only has 20,000 men.”

Lei Jingzhe was feeling restless too. He could not be clearer about Xiao Chiye’s intentions. Xiao Chiye wanted to force them into making a move out of restlessness so that they would not be able to sit still and continue hiding. But he was extremely clear-headed. He knew that the people he was leading were a motley crew cobbled together from the two prefectures in the east. None of them had received formal military training. They would end up battered and defeated the moment they lost their current advantage and faced off the well-equipped Imperial Army. However, it was not an option to keep hiding either. Lei Jingzhe could hide, but could those rowdy subordinates of his hold it in?

Lei Jingzhe was sweating. He stared at the muck under his feet and said, “That person is a little underhand. He won’t play a game with me by the rules of benevolence, justice, morality, virtue, and the likes. I don’t think he has even set up defenses in the north at all. He just wants to jostle us over. He knows very well that it’s Libei in the north, and he’s betting that we won’t dare to go there.”

But damn it!

Feeling stifled with pent-up frustration, Lei Jingzhe spat.

He really did not dare to go!

“We’ll wait for one more night.” Lei Jingzhe suddenly stood up and said, “Go, tell Liu’er to notify the brothers who are still in the town tonight that we’ll leave if the situation doesn’t look right. If worst comes to worst, we’ll just retreat back to Mount Luo first. I have all the energy to play a war of attrition with Xiao Chiye!”

Xiao Chiye was eating a few steamed buns paired with pickled vegetables. He sat on a wooden stake used for tethering horses and watched as the soldiers issued paper slips that could be used to exchange for copper coins to the commoners who came to tip them off.

“Master.” Tantai Hu walked over and said, “He really is something to scatter his people everywhere. How is he going to issue his orders this way?”

He can't be going around knocking on their doors one by one, can he?"

"As the bandit chief, he naturally has his ways." As Xiao Chiye spoke, he scratched Meng, who was perched on his shoulder. "The gyrfalcons raised in Libei are also able to pass on military intelligence swiftly."

"We caught quite a number of them." Tantai Hu said. "What shall we do with them?"

Xiao Chiye said, "Kill them."

Tantai Hu turned to look at that other side, then looked back at Xiao Chiye. He said quietly, "But I heard that some of them are gentlemen from respectable families. Kill them all?"

Xiao Chiye looked at Tantai Hu and said, "Since they went to Mount Luo to join the bandits and submit themselves to Lei Jingzhe's command, they should have expected such a day to come. I'm here to eradicate the bandits. There is no reason for me to show mercy to the enemy forces. Besides, let me ask you. Humans are all born with a mouth. If every one of them says that they are from a respectable family, then who do you believe, and who do you not?"

Tantai Hu said nothing.

Xiao Chiye stood up and watched as Meng flew away. He said, "I know you're thinking of the Biansha Cavalry. But Laohu, benevolence should not be used in the wrong place. You've been in the army for a long time. These are originally words I shouldn't have to make a special point of telling you. Are you not able to figure it out yourself?"

Tantai Hu lowered his head and made to kneel.

"Remain standing." Xiao Chiye patted his shoulder. "You are now a general leading the soldiers, not a squad commander standing guard at the main city gate of Dengzhou. Don't get your position all wrong."

Xiao Chiye was generous, but he was also quite exacting. The guards around him all knew when to advance and when to retreat. He could even make Chen Yang feel worse than if he had been whipped the last time the latter had sat on the sidelines. However, guards and generals were two different things. Why did Xiao Chiye not let Chen Yang lead the troops? There was no doubt that Zhao Hui, the person by Xiao Jiming's side, was a valiant general. Xiao Chiye obviously had other considerations in mind.

Xiao Chiye did not fly into a rage, nor was there a change in his countenance, but Tantai Hu was already looking quite ashamed. None of them could get a handle on Xiao Chiye's true moods and emotions, but with just a relaxed tone like this from Xiao Chiye, Tantai Hu had already begun to reflect on his own shortcomings.

Credit to Tea for image! <3

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO

Guest Translator: Tea <3

(Edited by Lianyin)

Footnotes

1. 苞谷面 noodles made out of maize or corn

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 115 : DESTINY

Translated with: Dee<3

Swing after swing of the Imperial Army's blades pressed in towards them. The soil under their feet was already soaking wet from the splashes of blood. A bandit who was still alive was pinned to the ground. He listened to the never-ending screams until even his pants were wet with piss. The back of a blade pressed up against the back of his neck. His nose and mouth were smeared all over with bloodied water, choking him until tears and mucus flowed. He cried in terror, "I don't know. I really don't know!"

Lei Jingzhe was suspicious by nature, and he was very secretive about his whereabouts when he was in Mount Luo. Other than his trusted aides, no one else knew his exact hiding place.

Tantai Hu scraped away the bloody mud on the soles of his boots and said, "Since you know nothing, then why are you wasting our time? Drag him away!"

Both of the bandit's arms were bound behind his back, and the Imperial Army dragged him by the rope to the execution spot. He kicked out both legs, looking at those headless corpses lying on either side of him. The back of the blade that had been pressing against his nape was already turned over, and the sharp edge of the blade made him tremble all over. He watched Tantai Hu lift his blade and suddenly burst out bawling. "Liu'er! Sir! I know where Liu'er is!"

Tantai Hu asked, "Is this person a trusted aide of Lei Jingzhe?"

"Yes, yes, a trusted aide!" The bandit's chest heaved as he stared wide-eyed at that blade and said. "Liu'er is our 'carrier pigeon'. He is the one who passes on all the orders issued by Lei Jingzhe! It was also Liu'er who sent someone to pass me the message telling me to bring the men to hide out in the west!"

After having been here for half a night, Tantai Hu finally managed to pry out some information. He lifted the man and asked, "Where is this Liu'er now?"

“In Bianshui Town.” The bandit answered. “The information I received a few days back came from Bianshui Town. If you go look for him now, you will definitely find him!”

Bianshui Town was just a few li away, but on second thoughts, Tantai Hu felt that it did not bode well. They had searched through that place many times, and in all probability, they had already alerted the enemy. He hurriedly released his grip on the man and strode away to report to Xiao Chiye.

The Imperial Army promptly changed direction and raced to Bianshui Town. They set up a heavy siege outside the town, then searched from house to house and detained all the recent arrivals with questionable origins who were not registered in the household register. The bandits were identified one by one, but there were no traces of Liu’er and Lei Jingzhe.

Seeing as dawn was about to break, the bandit feared that Xiao Chiye would take out his anger on him, so he racked his brain to offer suggestions. He said, “Liu’er has plenty of followers; they are all his snoops and spies. Every time he heads out for battles, they will spread out all around him to facilitate the relaying of updates to Lei Jingzhe. Now that they are not here, it’s most likely because they have gotten wind of it and fled. You have blocked off access to the south, and we don’t dare to head north, so we can only retreat east. If you give chase now, you’ll definitely be able to catch up to them!”

Although Tantai Hu despised a spineless coward like him who would sell out his master for his own benefit, he still reported the information as it was to Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye considered it over for a moment on his horse before he said to Tantai Hu, “Take half of your men and chase after them along the eastern side of the mountain forest. They are now birds that will be startled at the mere twang of a bow-string. Just intimidate them a little, and they will be in such panic that they won’t be able to turn around and meet the attack head-on as usual. You just need to hit them hard. Those remaining thousand people are all scattered soldiers without contact with their commander. They won’t be able to hold their own against you.”

Tantai Hu acknowledged his orders, only to see Xiao Chiye gathering the remaining men. So he asked, “Since that’s the case, wouldn’t it do for Master to wait for me here? Why make another trip?”

“Look at Lei Jingzhe’s behavior and demeanor, and you should know that he’s not only suspicious by nature but also terrified of death. Whatever we can think of, he can think of it too. If heading east is the only way for them to take, he will not go along with such a large contingent of troops. That is too big a target; it's too obvious." Xiao Chiye wound up his horsewhip and said, "Since he dared to use Lei Changming as a live target earlier, he will similarly dare to use these remaining thousand people as live targets as well. You may set your mind at ease and head east. I'll go block him."

It was scorching hot these two days. The sun was so blazing that it made the bandits burning with anxiety even more restless and uneasy. They squatted in groups in the mountain forest. Seeing as Lei Jingzhe had been slow to show himself, they loudly questioned Liu'er, who was standing on a rock. "Master Liu is also a part of the council, so you would be clearer than us when it comes to news of the second-in-command. What is the situation now? Tell us!"

Liu'er stuffed tobacco into his pipe but did not manage to find a flint. He squatted on the rock and looked up at the clear, cloudless sky. It was too bright to take in everything at a glance. He clicked his tongue and said, "I'm here to deliver a message, aren't I? That is, go home!"

"The Imperial Army has captured a few hundred brothers under my command, and I still don't know if they are alive or dead now. I'm waiting for the second-in-command to come up with an idea to save them, and he's telling us to go home just like this? Isn't this just tucking our tails between our legs and subjecting ourselves to bullying?!" A man with a booming voice stood up and said with discontent. "We were all big names back in Mount Luo, and we followed him to Cizhou so that we would have no lack of food and water. In the end, we have all become cowards like tortoises hiding in their shells. This is really fucking pissing me off!"

"Isn't this all because we are down on our luck." Liu'er not only looked like a shrewd old monkey, the way he handled matters was also similar. He had a lot to complain about regarding Lei Jingzhe's current order, but he would never voice it out, so he said in an attempt to smooth things over, "Even if you return to Mount Luo now, you will still be a big name there. Whom among us can take it lying down? But there will be times when even a horse will stumble. It's no big deal if we suffer from the occasional defeat. All you have to do is report the number of people you have lost to the council later and get the second-in-command to make it up to you, as well as allocate some silver to you. Surely he won't shortchange you."

"Do I look like I give a damn about that bit of silver?" The man spat. "I'm heartbroken for those brothers! Do you think people are that easily replaced nowadays? Didn't you see the public notice posted by the Imperial Army? Cizhou wants to rebuild its garrison troops. There are meals and fields to be had. Why would anyone give up a decent job in a regular army and join us? They got a screw loose up there?! Moreover, our numbers are much greater than the Imperial Army. We should have just fought them the first time we encountered them at the foot of Cizhou's city gate! But he feared this and that. The fuck he's afraid of?! This is just great. We haven't even met them head-on, and we have already inexplicably lost!"

Sounds of agreement rang out all around at his words.

Creases formed at the corners of Liu'er's eyes. He said, "The second-in-command is just being cautious. The Imperial Army is well-equipped. Look at those armors that are so polished they shine. We might not necessarily be their match if we really come to blows."

"They just look impressive on the surface!" The man wiped the phlegm he had spit out with the sole of his shoe and said, "What kind of troops is the Imperial Army? How many battles have they fought? They can't fight for nuts! They only fought once with the Eight Great Training Divisions at the gate of Zhongbo. Can that even be called a battle? That's called a pissing contest! Whoever the fuck stands the longest wins!"

Laughter broke out all around.

The man noisily cleared his throat and tugged at his collar again to reveal a reddish chest. He said, "As I see it, we are not in a hurry to leave. Cizhou is such a big gold mine. If we miss it this time, it'll be harder to lay our hands on it the next time! The Imperial Army goes around posting notices everywhere to get the common folks to tip them off. But at the end of the day, they are still afraid, no?! If not, then let them bring it on! We are now all gathered together, and we have at least five or six thousand people. Just engaging in guerrilla warfare in the mountains alone will be enough to make the Imperial Army suffer!"

Liu'er did not kick up a stink with him or make a decision. He rubbed the pipe in his hand and said, "The second-in-command said to go back, and you still want to fight them. Then go notify him yourself."

“He wants to be a cowering tortoise and hide his head under his crotch. Where am I supposed to go looking for him?” The man sneered. “He doesn’t even dare to show his face. Why? Afraid there’s an Imperial Army spy among the brothers? Bah!”

The man that Lei Jingzhe had used as a shield that day when he fled was none other than this man’s prospective brother-in-law. His younger sister was just as burly as him, and she had been previously unable to find a suitable person to marry. It had not been easy to find a man who treated his younger sister well this time, and they were even ready to have the wedding at the year of the year. But who would have expected Lei Jingzhe to use him as a shield this trip! He hated Lei Jingzhe for being hard-hearted, and he also resented Lei Jingzhe for subjecting them to this kind of frustration they could only bottle up.

“I’ll repeat the second-in-command’s words.” Liu’er stood up and pounded at his waist with his pipe. He said, “We are now the vanguard squad. We don’t have many people, but we are still different from those minor bandits we came across on the way. As long as we can get out of Cizhou’s border within five days and arrive at Dunzhou’s relay station, we can be considered to be back in our own territory. By then, we will have nothing to fear even if the Imperial Army wants to continue pursuing us.” On seeing the fury on that man’s face after he was done speaking, he continued, “Of course, the second-in-command is still hurrying on his way here. Whether we leave or stay is open to discussion.”

They were initially bandits gathered from various mountain strongholds. Although Lei Changming was usually a headstrong man, he was very generous to the brothers, showering them with meat and wine, money, and women. Even if they made a mistake, they only had to plead for mercy for the matter to be dropped. But Lei Jingzhe was different. Not only did he rarely show himself, he was also rather severe in meting out punishments. Eight or nine out of ten wrongdoers who ended up in his hands would all meet their ends. He relied on inspiring awe to lead these bandits. Those who feared him outnumbered those who respected him. Now that everyone had fallen into dire straits together, it was inevitable for them to start harboring other intentions. One could take turns to be the emperor, so why not the chief of the bandits? He who is capable is qualified!

Seeing how Liu’er was a weathercock who did not want to offend both sides, the man said, “Fine, the second-in-command won’t come, and he tells us to flee by ourselves. I'm of the view that he can be unrighteous, but we can't be unrighteous! The Imperial Army is still at Bianshui Town, right? Liu'er, don't you fucking leave any traces behind! Let's take this place as our camping ground and carry out harassment in small groups. We are used to climbing mountains. As long as the Imperial Army gathers manpower and turns around to fight us, we will run back. Forget it if they don't enter the mountain, but if they dare to pursue their way in, then we will take all of them down and not let anyone return alive! As long as he's human, he will not be able to hold out if we keep up with this war of attrition against him for a few days. When the time comes, we'll charge our way down in one burst of energy and beat the shit out of him! The City of Cizhou will still fall into our hands as long as the Imperial Army is afraid, no? So how about it? Do we do it or not?!"

The remaining people were all fired up by his words. They had been living like vermin detested by all these few days. Not only were they killed by the Imperial Army, they were also subjected to bullying by unarmed commoners. They could neither eat nor sleep well. Where had they ever had to endure this kind of hardship back in Mount Luo? So they promptly chimed in and shouted,

"Do it! We'll follow Big Bro Ding's lead!"

Pleased, Ding Niu laughed out loud. He nodded in satisfaction and said, "We all have brothers who have been captured by the Imperial Army. This revenge must be taken! If Xiao Chiye dares to kill one of our men, we'll kill ten of his to give vent to this wrath of ours! Who knows, when the time comes for us to take him captive and occupy the city of Cizhou, maybe even Xiao Jiming will try to cozy up to us!"

The bandits were in high spirits, and for a moment, everyone was talking all at once about the good life they would have after occupying the City of Cizhou. Ding Niu was on cloud nine after being praised, and he increasingly felt confident that this plan would work. He was already thinking about bringing his younger sister over and finding her a husband, one who had to be better than the one who died! But then he had a better idea—this Xiao Chiye works fine too! He was not only impressive-looking, he was also taller than him, had a great physique, and came from a good family background.

At this point, Ding Niu was already thinking about children and grandchildren. But then he saw the disciple on sentry duty at the foot of the mountain scrambling his way over. The latter's face was pale with fright as he announced, "The Imperial Army is here!"

Liu'er slipped his way into the blades of grasses, wanting to flee. Ding Niu grabbed this wily old fart, lifted him, and demanded with a glare, "You tipped the Imperial Army off?!"

Liu'er hunched over, his long arms dangling, his white eyebrows almost trailing to the ground. He hurriedly shook his head and said, "Not me. How can it be me? I wouldn't have come if it were me!"

Ding Niu put Liu'er back on the ground. He steeled himself and said at the top of his voice, "Great! Since they have come calling at our door themselves, then we shall go and meet them!"

Lei Jingzhe spurred his horse on and galloped on the road. He had already skirted around the mountain forest at the east and was on his return trip back. More than half of the Imperial Army troops would be held up with Ding Niu, Liu'er, and the rest of the group as his cover, while the remaining had to stay behind to guard the southern side of Cizhou as well as the villages and towns along the way. He was the fish that had slipped through the net.

Lei Jingzhe had only brought along the silly lad, Li Xiong. He did not want the rest of them. It was not because he trusted Li Xiong that he was willing to take him along, but because this lad was silly enough, and Lei Jingzhe had single-handedly brought him up all by himself. Li Xiong was the most obedient lad, and Lei Jingzhe could tell what he was thinking at a mere glance.

Lei Jingzhe rode a horse, while Li Xiong ran on foot. He ran with great vigor and had no trouble keeping up as he followed behind Lei Jingzhe's horse. They had already been running all night, and Li Xiong was still naively waiting to meet up with the rest of them.

"Take a drink of water." Lei Jingzhe tossed the water bag to Li Xiong as he reined in his horse. "We won't be resting en route today."

Li Xiong opened the lid and gulped down more than half of it in one breath.

On seeing this, Lei Jingzhe cursed. "You stupid brat! If you drink it all up now, then what are you going to drink at night? You're going to keep whining about wanting to pee later with this much water in your stomach!"

Li Xiong wiped his mouth with a smile and patted his stomach. He said, "I won't, bro. It'll be gone after a run!"

Lei Jingzhe hung the water bag back on the horse's back. He asked, "Are you hungry?"

Li Xiong shook his head and said, "I stuffed myself so much last night that I'm still full! We'll be able to eat meat once we're back in Mount Luo."

Thus, Lei Jingzhe did not linger further and continued hurrying on his way with Li Xiong in tow. They had helpers in Dunzhou, and the Dunzhou relay station could pass on his message to deploy the bandit soldiers who were still guarding Mount Luo. Lei Jingzhe was in such a hurry because he still had some misgivings. He wanted to arrive before news of Ding Niu, Liu'er, and the others' capture made its way back. Otherwise, should the news arrive first, half of the trust and reputation he had built up throughout the year in Mount Luo would fall into shambles. By then, it would not be as easy as it was now to deploy the men.

The road checks along the way gradually grew lax until it was not as strict as it had been within ten li or so around Bianshui Town. The number of the Imperial Army troops grew fewer and fewer. By the time Lei Jingzhe passed by the vegetable fields manned by troops, he could no longer see any signs of the Imperial Army. At night, they rested by the side of a stream. Li Xiong speared a few fishes and roasted them for Lei Jingzhe to consume. Without seasonings or herbs, these fishes were fishy and bitter to the taste. But Li Xiong ate them with relish and fell on his back to sleep after eating his fill.

Lei Jingzhe did not dare to leave the campfire behind, so he covered it with soil. Gradually finding it harder to hang on as he had not had any sleep for a day and a night, he leaned against a tree and fell asleep. Lei Jingzhe slept for an unspecified amount of time before he was startled awake. He propped himself up on the ground, stilled his breathing, and listened to signs of activity within the forest with rapt attention.

The wind was a little strong tonight. Tree branches swayed from the force of it, rustling the leaves in intermittent bursts. Li Xiong was still sleeping, his snores thunderous. Lei Jingzhe listened for a long time. Although he could not see anything amiss, he was already starting to feel suspicious. He kicked Li Xiong awake and gestured with his hands for Li Xiong to get the horse.

As Li Xiong untied the reins, he suddenly had the urge to relieve himself. He never stopped for a break in the morning, and he had fallen right asleep at night. Unable to hold it in, he whispered to Lei Jingzhe, "Bro, I want to pee."

Lei Jingzhe clicked his tongue and made a gesture as if he was going to thrash him, then motioned for him to hurry. So Li Xiong went behind the tree and loosened his waist sash. The sound of water splashing rang out. Having seen no signs of movement so far, Lei Jingzhe relaxed a little. He pulled the horse, and when the horse snorted, he suddenly realized something off. Why was there not even a chirp from the birds or insects?

Li Xiong was not done relieving himself when he heard Lei Jingzhe hissed. "Leave!"

Li Xiong exclaimed in acknowledgment, then tied his waist sash in a hurry and broke into a run after him. Lei Jingzhe lashed out hard with his horsewhip and charged at random among the shadows of the trees. The tree forks swaying in the wind loomed like demons brandishing their claws and baring their fangs as they came surrounding him from all sides.

Lei Jingzhe fled until he was sweating. He did not know why he was sweating. His back had gone all cold from the wind. He did not even care to look back at Li Xiong; he only wanted to leave this forest as fast as possible. The horse under him was already exhausted from the running. No matter how he whipped it, it did not run as fast as it did in the daytime.

The sounds of footsteps came trampling noisily towards him. It was as if Lei Jingzhe was being chased by some gargantuan behemoth. He crashed headlong through the net of trees and charged out of the forest, but following right after, he forcibly reined in the horse and gasped for breath as he looked fixedly ahead.

The hem of Xiao Chiye's clothes fluttered backward in the wind. The gyrfalcon was perched on his shoulder, its head tilted to the side. Darkness seemed to spread out from behind him. It weighed down heavily on Lei Jingzhe's limbs, swallowing them and rendering him immobile; his entire body was frozen stiff on the back of the horse.

A raspy sound escaped from Lei Jingzhe's throat. He snapped back to his senses and thought of turning around, but the Imperial Army was all around him. Xiao Chiye had deliberately hidden his men in the forest; as a result, Lei Jingzhe could not guess how many men he had brought along—this was a counterblow to Lei Jingzhe's initial deception, so that Lei Jingzhe would similarly experience the absurdity of being played.

"Go ahead and run." Xiao Chiye said in a deep voice.

Lei Jingzhe released the reins and put both hands up. He said, "You win. I concede defeat."

Lang Tao Xue Jin threw its head back and neighed. Xiao Chiye said nothing.

Lei Jingzhe slid off his horse slowly, keeping both hands up to indicate that he had no thoughts of fighting it out to the death. He seemed to be very well-aware of the situation. After landing on the ground, he removed the broadsword at the side of his waist and looked at Xiao Chiye as he bent over to put it on the ground. Then he said, "We can still talk."

His interest piqued, Xiao Chiye said, "Go on."

Lei Jingzhe calmed his panting. Surrounded by the cold glints of blades, and with beads of sweat dripping from his temples, he said, "You're going back to Libei, so you won't reside in Cizhou for long. Killing me now won't stop the Mount Luo bandits from making a comeback. Instead, it will plunge Dunzhou and Duanzhou, which have only just stabilized, back into chaos. Why not let me go to keep the situation in both prefectures stable and give Cizhou enough time to rebuild its garrison troops?"

The cawing of a crow rang out from the sky. Meng braced itself. With a spread of its wings, it took to the air, glided through the wind, and swooped into the billowing trees. The atmosphere at the bottom subsequently grew tense. Lei Jingzhe kept looking at Xiao Chiye all this while, as if to prove that he was confident of success, that it was not the end of the road for him yet.

Xiao Chiye lifted a hand and laid his palm at the side of his waist.

Both men stood facing each other. In the very instant Meng pounced and ripped into the crow, Lei Jingzhe abruptly kicked up his broadsword and flung off its sheath. He rolled forward. With a strong burst of strength in his legs, he sprang up high into the air and cleaved the broadsword down towards Xiao Chiye right in the face. Blade collided violently against blade, sending sparks sputtering as they scraped against each other in a mighty show of power.

The scorching weather that had persisted for several days dissipated in the wind. Skies that were still clear and boundless in the morning were now overcast with dark clouds. A few bean-sized raindrops came pelting down, followed by the sudden arrival of a rainstorm, as if Heaven could not bear the heat and had sent it to scour the filthy world.

Li Xiong, who had lost track of Lei Jingzhe, circled around for a long time before he finally heard the subtle sounds of fighting in the rain. He brushed aside the branches and leaves with all his might and trampled upon muddied water as he chased his way towards the sound. The moment he rolled out, he came right in front of the Imperial Army wielding their blades. He was unarmed, but in a moment of desperation when he saw Lei Jingzhe in a disadvantageous position under the curtain of rain, he bellowed and turned around to wrap his arms around a bare, withered tree as thick as the rim of a bowl and swung it up.

“Bro!” Like a strong, charging bull of limitless strength, Li Xiong sent the Imperial Army on one side scattering all over in total disarray.

Xiao Chiye did not expect Li Xiong to have such strength. He swung away from the trajectory of the tree Li Xiong was brandishing. Lei Jingzhe, who had already been struck with the blade, saw his opportunity and retreated immediately to Li Xiong’s side. Li Xiong’s extraordinary strength was innate, and it was even more terrifying than Xiao Chiye’s. He swung the tree to ward off all those blades and swords and shouted, “Bro, I’ll carry you on my back!”

Lei Jingzhe jumped onto Li Xiong’s back. Supporting the tree, Li Xiong bellowed and charged a path out of the encirclement. He was not afraid of blades and swords, and he did not fear Xiao Chiye either. Newborn calves were all of such a temperament; there was only his big brother Lei Jingzhe in his eyes! Li Xiong did not even feel the pain when he was slashed in the arms. He kicked over the wall of people before him and broke into a mad dash in the torrential rain with Lei Jingzhe on his back.

Blood dripped off Lei Jingzhe, staining Li Xiong’s back red.

Li Xiong wiped his face and cried, “Bro! Don’t die!”

Lei Jingzhe was not a person who would simply resign to his fate. He did not have a pleasant time back in the Zhu clan in Duanzhou. His father failed his mother, so he changed his surname and called himself Lei Jingzhe from then on. He ran into danger many times on Mount Luo, and he had always been able to wait for things to take a turn for the better. But Xiao Chiye was just like the sudden rain that came out of nowhere this night; he was the edge of a precipice he had never foreseen. He thought it should not be the end of him just yet, yet he could only watch as the turns of events tipped the balance against him.

“Damn it...” Covering his wound, Lei Jingzhe said, “Shut up!”

Li Xiong listened to the sound of horse hooves behind him and dashed off with his teeth clenched and his face tilted up. This lad was truly unusual; even ordinary horses could not catch up to him. But Xiao Chiye’s Lang Tao Xue Jin was extraordinary. In the blink of an eye, it had already caught up right behind them.

Li Xiong did his best, but as he leaped across the stream, he suddenly cramped up. He was still growing, and he lost his balance when he landed on his feet. Consequently, he fell. As he sucked in a breath from the pain, he dragged Lei Jingzhe up, still intending to carry him on his back to flee.

“Xiao Chiye!” Knowing that there was no escape for him, Lei Jingzhe said, “If you are willing to spare me, then it’s possible for the bandits of Mount Luo to come under your command! I still have some influence left. I can still be of some use!”

Xiao Chiye flung away the drops of blood on Langli Blade. Lang Tao Xue Jin stamped its hooves twice before it broke into a sudden run.

Lei Jingzhe twisted Li Xiong’s face over. There was already a change in the timbre of his voice amidst his violent gasps. He did not want to die. His grip tightened on Li Xiong’s hand as he said, “Xiong-zai,<sup>1</sup> kill him, kill him!”

Li Xiong rubbed away the rainwater on his face. With one limping leg, he spread both arms open and stabilized his lower body, wanting to throw off Lang Tao Xue Jin. With his sturdy body trembling, he looked at Xiao Chiye, then let loose a bellow and charged over. He wrapped his arms around Lang Tao Xue Jin’s neck, causing Lang Tao Xue Jin to neigh. He did not know too many martial art moves, but there was a flash of his leg in what was clearly a wrestling technique of the Biansha Tribes as he flung Lang Tao Xue Jin over into the muddy water.

Xiao Chiye grabbed Li Xiong, who had a youthful-looking face, up by the collar. As the latter struggled and pounded on Xiao Chiye’s arms, he shouted, “Bro, run!”

Hauling Li Xiong along, Xiao Chiye watched as Lei Jingzhe rolled down the muddy slope. He did not give chase. Li Xiong made to bite him with his teeth, and Xiao Chiye wrung his back collar to hurl him right to the ground face-first so that his nose and mouth were stuffed into the mud puddle, choking him until he was violently struggling all over.

“Tie him up.”

Li Xiong heard Xiao Chiye say to the Imperial Army, who had arrived later. And then he was knocked unconscious with the back of a blade.

The rainstorm stopped after a while. Tantai Hu arrived from behind on horseback. Xiao Chiye just happened to be wiping the mud off Lang Tao Xue Jin’s body. When he saw Tantai Hu, he removed the half-arm fabric sleeve used for wiping with one hand and beckoned to Tantai Hu.

“Master.” Tantai Hu said. “I’ll lead the men to outflank him from the southeastern side right away. He won’t be able to run far.”

But Xiao Chiye asked him, “Have all the bandits in the forest been captured?”

Tantai Hu thought that Xiao Chiye wanted to do a headcount and was ready to turn back to get his subordinate to bring over the book. But unexpectedly, Xiao Chiye said as he wiped away the mud on his fingers, “It’s all good as long as you’ve caught them. There’s no need to show me. Go get ready. We’re returning to the city.”

Tantai Hu was taken aback. Seeing that Xiao Chiye had already picked up the saddle to put it on Lang Tao Xue Jin, he walked a few steps with him and said, “Master, isn’t letting him go just like this akin to letting the tiger return to the mountains and setting the stage for future disasters?”

As Xiao Chiye wiped the mud on the saddle, he said, “I’m not only going to let him go, I’m going to send him off with great fanfare. Get a few squads of men to follow him. He has been stabbed; don’t let him die on the way. Send him all the way into Dunzhou’s territory. There’s no need to bother about the other matters.”

Tantai Hu only had to use his brain a little to understand his intent. He grinned and said, “Then I’ll go. Master, I’ll bring dozens of men. I’ll be sure to escort him back to Dunzhou within three days.”

Xiao Chiye looked on with cool detachment in the direction where Lei Jingzhe had fled. A dripping wet Meng landed back on his shoulder and combed through its bloodstained feathers. Xiao Chiye used the handkerchief that he had used to wipe the mud from Lang Tao Xue Jin to clean Meng’s talons. He said, “Lift it properly. I’ll wipe them clean for you. Otherwise, if you see Lanzhou upon returning and trample mud all over his shoulders, I’ll have to wash his robe.”

T97's Words:

2 chapters in 1. Thank you for reading.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 崽 a child (sonny, lad) or young animal. 熊崽 (Xiong-zai) would literally mean bear cub.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 116 : CHEN YANG

If Xiao Chiye said he would return in three days, then he would return in three days. When he hurried back to the foot of Cizhou's city gates in the middle of the night, the city gates had already been opened, with torches brightly illuminating the city walls. The Imperial Army held the captives in line and entered. Zhou Gui had cleared out the prison in the south for the Imperial Army to hold these bandits in custody. He received Xiao Chiye and said, "Your Lordship has been working hard! The soldiers are tired after having eradicated the bandits. I've already gotten men to prepare meals for all. Everyone, this way, please."

Xiao Chiye dismounted and said, "Thank you, Your Excellency, for going to the trouble."

Zhou Gui followed Xiao Chiye in and said with a radiant expression, "I saw General Tantai's report that the bandits have been taken captive in the east. They have been completely disbanded. And Your Lordship personally went after Lei Jingzhe. This is truly... truly marvelous!"

Xiao Chiye had already caught sight of Shen Zechuan, and Shen Zechuan had also seen Xiao Chiye. A few guards were following behind Shen Zechuan, and Qiao Tianya was carrying a lantern in hand; they had obviously been waiting for a long time. Still speaking to Zhou Gui, he said, "I shall have a detailed discussion regarding Lei Jingzhe with Your Excellency in the study tomorrow morning."

Zhou Gui thought Xiao Chiye was tired from being on the go, so he hurriedly nodded and said, "sure." Kong Ling was more perceptive than him. Although he was not used to it, he also knew that they were getting in the way, so he threw out a random excuse and led Zhou Gui away.

Chen Yang stepped forward to take the horse. The guards behind all kneeled on one knee and said, "Congratulations to Master on your triumphant return!"

Xiao Chiye undid his arm guards and took off the Conqueror Bow and said, "You may rise. Have you been waiting long?"

Shen Zechuan took the lantern over from Qiao Tianya and turned around to walk with Xiao Chiye along the street. He answered, "Quite a while."

Xiao Chiye lowered his fingers and took the lantern over from Shen Zechuan's hand, while Shen Zechuan took the arm guards Xiao Chiye had just taken off to look it over.

On seeing this, Xiao Chiye said, "These are old stuff from a few years back. The metal was cast by Libei, and the leather strings on top were supplied to the Eight Great Training Divisions right from Qudu. It came apart from the chafing the last time I drew the Conqueror Bow here. I'll think of a way to replace it before I return to Libei."

The leather strings used for binding on the arm guards were indeed worn out. Shen Zechuan hooked it several times and said to Qiao Tianya. "Take it and put it aside first."

Noting that both of them were moving in the wrong direction, Xiao Chiye could not help but cast a sidelong glance where the Zhou's residence was. Then he looked at Shen Zechuan and said, "Have we moved out?"

"Of course, we have to move out." Shen Zechuan went up the stairs. "It's not convenient to keep staying in Zhou Gui's residence. He just had a grandson at the beginning of the year, and his entire family is crammed into two courtyards. It's too much of an inconvenience to them. I had someone ask around a few days ago, and it just so happened that a residence here caught my eye."

Both of them had already entered the wide alley as he spoke. The slabstone path led right to the main entrance. Xiao Chiye sized it up and said, "It's next to the main street, and it's close to Zhou Gui's residence. It'll be convenient to discuss matters during normal hours. You've chosen an excellent location."

"There's a drawback." Shen Zechuan said as he led Xiao Chiye across the threshold. "It's too big. The smattering of men we have aren't even enough to fill up these few courtyards."

Xiao Chiye saw a horse platform<sup>1</sup> made up of stacked bricks set up before the residence. The wooden carved door pillars were crude, and its patterns were not as fine and meticulous as the ones in Qudu and Juexi; rather, it was more the style of Libei and Biansha. Five courtyards in a compound were really too big for both of them. When Qi Huilian was still the Grand Mentor of the Eastern Palace, the residence he had been bestowed upon was about the same size as this. They would not be able to fill it up even with the addition of servants. Besides, both of them had no heirs or concubines. The stone walls looked a little old, but the double-eaved roof cut an imposing sight. It did not obstruct the light either. It was just the way Xiao Chiye liked it.

“No issues there.” Xiao Chiye stepped through the door and held Shen Zechuan by the hand. “Shifu can take one courtyard, while you and I can share a courtyard. The few of them buddies can have a courtyard. If more people join us in the future, we can split them up according to status. There will be a day we get to see it filled up when we are seventy or eighty years old.”

“The backyard is empty.” Shen Zechuan said. “But we will need to add men to the rear yard and the side rooms flanking the principal room. These courtyards are all connected to one another, so it won’t do for us not to have someone keep watch. It’ll be a bit more troublesome when they are on shift duty.”

As both of them were at the head discussing what they should acquire in the future, Ding Tao was at the back recording down the routes in his book. He whispered, “Although this residence is not as big as our Prince’s residence in Qudu, it is too circuitous. If I were to live at the back, it would take me half a month just to remember the directions.”

“What are you afraid of since we don’t let you take up a mission alone? And you always have Gu Jin around to lead you.” Qiao Tianya said. “This residence isn’t cheap, but my master doesn’t even blink an eye at the price. He sure has deep pockets.”

With a sorrowful expression, Ding Tao wrote a few more words and said, “You don’t understand. It’s precisely because Gu Jin is leading that we will get lost. Sigh, Jin-ge is really a strange one. As a scout in the military, he can remember all those unfamiliar places clearly when he’s investigating matters outside, but not so when he returns to our own home. Eight or nine times out of ten, he will turn into the wrong courtyard. Back at home in Libei, he will often end up somewhere else. I’m telling you, there’s an older sister in that residence called Cuilan, a maidservant of the Consort of the Hereditary Prince. She’s really gentle. Every time Jin-ge makes a wrong turn, she’s the one who leads him back. She even gives me candy. In any case... hmphasdfghjkl!”

Gu Jin clamped an arm around Ding Tao and gagged his mouth shut. He cast a few glances at Qiao Tianya and said, “Hear no evil.”

“I haven’t heard any part that’s ‘evil’.” Qiao Tianya looked astonished and applauded softly, “On the other hand though, you have just shot yourself in the foot.”

“... It’s hard to plant bamboo here. I’ll look for others after a few days.” Xiao Chiye looked back and said to the few of them. “Who is on the night watch tonight?”

All this while, Chen Yang seemed to be preoccupied, but on hearing him, he said, “I’m on guard alone. The few of them are on shift duty these few days.”

Xiao Chiye knew from this that Chen Yang had something to report to him, so he nodded and did not ask further. He already knew that there was an issue when he entered the city and saw Chen Yang’s expression as the latter received him. The hot water was ready when he returned to the courtyard. During the interval Xiao Chiye was taking a bath, Shen Zechuan got someone to warm up the meal.

The weather was hot, and the doors to the principal room were wide open with bamboo blinds hung up to keep out mosquitoes. The window screens were all newly replaced, and there was a round-bellied copper vat placed on the veranda with two red carps in the clear water and three or four lotuses floating on it. Several green plants that had been planted in the courtyard were bathed under the warm light emanating from the room. They clustered around Chen Yang, who was sitting in a daze.

Chen Yang was wearing an old robe. Their clothes had all worn out after they rushed the entire journey here. Shen Zechuan had asked Zhou Gui’s principal wife to look for a tailor to take their measurements one by one. After a period of time, they would all have new sets of clothes to change into.

Chen Yang and Zhao Hui were of the same age. But Zhao Hui already had a family and an established career, while he was still a head of guards who lived together with the other brothers. He seemed to be the most sophisticated of them, but in truth, he was also rough around the edges. He was sitting under the eaves at present, getting quite a number of bites from the mosquitoes. Yet he felt troubled as he continued to deliberate over how he should report to Xiao Chiye in a while.

The bamboo blinds opened up partially. Shen Zechuan had already changed into his regular clothes. He said to Chen Yang, “You’ve been guarding the city wall entrance at night, and you still want to sit here and let the mosquitoes feast on you. Come in and have dinner with Ce’an first.”

Chen Yang rose to his feet in compliance and followed him in.

Xiao Chiye had yet to come out. The meal was very simple; they rarely had lavish meals. Now that Ji Gang was back, he kept a tight watch on their food. All the ingredients to be used and nourishments to be taken were arranged according to the recipes he and Qi Huilian had decided on back at Zhaozui Temple. The few of them guards loved to drink, as did Ji Gang back in the past, and the dishes he made to go with wine were exceptional.

Chen Yang sat on his knees on the mat, and the maidservant set the dishes on the small table in front of him.

It was quiet inside the room. Chen Yang sat with his head lowered and listened as she withdrew out of the room. Shen Zechuan sat at the head. He was not as restrained as Chen Yang was. The wide, white robe he was wearing shifted along with his moments and revealed his wrists, consequently diminishing some of the exquisiteness his appearance had given him. Instead, there was something relaxingly unpretentious about it.

If both of them were to remain here together for long, perhaps they would both end up subconsciously affected by the other.

Shen Zechuan at this moment felt to Chen Yang like Xiao Chiye when he was quiet—they both gave off a vibe that could gradually put one at ease.

“Contrary to expectations, it won’t do you any good to worry too much.” Shen Zechuan set down the wooden chopsticks and said without looking at Chen Yang, “Just report according to the facts. No embellishment, no rephrasing. Tell him as it is. He will naturally have his own thinking. It is often said that those deeply involved in a matter often lack the detachment to see the whole picture. But in truth, that’s not necessarily so. As the one involved, he understands it far more than anyone else. He has perhaps even thought of it way earlier than you did.”

With his head lowered, Chen Yang bowed to him in silence.

“If you underestimate him, then you are underestimating yourself.” Shen Zechuan said unhurriedly. “He chose all of you out of millions of people, but didn’t all of you also choose him out of millions of people too? There will still be rainstorms to brave and turbulent seas to navigate in the future. If you are going to keep hesitating and wavering like you are tonight every single time for every single matter, then, sooner or later, you will not be able to keep up with his pace. They only recognize the Xiao Chiye of six years ago. But what you are seeing is a Xiao Chiye that has been tempered over these six years to the way he is now. Chen Yang and Zhao Hui are both the sunlight,<sup>2</sup> and Xiao Chiye and Xiao Jiming are both the wolves of Libei. So what are you still afraid of? Don't let your time in Qudu befuddle you. All of you have long been on par with them."

Chen Yang sat on the mat with his head lowered, and an indistinct sob escaped his throat as his fingers curled slightly. He did not say a word for a long time. He thought his own matters were of no importance, so he did not mention it. Although he did not suffer a gross injustice like Gu Jin, he could still sense the cold treatment he had been given back at home. He had been tossing and turning these few days precisely because he did not know how to bring it up to Xiao Chiye. He was even secretly relieved when he left Libei with Gu Jin.

When Chen Yang left Libei, he was in no way inferior to Zhao Hui. He always tried to win credit in every matter, as he was the most fearful of being perceived as being inferior to Zhao Hui, so he kept raising the bar for himself. But when he went back to stay for half a month, he unexpectedly had the notion to avoid Zhao Hui.

He was afraid.

At some point, he thought he had already lost.

He was Xiao Chiye's trusted aide, and also an aspect that others would use to compare Xiao Chiye and Xiao Jiming. The moment he started to harbor such a fear, then Gu Jin and Ding Tao who were the next in line would inevitably be affected too. They would no longer be able to be placed on par with Xiao Jiming's guards. To a Xiao Chiye who was about to fall under the harsh scrutiny of Libei, this was a heavy blow.

Xiao Chiye was not anyone else. He was not Xiao Fangxu, nor was he Xiao Jiming. He was his own person. His most arrogant traits were his fearlessness in forging ahead and determination to win. For Chen Yang, following him would be just like chasing after the tempestuous wind. Shen Zechuan was right. If Chen Yang were to feel fear at this point in time, then he would, sooner or later, be left behind. Because the one he had chosen at the very start was a Xiao Chiye who had the guts to remain all alone by himself in Qudu.

Xiao Chiye's hair was still wet when he emerged with his regular clothes draped around him. He could not help but be taken aback when he saw Chen Yang bent over the ground with his shoulders trembling. He looked at Shen Zechuan, who spread his hands out slightly and gave him an innocent look.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO

Peach for correction! <3333

Footnotes

1. 马台 a stone stool or platform to make it easier for one to dismount from horses. Usually placed at the left and right sides of the main gate of well-to-do families.
2. Chen Yang (晨阳) literally morning sun, and Zhao Hui (朝晖) literally morning sunshine

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 117 : FAVOR & INTIMIDATION

Translated with: Lin & Dee<3

Xiao Chiye's loose outer robe was half-opened, revealing the unclosed collar of his inner garment. When he sat down, he blocked off much of the light. There was still moisture on his body, and he felt a little more comfortable after wiping his face with a clean handkerchief. He then rapped a bent finger thrice on the floor and said to Chen Yang, "What's the matter? Sit up and talk."

Chen Yang promptly rubbed his face clean with his arm and sat straight up. He said, "We encountered some incidents during this return trip to Libei. I'm reporting to Master first, as I do not dare to make a decision arbitrarily."

Xiao Chiye picked up Shen Zechuan's chopsticks and listened as Chen Yang recapped what happened. Shen Zechuan left the table midway to take a bath. Xiao Chiye finished the rice in his bowl and sat for a moment without showing any intent to ask for another helping. He asked, "How is Gu Jin's injury?"

"We called for a physician after we left Changzhu camp. Gu Jin's fever subsided during the journey, but the wound on his back is festering badly. Ji Gang-shifu took a look at it last night and told Gu Jin to abstain from certain foods. He also gave him instructions on several matters and said that he would be able to recover if he recuperates for about a month." At this point, Chen Yang paused for a moment before continuing. "Fortunately, his eyes and ears were not hurt."

Gu Jin's eyesight and hearing far exceeded that of the average person. It was a one-of-a-kind natural talent among these guards. This matter would be a lot harder to resolve had he been wounded in his eyes and ears. If that happened, then even Xiao Chiye would not be able to swallow this injustice, let alone Chen Yang.

"Tudalong Banner is a domain the Changzhu camp of the eastern mountain range would patrol daily. It's originally quite a distance away from the Hanshe Tribe. To think Gu Jin's vanguard squad actually retreated all the way there." Xiao Chiye had gathered plenty from Chen Yang's statements. He said astutely, "This shows that the Libei Armored Cavalry has been retreating. The battles Father and shifu are fighting aren't going smoothly."

The insects' cries on summer nights created quite the din as it drifted through the bamboo curtains, and it was so hot both inside and outside the room that it made one restless.

Xiao Chiye looked at the candle flame for a moment and said in a hushed tone, "Eldest brother's incapability to lead the troops is a heavy blow to Libei Armored Cavalry. Father promptly came out of retirement to boost the troops' plunging morale and soften the impact of the word 'defeat'. But he has not been on the battlefield in person for nearly fifteen years. On the other hand, his opponent, Amu'er, has never left the front line of the Hanshe Tribe in these fifteen years. Times have changed. Relying blindly on Father is not the way to victory. I often say not to have a change of people right before the battle. Even the best general has to build up a rapport with his soldiers over time. All of Father's troops fifteen years ago have been replaced, and those who can stage a comeback with him are few and far between. The ones he is leading now are a new school of military officers and soldiers who are already used to Eldest Brother's style of handling matters. Both sides need to mutually adjust to each other during a critical battle, and this is not an easy thing to achieve."

When Xiao Fangxu established the Libei Armored Cavalry, the word "Armored Cavalry" was the best description of the Libei Army. At that time, Libei was unable to catch up with the Biansha Cavalry's horses, so Xiao Fangxu adopted the measure of making them 'heavier'—he not only had the soldiers all armored up, but even the horses of Libei too. Such an army was a terrifying force to behold in a frontal assault. Like the mighty torrents of the mountains, the impact of the collision was able to annihilate their foes in a blink of an eye. There was simply no time for the Biansha Cavalry to draw their machetes, and even if they did, they could not stab through those armors. Even the ferocious Hanshe Tribe was not willing to fight a drawn-out war with the Armored Cavalry. Their light and swift mobility was their only remaining advantage. And it was on this basis that Xiao Fangxu kept piling on more weight to armor up the Libei Armored Cavalry until he eventually forged the Libei Armored Cavalry into a real “wall of iron”.

When Qi Zhuyin led the Qidong Garrison Troops through the territory, the sounds of their horses’ hooves boomed like thunder. But when the Libei Armored Cavalry did the same, the sound they generated was not just “like thunder”, but real “thunderclaps”. That weight could make one lose the courage to continue fighting just from the sound of it alone, so much to the extent that no one could find the Libei Armored Cavalry’s weakness for as long as five or six years.

However, Amu’er was also a fearless warrior who, among his constant engagement with the Libei Armored Cavalry, made use of their “heaviness” to the fullest. As long as the Hanshe Tribe’s cavalry was fast enough, they would be able to loot, retreat, disperse, detour back, and encircle the foe in that order, like a swarm of blood-sucking flies that, despite being unable to penetrate through those solid and sturdy armors, would also emerge unscathed. The way Lei Jingzhe gathered the bandits together to harass the Imperial Army was precisely an imitation of the Hanshe Tribe’s way of combating the Libei Armored Cavalry. It was just that Lei Jingzhe did not have horses that fast, nor soldiers that strong.

It was at this time that Xiao Jiming took over the Libei Armored Cavalry. The first decision he faced back then was whether to retain the weight of the Libei Armored Cavalry. In the eyes of the veteran generals, he was a lad who was still wet behind the ears, and his refined and humble personality was one aspect of him that the veterans who were used to Xiao Fangxu could not stand. He made a completely different choice from Xiao Fangxu—he reduced the weight of the Libei Armored Cavalry, making the “wall of iron” thinner, but equipping it with the mobility to turn around quickly. And thus, the Libei Armored Cavalry shifted from being a heavy cavalry into a cavalry that veered towards being a little more armored up.

It was with this change that Libei began to possess the characteristic of “fast”. This was where “River of Ice Armored Cavalry” originated from, and it was also the fundamental reason he was able to stride across the borders of two territories in one night. They were able to keep up with the Hanshe Tribe’s speed. Coupled with the constant refining of their battle formations, they became even tougher to deal with. The new school of generals was all selected by Xiao Jiming. Their working style was mutually compatible with Xiao Jiming’s, and they were already used to Xiao Jiming’s receptiveness to their suggestions—Perhaps, they respected Xiao Fangxu just the same on an emotional level, but they might not necessarily be able to adapt to Xiao Fangxu.

Respect alone could not win them battles. The light in their eyes as they looked up to the legendary god of war would be worn down again and again as they mutually butted heads with one another. In the end, the glorious Prince of Libei would also fall off the pedestal on which he had been placed on to become a myth that had faded into obscurity along with the tides of change. When that time came, the legend of the Libei Armored Cavalry would also come to an end. They would become a bunch of disorganized soldiers plagued by mutual discord and internal strife among themselves. A concentrated force excessively dependent on a centralized command was an advantage, but it was also a shortcoming.

Qi Zhuyin was the commander-in-chief who had intensively studied the Libei Armored Cavalry the most. She was very well-aware of the drawbacks in the Libei Armored Cavalry's reliance on its commanding officer. That was why she had been trying her best to avoid leading Qidong down the same route as the Libei Armored Cavalry after she became the commander-in-chief of the Qidong Five Commanderies' military forces. She went all out to establish the Qidong generals' barrack, which took in men who had the potential and the making to lead troops. It was her confidence in her hold over absolute military power and authority that she dared to delegate authority to these men. She gave Lu Guangbai this much authority because Lu Guangbai had the capability. She understood what kind of generals were suitable to lead what kind of squads. In Xiao Chiye's eyes, Qi Zhuyin was the most qualified person among their generation to be the commander-in-chief.

People who could fight could be the general of an army, but they might not necessarily be able to be a commander-in-chief commanding armies from all quarters. If one were to rank the Four Great Generals of the world, no doubt Qi Zhuyin would be the chief. She had long come to discern the Libei Armored Cavalry's weakness, and she had reminded Xiao Jiming of it.

Xiao Chiye's ostracisation was inevitable.

With one hand on his knee, Xiao Chiye poured the melted candle wax into the small porcelain plate. The tips of his fingers came into contact with it, but he liked this kind of searing pain. He watched as the candlelight flickered and said, “Chen Yang, when I left home at seventeen, I asked my eldest sister-in-law when I would be able to return home. This question brought tears to her eyes, and she cried the entire night alone in her room. When my eldest brother and I got on the horses, she stuffed many cakes from Libei into my bundle<sup>1</sup> and even hid a flask of ‘On Horseback’<sup>2</sup> within. She said she didn’t know when I would be able to return home either, but they would always be waiting for me in Libei. I entered the capital as a hostage because my eldest brother won a victory in battle. I hate Shen Wei to the core. At that time, I thought the defeat of the Zhongbo troops was to be blamed. I never thought of myself to be more outstanding than my eldest brother, but I was equally attached to Hongyan Mountains and the racecourses. I used to lie prone on the ground and listen to the sounds from the lands of Libei. When I left, I even wanted to take the soil of Libei along with me.”

“I attempted to survey the horizons for a glimpse of Libei from the top of the tallest building in Qudu, but even Meng could not see it when it flew up into the clouds. It was then I understood for the first time how much of a remote possibility it was to return home. I’ve learned plenty from shifu, but it was only when I was in Qudu that I began to understand the truths behind those words. I am a man burning with ambitions, and Qudu is the teacher that taught me to restrain all those desires. My encounter with Lanzhou did not happen by accident. He was the last line of defense when I was about to hit my limit and lose it. He is also the indulgence and freedom I lost and regained.”

Xiao Chiye lifted a finger, as if he had drawn a line.

“I am complete. The parts of me that were broken and lacking are now encased with steel. I would no longer stop when I walked out of Qudu again. Whether it was twenty years ago or ten years ago, my father and eldest brother both made the best choice, and now, it’s my turn. The mountain we surmount might not necessarily remain our foes forever. I acknowledge how outstanding my father and eldest brother are. I revere and cherish them, but that is the part that belongs to ‘family’, not the ‘Libei Armored Cavalry’. We are wolves that have strayed from the pack. Our return to the pack is not for us to submit and bow to the commands of others, but to carve out our own place and positions among them.”

Xiao Chiye bent over slightly, his gaze as sharp as a blade.

“Libei cannot suffer another defeat. This isn’t a matter of the Xiao clan. I understand that, as do my father and eldest brother. Who should inherit this iron wall? Anyone. As long as he can shoulder the responsibility. I’m going back to Libei, not just going home. Guo Weili is a veteran of Libei; he knows all of your functions best, and not injuring Gu Jin’s eyes and ears is the most merciful warning he is giving me. So cheer up, Chen Yang. Our opponents are all the battle-hardened seniors who have been fighting on the battlefield for a long time—there is no battle in this world that must be lost. All those impregnable defenses and impenetrable encirclements are but facades. I’m going back. I want a Libei Armored Cavalry that truly belongs to me.”

Chen Yang’s fingertips trembled slightly; Xiao Chiye’s words had him all fired up. He had been sitting on his knees until his legs had both gone numb, but that tingling sensation leaped up his spine as he faced such a Xiao Chiye, his fear all swept away by the fervor coursing through his blood.

By the time Shen Zechuan emerged from his bath, Chen Yang had already taken his leave and left the room. Xiao Chiye was lying on the xumi couch<sup>3</sup> staring into space. The windows were open, and there was a porcelain jar on the veranda with a few stalks of lotuses in it. Their delicate fragrance wafted through the gaps. Xiao Chiye rested his head on an arm and looked up at the starry night sky.

The breeze of summer nights was always so gentle, coming and going without a trace; one could barely feel it if not for the scent of lotuses permeating the air. Xiao Chiye was not only feeling hot; he was also weary. However, he had his own pride. He was unwilling to show his fatigue easily, so he could only stuff these feelings into these sleepy moments as he stared into nothing and pretended not to be tired at all. The sky was studded with stars this night. He was in a bit of a trance.

Shen Zechuan blew out the candle and threw his outer robe on the back of a chair. He scraped an icy cold finger gently across Xiao Chiye’s cheek, leaving in its path a temperature that belied excitement. Xiao Chiye returned to his senses and locked gazes with him.

Even though he had just showered, Shen Zechuan’s fingers were still icy cold. That icy cold finger brushed across Xiao Chiye’s cheek, as if comforting him.

Xiao Chiye tilted his head a little to the side to be a little closer to Shen Zechuan's palm.

Xiao Chiye really missed Shen Zechuan. This kind of longing was fervent and urgent, but it was not strange. Every inch of his body missed Shen Zechuan; this was a common occurrence. However, this longing was not just limited to his physical self; it was also the desire raging in his heart. It was a love far deeper and much more indescribable. He felt an unprecedented excitement lying in wait behind all of this fatigue.

Shen Zechuan sensed his rising temperature.

Xiao Chiye had been on horseback for days, but he was unable to fall asleep right now. Only both of them understood the intrusive look in his eyes, which hardened along with the movements of Shen Zechuan's finger.

Absence makes the heart grow fonder. In the near future, there would be countless of such absences. And now, Xiao Chiye wanted to possess every single moment they were alone together. He suspected that vines would sprout out of the longing in his chest and wound around the armored hooves on which he raced across the grasslands, holding him back. He wanted to invade Shen Zechuan, penetrating deep into him again and again, and in the process, leave his own scent on him. Not only that, he also wanted to be filled with Shen Zechuan's scent.

Both of them had to have the same scent.

This was a childish obsession of the wolf pup. It was as if doing so would prove that they could never be apart. Xiao Chiye pressed his cheek against Shen Zechuan's palm, sniffing his scent before the small furrow in his brows finally relaxed.

Xiao Chiye wanted to tell Shen Zechuan how much he truly loved him.

Perhaps there were many ways to express love. But now, he only wanted to use the most intense kind.

The xumi couch was not big enough for both of them. Xiao Chiye reached out to pull down the bamboo blinds and covered up that bit of gap in the window, shutting the moon outside. Lanzhou did not need the moonlight. That naked, lithe softness of his only needed one person's gaze on him—Xiao Chiye's.

Shen Zechuan rode on Xiao Chiye as they kissed in the darkness. Their hot breaths intertwining inseparably together, its heat edging all the way down to their necks, chests, and even abdomens. Shen Zechuan's neck was flushed all over. Xiao Chiye felt this to be some kind of silent acclamation; it was also Lanzhou's indulgence. As with Shen Zechuan's tremblings, these were all urgings Xiao Chiye could not rein in.

Xiao Chiye's ferocity caused Shen Zechuan to lift his head and gasp for breath. Shen Zechuan pressed down on Xiao Chiye's chest and attempted to make him stop this aggressive invasion. But he was also looking down at Xiao Chiye with tears in his eyes, seducing Xiao Chiye with his gaze into continuing with the fierceness, into keeping up with the meanness.

Do all you want.

This was what the expression in Shen Zechuan's eyes was explicitly telling Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye was brimming with energy as he held Shen Zechuan securely on top of him. He was panting. Neither of them averted their eyes, as if they could not bear to look away from each other for even a moment.

Shen Zechuan's hair gradually scattered all over his shoulders amidst the intense thrusting. He clenched Xiao Chiye's clothes until it creased, as if he was a drowning man clutching at straw while shudders rocked through him.

"Grow a little more meat on you." Xiao Chiye said in a raspy voice, "Lanzhou."

Shen Zechuan's damp locks of hair stuck to his face. In the moments between kissing and panting, he could not find it in himself to answer. Sighs escaped through his lips as he reached out with his fingers as if to grab on to something. But Xiao Chiye held his hands and did not wait for him to come to his senses as he entered with unhurried tenderness—a slow, gentle ride after the gallop to his heart's content before.

That is, if he had not gone in that deep.

Shen Zechuan let Xiao Chiye hold him in position as he took him all in to the deepest depths. The never-ending onslaught of thrusts turned his mind into mush. His misty, lidded eyes became even more of an aphrodisiac, while the corner of his eyes glistened with pleasure as Xiao Chiye permeated every pore of his being.

"Ce'an," Shen Zechuan followed his heart and called out his name, "A-Ye."

His calls caused Xiao Chiye to break out into a sweat.

Shen Zechuan lowered his head and edged along Xiao Chiye's temple with the tip of his nose to disperse those beads of sweat. He called out wickedly, "Er-lang".

Xiao Chiye came to an abrupt stop. He grasped Shen Zechuan's jaw and corrected the position of his face, then kissed him hard in between gasps. These calls threw all those that once had order into disarray; it messed up the anxieties he had concealed away. Xiao Chiye forgot them all. He did not need any of them; he only wanted Shen Zechuan.

They could not indulge to their heart's content on the xumi couch, and so the bedding on the bed was pulled down onto the rug. Even the pillow on the rug was drenched after some time. Shen Zechuan's eyes were half-closed. He was wet to the bone, his energy fully expended. Xiao Chiye propped himself up on his arms. He was still inside him. He lowered his head to press his forehead against Shen Zechuan's, all the while lightly gasping for breath.

"Lanzhou." Xiao Chiye's sweat-drenched forehead inched down. He nuzzled against the crook of Shen Zechuan's neck and called out in a muted voice, "Lanzhou."

Shen Zechuan lifted his hand and placed it on Xiao Chiye's hair. They clung this inseparably close together, in perfect harmony in every sense of the word. Shen Zechuan raised his legs, indicating for Xiao Chiye to press down into him. Instead of doing so, Xiao Chiye tightened his arms around him. His embrace was so tight that Shen Zechuan found it hard to breathe. He stroked the back of Xiao Chiye's head with varying strength and tilted his head to breathe a light puff of air into Xiao Chiye's ear. Very slowly, he called out, "Lang-zai."<sup>4</sup>

Xiao Chiye bit him.

Shen Zechuan let out a husky laugh. He sensed something trickling out of him, so he said, "You came."

Xiao Chiye switched to kissing him. Both of them grind against each other intimately, squeezing out even more fluid as they moved. It still seemed as though Xiao Chiye's sexual desire was about to rear its head again, causing Shen Zechuan to sigh repeatedly. Xiao Chiye initially thought of putting the brake on as he had been going at it rather savagely, but when he looked at the expression in Shen Zechuan's eyes, he continued to penetrate deep into him.

Xiao Chiye stroked Shen Zechuan's cheeks and inserted two fingers into his mouth, leaving Shen Zechuan's tongue with nowhere to hide. Both of them clung close together, panting at the same pace as they took in each other's expressions all into their eyes. The last time was not intense; rather, it was more like a never-ending session of tender lovemaking.

When Xiao Chiye finally slid out of him, Shen Zechuan was no longer able to make a single sound. All of his vague grunts and moans had been devoured clean by Xiao Chiye. As the waves of heat washed over him, he grasped Xiao Chiye's jaw. Tears he could not stop soaked the hair on his temples wet. Xiao Chiye finally lowered his body to snuggle with him, skin on skin.

In the end, both of them were exhausted, Shen Zechuan could barely keep his eyes open. He was still grasping Xiao Chiye's jaw. Xiao Chiye seemingly let out a laugh and leaned over to kiss him. They kissed for a moment before falling asleep together like this—Xiao Chiye on Shen Zechuan.

Xiao Chiye did not dream.

It was already considered late when the day broke the next day. Xiao Chiye had only just returned after leading his troops, so no one would have castigated him for it, but he woke up pretty early. Their lovemaking had dispelled emotions that might have been suppressed otherwise. When he got up, Shen Zechuan made to wake up too, so Xiao Chiye covered the latter with a quilt and kissed him back onto the bed.

"Military affairs." Shen Zechuan struggled tiredly and sleepily in the darkness, and said with his eyes closed, "I'll go later, in the afternoon..."

"We'll discuss Cizhou's garrison troops later." Xiao Chiye said. "I want to settle the issue with Lei Jingzhe with Zhou Gui first."

"Two hours." Shen Zechuan let out a long sigh. "I'll be there two hours later."

Xiao Chiye stroked him and said, "It's the same if you go tomorrow. There's no hurry to do it these few days. Go on, sleep. I'll be back for lunch at noon. Call shifu along too."

Shen Zechuan uttered an acknowledgement, although it was unknown if he had actually heard Xiao Chiye clearly. Xiao Chiye changed his robe after taking his bath. He did not get anyone to go in and clean up, but he had instructed Ding Tao and Gu Jin well in advance to stand guard in the courtyard. Then he left, taking Chen Yang and Qiao Tianya with him.

Zhou Gui was already in the study, having a few rounds of discussion with his advisors. It was getting increasingly bright out there, but there was still no sign of Shen Zechuan. When he finally saw Xiao Chiye, he hurried out to greet him. He dismissed the others, leaving only Kong Ling in the room to serve tea.

Xiao Chiye did not look to be in an amicable mood today, and all his so-called frivolity had been fully curbed. He cut such an intimidating presence that Zhou Gui and Kong Ling did not dare to take deep breaths. Xiao Chiye had something on his mind, and so he did not beat around the bush after taking his seat.

"I let Lei Jingzhe go in the east. He should arrive in Dunzhou in three days."

Kong Ling had done a headcount of the bandits last night, and he had gotten suspicious when he did not see Lei Jingzhe. Hearing these words now, however, had dispelled his misgivings. They were already on familiar terms with Xiao Chiye, so there was no need to be as punctilious as before. He gave a light cough and said, "Your Lordship presumably must have your own plans."

Zhou Gui still had doubts, so he asked, "Lei Jingzhe is a scheming man. Is Your Lordship planning to keep him for your own use by letting him go?"

"This man is too shrewd to submit himself into compliance." There was no warmth in Xiao Chiye's eyes as he said, "Although we've captured the majority of Lei Jingzhe's men this time, he still has men remaining in Mount Luo. And it's not just that. There are still plenty of Lei Jingzhe around even without this one Lei Jingzhe. Before Cizhou has its own garrison troops, it'll prove to be too difficult to get rid of them once and for all."

Kong Ling thought of what Shen Zechuan had said a few days before. He nodded at Xiao Chiye's words and said, "That's right. Just as the Vice Commander said, as long as food is scarce in Zhongbo, there will still be decent commoners reduced to being bandits. There is no way to eradicate this issue just by force alone."

"Lei Jingzhe lost his right-handed men this time, yet he was still able to escape alone from my hands. Even if he has a glib tongue, he won't be able to clear himself of suspicions among the bandits." Xiao Chiye said. "I'm also going to give him a hand and make him the Imperial Army's 'spy' that the bandits of the two prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou will revolt against. This person is capable. He will certainly not sit still and wait for death. With that, the bandits will be thrown into internal turmoil and will be too preoccupied to set their eyes on Cizhou.”

It was only because he had intentionally released Lei Jingzhe that Lei Jingzhe would have to suffer. Cizhou was presently powerless, and this was already the best option out of the better strategies available to them.

Kong Ling caught a hint of his intent when he heard this. He asked, “Your Lordship goes to such an extent to think for Cizhou. Is it because you are preparing to set off for Libei?”

Xiao Chiye turned the teacup around and said. “Time waits for no man, and Libei is currently often at war. It’s inadvisable for me to remain in Cizhou for longer. Moreover, Qidong has already delayed for two months. Once Qi Zhuyin arrives, it’d be hard for me to leave even if I want to. After I leave Cizhou, Lanzhou will still continue to assist Cizhou. As I said before when I deployed the troops, I will not concern myself in all the matters concerning the garrison troops of Cizhou. But if both of you gentlemen still need the Imperial Army, just get Lanzhou to send me a notice, and I’ll be sure to arrive within a day.”

The way he put it was worth pondering over. At least, in Kong Ling’s ears, it sounded like both a favor and an intimidation.

Xiao Chiye said to let Lanzhou inform him; this indicated that he would not listen to the words of the whole lot of them from Cizhou. Lanzhou would have to be the one to decide whether or not to let him lead his troops back. However, Lanzhou was not someone who could be easily fooled, so they could not take advantage of the distance to deceive the Imperial Army into deploying their troops. In addition to the above, there was another layer of meaning.

Kong Ling was a little on tenterhooks as he wiped his sweat.

If Cizhou dared lay a hand on Shen Zechuan, Xiao Chiye was sure to hasten there within a day.

T97’s Words:

2 Chapters in 1. Short of 700 words orz

Thank you for reading.

Lianyin’s Note:

This chapter is a combination of the non-censored + revised version for the best of both worlds (◡‿◡)

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

- 1.
2. 包袱, a cloth bundle. In the old days, people traveled around with their clothes and possessions bundled up with a piece of cloth. The bundle was then worn across the shoulders and carried around. It also works for carrying food around.
3. A strong wine from Libei, as mentioned in Chapter 102
4. Xumi couch (须弥榻, ), also known as the Mile couch (弥勒榻) or short couch (短榻), is basically a shorter couch, a common piece of furniture during the Ming Dynasty.
5. 狼崽 literally wolf pup

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 118 : PAST AFFAIRS

Kong Ling did not dare to grouse to himself for fear that Xiao Chiye might sense something amiss. After wiping his sweat, he took a sip of his tea trying to cover it up, only to make it more conspicuous. He said as he nodded, “Your Lordship is returning to Libei to fight battles with the Biansha Tribes, so Cizhou can’t possibly trouble the Imperial Army any further. Moreover, with the Vice Commander’s presence here, Lei Jingzhe won’t be able to get anything out of it even if he stages a comeback.”

Zhou Gui still had not gotten the hint at this point. He merely said, “The march of an army over a long distance is beset with difficulties. Cizhou is to the south of Libei, so Libei has nothing to worry about back here. If we can be of any use to Your Lordship in the future, Cizhou will surely do its best to help. As for those bandits who have been taken into custody at the prison, how does Your Lordship wish to deal with them?”

“Several of those bandits were once one of the few bandit chiefs from Mount Luo. There’s not much use in killing them, so why not release them together with Lei Jingzhe?” Xiao Chiye already had a plan in mind. He said, “I’ve already bribed a few of the bandits to spread around the news that Lei Jingzhe has been released by the Imperial Army. Half a month later, they will break out of the prison and flee with Ding Niu and Liu’er. When the time comes, Cizhou can just send men to pursue them and drive them back to Dunzhou’s territory. They have men who died at the hands of the Imperial Army. Once they conclude that the siege in the east was a leak from Lei Jingzhe, they will never let him off.”

Zhou Gui and Kong Ling nodded in unison. Thinking as Xiao Chiye was about to return to Libei soon, Zhou Gui decided that he had to discuss the military provisions with him. They had conferred with Shen Zechuan a few days ago regarding the military provisions’ allowance for the Imperial Army next year, but Shen Zechuan had promptly turned it down.

“Cizhou had originally planned to give the Imperial Army an allowance of 16,000 dan<sup>1</sup> of grains after spring next year.” Zhou Gui faced Xiao Chiye and deliberated over his words. “We know it is a small amount, but it’s a little token of appreciation from Cizhou to Your Lordship. I have already told the Vice Commander of this. The Vice Commander understands Cizhou's difficulties. He wants us to sell these grains at a suitable price to Chazhou and use the money as funds for the reconstruction. We have been thinking about it for these few days, and we still feel bad about it. Your Lordship, there is a piece of vacant land to the northwest of Cizhou. It's the former site of the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds.<sup>2</sup> At the very beginning, we wanted to till the land and cultivate fields there, but the soil isn't suitable, and we couldn't grow any grains except sow some rapeseeds. Rather than leaving it idle, we might as well gift it to Your Lordship to create a track for horse riding or to build a new camp as you wish."

The emergence of the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds preceded the Nanlin Hunting Grounds. Owing to the rise of Xiao Fangxu in the north later, the Li clan canceled the annual ceremony at the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds and had the venue changed to Nanlin Hunting Grounds, where they could feel more at ease. This piece of land was not small; it was even bigger than Xiao Chiye's military drill grounds at Mount Feng in Qudu. It was far enough to pose a threat to Dancheng and close enough to provide support to Cizhou. And it also stood on Libei's boundary line. It was an excellent position from which to advance and retreat, launch an assault and defend.

Xiao Chiye's interest was piqued. He dreaded the Qidong Garrison Troops in the south. Shen Zechuan was remaining behind in Zhongbo. If he did not have a place to station his troops, he would have to rush to and forth between both ends. Never mind if it was just him alone. But if he ran around like this with tens of thousands of men in tow, then he would not only expose their tracks but also draw unnecessary troubles to themselves.

But Xiao Chiye had no money. He had scrimped and saved to build up the military drill grounds at Mount Feng. It was not as imposing as the Eight Great Training Divisions' military grounds, but it consumed real silvers. His noble title was useless now, and there was no one to pay him a salary. His residences in Qudu had turned into lifeless objects he could see but not eat. Even taking out a handful of copper coins would prove to be a problem for him.

The little jade bead earring Shen Zechuan was presently wearing on his right ear was polished by Xiao Chiye himself. In the past, Xiao Chiye would not even blink an eye at losing a few ivory fans. Now that Lanzhou's little bamboo fan had gotten stained on one side and he had promised to have it replaced, he was thinking of making one himself later.

Seeing as Xiao Chiye had still yet to say a word, Zhou Gui thought that the piece of land was not to his liking, so he said, "The place is big. Although it is a venue for hunting, it has fallen into years of disrepair, and the errand-runners have all left. The perimeter wall seems to me to be still solid. After Your Lordship takes over, you'll just need to fortify its defenses a little, and you'll be able to use it."

Kong Ling also added, "Your Lordship helped Cizhou out of its predicament. Naturally, we will not try to fool Your Lordship on this matter. We had also mentioned this place to the Vice Commander yesterday, and the Vice Commander said he would personally make a trip down to take a look when he finds the time these two days. Seems like he likes it too."

It had been a passionate night last night, and Shen Zechuan did not get the time or chance to bring this matter up. What's more, Xiao Chiye had left in a hurry in the morning, and Shen Zechuan was still not wide awake then.

"The place is good. It's suitable as a resting place and temporary lodging for the Imperial Army. Lanzhou and I both like it." Without a change in expression, Xiao Chiye said, "There's no need for both of you to stand on such ceremony, but thank you."

Shen Zechuan got out of bed and put on a plain, white set of regular clothes. He originally wanted to go out, but the traces from their lovemaking were too obvious. The marks on his chest, waist, side of the legs, crook of the neck could be covered up with clothes. But he was too thin-skinned. As long as they had gone at it vigorously at night, the lingering redness at the sides of his eyes would not fully recede the next day.

Ding Tao was standing on the veranda feeding the red carps. He was also rattling on and on, telling Gu Jin a story. The fish bait in his hands kept leaking into the vat, where the two red carps gobbled it down. By the time Gu Jin realized what was happening, one of them had already gotten so bloated that it flipped belly up.

Gu Jin made to beat up Ding Tao. Sensing trouble, Ding Tao hurriedly stuffed the remaining fish bait into his pocket and fled to the principal room. He yelled, "Young Master! Bad news! Jin-ge fed the fish to death!"

Shen Zechuan picked up the sweet soup from the tray. He gave a bowl to Ding Tao and told him to sit under the eaves to drink it. He then asked Gu Jin, "How are your injuries today?"

Gu Jin saw Shen Zechuan wearing wooden clogs and knew that the latter would not be heading out today. He bowed in greeting and said, “Much better. The physician came as scheduled to change the bandages. Since Young Master is not going out today, shall we get the kitchen to prepare the meals now?”

Clusters of tree shades decorated the grounds in the courtyard, while shadows of flowers adorned the panels of the two wide-opened doors. The weather was fine today. It was not yet noon, but it was already starting to get hot. Shen Zechuan’s fingers that were basking in the sunlight looked as though they were clutching a handful of crystal clear amber. He could not stand the cold, and he also disliked the heat. He looked to be exhausted today, and his entire person exuded laziness.

“The weather is hot. Shifu dreads greasy food, and Ce’an gets cranky easily. Get the chef to choose and make some light dishes. You’re currently nursing an injury, so do as the physician and shifu say and get the kitchen to make an individual portion for you.” Shen Zechuan retreated half a step and returned to the coolness of the shade under the eaves. “Ding Tao, go to the courtyard and call shifu over.”

Ji Gang did not stay in the separate courtyard Shen Zechuan had initially given him. Instead, he lived in a courtyard together with Qiao Tianya and the rest. People tend to fear loneliness when they grow old, and it was inevitable for him to get all sentimental now that Qi Huilian was no longer around to squabble with him. The good thing was that there were those from Libei and those who originally came from the Imperial Bodyguards among this batch of guards. All of them held the Ji clan’s boxing style in esteem, and they hoped to gain pointers and guidance from Ji Gang. That was why they liked to hang around Ji Gang when they were not on duty. What’s more, they were all lads who had yet to get married. Ji Gang found them boisterous and lively, and it made him happy to be around them too.

Ji Gang went to bed early and woke up early nowadays. He got up at the first quarter of the hour of mao<sup>3</sup> today and watched Qiao Tianya and the others practice shadowboxing in the courtyard. After drinking his tea, he came out for a stroll and found that Shen Zechuan was still asleep. So he took another stroll with his hands at his back and returned to find that Shen

Zechuan was still not up. So on seeing him now, he could not refrain from asking, "Why did you get up so late today? Have you fallen ill?"

Taken aback, Shen Zechuan paused for a moment before he said, "... I overslept."

Ji Gang noted that he seemed to be under the weather today, so he said, "Although there are plenty of issues at present, you also have to take care of your health. I'll cook a couple of fish dishes for you tonight."

As they chatted, Xiao Chiye returned. He saw Ding Tao at the entrance of the courtyard and knew that Ji Gang had come. He took off his outer garment and asked Chen Yang as he washed his hands, "Did shifu come in the morning too?"

Chen Yang answered truthfully, "Young Master bought shifu a skylark a few days earlier, and shifu would always take a stroll with the bird every morning when he gets up. Young Master was still sleeping when he came to the entrance of our courtyard this morning, so he asked about it several times."

Xiao Chiye wiped his hands and walked along the walkway to the front. When he entered, he carried out a disciple bow to Ji Gang. He had been very respectful to Ji Gang and Zuo Qianqiu back then at the Plum Blossom Residence, but Ji Gang could not forget that kick he gave Shen Zechuan six years ago. Now that Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye were in the same boat rowing towards a common goal, Ji Gang thought that they had buried the hatchet in private and were merely friends on good terms with one another. So, for Shen Zechuan's sake, he would not give Xiao Chiye the stink eye.

Ji Gang and Zuo Qianqiu were brothers. According to seniority, Xiao Chiye's paying of obeisance to him was etiquette. Ji Gang nodded and said concisely, "Your Lordship may dispense with such formalities."

Xiao Chiye took his seat. Ji Gang was at the head, so Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan were sitting face to face with one another. During the meal, Ji Gang asked questions relating to the suppression of the bandits as well as stuff about Zuo Qianqiu. Xiao Chiye answered him all in full detail. He did not hope to give a perfect answer; all he strove for was to be genuine in his responses.

Ji Gang was a person who greatly valued relationships and ties. In his younger years, he screwed up his assignment because of drinking and caused his adoptive father, Ji Wufan, to lose the favor of Emperor Guangcheng. This had been weighing heavily on his heart. Later on, Duanzhou fell into the enemies' hands, and he never touched wine again. He did not have Qi Huilian's illustrious reputation for his talents, but he had great prestige among the Imperial Bodyguards. He was the main reason why the group with Ge Qingqing at the head was willing to go all out to help Shen Zechuan when Shen Zechuan was flogged and thrown into the imperial prison, even extending their assistance to him in the period after. When Ji Gang was still serving as the Vice Commander in the Imperial Bodyguards, he rarely abused his authority to oppress the others. He also abhorred Pan Rugui and the likes. Again and again, he had helped the innocents to redress the injustices they had suffered, and because of this, he had offended quite a number of powerful officials.

When it came to elders like this, Xiao Chiye would not resort to dubious tricks for his own personal advantage. He had to take out all of his sincerity. Only then would he be able to make Ji Gang see him in a new, more favorable light.

Their meal lasted an hour. Ji Gang thought that they still had important matters to discuss, and so he did not stay for long and left early.

Xiao Chiye was changing his clothes. When his upper body was bare, he pulled over Shen Zechuan's hand and placed it on his back to touch it.

Shen Zechuan was still sitting on the mat with a brush in one hand as he calculated the expenses for this period of time. As he touched Xiao Chiye's sweat, he lifted his eyes and said, "Just how nervous were you?"

"That was scary." Xiao Chiye swiftly put on his clothes. "I was worried my answers were not sincere enough, and it would alienate shifu from me even more. I've been really busy this period of time. I will have to find a day later to talk it over with shifu."

"A father loves his child without asking for anything in return."<sup>4</sup> Shen Zechuan set the brush down. "There is no transactional exchange of benefits and profits when it comes to shifu, only genuine affection and sincere concern. Second Young Master has a long way ahead. That kick of yours really set you back a long way."

Xiao Chiye slumped into the rattan chair. He thought for a moment and said, "If it had been my old man sitting there today, we might not even get to finish the meal."

Still feeling the trepidation, Xiao Chiye touched his own chest and looked at Shen Zechuan, who was deep in thought over the accounts. He held the brush, then set it down, and his sleeve slid down to reveal a portion of fair skin. The expression on his side profile was calm. There was no one else in the room, and his collar that had been slightly loosened because of the heat exposed a snow-white expanse with traces of lovebites on it.

How flimsy.

For a moment, Xiao Chiye was in a daze as he gazed blankly at Shen Zechuan. He thought of many things, and yet it also seemed as if he had figured out nothing.

“Lanzhou.” Xiao Chiye inexplicably called out to him.

Shen Zechuan’s mind was not here. He just happened to be thinking that he should get Ge Qingqing to find a few stewards from Juexi who could do the accounts and have them sent over when he suddenly heard Xiao Chiye’s voice. Although his eyes never left the accounts book, he turned his face slightly and answered, “Spit it out if you have something to say.”

Xiao Chiye abruptly stood up, turned around a few times, and suddenly squatted behind Shen Zechuan to embrace him. Shen Zechuan was still writing. It was all thanks to the power of his extraordinary focus that he did not mess up his strokes.

Xiao Chiye nuzzled against Shen Zechuan’s cheek from behind until Shen Zechuan’s face felt hot. Shen Zechuan had no idea what was up with Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye never said a word as he touched Shen Zechuan all over and scooped Shen Zechuan into his arms, clinging on to him like glue.

And just like this, Shen Zechuan sat in Xiao Chiye’s embrace and continued to do his accounts. When he ran into difficulty, he got Xiao Chiye to stretch his fingers out, but Xiao Chiye was unwilling to and did the sums orally as he continued to hug him. Surprisingly enough, he was pretty swift in his calculation.

“Second Young Master.” Shen Zechuan pushed the abacus aside. “You have a bit of a knack for this. Calculate these all for me, will you?”

Xiao Chiye pulled the abacus back and said, “Count long enough, and I’ll fumble. It’s so complicated that it’s better to hand it over to the professionals. Do you know who in Qudu is the best in arithmetic?”

Shen Zechuan replied, “That, I really don’t know.”

“Third Missy Hua, Hua Xiangyi.”

So Shen Zechuan asked, “Then do you know who in Zhongbo is the most skilled in employing diversionary tactics to lure the enemies?”

Xiao Chiye ventured a guess. "... Tantai Long?"

"It's Xiao Ce'an." Shen Zechuan finally looked at him and said in all seriousness. "Look at him nuzzling away at me until my heart goes all pitter-patter and I'm too preoccupied to get down to serious business."

"I'm unworthy of the reputation." Xiao Chiye moved in closer. "It's only because I saw how sweaty the little Young Master is and with clothes in such a state of disarray that I've specifically come over to drop you a reminder or two."

"Then you are a real gentleman." Shen Zechuan brushed the tip of this finger that was moistened with tea water across the back of Xiao Chiye's hand and said, "Unlike me and my mind working in overdrive."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO: Yunyun

Footnotes

1. 石 dan, dry measure for grain equal. 1 dan = approximately 90kg (see chapter 113 author's note)
2. 北原猎场 literally Northern Plains hunting grounds.
3. 卯时 hour of mao, i.e., 5-7am, based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times. one ke (一刻) is at approximately the 15 minutes mark.
4. 慈父爱子，非为报也。The original quote speaks of a mother's love instead (慈母爱子，非为报也。) by Liu An (刘安).

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 119 : PAST ACQUAINTANCE

Xiao Chiye said, "Let's hear more about it."

Shen Zechuan was feeling so warm from Xiao Chiye's embrace that he began to sweat. He said, "You'll lose the fun if you voice it out when it comes to matters like undressing and what happens after."

Xiao Chiye grabbed hold of Shen Zechuan's fleeing finger. He laughed for a moment before saying, "You'll lose the fun if you voice it out? Then, take a moment to hear me out. I'll say it for you."

Shen Zechuan looked toward the account books.

Xiao Chiye squeezed Shen Zechuan the pulp of Shen Zechuan's finger and looked at the account book together with him. He said, "I haven't even started, so why are you getting all hot?"

Shen Zechuan looked askance at Xiao Chiye and mouthed soundlessly, because of you.

Xiao Chiye looked at Shen Zechuan for a moment, then suddenly lowered his head and buried it into the pit of Shen Zechuan's neck. All his earlier emotions had melted away at this look of Shen Zechuan. They became another kind of raging torrents that surged along Xiao Chiye's chest to his entire body. But no matter how tempestuous the waves were inside of him, he did not dare to use even more strength in his embrace of Shen Zechuan.

That kick that had never once turned a hair during all the years in Qudu had, along with the passage of time, cunningly turned into pangs of pain after Xiao Chiye fell into the clutches of love. The turbidness that was love and hatred went through a cleansing by the heavy downpour to become a crystal clear lake. Xiao Chiye drew in his claws, bowing his head in submission to the word "love".

Shen Zechuan released his hand and held hands again with Xiao Chiye with interlocking fingers. He tilted his head to bump gently against Xiao Chiye's unmoving head and said, "Have you fallen asleep?"

Xiao Chiye raised his head and said in a hoarse voice, "Oh, how I love you so."

Shen Zechuan was slightly stunned.

Xiao Chiye looked at him and enunciated each word as he repeated, "I love you so much."

Shen Zechuan remained stunned for a moment before he said, "I—"

Xiao Chiye could not wait any longer. He turned his head and kissed Shen Zechuan hard, as if he wanted to give all the love in his heart that could not be expressed with words alone to Shen Zechuan. The cool breeze in the courtyard stirred the bamboo blinds, while shadows of flowers shifted under the eaves along with the slanting trajectory of the sun at the same time golden light, having penetrated through the obstacles to make it way deeper in, cascaded over the ground.

Beiyuan Hunting Grounds was not that far away from Cizhou, and there was also a bridle path connecting both places. Lang Tao Xue Jin could reach it in half a day, so Xiao Chiye took Chen Yang and Ding Tao to take a look at the site the next day. Shen Zechuan finished sorting out the accounts for this period of time in Cizhou and, together with Zhou Gui and Kong Ling, made some changes to matters relating to the Cizhou garrison troops.

"Although I had the thought that quite a number of people would come forward to answer our recruitment call, I never expected it to be this many!" Zhou Gui was overjoyed. "With this, we can further expand the plowing range next year."

"There's a shortage of grains on the outside which Cizhou can supply. To many of those in desperate situations, this is timely help that's equivalent to sending charcoals in snowy weather. It not only solves their urgent needs but also prevents them from turning to banditry." Kong Ling looked delighted as he said to Shen Zechuan, "We shall have to trouble the Vice Commander regarding the military arms."

"With the way things are going, there will be no more bandits in Cizhou's territory when next year comes around." Zhou Gui did not sleep the entire night; he had been making a lot of plans. He said, "If we can also help Dunzhou and Duanzhou out of their predicaments, then the bandits from Mount Luo will fall apart without the need for us to attack them."

"While the recruitment is showing initial success, Your Excellency cannot simply rely on this alone. Cizhou has been able to sustain such a large amount of food consumption because everyone from top to bottom in Cizhou was able to work as one in the past five years. Duanzhou lies close to Biansha. Even if they have a change of heart and wish to reclaim the wastelands for farming, they won't be able to do it." Shen Zechuan still has other considerations. He said, "What's more, we currently do not have an emperor on the throne, and ambitious men are easily born out of troubled times. There's a Lei Jingzhe in Mount Luo, so Chazhou might just have their own Lei Jingzhe too. Cizhou has only just begun to toddle; there's no rush."

"What he said." Kong Ling nodded and said, "The most pressing task at present is to resolve the issue of household registration. Many of them fled here from other places, and they don't have any documentary proof on them. If they want to reside in Cizhou permanently, they will need an identity."

Shen Zechuan paused for a moment and said, "During the reign of Yongyi, the Eastern Palace pushed forth a census registry<sup>1</sup> to register common folks as citizens. It was to be checked and verified by the layers of prefectural prefects, district magistrates, and townships of the various lands. Cizhou is less populated at present. Since Cizhou is no longer under Dazhou's command, you can abolish the original three registers and let Cizhou develop its own new registers, with vagrants still prohibited in the city. Once the registry is finalized, Cizhou will be able to collect taxes based on the registry, and subsequently, the accounts will become clearer too."

"Then we can get to work and have it straightened out these few days." Zhou Gui paused for a moment, then continued, "I'm only worried about the Qidong Garrison Troops now."

"It has been so long." Kong Ling piped up too. "Why haven't we heard any news from Qidong at all?"

Shen Zechuan had also gotten an inkling of sorts from this wait.

If Qudu wanted to stop Xiao Chiye from returning to Libei, they only had to mobilize Qi Zhuyin right away, and she would have been able to stop Xiao Chiye at the border of Zhongbo a month ago. But Qudu did not do so. They sent Han Jin, an armchair strategist who was all talk and no action. This legitimate son born of the Han clan was taken captive by the Imperial Army outside Dancheng and was still being held in prison. Going by the division and distribution of Qidong's Five Commanderies, Qi Zhuyun could assemble 100,000 men within half a month. Yet, there was still no sign of her to date.

It was already late when Shen Zechuan came out of the Zhou's residence. He estimated the time; Xiao Chiye should still be on the way back to the city, so he was not in a hurry to return home. As he descended the stairs, the path ahead brightened up. Fei Sheng carried a lantern, illuminating the road ahead for Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan had been busy with other matters these few days, and so he had yet to have a talk with Fei Sheng. Fei Sheng tried his best to get close to Chen Yang every day, and he was the most diligent in serving tea and water to Ji Gang. This man, a veteran who had tumbled his way out of Qudu, was presently holding up the lantern for Shen Zechuan, and he did not speak up to interrupt Shen Zechuan's thoughts along the way either. From all appearances, he looked as if he was already content enough to hold the lantern for Shen Zechuan.

There were some people on the streets. Fei Sheng was carefully guiding the way when he suddenly heard Shen Zechuan said, "I heard you recommended yourself for the job when His Lordship went out this morning."

Fei Sheng answered with a neutral expression, "I saw that Gu Jin had yet to recover from his injuries, and so I thought of going along with His Lordship on his behalf."

Shen Zechuan looked at the road and said nothing more.

Once back at the residence, Qiao Tianya took over the lantern. There was still Gu Jin in the courtyard, and it was not Fei Sheng's turn to be on shift duty. So he went back on his own initiative.

"If Master gives him the cold-shoulder," Qiao Tianya said, "he might come to harbor resentment."

As Shen Zechuan entered the long walkway, he looked back to see that Fei Sheng had already made a turn and passed through the moon gate<sup>2</sup> on the other side. He said, "I have the mind to use him, but he might not necessarily think highly of me. His rank in the Imperial Bodyguard is higher than yours. Han Cheng could be said to be one of the bigwigs he counted on for backing. He was also Han Cheng's right-handed man before the former emperor met with sudden death. There has to be a reason why Han Cheng wants to kill him. It has been several days since he came to Cizhou, and yet he has never shown any intent to speak of this reason to me."

Shen Zechuan stood still and smiled at Qiao Tianya.

“It wasn’t me but Ce’an he was originally gunning for when he willingly staked and gambled everything on that one move of his in Qudu. Ce’an is the second legitimate son of the Prince of Libei. The Hereditary Prince was severely injured at that time, and the others all thought the Ce’an was going back to replace Xiao Fangxu. Fei Sheng was already starting to harbor ill-feelings towards Han Cheng. Rather than compromise and make concessions to achieve his aim, he might as well leave Qudu for Libei to carve out another path for himself. The identity of a life-saving benefactor is enough for him to secure a stable life in Libei.”

Qiao Tianya had some understanding of Fei Sheng. He said, “It’s inconvenient for Gu Jin now that he’s wounded. Fei Sheng recommended himself for the job today because he wants to take Gu Jin’s place. A pity His Lordship is a hard-hearted man and would not give him this opportunity.”

But Fei Sheng was prepared. He had been so attentive towards Ji Gang just so he could leave himself a way out. The self-recommendation today was a kind of test to sound Xiao Chiye out. He had already understood Xiao Chiye’s intent, and so he shifted his gaze back to Shen Zechuan.

“This person has real capabilities.” Shen Zechuan said. “He’s on par with Gu Jin. It’d be truly a pity to cast him aside and not use him.”

They had already arrived at the courtyard while they were speaking. Gu Jin was about to arrange for the people to serve the food, but Shen Zechuan told him to wait.

“He should almost be back now.” Shen Zechuan turned back. “Go wait at the entrance and receive him.”

But this wait lasted for half a night, and Xiao Chiye still had not returned. Shen Zechuan stayed up until the burning candles were gone by half before he heard movements at the front.

Xiao Chiye strode into the courtyard but did not enter the room immediately. He was covered in dust all over. He took off his outer robe in the courtyard and turned back to look at the person behind him, although the words that came out of his mouth were, “Lanzhou.”

Shen Zechuan looked past Xiao Chiye’s shoulder and saw Chen Yang and Gu Jin supporting someone in. The courtyard was not bright enough for Shen Zechuan to make out who this person was.

This person’s robe had been ripped to pieces, and the legs of his trousers were torn. He was wearing a pair of straw shoes that had split apart, and his legs were all caked in dirt and mud. He could not stand firm on his feet and had to rely on Chen Yang and Gu Jin to hold him up as he spouted nonsense. Disheveled and unkempt, he was truly a sorry sight to behold.

Shen Zechuan suddenly thought of something under the faint light. He probed, “Your Excellency Yu?”

That man shivered and struggled for a bit as he peered forward through the dimness in disbelief. His messy hair exposed a pair of eyes among them. He froze for a moment when he saw Shen Zechuan. Then he swallowed a few mouthfuls of saliva. His mouth opened and closed. All of a sudden, he burst out bawling.

“This is draining the life out of me!” Yu Xiaozai cried himself hoarse. He kept wiping his face as he shouted, “Vice Commander! The Grand Secretary is no more! I’m going to die too! I’ve been fleeing and hiding the entire journey here. Life is hard!”

Startled, Shen Zechuan strode a step out and asked in a heavy voice, “What do you mean, Secretariat Elder Hai is no more?”

Chokes of sobs clogged up Yu Xiaozai’s throat. He wanted to answer, but all that came out was the sound of his crying. He cried so hard that he was virtually on the verge of sliding to the ground. He kept shaking his head. At last, overwhelmed with grief and with his voice hoarse from exhaustion, he answered in bureaucratic-speak, “The Grand Secretary... The Grand Secretary risked his life in futile remonstrance...”

“Take him away to calm down for a moment and have a change of clothes.” Xiao Chiye said with a cool head. “Gu Jin, go inform the kitchen to make some soup and have it sent over.”

Those wretched cries lingered in the air. Shen Zechuan was still standing in the same spot. For all his hundreds and thousands of guesses, he had never foreseen that Hai Liangyi would die. Hai Liangyi was the stabilizing force of Qudu. He could even hold on tight to his position in the Grand Secretariat back then, when the Hua and Pan factions were at the height of their power and influence. Even if Han Cheng wanted to assist a male offspring from his own clan to the throne after Li Jianheng’s death, Hai Liangyi should still be the first and best choice of a minister inside and outside the imperial court to entrust the child to.

Xiao Chiye held on to Shen Zechuan’s arm to bring him out of his stupefaction. Xiao Chiye said, “I found him among the groups of bandits a few li west of the hunting grounds. It hadn’t been easy for him to get out of Qudu, and he was robbed by the bandits after leaving Dancheng, so he could only walk barefoot towards Cizhou. He has a letter on him, which Cen Yu wrote to you. He has news of Qudu and Qidong as well.”

Yu Xiaozai still needed someone to help support him when he entered the room again. He was so famished that he had no strength and had to carry the bowl in his arms to wolf down the food before they had their conversation. Tears were still streaming down his cheeks as he ate. He seemed to be in a rush as he choked on his food and coughed. It was only when his hunger abated some that he covered up his face with a clean handkerchief and wiped away at it for a while.

“It’s truly a stroke of luck that I could live long enough to see the Vice Commander. His Excellency Cen’s letter is in my bosom. I kept it close to me throughout for fear that the bandits would search me and find it.” Yu Xiaozai sat on his heels and said with difficulty, “Before I begin, I have to inform both of you gentlemen that the new emperor who is about to ascend to the throne is a woman.”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 黃冊 Huangce or census registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household’s classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.

- 2.
3. 洞门 An opening in a wall separating different courtyards within a residence or palace. It's also known as a moon gate (月亮门).

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 120 : AFFAIRS IN THE CAPITAL

There was no place for women in the imperial court.

Feudal ethics<sup>1</sup> drove them into the lady's chambers, becoming fragile objects in the small courtyard of their living quarters, cared for in every way by their husbands and servants, parents and children. They were porcelain vases to be appraised for their value as they waited to be married off; they did not need lofty aspirations.

The Empress Dowager, Hua Hewei, was from an illustrated clan. She was a legitimate daughter of direct descent born to the principal's wife of the Hua clan. Before she came of age, she had never seen the world beyond the walls of her quarters, and after she came of age,<sup>2</sup> she was still bound within the confines of her courtyard. She wrested away the most supreme power and authority of this world from her husband's hands, yet she never strode a step beyond that line; instead, she let down the beaded curtain and sat cautiously with her back straight behind it.<sup>3</sup>

Commander-in-chief, Qi Zhuyin, similarly came from a distinguished background. She was the legitimate daughter of direct descent born to the principal's wife of the Qi clan, a military family of generals. Before she went to war, she was betrothed to another, but after she went to war, no one dared to marry her. She never got the conferment she deserved, only the concession before Yulong Terrace.<sup>4</sup> The Ministry of Rites said that she was not worthy of enjoying the posthumous privilege of being enshrined and worshiped by the Imperial Ancestral Temple after death. The name, Qi Zhuyin, had been, to date, branded as the little girl of Qidong. If only Qi Shiyu's sons had lived up to expectations, the position of commander-in-chief of the military forces would never have come to fall upon her shoulders.

Xue Xiuzhuo initially did not have the thought to support and assist Ling Ting to the throne. That acute disappointment when he found out that the imperial heir was a girl made him change his strategy right at once, but then, he changed his mind when he saw Ling Ting.

Because Ling Ting resembled Emperor Guangcheng way too much.

Any long-time minister who was old enough to have seen Emperor Guangcheng before could tell Ling Ting's origins at a glance—this was an aberration the result of incest within the Li clan.

When the Eastern Palace fell from power during the reign of Yongyi, the only reason for Emperor Guangcheng to leave the palace was to pay a visit to Prince Qin – who had taken ill – and his beautiful, defenseless wife. Emperor Guangcheng did not have any imperial concubine who was in his favor during the later years of the reign of Yongyi. After he fell ill, the empress, Hua Hewei, took control of the former imperial court and harem to prevent him from begetting another imperial heir. It was under these layers of walls around him that Emperor Guangcheng set his eyes on his daughter-in-law.

A pity Princess Consort Qin gave birth to a girl.

Like an old lion who had exhausted every bit of his energy, Emperor Guangcheng did not even lift an eyelid when he learned of this news and subsequently lost all the lofty aspirations he once harbored. No one knew if Prince Qin had caught some wind of it, but it was not long before he passed away from his illness. Before his death, he threw Ling Ting out of Qudu. However, it seemed to be fated that Xiangyun would come across her and bring her back.

When Xue Xiuzhuo had just found Ling Ting, she was uncouth in behavior and was already in her teens. Pulling her back onto the seat of the imperial heir would be an impossible task without the determination to transform her from inside out. At first, it was tough. She had wasted too much time in Xiangyun Villa. If she herself were not resolute enough to erase all those superfluous traces on her completely, then it would have been undoable even if Xue Xiuzhuo had superhuman powers.

But Ling Ting actually “corrected” herself, one step at a time. Little by little, she scraped all those vulgar and frivolous things off herself. At first, there were plenty of words she could not read, so she studied hard through the nights. Strokes she could not write well, she would practice them day and night. She seemed to be the last remaining bit of strength Heaven left for the Li clan’s empire. She allowed Xue Xiuzhuo to see a faint glimmer of light in that deteriorating situation.

A few months ago, when the misty rain enveloped the silk-tree blossoms – when Qi Huilian rejected Xue Xiuzhuo in the loft – Ling Ting was sitting upright at the table practicing her writing.

She used so much strength in her writing that she almost broke the paper.

After she was done writing, she turned her head aside to look at the drizzling rain. She watched it for a long time without expression. Xue Xiuzhuo later came over to have a meal with her. She sat in the seat of lower priority and ate her meal with precise table manners. Xue Xiuzhuo was particular about not speaking when eating, so they never talked when they had their meals. After the meal, he would test Ling Ting on her homework. This was the most important event of the day. Ling Ting had to be precise and clear in her answers. Xue Xiuzhuo never scolded her, but he was more exacting on her than anyone else.

“Teacher.” Ling Ting paused for a moment as she lowered her head. “Am I going to have a change of teacher?”

Xue Xiuzhuo put the books in order and said with indifference, “This isn’t a matter for you to think about.”

Ling Ting was silent as she propped herself up. She listened as Xue Xiuzhuo rose to his feet and walked towards the door. She suddenly turned her head aside to look at Xue Xiuzhuo and asked, “Because I’m a woman?”

Xue Xiuzhuo stood still and turned back to look at Ling Ting too. Ling Ting never averted her eyes. She was just as calm as Xue Xiuzhuo.

“I’m a woman.” Ling Ting said. “If the new teacher isn’t willing to teach me for this reason, then I’d like to ask to see him.”

Xue Xiuzhuo turned around again and changed his shoes. The sound of rain outside intensified. He said, “No. You just don’t have the affinity to be teacher and pupil with him. I’ll still continue to teach you.”

“Affinity is the most difficult thing to make do with. Wise teachers are hard to seek. I’m not willing to let a teacher slip by because of this.” Ling Ting had already stood up. “Teacher.”

But Xue Xiuzhuo paid her no heed, nor did she answer her. He lifted the curtain, and the young servant boy waiting on the outside hurriedly held up the umbrella. Without letting the servant touch the books, he went down the stairs and left.

Ling Ting stood where she was and watched through the gap in the same curtain as Xue Xiuzhuo walked a few steps before he disappeared in the rain. She knew this was a soundless rejection from Xue Xiuzhuo. No matter what other people thought of Xue Xiuzhuo, he was, in Ling Ting’s eyes, exceedingly calm under that gentle and refined mask of his. He was even a little conceited; he would never open himself up to manipulation by others, and it was rare for him to heed the words of others.

Ling Ting could only let the matter drop. She sat back down, flipped open the essay on contemporary politics that Xue Xiuzhuo had left behind, and copied Xue Xiuzhuo's characters. But she could never write like him. Because she did not know how to rein herself in diplomatically. Her strokes were just like steel blades that would never go around in circles.

Several months later, the scorching sun blazed down upon Yulong Terrace where a densely packed mass of court officials was kneeling. These were officials from humble backgrounds headed by Hai Liangyi. After the sixth month, Han Cheng brought back a boy from his own clan and claimed this child to be a descendant of the Li clan.

Under Yao Wenyu's meticulous care, Hai Liangyi's condition took a turn for the better. The first thing he did when he attended court was to reject Han Cheng's memorial in his capacity as the Grand Secretary of the Grand Secretariat. He also demanded an official verification of his child's identity. But the emperors of the Li clan were all dead, and it was impossible to determine if this child was a descendant of the Li clan based on the empress dowager alone. Both parties reached a deadlock, with no one willing to make any more concessions.

"I was the Eight Great Training Divisions Vice Commander during the reign of Yongyi, and I was also the top military officer under Emperor Guangcheng's command. I have a private letter from Emperor Guangcheng entrusting the care of the child to me. Grand Secretary, is this not enough either?" Han Cheng had gained power recently and so dared to refute Hai Liangyi on the imperial court.

Hai Liangyi did not have the same vigor as before after his illness. His heart would palpitate and his hands would tremble just by standing for a few moments. He stepped out and said, "Mere words without a factual basis. If the commander is willing to make the private letter public and hand it over to the Grand Secretariat for examination, then you and I would have no further need to engage in such a war of words on the imperial court."

Han Cheng sneered inwardly to himself. There was no imperial heir at present, and it was the throne being left vacant that Hai Liangyi should be getting anxious about. For him to be so unwilling to make a concession, he must already have found a candidate. So he said, "The throne has been left empty for more than a month. What is the Grand Secretary still waiting for? The Grand Secretariat has been deliberating over it. Has it still not come up with a solution?"

Hai Liangyi was sweating all over. He felt a stifling oppression in his chest, so he took a short breather before continuing, "We sorted out the clan register and found out that the second son of the former Prince Yan's grandson born of a concubine is still in Huaizhou. He is a descendant of the Li clan with a traceable lineage. According to the rules, no one else but him is fit to be the current crown prince candidate."

"Prince Yan was the Prince of Huaizhou during the reign of Wanxuan. His descendants of direct lineage died in battle at Luoxia Pass, and those born of concubines further down are all from the collateral branch of the clan. How can they be called the bloodline of the Li clan if we were really to go into it? The second son of Prince Yan's grandson born of a concubine is already approaching seventy years of age, so how can he still head the government?" Han Cheng smiled. "Furthermore, it's a long and bumpy journey. How is he going to stand this kind of physical and mental torment? Grand Secretary, there is simply no way we can discuss this further in detail!"

Both parties stood their ground, with no one backing down. There were still students from the imperial college kneeling outside. The empress dowager listened behind the bead curtains for a moment before saying, "Although this matter is urgent, there is still room for discussion. Secretariat Elder, the Grand Secretariat assists in governmental affairs, and there has never been a time when I do a perfunctory job of matters. If you have objections, you can come over to Mingli Hall to discuss it face-to-face with me. Please get the students to disperse."

She spoke in a soft voice, but Hai Liangyi could hear the displeasure.

Although Han Cheng went all out to push forth this child, he had always been submitting his memorials in the capacity as the former Vice-Commander of the Eight Great Training Divisions; he never got the officials from the noble clans to second his proposal. This was to, firstly, allow the Han clan to become the only support the new emperor could rely on, and secondly, avoid suspicion.

Avoiding suspicion was exceptionally important.

Hua Siqian and Pan Rugui both failed because they did not know how to avoid suspicion. Forming cliques for one's selfish ends was a great taboo in the imperial court. It had not been long since the empress dowager took control over the imperial court again. At present, she was just like the emperor. What she could not stand to see was her ministers flocking together to become a force powerful enough to coerce her into making policy decisions. As such, she did not promote officials from humble backgrounds as a gesture of goodwill, nor did she promote officials from the noble clans in order to secure her power. She seemed to understand that Dazhou had already come to a certain point. Instead of pinning her hopes on a puppet like she had done a few years before, she might as well count on herself.

Hai Liangyi was sick for two months, during which officials from humble backgrounds were extremely jittery and on edge. With Kong Qiu and Cen Yu taking the lead, they carried out plenty of discussions in private, and they also repeatedly submitted memorials to ask the empress dowager to let Hai Liangyi return to the imperial court to administer state affairs. Not only that, the students from the Imperial College still had the nerve to engage in idle talks of state affairs. The sixth month had only just arrived, and there were already rumors that the empress dowager had seized power and established herself as the ruler.

The empress dowager did not have any overt discussions with Hai Liangyi, but she increased the frequency of visits paid by the eunuchs. This was a kind of covert prompt. So Hai Liangyi attended court as soon as the sixth month came around, when his illness had just taken a turn for the better. Although he had, in the past decades, asserted that he never was a part of a faction or clique, he had already become the direction in which all the scholars of humble origins in the world looked to. This was a fact he could not deny even if he wanted to. He had already turned into a powerful “force” of sorts.

Hai Liangyi fell ill, and everyone in the world panicked. Hai Liangyi rejected Han Cheng’s memorial, and before the empress dowager gave her reply, the officials and students had already kneeled for a day. Without realizing it, he had become the thorn in the empress dowager’s flesh, far more than the overbearing Han Cheng.

Hai Liangyi braced himself to hang on and said, “The imperial college students have the duty to discuss official affairs to begin with, and the imperial court is a place where the world has their eyes on. It’s only when there are discussions that there can be strategies. Your Majesty heads the administration diligently and attends to affairs personally. Still, officials are appointed to share the burdens of their superiors at the top and oversee the work of their subordinates at the bottom. It's Dazhou's blessing that they are concerned about state affairs. What's more, the matter of the crown prince is not just a family affair. This subject thinks that it's only by letting them remain here that we can have an open discussion on the issue of the new emperor."

It was not stuffy and warm in the hall. There were bamboo blinds hanging everywhere to hold in broken blocks of ice. To Hai Liangyi, it was even a little cool. He stood with his head lowered after he was done saying his piece. Behind the beaded curtain, the empress dowager remained silent for a long time. It was only when Hai Liangyi's legs were aching that she finally answered in an unhurried tone.

"What the Secretariat Elder has said makes sense. In that case, I shall listen to you. As for the matter of the second son of Prince Yan's grandson, I still have yet to see the clan registry, so it's inappropriate for me to come to a conclusion. But Han Cheng's people are already here. Do you want to let the Court of Judicial Review assist in the checks, or would you prefer the Ministry of Justice to do it? I shall do as you say."

T97's Words:

If a character's reason for appearing is not convincing and their actions are not logical, then it won't matter if this person is a male or female; it won't save the story from collapsing. When I first did the mind map of the characters, it occurred to me that the female characters might get discussed. But I didn't expect discussion about whether the entire book is enough of a serious drama with their presence. When Qi Zhuyin appeared, someone mentioned that she was a self-insert Mary Sue. But actually, in the year before last, I've put up a few Qiang Jin Jiu paragraphs on Weibo, and Qi Zhuyin and Ling Ting were among the characters who made an appearance back then. If their appearance makes no sense, would it definitely make sense if I change them to a "he"?

Thank you for reading.

Lianyin's Reminder:

As usual, you are free to dislike the novel or the plot or settings (just stop reading, easy as that) but please refrain from bringing the author personally into tirades. Thank you.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Alex, Yuka for burning brain cells with author's words!

Footnotes

1. 天理 “Law/Principles of Heaven” i.e., feudal ethics as propounded by the Confucianists in the Song Dynasty
2. 及笄 for a girl to reach the age of fifteen in old days
3. i.e., to hold court behind a screen or curtain. A practice in ancient China, where the Empress or Empress dowager was allowed to preside over the imperial court without actually being seen by her subjects since women were prohibited from politics. This would usually be done by a child emperor's mother, who would serve as regent and rule in place of the emperor. It's different from actually declaring herself sovereign and ruling as the 'emperor' herself.
4. For a refresher, see chapter 51

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 121 : LIANGYI

Hai Liangyi did not want to be supported by anyone after the court session was dismissed. Kong Qiu and the rest knew that the Secretariat Elder was a strong-minded one who did not like to look weak, and so they only dared to follow behind him and watch as he hobbled along alone and made his way slowly down.

That official robe of his soaked in the last of the evening rays like a scar blending into its brilliance. At this time last year, he had led hundreds of officials in attending court. What an imposing, spirited sight he had cut back then. But now, there was no trace of this will and spirit to be found on him.

Hai Liangyi reached the end and stopped. He slowly turned back to look at the officials on the stairs, then at the last remaining sunset glow above the upturned eaves of Mingli Hall.

“It’s getting dark.” Hai Liangyi said gently. “Be careful on your way back.”

For some reason, Kong Qiu felt a tinge of fear at this moment. He strode a step out with the intent to support Hai Liangyi by the arms. Choking a little with emotion, he called out, “Teacher!”

Hai Liangyi waved a hand at him and turned around to walk towards the palace gates.

The descendant of Prince Yan’s grandson born to a concubine was Hai Liangyi’s last line of battle. He watched as that setting sun was covered up by the buildings. A sense of powerlessness washed over him. He knew what it signified for a child of the Han clan to ascend to the throne. He had fought this battle for thirty years, and his steady pursuit to sue for peace had never once scored a victory.

He could only try his best to set himself aflame and throw these old bones of his into the intense fire, hoping that the spatter of sparks would be able to light up the night sky that had been deadly still for so long. An endless night had descended upon Dazhou, and he seemed to be the only remaining torch left. But to date, he still could not bring himself to admit that Qi Huilian and the rest who had once shared the same goal in spite of their differing paths had all failed.

He watched as those geniuses fall like shooting stars, one after another, leaving himself as insignificant as ever.

Thirty years ago, Hai Liangyi was not concerned with success or failure. Thirty years later, Hai Liangyi was all burned out and spent. Steadily but surely, he walked on his own path and attempted to hold back Qi Huilian, who was taking extreme, radical measures as he charged ahead. But he failed to do so. No one knew that the night when the entire Eastern Palace was wiped out was the most pained moment in Hai Liangyi's life.

It was already dark. By the time Hai Liangyi made his way to the palace gates, he was already panting. He lifted his sleeves to wipe his sweat and saw Yao Wenyu standing beside the sedan waiting for him. Yao Wenyu came over to help him up. Hai Liangyi took his seat, and just as Yao Wenyu was about to lower the curtain, Hai Liangyi said to him, "Yuanzhuo, there is a load on my mind that has yet to be resolved. Make a trip to Wucheng tomorrow on my behalf. Pack your bags tonight."

During the court session a few days later, the empress dowager exempted Hai Liangyi from standing. But the more she treated him with such courtesy and respect, the more it meant that her dissatisfaction with Hai Liangyi was intensifying. This was because the imperial censors from the Chief Surveillance Bureau had been working as one these few days to launch a series of scathing rebukes at Han Cheng. Cries of demand for an official verification of the child from the Han clan rose to an all-time high, and this tidal wave surging around Hai Liangyi was forcing the empress dowager to make a concession.

The empress dowager had a hard time sleeping in the day and at night, and her hesitation put Han Cheng in a desperate situation. Gradually, it dawned on Han Cheng that the empress dowager was trying to take advantage of the conflict to destroy him. As long as he could not bear the weight of the burden and perish under the voices of castigation, the empress dowager would be able to support the Han clan's child into ascending to the throne immediately and eliminate the possibility of Han Cheng making a power grab. When that time comes, she would be able to focus on confronting those of humble backgrounds. Whether she would be giving Hai Liangyi the cold shoulder or have the Grand Secretary of the Grand Secretariat replaced, she would be able to do it with more ease than she could at present.

Han Cheng was unwilling to let the matter drop and surrender the power in his hands on a silver platter to others. Even if he had to put up with it, he had to make Hai Liangyi suffer!

“The situation is unstable at present. Libei in the northeast is eyeing us like a tiger watching its prey, while Zhongbo to the east is beginning to show signs of stirring. Is the world going to take the lead of the Grand Secretary if we don’t have a new emperor because the Grand Secretariat keeps delaying the matter of the crown prince?” Han Cheng’s mouth was already blistered from the verbal battle that had gone on for several days running. He suddenly flung his sleeves and said, “If you ask me, the Grand Secretary is rallying his own clique to obstruct the imperial court from designating a crown prince. His intention is condemnable!”

“That’s a slanderous accusation!” Cen Yu rebuked sternly in his capacity as the head of the imperial censors. “We have been discussing the matter of the crown prince appointment for several days in a row, and yet the commander has been unwilling to verify the real identity of the imperial heir officially. So who is the one here trying to hamstring efforts to designate a crown prince? The imperial court had the support of the public previously. If it weren’t for the commander’s insistence on surrounding the Marquis of Dingdu, Xiao Chiye, to capture him, how would Qudu find itself caught in such a predicament?! If we were to hold someone accountable for this, you’d be the one to bear the bulk of the responsibility!”

“Well, then!” Han Cheng sneered and pointed at Cen Yu. “Xiao Chiye assassinated the late emperor. As the commander-in-chief of the Imperial Bodyguard and Viceroy of the Eight Great Training Divisions, I’m perfectly justified in taking this person down! You said I did wrong, and that means you’re saying that he did right in assassinating the last emperor! You are on good terms with Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan. Cen Xunyi, the Ministry of Justice didn’t trace their investigation to you, did they? Kong Boran, both of you are truly close friends from the same school. I, Han Cheng, am truly envious!”

Fury washed over Kong Qiu’s face. He said, “What nonsense are you spouting? We are still investigating whether Xiao Chiye really did assassinate the late emperor. If we just take your words as it is without evidence, then we might just as well do away with the Ministry of Justice.

Besides, you were also present during our private gathering, were you not? You drank quite the amount of wine too!”

Han Cheng said, “I’m an Imperial Bodyguard. Keeping my ears to the ground at all times and taking records is my duty. If I don’t show up when you senior officials have a private gathering, then how can I know precisely what has been said? I have already told someone to transcribe everything that has been discussed in detail that night for Her Majesty. I’m in the clear! Do you people dare to though?”

Pan Xiangjie, having received help from Xiao Chiye before, was fearful of being implicated, and so he had been keeping a low profile on the imperial court lately. Han Cheng was presently in power, and Pan Xiangjie went along with whatever he said. Seeing them argue again, his lips opened and closed, and he took several small steps back, not daring to cut into the conversation. He made up his mind to be a coward like a turtle hiding in its shell.

Gradually, several parties got carried away with their verbal assaults on each other. Cen Yu was the most eloquent of all. He cursed Han Cheng so savagely that even if Han Cheng wanted to put up with his words, he was boiling with so much rage that the hand he was pointing at Cen Yu with was trembling hard. But still, he kept a clear head as he slid down to his knees on the ground and burst out wailing as though he was going to go broke.

“Your Majesty!” Han Cheng lay prostrate on the ground and wept bitterly. “Your Majesty! This subject’s heart is as pure and bright as the moon! It’s my fault for surrounding Xiao Chiye to capture him. It’s also my fault that the late emperor was assassinated. And now it’s even my fault that we have no one to be the crown prince! As an official, I’m willing to die for my sovereign and be punished by my sovereign! If there is a crime, then it’s all on me! Whether I’m to be killed alone or along with my family, I will accept whatever sentence my master dishes out!”

Kong Qiu found this man truly shameless. He promptly raised his hands to remove his wusha hat<sup>1</sup> and said, “I am ashamed to be of the same rank as a vile person of this kind! If the real identity of the imperial heir cannot be officially verified, then I, Kong Boran, might as well forfeit this official post!”

The empress dowager abruptly rose to her feet and lifted the beaded curtain to sweep a cold glance over them one at a time before her eyes came to a stop on Han Cheng. She said, “We are discussing official matters on the imperial court, so what are you crying for? Get up!” Then she looked at Kong Qiu. “You are a member of the Grand Secretariat and could be said to be the Deputy Grand Secretary. You are someone who presides over the affairs of the state. You keep using your resignation at every turn as a pressure tactic. Are you trying to threaten me into giving in, or are you thinking of fishing for praises—You know it best yourself! Ever since I stood in to act on behalf of the Son of Heaven, I have to ask the Grand Secretariat about all the matters in detail, regardless of its significance, so what is there that can’t be explained clearly that you have to keep pushing every step of the way?!”

All the ministers kneeled.

“Our forefathers laid down the rule that the harem cannot interfere in politics. I’ve been overstepping my boundary time and again that I’m already too ashamed to face my ancestors. Jianheng passed away so suddenly this time. If not for your repeated pleas, how would I have been willing to step out into this court once again to take charge of governmental affairs? We lack an emperor now, and I’m merely a widow who is without a child...” Hot tears brimmed in her eyes when she spoke to this point. “When has Emperor Guangcheng ever let me suffer such grievance when he was still around?!”

Han Cheng seemed to be so moved by the emperor and empress’s deep love that he covered his face as he lay prostrate on the ground and wailed, “This subject never had to put up with such a treatment either when Emperor Guangcheng was around. I’m deeply aware that I’m an ignorant and shallow person. I’m merely a soldier. I dare not compare myself with the various major officials from the Grand Secretariat, what’s more vie with the Grand Secretary? It’s all because of my staunch loyalty and deep love for the Li clan that I dared to return the imperial heir to the imperial court. Grand Secretary, why go to such an extent?!”

Han Cheng has repeatedly been fanning the flames towards Hai Liangyi. Kong Qiu was burning with pent-up anger deep down. It was with difficulty that he said, “Your Majesty... Heaven can attest to the Grand Secretary’s heart and intentions. Designating a crown prince is by no means a small issue. We are beset with difficulties all around at present. Dazhou is already at the most critical moment of survival. If we cannot proceed with prudence and caution, then I fear there will be no end of trouble for the future...”

“I understand this as well. That’s why I have called the various excellencies here for days on end to discuss it in detail.” The empress dowager regained her composure and said, “The imperial heirs after Emperor Guangcheng have all passed away, and now, we can’t even find ourselves a crown prince. The harder the crisis is, the more we should work together as one. Han Cheng, hand over Emperor Guangcheng’s private letter for the various excellencies present to verify it officially!”

Where on earth would Han Cheng have a private letter entrusting the child to him? The reason he had been holding out and refusing to hand it over was that he was competing with Hai Liangyi and the empress dowager to see who was more capable of stalling. The moment Hai Liangyi relented and the wave of officials from humble backgrounds dispersed, the empress dowager’s desire to head the country would be unstoppable. When the time came, she would have no choice but to let the child from the Han clan ascend to the throne. By then, he would truly become the minister the child had been entrusted to. The golden age of the Han clan was just right before his eyes. He understood that the empress dowager currently wanted to push him into the corner to his death, so he cried even louder.

Han Cheng beat his chest and said, “The various excellencies doubt my loyalty, so you may as well let me die! My dear younger brother, my dear younger brother of direct descent! He ended up being held hostage in Cizhou to this date, all just to hunt down that Xiao Chiye. I had an eye injured for the late emperor, and I took three slashes of the blade for Emperor Guangcheng. So how can I be a shallow, narrow-minded person who deceives the entire world for my own selfish desire?!”

All they had been going back and forth about was “selfish desire”. Cries and curses flooded the imperial court. No one else mentioned Prince Yan’s descendant again. Kong Qiu remained kneeling, but his heart had already gone cold.

Hai Liangyi had not spoken a word today. Supporting himself on the handles of the chair, he suddenly stood up. Countless gazes converged together on him. Officials from humble backgrounds looked on expectantly for the Grand Secretary to turn the table and regain control of the situation again, while officials from the noble clans remained silent and waited for a good opportunity. They all focused their attention on Hai Liangyi, just like they did in the past.

Hai Liangyi started coughing. His emaciated, wizened hand trembled as he covered the blood with a handkerchief. He swallowed some saliva and slowly looked around the great hall, then at all these faces. Finally, he looked at the empress dowager.

“Back then, the Li clan reigned supreme, and it took several years of conquest before the empire was finally united as one. Over the past hundred years, generations after generations of Dazhou’s officials have, without exception, devoted all their themselves to the court and spared no effort in their duties. Although the city walls of Qudu during the reign of Yongyi are old, its integrity still remains, and its spirit still exists. At the start of the reign of Yongyi, Qi Huilian of Yuzhou successively came in first in all three imperial examinations,<sup>2</sup> and from then, the imperial college flourished. Although the three preceptors of the Yao clan were born of a noble clan, they advocated freedom of speech and recruited all kinds of outstanding talents. Most of the scholars of humble origins still serving in this imperial court today joined the imperial court during that period of time.”

Kong Qiu lowered his head. As he recalled the past, he could not help but choke with sobs softly.

“But then, the period of resurgence during the reign of Yongyi was merely a flash in the pan. It had only been ten years, and Emperor Guangcheng fell ill. Then the noble clans thrived once again, and prejudices over family status divided the imperial college. From the reign of Yongyi to Xiande, no other scholars of humble origins entered the imperial court; this is the imperial court of the noble clans.”

Pan Xiangjie looked embarrassed and kept his head bowed in a kowtow without saying a word.

Han Cheng wanted to say something, but Hai Liangyi suddenly raised his voice. “During the reign of Xiande, the state treasury was empty. This subject made a request to Hua Siqian to hand over the accounts. He worked in hand with the various noble clan officials who were then serving as the ministers of the various ministries to avoid the issue and dismissed me in a perfunctory manner time and again! In that same year, Juexi was hit by a disaster, and it was a scene of desolation and despair everywhere. Once again, this subject forced Hua Siqian to hand over the accounts, only to have him skirted around the issue. Not long later, the troops of Zhongbo suffered a defeat, and the granaries of the six prefectures turned up emptied overnight after the battle! To this date, Hua Siqian had never given a clear explanation of this account! Is this his fault, or is it the fault of everyone here for exacerbating the issue?!”

Alarmed, Pan Xiangjie hurriedly said, “About this matter, the Court of Judicial Review has already—”

“Ever since this subject, Hai Renshi, has returned to the imperial court, I have been repeatedly remonstrating and requesting to officially verify the real identity of the imperial heir from the Han clan. Han Cheng keeps hesitating, and to date, he is still unwilling to hand over the private letter entrusting the child to him. Left without a choice, I took charge and directed the Grand Secretariat to search through the imperial registry before I eventually presented a memorial to ask Her Majesty to choose and designate the descendant of Prince Yan of Huaizhou as the crown prince. It was a futile attempt.”

The empress dowager was stunned into taking half a step back by this impassioned tone. The beaded curtain fell noisily over her body as she looked at Hai Liangyi in shock and uncertainty.

Hai Liangyi was on fire. The fury in his heart had been suppressed for a full thirty years, and it was now burning so intensely that his spirit blazed once more into existence and left the entire hall shocked. He said, “The decline of the state is all my fault as the Grand Secretary! I have been remonstrating with the ruler all my life; I already have no more to fear! Since my remonstrations are futile while I’m alive, then I shall remonstrate with Dazhou today with my death! A crown prince can be appointed, but the child from the Han clan must never be appointed as the crown prince! A crown prince can be appointed—”

Before anyone could bat an eyelash, Hai Liangyi’s sleeves rose with the wind, like falling leaves set on fire right before everyone’s eyes. An earthshaking thud followed. Blood splattered.

Dead silence descended upon the entire hall. The empress dowager’s limbs went icy cold, and she almost slid to the ground. Her eyes traced along that splattered blood with difficulty and landed upon Hai Liangyi. A moment later, the entire court of officials rose to their feet with exclamations of shock. Kong Qiu practically crawled over on his knees and propped Hai Liangyi up.

“Renshi...” The empress dowager’s voice trembled, “Why... why go to such an extent...”

This one head smash completely severed Han Cheng's retreat route. Hai Liangyi used death to attain the wrath of all the scholars in the world. The lad of the Han clan would never be able to become emperor. Whoever dared to risk universal condemnation to seek infamy would be the thorn in the flesh of the world's literati in the future. But even Han Cheng himself was stunned on the ground. Never in his wildest dream could he have imagined that Hai Liangyi would go to such extremes.

With his face drenched in blood, Hai Liangyi looked up at the high, unreachable roof.

He had been seeking stability his entire life. Yet, at this last moment, he took such drastic measures for once. He became the blazing sun that had burst out of Dazhou, flaming with countless rays of light in that pitch-black night. The crane on his chest,<sup>3</sup> which had already been stained red, rose and fell with the last remaining heaves of his chest. He gripped Kong Qiu's hand tightly.

"Boran..." Hai Liangyi said softly. "... I... have done all I can."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Eggy<3

Footnotes

1. 乌纱帽 wusha hat, or black gauze hat, is the headwear of Ming dynasty officials, comprising a black hat with two wing-like flaps of thin, oval-shaped boards on each side.
2. 三元 "Triple Yuan". In the Ming Dynasty, the imperial examination system was split into three phases: the provincial exam (乡试); metropolitan exam (会试); and the palace exam (殿试). The titles for the top scholars in each exam were known as the Jieyuan (解元), Huiyuan (会元) and Zhuangyuan (状元). These three are known as the "Triple Yuan". i.e., a Triple Yuan Top Scholar is one who came first in all these examinations.

朝服 | 黄强文史

- 3.
4. Refers to his rank badge, or mandarin square, a large embroidered badge sewn onto the surcoat of an official to indicate the rank of the official wearing it. Squares depicting birds were used for civil officials, while animals were used for military officials. So for a first-grade civil official like Hai Liangyi, this bird would be a crane.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 122 : THE EMPEROR’S DAUGHTER

When Yu Xiaozai spoke to this point, he bent over and choked with sobs, unable to continue. The scholars of their generation who went on to take up official posts either wanted to be the patriotic and loyal Qi Huilian who would lay down his life for his cause, or the Hai Liangyi who was the stabilizing force that could hold them together in times of crisis. But then, this building teetering under the elements suddenly let loose the thunderous sound of collapse.<sup>1</sup> In one night, it shattered the lofty aspirations of several tens of thousands of people, turning Dazhou into a land where wails abound everywhere.

Shen Zechuan turned his head aside silently and listened to the sound of the night watchman on his rounds beyond the courtyard wall.<sup>2</sup>

Some time later, Yu Xiaozai stopped sobbing. He covered his face with a warm handkerchief for a moment before he said, “The Grand Secretary’s use of his death to remonstrate forced Han Cheng into a dead end, but he refused to give up. The crowd from imperial college was so worked up that they blocked Han Cheng’s sedan on Shenwu Street after the dismissal of the court session and smashed it to pieces. The Eight Great Training Divisions sealed off the imperial college and captured a few students who had been taking the lead and hauled them over to the imperial prison. They even cut off the students’ supply of food, and so the students went on a hunger strike.”

Yu Xiaozai could not help but shed tears again.

“I initially thought all the scholars in the world would die out at this point. But that night, I saw the flickers of flames<sup>3</sup> among Mount Jingyi, which the imperial college was on, and that was when I knew of the far-reaching significance of the Grand Secretary. The blaze that spread far and wide had already become a force to behold. To quell the fury of all the scholars in the world, the empress dowager once again demanded Han Cheng hand over the private letter entrusting the child to him. She also drove the child from the Han clan who was feigning to be the imperial heir out of the palace. Han Cheng had no choice but to make a concession. He promised to have the private letter officially verified three days later.”

“The forged private letter did not have Emperor Guangcheng’s private seal. So the Grand Secretariat rejected Han Cheng’s crown prince proposal. On seeing this, the empress dowager consented to meet with Prince Yan of Huaizhou’s descendant to establish the candidate for the crown prince. However, Huaizhou is far away from Qudu. Just as Han Cheng had said earlier, that second son of Prince Yan’s grandson of non-direct descent was already advanced in age. He was fatigued from the long journey, and coupled with the fact that he had been through a roller coaster of emotions, he gave up the ghost before arriving at Qudu.”

“The issue of selecting and designating a crown prince completely came to an impasse. Han Cheng, with ulterior motives in mind, used the Eight Great Training Divisions to coerce the Grand Secretariat. He submitted another memorial to make a request for the eight cities to assist in governmental affairs. He wanted the empress dowager to establish a ‘Chamber for the Deliberation of State Affairs’, and the candidates listed were all officials from the noble clans. The empress dowager shelved the memorial without giving him an answer. Carrying on with the legacy of the Grand Secretary, His Excellency Boran submitted a memorial to consent to the original plan for the Chamber, but he asked for the removal of Han Cheng’s military power on the grounds that civil officials do not get involved with the military. He wanted to use this opportunity to take down Han Cheng’s Eight Great Training Divisions. But Han Cheng refused, so the Grand Secretariat did not give their approval, and both parties’ negotiation fell through once again.”

The lack of an heir was the breaking point of the no-win situation in Qudu. Officials of the Grand Secretariat with Kong Qiu in the lead made a concession in the face of the proposal for the eight cities to assist in governmental affairs, and this was in line with Hai Liangyi’s policy to keep the peace. They had no troops. Qidong was under the control of the empress dowager, and Libei no longer obeyed Qudu’s deployment orders after what happened with Xiao Chiye. Kong Qiu could only choose the lesser of two evils and give way. The bottom line was to strip Han Cheng of his military power. Even if they could not get their own hands on military power, they could not hand over all the patrols in Qudu to the noble clans to take charge of just like before.

“It was at precisely this moment that Xue Xiuzhuo submitted his memorials.” Yu Xiaozai let out a vague, bitter smile under the dimness.

“With one stone, he stirred up a thousand ripples... This move of his was really too ingenious.”

Xiao Chiye heard Xue Xiuzhuo's name and shifted his gaze a little to look at Shen Zechuan. After a moment of silence, Shen Zechuan lifted his head slightly to look out of the window with furrowed brows. After a moment, he said, “You were right before. This talent is really something else. Rumors of the imperial heir made their way so easily to where we are, stirring us into action. I originally suspected that Han Cheng was the one who killed all those boys after I arrived in Zhongbo. But it now seems that Han Cheng was merely the same as Xi Hongxuan—they were all sacrificial chess pieces manipulated by Xue Xiuzhuo. A wrong move of a chess piece and the whole game is lost. It was careless of me to underestimate the enemy.”

The impasse in the imperial court continued for less than half a month when the upsurge of verbal assaults of the imperial college on Han Cheng shifted to the eight cities' assistance of governmental affairs. Countless students with emotions running high became more and more dissatisfied with Kong Qiu's conservative strategy. At the same time they wrote articles and elegies to mourn Hai Liangyi, they were also mourning Qi Huilian. The way Kong Qiu was at present was not the Grand Secretary of their expectations.

The empress dowager made a concession when it came to the child from the Han clan, and this allowed all the students under the world to see the might of gathering various powers into one faction. They were like water droplets from all over who converged together to form the boundless sea. They believed that their combined forces could push over that high wall. The opportunity to get rid of the malady that was the noble clans was right before their eyes.

Because Kong Qiu affirmed Han Cheng's proposal for the eight cities to assist with governmental affairs, the direction of the imperial college suddenly changed course like the weather in the fourth month. First, an article with impassioned words was stuck to the door of the Kong's residence. Then all the criticisms that had been used to verbally assault Han Cheng were used on Kong Qiu. The students became more and more certain that the scholar-officials of humble origins led by Kong Qiu were too weak, and that was why Hai Liangyi was left high and dry by himself in the Grand Secretariat, which led to his eventual decision to choose such a resolute method to remonstrate. They openly listed out all the court officials during the reign of Yongyi and checked, one at a time, whether these officials used to have any relations with officials from the noble clans. News that Cen Yu had invited Han Cheng to a private feast spread like wildfire and worked the students up into an emotional frenzy. They labeled Cen Yu, Kong Qiu, and even the Minister of War, Chen Zhen, as “hypocrites”.

The sedan Cen Yu used to attend court sessions was smashed. He stood at the entrance of the palace gate with his head all covered in blood and pointed to the sky to proclaim that he had no inappropriate relations with the noble clans. Consequently, he got splashed with filthy dung all over. Cen Yu could not believe that these were the students of before. He had been with the Chief Surveillance Bureau for twenty years, and he had impeached countless major and minor officials of the imperial court. He even dared to impeach Emperor Guangcheng. But he never thought that he would, one day, be cursed as a scum who sought personal gain without shame.

The Yao clan had always been an exemplar of scholars who were concerned with politics but remained political outsiders who kept their distance from those in power. It was an honorable glory for a clan to produce three preceptors. Even though they had no one in the imperial court after the reign of Xiande, their influence far surpassed those from the other clans. They were widely respected among the noble clans and those of humble origins. Hai Liangyi, Qi Huilian, Kong Qiu, and other old and new officials of the imperial court were all once recipients of the Yao clan’s advice and guidance. The thriving of the imperial college during the period of resurgence in the reign of Yongyi had everything to do with Old Master Yao’s extensive recruitment of talents. But now, the doors and windows of the Yao clan’s ancestral hall they had set up at the eastern end of Qudu had been smashed broken. If Kong Qiu had not sent someone to guard it, it would have been set aflame that night.

This fire even blazed its way to Yao Wenyu. He was Hai Liangyi’s student, yet he refused to join the imperial court as an official. He did not appear either the last time when the imperial college went up in arms to curse Pan Rugui. And now, new grievances piled up upon old scores. They tore up the essays they had once sung praises of, and likened Yao Wenyu to a thief—a thief of the noble clan who stole Hai Liangyi’s government administration knowledge.

Qudu plunged into complete chaos. The moment the Eight Great Training tried to dispatch troops to suppress them, the students would go on a hunger strike in protest. Already, four or five people had starved to death, and Han Cheng no longer dared to act rashly. At this time, even Qi Zhuyin, who was busy with Bianjun Commandery affairs far away in Qidong, was not spared either. The marriage alliance of Hua and Qi was to take place next month, and those impassioned articles stating their opinions spread like snowflakes to Qidong. The commander-in-chief initially had insomnia, and now, whenever she wanted to sprawl out on her desk to rest, she would get Qi Wei to read out those articles to her. The more unpleasant the scoldings, the more soundly she slept.

The fire in Dazhou did indeed start to burn, but not in the way Hai Liangyi anticipated. The night was whizzing with flaming stray arrows all over. They drew a clear boundary between “us” and the enemies. The demands made were exacting, with black and white clearly distinguished. There was no middle ground for anyone to stand on, only a bitter fight to the end when one side was left standing.

Kong Qiu insisted on not taking sick leave, but attending court gradually became a dangerous affair. One day, he went out all exhausted, but he was still in the compound when he saw a stranger walking out from the courtyard. The stranger held up his sword and hollered all around, wanting Kong Qiu to atone for his crimes with his death. He was a bona fide official of the Grand Secretariat, and he often used to receive some students from the other lands, so he had never set up defenses at home. But who knew someone would hold a sword against him now? It was simply the greatest joke in the world. How ludicrous!

It was at this time that three of Xue Xiuzhuo’s memorials were presented. The content of his memorials was like a monstrous wave that instantly extinguished the crackling fire. Following right after, it turned into raging billows that won over the scholars in the world in one fell swoop.

In his memorial, he spoke of the innumerable hardships he underwent before he finally found Emperor Guangcheng’s daughter, who had been leading a wandering life in poverty outside the palace. He not only had Prince Qin’s personal seal as evidence but also relevant witnesses’ testimonies that could prove the parentage of this girl beyond doubt. What’s more, he asked for an official verification right there on the court.

Having a woman as a master could be compared to a disruption in the balance of yin and yang, and a reversal of the sun and the moon.<sup>4</sup> This was something that had never happened before in hundreds of years. Xue Xiuzhuo's memorial sent the entire imperial court into an uproar. Even Kong Qiu refuted it vehemently and refused to accept it.

Following right after, Xue Xiuzhuo presented a second memorial.

He revealed in his memorial that this girl had ended up in a peasant household in Qudu. Because she was an exceptionally bright child, she was very well-loved by the family. Although the family was poor, they were willing to let her older brother teach her to read and write. As a descendant of Emperor Guangcheng, she was naturally different from the common person. Her family often saw auspicious signs such as rainbows materializing from dew and purple clouds over the house, and so they treated her with even more attentiveness and did not dare to slight or neglect her. This girl was not only intelligent, but kind too. Her neighbors were in distress, and there were elderly starving, so she saved her own food and personally attended to them. Everyone from the villages near and far was unanimous in their praises of her. There were witness testimonies of this incident too. As for her bearing, he would let the various gentlemen ascertain it themselves when this girl came to court.

This memorial had already spread beyond the palace walls. Someone posted it in the Imperial College, and it even made its way to every street and lane in Qudu. The emperor's daughter was noble and precious, and the only one who could claim such status in Dazhou at present was the one who was by the empress dowager's side, Third Missy Hua. The comparison and contrast between the two made the common folks even more sympathetic towards this emperor's daughter. Teahouses and wine taverns all had storytellers who specifically told the legendary tale of this emperor's daughter living among the people, making that extraordinary talent of hers out to be like she was an immortal who had descended to earth. She came from the common masses. Her family had been farming for generations, which, in many instances, was similar to current students from the imperial college. What's more, she was a righteous and benevolent one who was kind and friendly to her neighbors. She was the most aware of the hardships of the people. For a time, even the students revered her.

And it was at this time Xue Xiuzhuo submitted his third and most crucial memorial.

He said her elder brother was also a student of humble origins. He had previously entered Qudu during the reign of Xiande, but because of prejudices over his family status, he had never made it to the list of those who passed. After returning home, he died depressed. The affection between the emperor's daughter and her elder brother was so deep that this became a source of pain and distress in her heart. On the way to Qudu, she had asked him many times about the condition of Secretariat Elder Hai's illness. When he mentioned how hard it had been for Secretariat Elder Hai to take care of state affairs, the emperor's daughter actually shed tears on hearing that and said, "If I were a man, there would be no way I could have let the Secretariat Elder suffer such hardships." He was a son of non-direct descent from a noble clan, and he had been subjected to harsh treatment on both ends owing to the difference in status between those born of the direct line of descent and those who weren't. Yet, he did not have the same magnanimity as the emperor's daughter, and for this, he felt very ashamed.

At last, Xue Xiuzhuo said, since there was no law in the world that decreed that priority should be accorded to those of direct descent and those from distinguished clans during the selection of court officials, then there were also no forefathers in the world who said that priority should be accorded to males when it came to the selection for the crown prince—all the more so in view of the fact that Dazhou already had no other choice left at this stage.

The students were roused. They had finally found a suitable candidate. The prejudices between parentage and family status made it tough for them to fulfill their ambitions. They saw themselves as fellow sufferers commiserating with the emperor's daughter over her hard lot in life. Li Jianheng was an emperor who had grown up in a life of luxury. He did not understand the hardships of the people at all, and he had been repeatedly impeached by the Chief Surveillance Bureau for his pursuit of petty pleasures at the expense of lofty aspirations. But look at how different this emperor's daughter bestowed by Heaven was. She seemed to be the most wonderful woman in this world. She had a heart compassionate towards all the scholars of humble origins in the world. She was the Goddess of Mercy who had descended to the mortal realm to deliver the masses from suffering.

And thus, it was under the buzz of an entire night of discussion that Xue Xiuzhuo – who had been lying low without showing his mettle all this while – emerged the victor.

Lianyin's Note:

Dear all, I've been reflecting on my translations lately and I'm aware that they are very much lacking (and I keep going back and forth on terms). Tbh, I was intending to do an overhaul once I get my hands on the traditional chinese physical copies. But since it will take some time for qjj, I'll be going back to the earlier qjj chapters for some minor editing, that is, until the qjj physical copy (for a final edit) and possibly the LA (for english terms/titles used). This is the tentative plan, barring any unforeseen circumstances. Once again, if you have any feedback, suggestion, correction, etc, feel free to let me know. Thank you for putting up with me.

P/S: Also, please support the author, that's all I'm asking. If you enjoy the novels, purchase them on jjwxc. Links and "how to buy" guide are in each of the chapters themselves. Thank you.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Eggy, Yunyun, Alex, Yuka for consultation advice :p

Footnotes

1. From the idiom 大厦将倾, or "the mansion on the verge of collapse". The original idiom refers to a hopeless situation, like a mansion on the brink of collapse. Here, it suggests that the situation is a total goner.
2. A night watchman typically patrolled the streets at night with a wooden clapper or a gong and a mallet and regularly sounded the instruments at certain intervals to remind the others of the time and to look out for potential fire hazards.
3. 薪火 flame/torch which also refers to the flame/torch of learning/knowledge
4. Yin refers to feminine energies, and Yang refers to masculine energies in the concept of Yin and Yang, while sun and moon are also used to refer to the emperor and empress.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 123 : YANQING

By the time Yu Xiaozai spoke to this point, the tea on the small table had already gone cold. He continued, “I don’t understand. The students were initially so harsh on the officials of humble origins, then why would they flock to Xue Xiuzhuo overnight? Don’t tell me Xue Xiuzhou, who is merely the common son of the Xue clan, would be able to do his best for those from humble families more than Minister Kong from Cangjun Commandery, who has been diligent in administering state affairs? The Grand Secretary went to the trouble to pave the way for us. But who would have expected that it’s still the noble clans who gained the upper hand in the end?”

“Xue Xiuzhuo might not necessarily let the noble clans gain the upper hand.” Xiao Chiye poured cold tea and said, “He struck this round when his opponents were unprepared, and so caught both sides off guard. The empress dowager had been going around in circles with Han Cheng because she had no one in her hands to use. Xue Xiuzhuo obviously had not leaked any words of it to the conservative noble clans headed by the empress dowager. Furthermore, at the time when the former emperor passed away, he had Han Cheng trapped as a pawn. In other words, he had already offended the noble clans, and this is something he knows better than anyone else.”

With a worried frown, Yu Xiaozai said, “I’ve been thinking about it on the way here, but I still can’t figure it out. I don’t understand what his intention is. The foundation of the new emperor is unstable, and she’s a woman to boot. If he did so for merely a moment of power, then even if the Xue clan rises in power, he wouldn’t be able to last long under pressure from the empress dowager and the others.”

Thoughts flashed through Shen Zechuan’s mind. He contemplated it for a moment, then said, “We can’t let go of any clues if we want to probe into a person’s motive. During the reign of Xiande at the Nanlin Hunting Grounds, Hua Siqian was forced into rebelling, and it was Secretariat Elder Hai and Xue Xiuzhuo who masterminded it. At that time, Xue Xiuzhuo held office as the Chief Supervising Secretary in The Office of Scrutiny for Revenue and audited their accounts. You said that Secretariat Elder Hai mentioned this matter before he died in remonstrance. Then my guess is that Xue Xiuzhou was aware of the inside story of the Zhongbo troops' defeat. This was probably the reason he could later go on to join forces and work as one with the Juexi's Provincial Administration Commissioner, Jiang Qingshan, to investigate and take out Hua Siqian. Looking at it this way, this person is not of the same kind as Wei Huaigu, because he has been striking out the noble clans right from the start."

"I once heard Xi Hongxuan talking about him. He said Xue Xiuzhuo was busy all day with governmental affairs. After I took office as the Northern Judge of the Imperial Bodyguards, I sorted out the case records the Imperial Bodyguards and the Court of Judicial Review joined forces to investigate. I discovered that he did indeed handle many cases after he was transferred away from the Office of Scrutiny for Revenue to the Court of Judicial Review. Secretariat Elder Hai was an upright person who would never stoop to flattery, and his repeated promotion of Xue Xiuzhuo is not without merit. Even His Excellency Cen has spoken to me many times about Xue Xiuzhuo. His political achievement to date could be said to be outstanding among the up-and-coming talents."

Enlightened, Yu Xiaozai said, "To tell you the truth, Vice Commander, this is where I can't figure it out. All along, Xue Xiuzhuo has a good reputation. Even the imperial censors from the Chief Surveillance Bureau hardly have any objections of him. The Chief Surveillance Bureau's appraisals of him are excellent. This is clear as day to everyone, so I really can't understand the rationale behind his current actions. Because as we have seen before, he's not a man like Pan Rugui who would seize the opportunity to get rich."

Xiao Chiye leaned back slightly and put up his arms. He said to Shen Zechuan, "That's right. We talked about Xue Xiuzhuo too when we were in Qudu. Yao Wenyu said before that although he was not accepted by Secretariat Elder Hai as his pupil, he was very much in Secretariat Elder Hai's good books, and this was the reason Secretariat Elder Hai let him hold the crown during Yao Wenyu's coming of age ceremony. In the first few years when he joined the imperial court, the essays<sup>1</sup> he wrote were all on doing away with the prejudiced views of the noble clans in the hope that the imperial college, headed by Hua Siqian, could be restored to its former glory in its heyday during the Grand Preceptor's time. As you know, other than Hai Liangyi, the Grand Secretariat – as well as the Six Ministries under it – was then composed of officials from noble clans. For a time, priority during the selection of officials in Qudu was given to those from distinguished clans. Even the illiterate thirteenth son of the Hua clan could take up an important post in the Ministry of War and intervened with the Imperial Army's affairs. Kong Qiu was still stewing in the Ministry of Justice at that time, while Liang Cuishan from the Ministry of Revenue was repeatedly demoted during the same period, with no hope of a transfer and promotion."

Shen Zechuan nodded his head slowly and said, "The fact that he was able to hold the post of the Chief Supervising Secretary in the Ministry of Revenue at that time is an indication of Hua Siqian's intention to send him away. The Chief Supervising Secretary is an important post that would give him direct access to the emperor. But at that time, Emperor Xiande was unable to take charge of the government. Hua Siqian, who was in charge of the Grand Secretariat, had the final say over whether he would be able to build up an outstanding track record in this position. It was at this period that Xue Xiuzhuo's approach to tackling matters began to shift. He went from taking radical measures to keeping a low profile for a time, eventually settling into the way we later come to be well-acquainted with."

The more Yu Xiaozai listened, the more alarmed he was. He said, "But since he is in the same camp as those from humble origins, why didn't he get in touch with us? That Han Cheng..."

"He gave the best he could in the incident leading up to Li Jianheng's ascension to the throne, but very quickly, he came to the realization that Li Jianheng was not bold, decisive, and visionary enough. Back then, Li Jianheng was constantly wavering in the tug of war between several parties, and the officials of humble origins led by Secretariat Elder Hai failed to get rid of the empress dowager." Shen Zechuan turned his head aside, causing the little jade on his right ear to be obscured by shadows. He continued, "The imperial college students repeatedly mentioned weakness in their attacks of the officials from humble origins. This is probably the reason Xue Xiuzhuo no longer trusts scholars of humble births. Secretariat Elder Hai's conservative policy allowed Dazhou to survive, but he also gave the noble clans a chance to catch their breath. The noble clans give to one another, like how Wei Huaigu fell this time only for Han Cheng to rise. This is not the result Xue Xiuzhuo wanted—"

Shen Zechuan suddenly stopped and narrowed his eyes.

“No wonder he took Teacher away.”

Qi Huilian was the most important figure of the radicals—those who were in favor of thorough and complete political change. He had been actually working hands-on in the Eastern Palace. The Crown Prince did not live for long, yet he could still accomplish feats such as the registration of the common folks into the census register,<sup>2</sup> tapping on the Eastern Palace’s subordinates’ diligence in discharging their official duties and tenacity to forge ahead regardless of public opinions. If Xue Xiuzhuo wanted to change the conciliatory approach during the time Hai Liangyi headed the administration, then he was bound to seek Qi Huilian’s help.

But Qi Huilian declined. So Xue Xiuzhuo handed Qi Huilian over to Han Cheng.

Shen Zechuan pursed his lips tightly. His side profile was cold and detached under the candlelight. He said, “He’d stop at nothing to achieve his aims. This person doesn’t believe anyone else. He still wants to rely on the new emperor to sustain Dazhou, and for this, he does not hesitate to offend the old-school noble clans. He wants to bring in new blood to Qudu and overhaul the system. We defeated Wei Huaigu and the others in Qudu, and their falls have now turned into vacancies in which he can install these new blood. Your Excellency Yu, you’re wrong. It was not how wonderful the emperor’s daughter was that the memorial he presented could move the hearts of all the scholars in the world, but his last sentence.”

There is no law in the world that decreed that priority should be accorded to those of lawful birth and those from distinguished clans during the selection of court officials!

The noble clans’ domination of the upper echelons of the government once again turned Dazhou into an imperial court dominated by the eight clans. The Li clan emperor’s assertiveness, or the lack of it, dictated whether those from humble backgrounds would be able to kill their way out of the heavy siege laid by the eight clans. They underwent a low period during the later years of the reign of Yongyi. This was too long a time. What they desperately needed was a sovereign who was well-disposed towards the scholars of humble origins. Gender did not matter. As long as this person was able to rouse the hearts of the humble scholars, and shoulder the weight of the humble families’ expectations after the successive passing of Qi Huilian and Hai Liangyi, then this person would be embraced.

After the empress dowager took charge of the government, those of humble origins not only had to put up with the intensified ostracism but also the weakness and incompetence of the Li clan's emperors that had taken firm roots in the minds of the masses. The reason why the students were so harsh on Kong Qiu and Cen Yu was that they could no longer endure the repeated concessions made by the present imperial court. Hai Liangyi, who had endured it for a lifetime, had already died in remonstrance, so why must Kong Qiu still keep on enduring? The reform of the world was at hand, right now! Doing nothing was tantamount to a neglect of duty!

But was it really a good time now?

Shen Zechuan thought otherwise.

Why did Hai Liangyi endure it? Because the noble clans had already become a chronic disease of Dazhou. They ought to have scraped the bones and healed the wounds long during the reign of Yongyi. But as it turned out, the troops of Zhongbo suffered a defeat before Hai Liangyi could make his move. Dazhou was just like an old man in his twilight years who was kicked in the waist by another until he coughed out blood. It was hard for the external wounds to recover, and even harder for the internal wounds to heal. Right before his death, he questioned the imperial court, asking if this was everyone's fault for exacerbating the issue. But did this "everyone" include himself too?

If he had not pushed Hua Siqian every step of the way.

If he had been able to deal with it with a more conciliatory attitude back then.

Would Zhongbo be able to avoid the subsequent tragedy of having its cities massacred?

Hai Liangyi did not know, but this incident directly affected the way he headed the administration in the later period of Emperor Xiande's reign. He partook in the imperial court with an even more placatory attitude. He did not dare to act rashly again. He had the reckoning and awareness of one mired in the current political situation, but these were things that the fledgling students did not understand.

Perhaps Xue Xiuzhuo did not have the power to guide the direction in which the students of the world moved. But he was no doubt a fisherman standing among the stormy waves trying to figure out the most optimal time to cast his net. This person did not return empty-handed after rolling and crawling in the official circles for many years. He even understood the dispute between the humble scholars and the court officials more than Shen Zechuan did. Since the flames of war of the old clique had already been ignited, then the sparks erupting at present had similarly kindled a fire in those of them who upheld the same ideals.

Xue Xiuzhuo had repeatedly asked to be under Hai's Liangyi tutelage in a formal teacher-pupil relationship. But he did not get his wish. He eventually turned to Hai Liangyi to ask for help. And still, he failed to get his wish. He seemed to be a rock in the tussle between both parties, destined to use his own method to charge his way out amidst the bloodshed. This was a merciless character who would not even spare himself.

Ruthlessness brimmed in Shen Zechuan's eyes. He felt as if he had been thwarted. He was driven out of Qudu, like a stray dog with its tail between its legs, beaten to the point he was almost defenseless.

Xue Xiuzhuo was able to forsake Xi Hongxuan instantly at the right time, and he emptied the Xi clan's silver warehouses before Shen Zechuan made his move. This showed that he had long been preparing for this day. And what had Shen Zechuan been doing at that time? He was still naively thinking that he could rely on his eloquence to drive a wedge between the noble clans, even though it was clear that Xue Xiuzhuo had long revealed his mettle during the Imperial Army's silk case.

Shen Zechuan had already been defeated once. Since he was still alive, then he had to fight this battle to the end. As someone who had inherited Qi Huilian's life work, he could not accept himself being dogged by defeat again and again. They had already gone from a battle-free Qudu to the crumbling land of the frontier that was torn apart by disunity. He had to stand up again immediately. Otherwise, there would be no place for him in these turbulent times. There were no weaklings among the up-and-coming talents who were looking on covetously like a tiger eyeing its prey. He had to acquire the rights to challenge the other party before he could sit down and delve further into the topic of beliefs in a calm manner.

Xiao Chiye looked at Shen Zechuan's silent side profile and suddenly asked Yu Xiaozai, "Have you seen the empress?"

Yu Xiaozai happened to be fishing out the letter Cen Yu wrote to Shen Zechuan from his robe. On hearing this, he gave a start and said, "Not yet. Before I left Qudu, the Ministry of Rites was already starting to prepare for the enthronement ceremony. The empress dowager wanted to summon the emperor's daughter for a meeting, but Xue Xiuzhuo declined."

Xiao Chiye's hanging fingers swayed gently. He said, "Looks like he isn't that confident of success either. Then let's wait and see if the empress he has nurtured in four short years is a paper tiger who would topple over at just a touch. I'd like to see just how long she would be able to bluff Qudu."

Shen Zechuan returned to his senses. After composing himself for a moment, he said, "I just hope she isn't a second Li Jianheng."

Xia Chiye was tired from leaning. He straightened up his upper body and asked Yu Xiaozai. "We still don't know what her name is. If they are going to register her in the imperial registry, then is it possible that she's called Li Jianting?"

A strange expression came over Yu Xiaozai's face. He extended his finger to write on the mat, one stroke at a time. "It's this name all right. But it's not the same character as the former emperor. Rather, it's Jianting, with different words. Li Jianting."<sup>3</sup>

Taken by surprise, Shen Zechuan exchanged glances with Xiao Chiye.

Will edit later _(: 丿 ∠)_ Also feel free to feedback.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Alex, Suika <3

Footnotes

1. Specifically essays on current affairs presented to the emperor as advice on government policy
2. 黃冊 Huangce, or registers/book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household's classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.
3. Shen Zechuan initially thought it was written as 李建婷. The Jian is the same as the Jian in Li Jianheng (李建恒) and Li Jianyun (李建云 a.k.a. Emperor Xiande). This is a "generation" name, where each member of the same generation (i.e., siblings and paternal cousins of the same generation) share a common syllable. (For example, in the Xue Clan, this character is "Xiu" for Xiuyi and Xiuzhuo's generation.) Ting (婷) is a common female name, which is also the same Ting in her original name, Ling Ting (灵婷).

However, Yu Xiaozai said it was written as 李剑霆 instead (which sounds more masculine too).

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 124 : THE DIE IS CAST

The first glimmer of dawn appeared in the sky. Yu Xiaozai was a scholar after all, and it was hard for him to hold up mentally after a time, so Shen Zechuan got Chen Yang to lead Yu Xiaozai away for a rest. They could always discuss the remaining matters another day. Yu Xiaozai did not force the issue and withdrew out of the room after leaving behind the letter Cen Yu wrote to Shen Zechuan.

Xiao Chiye went to take a bath, while Shen Zechuan read Cen Yu's letter under the candlelight. The morning light from the courtyard seeped into the room. Shen Zechuan read the part about Bianjun Commandery. He waited for a moment, but Xiao Chiye was still not back. He set aside the letter, lifted the bamboo curtain, and walked along the narrow corridor to the inner area. Then he stepped around the screen for a look. Xiao Chiye was soaking in the pool, fast asleep.

Xiao Chiye had been feeling a little tired as he thought about some matters, but who would have known that he would fall asleep while thinking? A sudden chill on his cheek woke him up.

Shen Zechuan scooped up the water and stroked Xiao Chiye again. He said, "The water has gone cold. Go back and sleep in the room."

Xiao Chiye rose, sending water droplets splashing all over. He lowered and buried his head into Shen Zechuan's bosom, rubbing against him until half of Shen Zechuan's body was wet. He said in a muffled voice, "Hug me."

Shen Zechuan lifted his hand to squeeze Xiao Chiye's nape. He said, "Aren't you making things difficult for me?"

Xiao Chiye said, "Then I'll hug you instead."

Shen Zechuan kicked off his shoes and stretched his arms around Xiao Chiye's neck that still had water droplets on it. He said a little lazily, "Come on then."

Xiao Chiye raised his head to press his forehead against Shen Zechuan's forehead. He embraced him and said, "I've seen the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds. It's still passable. It can be made into a military camp after a little tidying up, but the towers have to be constructed anew. All these will cost money."

The lamps were not lit on this side, and the lightning added a touch of sensuality to the atmosphere.

Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye pressed against each other up close. Shen Zechuan said, "The city of Dancheng lies to the west of the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds. If we are going to come face to face with the Eight Great Training Divisions in the future, we can't skimp on this place."

"No rush." Xiao Chiye exerted a little force to pick Shen Zechuan up and carry him into the room.

Shen Zechuan knew that Xiao Chiye did not intend to use those silvers of his. The Imperial Army's expenditure could not always be pegged to Cizhou. What's more, Xiao Chiye was about to return to Libei soon. To lack money was to lack confidence. He was probably considering this matter himself.

"Cen Yu went to the trouble to get Yu Xiaozai to bring a letter to you. He must have a favor to ask of you." Xiao Chiye got onto the bed. Without even taking off his robe, he leaned back against the pillow, half-embraced Shen Zechuan, and rested his chin on top of Shen Zechuan's head. He asked, "What is it?"

Shen Zechuan had already finished reading the letter. Resting his head against Xiao Chiye, he folded the letter and answered, "Cen Yu hopes that you can give everyone another chance and act as the bridge between Qudu and Libei."

With his eyes half-closed, Xiao Chiye said, "They are in need of help now, that's why they are willing to lower themselves. If the Grand Secretariat and the empress dowager get along in the future, then Libei will have to send another person in as a hostage. If not me, then Xun-er."

The grandson-heir was already six years of age now, and Xiao Chiye still had yet to meet him. But this did not prevent him from doting on his nephew. This matter was non-negotiable.

Xiao Chiye softened his voice. "Cen Yu is aware this is a difficult matter to achieve, so he hopes I can head south to Qidong and convince Qi Zhuyin to halt the marriage alliance between Hua and Qi."

"Cen Yu is in Qudu year in year out. He doesn't know the details when it comes to Qidong. The commander-in-chief doesn't have a say in matters relating to the marriage alliance." Xiao Chiye said. "It's Qi Shiyu who is going to marry Hua Xiangyi, not Qi Zhuyin. Qi Shiyu is a wily old fox. Seeing as the present situation isn't boding well, he does not want Qidong to follow in Libei's footsteps, and so he wants to strengthen ties with Qudu through marriage. What can Cen Yu and the rest give Qi Shiyu? With Hai Liangyi's death and the empress's enthronement, all past promises have become worthless. They have no bargaining chips that they can use to convince Qi Shiyu..."

Xiao Chiye's voice gradually became a murmur as he spoke.

Shen Zechuan counted in silence for a few beats, then turned over to look at him. Sure enough, he had fallen asleep. Shen Zechuan opened up the letter once again. His eyes lingered on the word "Bianjun" for a moment before he closed it.

Xiao Chiye had a good night's sleep.

Xue Xiuzhuo, however, did not fall asleep.

He had been resting in his study for several days in a row. The whole affair about the emperor's daughter could convince the students, but it could not convince the shrewd and astute imperial court officials. Kong Qiu felt that the blow Xue Xiuzhuo dealt to the Grand Secretariat by taking advantage of present circumstances was not what a gentleman should do. He had already submitted several memorials in succession to protest against the empress dowager's tacit consent. But it was a futile endeavor, and he received no response.

A conniving, ambitious man of great designs.

Thinking how wrong he had been about Xue Xiuzhuo, Kong Qiu threw these words at him and refused to discuss any further with him.

Whether or not the emperor's daughter ascended to the throne, the imperial court officials led by Kong Qiu had failed to reap any benefit this time round. They fought with Han Cheng and lost their pillar, and they saw Han Cheng make a concession only for Xue Xiuzhuo to come barging out of nowhere midway. What he delivered was not the emperor's son, but the emperor's daughter. Everything they had done had been in vain.

Cen Yu did not concede defeat. The criticism of the imperial censors was far more intense than Xue Xiuzhuo had imagined it to be. Xue Xiuzhuo thought Dazhou was already at the point where they would let the emperor's daughter ascend to the throne. Was he not implying by this that the state and its rule were coming to an end, and that was why an incident such as the reversal of gender norms and the confounding of right and wrong could have happened?

Back then, Qi Zhuyin had merely been conferred a title as commander-in-chief, and she had already been repeatedly censured. And now, the Ministry of Rites poured over book after book for details regarding the enthronement ceremony of the emperor's daughter, and there were too many areas in which they had simply had nothing to reference at all. The sounds of castigation in the imperial court never stopped, and memorials impeaching Xue Xiuzhuo numbered in the dozens.

"Are all of you I see here pansies?"<sup>1</sup> Pan Lin had now made a name for himself in the Ministry of Revenue after all the ordeals he had been through. As a descendant of Pan Xiangjie from the old-school noble clan, his reaction on the imperial court was the most intense. "Dazhou never had a female crown prince in all its hundred years! Feudal ethics<sup>2</sup> is the Way of Heaven. Although the common descendant of Prince Yan has passed, he still has descendants. Even if the royal bloodline is hard to find, Her Majesty can temporarily exercise the rights of the Son of Heaven. We will search again!"

Xue Xiuzhuo stood alone in the middle of these two groups of officials who were polar opposites and said in a steady voice, "All the later descendants of Prince Yan take his surname. Do you mean to tell me that the Li clan's empire should also change its surname to his? It's indeed entirely justified for the empress dowager to act on behalf of the Son of Heaven. Since the harem can lead the administration, then why not a female crown prince?"

"You're distorting the facts!" Cen Yu turned aside to look at Xue Xiuzhou. "The empress dowager acts on behalf of the Son of Heaven; she does not take his place. As long as the crown prince ascends to the throne, the harem will naturally have the authority returned to its rightful master! But if the emperor's daughter has an imperial heir in the future after ascending to the throne, will she be able to return the power?!"

Han Cheng's expression was livid. He understood deep down that he had been duped by Xue Xiuzhuo too. The empress dowager and all these old-school noble clans were dissatisfied because the attitude Xue Xiuzhuo was manifesting was not that of compliant submission. He held the emperor's daughter firmly in his hand, which meant that after the emperor's daughter ascended to the throne, he would have the influence to control court administration and state affairs. To those traditionalists, this was a kind of betrayal.

Seeing as the empress dowager, who was sitting behind the beaded curtain, had still yet to speak up, Han Cheng said, "Moreover, the emperor's daughter has never been out there in the world, limited as she is to her chamber. How can she assume the responsibility of managing state affairs? In my opinion, the empress dowager should still lead the administration after the enthronement ceremony."

On hearing this, Kong Qiu wanted to throw up his hands and quit. This situation was like one big sticky mess. At present, none of the parties were satisfied. They were displeased if the emperor's daughter were to ascend the throne, and they were unhappy if the empress dowager were to head the administration, but what else could they do? Let the eight cities deliberate state affairs, and that would upset the students!

Kong Qiu wanted so much to beg Heavens to hurry and drop a prince from the sky! They were blinded and muddleheaded over ten years ago not to let Emperor Guangcheng beget more sons. If there was still an imperial heir around, would they be in such a predicament?

Xue Xiuzhuo lifted his arm to point at the old stone inscription outside the hall. He said, "The forefathers had explicitly said that 'the harem shall not interfere with politics', not 'the emperor's daughter shall not lead the administration'! Since the various gentlemen here are so critical of me today, then may I be so bold as to ask what, in the various gentlemen's opinions, should be done? Do we oust the emperor's daughter and install an emperor of another surname, or do we leave the throne empty and have the empress dowager lead the court?!"

A loud buzz rose in the imperial court, but no one stepped forth to give a definitive statement. It was like this too when they appointed Li Jianheng as the crown prince back then. It was as if they were being pushed to the precipice of the cliff with each step they took with no other choice open to them.

If Xue Xiuzhuo had come forward a few days earlier to say that he still had the emperor's daughter in his hand, the empress dowager and the Grand Secretariat would all have a strategy to deal with it, and they would also have been willing to treat him cordially. But he just had to pin everyone down by their vulnerable point in an attempt to hold the initiative to call the shots in his own hands. He now had the emperor's daughter in hand, and public opinion to back him up. Who would dare to lay a hand on him at this juncture?

Kong Qiu took a step back and gave in. He knew such a stalemate was non-beneficial to Dazhou and to them. He said, "There is something the commander said which I find true. The emperor's daughter has been limited to her living quarters for long. Even if she ascends, she still needs to study the classics. In the interim, the empress dowager will be in charge of the administration with the assistance of the Grand Secretariat."

They had to stand firm in this last stand they took. They had to turn themselves into the threshold that determined if the emperor's daughter had the capability to participate in government independently. Kong Qiu's intent was clear. It was only when the Grand Secretariat found the emperor's daughter capable that she was capable. Otherwise, she would always remain a student sitting on the throne. To the empress dowager, this was also a kind of threat. If the empress dowager dared to support the Han clan as she did for the Hua, Pan clans during the reign of Yongyi, then they would immediately put the emperor's daughter in charge of the administration and force the empress dowager back into the rear palace.

The empress dowager sat in silence behind the beaded curtain for a long time before she said, "I feel uneasy all day to act on behalf of the emperor. Since there is now a crown prince candidate, it is indeed inappropriate for me to continue doing so. After the enthronement ceremony, I shall retreat to the Buddha hall and will no longer show myself in public."

Since she was going to beat a retreat for the sake of moving the situation along, all those present could only kneel in unison and shout, "Your Majesty is the matriarch of the world. You mustn't put your esteemed self down."

Xue Xiuzhuo knelt among them, his back drenched in sweat as he bowed in a kowtow. Surprisingly enough, he did not refute Kong Qiu.

Xiao Chiye was brimming with energy after a sleep. He had just finished his breakfast and was sitting cross-legged under the eaves feeding Meng. When he heard the news Bianjun had revolted, he and Meng looked back at Shen Zechuan together.

Yu Xiaozai sat on his heels at the side. On seeing this, he hurriedly said, "I was shocked when I heard it too. General Lu comes from a clan of military talents; how could he have revolted? Minister Kong requested right away for the Ministry of War to check the state of military affairs in Bianjun. The Imperial Bodyguards put the supervising eunuch on trial, and it took nearly a month for them to find out that the initial military provisions allocated to Bianjun were moldy.”

Xiao Chiye was still stunned. He rose swiftly to his feet, blocking off the light inside the room, and said, “Moldy? We agreed back then to reduce Qidong’s military provisions by half. No one said anything about letting them pass off inferior grains as quality grains.”

The warring situation in Libei was critical at that time, but Bianjun also had to fight battles with Biansha. No matter how anxious Xiao Chiye had been, he would never let anyone stuff Lu Guangbai with moldy grains. He dispatched Chen Yang and Gu Jin to supervise the process precisely because he was worried someone would mess with the military grains, but he had never expected someone to make a move on Bianjun.

“No wonder the commander-in-chief has yet to come and fight me.” Xiao Chiye raised his arm to let Meng perch. His expression was grave. “She lost Lu Guangbai. Qudu would not dare to be hasty and let her head up north to confront us. They have to let her close up the gap in Bianjun. But Lu Guangbai...”

This was Lu Guangbai they were talking about!

Xiao Chiye’s heart sank. He said, “The 20,000 soldiers in Bianjun are all infantrymen. With nowhere to go, Lu Guangbai can only lead his troops deep into the desert. The desert is the Biansha Cavalry’s territory. He will lose the advantage of laying ambushes that he has back in Bianjun. No doubt he will have to change his usual style of fighting battles. Why didn’t he head for Suotian Pass?!”

It would have been fine if he went to Suotian Pass or Tianfei Watchtower. There were still troops of the Feng clan stationed in Suotian Pass. Both of these places could be said to be Zuo Qianqiu’s former units. Zuo Qianqiu was now a general in Libei, and Lu Guangbai’s sister, Lu Yizhi, was Xiao Jiming’s wife. No one would ill-treat him if he went to either of these places.

But why did he decide to head east?

There were only the Twelve Tribes of Biansha in the desert.

To be edited ;;;

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Suika <3

Footnotes

1. Original quote “举朝之士皆妇人也” by Hai Rui, (海瑞), a Chinese scholar-official and politician during the Ming dynasty.
2. 天理 “Law/Principles of Heaven” i.e., feudal ethics as propounded by the Confucianists in the Song Dynasty

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 125 : MENG & YU

Editor: Ami<3

There was not much of the sixth month left. Cizhou's garrison troops were already beginning to take shape, and it was time for Xiao Chiye to continue his journey north. Not once had he sent a personal letter to Libei in the two months he was in Zhongbo; likewise, Libei did not send him one either.

Both parties seemed to have come to some kind of tacit understanding.

Meng began to spend more and more time out hunting. Xiao Chiye knew it was flying north. He stood in the courtyard today, watching the sun sink in the far distance. It was only when Shen Zechuan rapped lightly on the door frame behind him that he returned to his senses.

Xiao Chiye looked back at Shen Zechuan from under the last of the evening rays.

Shen Zechuan felt as if Xiao Chiye had grown a little taller again. Those broad shoulders of his bore the weight of the setting sun; he was far more sturdy than he had been six years ago. Shen Zechuan watched for a moment until Xiao Chiye turned aside slightly and said, "Let's go horse-riding."

Unlike the last time they went horse-riding in Qudu, Xiao Chiye was serious this time. He led Shen Zechuan up Lang Tao Xue Jin and explained it all to Shen Zechuan regardless of significance, from how to step on the saddle to how to pull on the reins. It was as if he wanted to leave it all to Shen Zechuan—His horse, his eagle, his heart.

The two men rode on the horse together and trotted along the forested path outside the city of Cizhou. This section of the path was not long. They ran until the last of the sun on the horizon vanished. Stars adorned the vast stretch of the sky behind them, sprinkling the ground with a smattering of light. The lands in the mountain ranges to the north were rich in vegetation and water. Lang Tao Xue Jin ran up the slope. Xiao Chiye reined in the horse and sat in the wind as he said to Shen Zechuan, "The Hongyan Mountains lie at the end."

Shen Zechuan looked out into the distance. On this cloudy night, the boundless sky stretched on in the far distance. He could vaguely catch a glimpse of the tall, rising peaks of the Hongyan Mountains. It looked like a dragon lying at the end of the earth, asleep in eternal rest. It drew a meandering demarcation line at the very edge of Dazhou. One could see its contours from Zhongbo, but not reach it from where they were. It nourished the vast expanse of land north of Dazhou; it was a natural-formed wall that rose from the earth of Libei.

Shen Zechuan heard the howl of the wind—a wind that was entirely unlike that of Qudu. It blew against him, sending the sleeves of his robe fluttering like a white bird spreading its wings.

“This is the call of the Hongyan Mountains. It’ll miss me too. When we get closer to it, we will be able to hear the song of the wind even more clearly.” Xiao Chiye spurred Lang Tao Xue Jin into a run. They jolted in the wind, shooting across the billows of wild grasses like a bird swooping towards Hongyan Mountains.

Meng flapped its wings and chased after them from behind. It circled in the air and dove, leaving behind a line of bent grass in its trail as it swept past.

Xiao Chiye suddenly said in Shen Zechuan’s ear, “I want to take you there to see it.”

The puff of warm breath from Xiao Chiye warmed up the little jade earring on Shen Zechuan’s ear. Looking ahead, he said, “Xiao Ce’an...”

Xiao Chiye turned his head. Shen Zechuan said something, but the wind was too strong, and Xiao Chiye did not hear him clearly. Refusing to let it drop, he moved in closer and motioned for Shen Zechuan to repeat it.

Shen Zechuan said, “Keep going, and we’re going to cross the border!”

“Then so be it.” Xiao Chiye did not stop. “I’m taking you home to meet my old man and eldest brother—What did you just say?”

Shen Zechuan shouted in the wind, “WHERE . IS . MY . FAN?!”

Xiao Chiye scooped up Shen Zechuan in his arms and suddenly reined in the horse, causing Lang Tao Xue Jin to raise his hooves and neigh. The world turned upside down in Shen Zechuan’s vision, and a muffled thud rang out right after. Both men tumbled and rolled in the grass along the slope.

Xiao Chiye wrapped his arms around Shen Zechuan to shield him. He did not get up when they came to a stop; instead, he spread his arms and remained lying under Shen Zechuan. He said, "You lied to me."

Shen Zechuan pinched his cheek and asked, "Who lied to you?"

Xiao Chiye stared at Shen Zechuan as he said huffily, "You lied to me. Liar. Scoundrel. Heartless man..."

Shen Zechuan tugged over a handful of grass and plastered them all over Xiao Chiye's face.

Xiao Chiye did not dodge. He stretched out his arms to embrace Shen Zechuan and forcefully held him to his chest. He said wickedly, "In this life, even if I die, I have to die with you."

He hugged Shen Zechuan so tightly that Shen Zechuan's head was buried in the pit of Xiao Chiye's neck. Shen Zechuan made a few attempts at struggling, but he could not break free, so he said in a muffled voice, "Xiao'Er, if you suffocate me to death, then you'd be murdering your own husband."

Xiao Chiye said, "Then repeat what you said earlier."

Shen Zechuan gasped hard for breath and finally managed to peek out from under Xiao Chiye's palm. With deep feelings, he said, "Xiao'Er, you're suffocating—"

Xiao Chiye rubbed away at Shen Zechuan's head until even the latter's cheeks flushed red and his hair was all tousled, looking not in the least like Vice Commander Shen at all. Xiao Chiye said resentfully, "Shen Zechuan!"

There were bits of grass in Shen Zechuan's mouth. "Huh?"

Xiao Chiye cupped Shen Zechuan's cheeks and lifted the latter's head to kiss him. But just as their lips were about to touch, he stopped and said callously, "Kiss me."

Shen Zechuan could only remain in this position with his head slightly raised. He endured it for a moment, then said, "Release your hands then."

Xiao Chiye said, "Nope. Think of a way yourself."

Shen Zechuan could not reach him. Pursing his lips, he grabbed hold of the front of Xiao Chiye's robe to yank him over and gave him a peck on the lips.

Xiao Chiye's expression remained unchanged.

Shen Zechuan was still trying to reach him, so Xiao Chiye lowered his head and kissed him so hard that Shen Zechuan bent backward. Even his bites were merciless. Xiao Chiye's arms were still locked around his waist in a hug, and as Shen Zechuan leaned back, he felt a stab of pain in his neck and sucked in a breath with eyes narrowed.

In no time, their positions reversed. Shen Zechuan sank into the grass. He could see the entire boundless starry sky as Xiao Chiye entered him. Sounds he could barely suppress escaped his lips as he grabbed a lock of Xiao Chiye's hair, which wound around his fingers as they tensed and curled. The stars dazzled before his eyes, and his consciousness gradually disintegrated in the wind. He gazed at Xiao Chiye a little dizzily, clearly sensing that the wolf pup was much fiercer than usual.

"Xiao'Er..." Shen Zechuan dragged out the syllables.

Xiao Chiye bent down, enveloping him and blocking out all the wind and stars at the same time.

"I love you."

Xiao Chiye seemed to have fallen in love with such whisperings lately. The closer he was to home, the more he would act like a child. He took possession of Shen Zechuan, and he was also taken by Shen Zechuan.

He was not stingy with declarations of love such as these. Each time he said it, he would make Shen Zechuan clench hard and tremble in spite of himself.

Shen Zechuan seemed to be sighing and moaning as he immersed in the murmurs of words and clung close to Xiao Chiye, while Xiao Chiye indulged to his heart's content with wild abandon at the boundary of Libei. Only the two of them knew of the debauchery taking place beneath those seemingly intact clothes. With his back to the Hongyan Mountains, and under that enchanting sighing of the wind, Xiao Chiye revealed just how feral and domineering he could be.

Shen Zechuan gradually forgot all about the milky way above as he kissed Xiao Chiye. He soared high up in the clouds and fell back into the embrace of the wind, eventually melting into the crooks of Xiao Chiye's arms.

When Shen Zechuan woke up, the day was just beginning to break. Thin rays of the morning sun shone through the bamboo blinds. He stretched a hand out and felt the fading residual heat beside him. Xiao Chiye had gone out of the city earlier, leaving his old robe still hanging on the clothes rack. A small incense had been lit in this room to repel mosquitoes. The mingling of heat still lingered on Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan spread his arms apart and took up both of their spaces. He had yet to close his eyes for the second time when he suddenly propped himself up into a sitting position. He hurriedly put on his clothes and wooden clogs and pushed the door open.

“Quick.” The redness at the corners of Shen Zechuan’s eyes was visible. In a hoarse voice, he said to Ding Tao, who was under the eaves, “Send that new pair of arm guards to Ce’an posthaste.”

Ding Tao was feeling a little dispirited because he had been left behind. He was presently sitting cross-legged at the edge of the small pond, drawing as a vent for his feelings. When he heard Shen Zechuan, he did not even put away his brush; instead, he rose to his feet and attempted to run. A sharp-eyed Qiao Tianya deftly caught hold of Ding Tao’s back collar and said to Shen Zechuan, “His Lordship brought it with him.”

The rush of coolness in the morning sobered Shen Zechuan up. He tapped his wooden clog, nodded his head, and made to return to the room when Qiao Tianya added, “But he only took one along. Said to keep the other one for Master.”

Shen Zechuan stood still for a moment without saying a word. He saw it was going to be complete daylight soon, and so he did not intend to return to bed. “How many men from the Imperial Army have been left behind?”

Qiao Tianya answered, “Two thousand. They are all at the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds.”

“Prepare the register of names. The Imperial Army must not be lumped together with the soldiers from Cizhou.” Shen Zechuan pulled the front of his clothes and said, “Mister Chengfeng wants to discuss the purchase and sale of grains between Cizhou and Chazhou in detail. Go tell him that we will discuss it today.”

Qiao Tianya was not in a hurry to leave. He fished out a letter from the front of his robe and said, “Master, you have a letter from Ge Qingqing in Juexi.”

“Good timing.” Shen Zechuan said. “Is the fleet of ships in Yongyi Harbor all good? The Xi clan’s shops have nothing to do with us, so the surface-level policing will not involve them. But Xue Xiuzhuo merely emptied their silver warehouse and left these money-making shops to us. My guess is that he might not have necessarily done it willingly.”

“There are no signs of activities from Qudu. Even if Xue Xiuzhou has a foolproof plan, he can’t be in two places at once. There’s no one to work out a plan for those shops in Juexi for him.” Qiao Tianya released Ding Tao and said, “However, what Ge Qingqing means is that Qudu did not go and created trouble for him, but the Yan clan of Hezhou did.”

The Yan clan of Hezhou owned the waterways of Chazhou. They were prominent merchants south of Qudu. Lei Changming was able to establish his brigade of bandits because the Yan clan was backing Lei Jingzhe. Shen Zechuan had been thinking about them, so he was not really surprised to hear this.

“I know very little about the Yan clan.” Shen Zechuan said. “There’s not much news about them in Qudu either.”

Ding Tao jumped in excitement at his words and said, “Young Master, I know of this! The one supporting Lei Jingzhe is the current head of the Yan clan, a man by the name of Yan Heru. Rumor has it that he’s such an extravagant and ostentatious person that he refuses to go out without a sedan chair worth its weight in gold. He’s not only dressed in gold; even the abacus he carries along with him is made of precious gold and jade! He’s VERY, VERY, VERY rich!”

In his haste, Ding Tao’s pronunciation of “very” came out sounding vague, so he lifted his little book and showed it to Shen Zechuan. There was a scrawl drawn in brush of a figure holding up an abacus. He was dressed in copper coins all over, giving off a strong “rich man” vibe.

“Where did you hear of this?” Qiao Tianya asked.

Ding Tao pointed in the direction of the prison and replied, “Master brought home a silly lad the last time they caught the bandits. He’s almost as tall as Jin-ge, and he’s incomparably strong. I used a few sweets to trick this information out of him. This lad is so simple-minded that he will spill it all if you give him food.”

Shen Zechuan vaguely remembered that Xiao Chiye seemed to have mentioned it. He said, “Weren’t the remaining bandits sent back?”

“Yeah.” Ding Tao nodded. “But Master said he’s too silly. He can’t survive if he returns, so we might as well keep him here with us.”

Shen Zechuan still wanted to know the details of the Yan clan, so he said, “Bring him here.”

Zhao Hui fed the eagles at dawn. Wearing an arm guard, he held up his arm to them one at a time to let them perch on him while he fed them meat. At other places, there would be a servant specifically assigned to the eagles to handle matters like these. But when it came to Xiao Chiye’s generation in Libei, they all liked to do it themselves and raised their own eagles they had tamed themselves.

When Zhao Hui fed “Yu”, who had been following Xiao Jiming all this while, he discovered that its back had been badly scratched, and there was a bald spot on it.

“What happened?” Zhao Hui held Yu and pushed aside its feathers for a look. He asked the soldier on the side, “Did it fight with someone?”

The soldier held the leather bag containing the strips of meat and took a few steps with Zhao Hui. He said, “I have no idea, General. It went out hunting a few days back, and when it circled back from the south, it was already injured. I had the physician look at it, and he said this wound was caused by the talons of a bird of prey.”

Yu was a gyrfalcon too, and it was considered large in size among all the flocks of birds in Libei. Xiao Fangxu was the one who was taming it originally, but he later gave it to Xiao Jiming. It had followed Xiao Jiming into battle for the last few years, and it had never been on the losing end against the saker falcons from the Hanshe Tribe.

Zhao Hui scrutinized the wound and wondered, “How strange. Whose eagle is as ferocious as this...”

One of these words sent a sudden jolt through Zhao Hui’s mind. He abruptly turned his head and looked to the south. The breeze was still the same. There were no traces of a gyrfalcon in the skies.

The sky in Libei was still blue.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Suika<3

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 126 : LI XIONG

Editor: Ami<3

Li Xiong was just as his name suggested—a baby bear. He stayed in the prison for a little less than half a month. Every day, he sat cross-legged with his face to the bars, looking helplessly at the door as he waited for Lei Jingzhe to come and take him away. Seeing as he was young, the wardens all loved to tease him. He was a strong but simple-minded boy who did not get angry even when he was made fun of. The only thing was that he had a terrifying appetite; he could eat a meal for three people in one setting.

The warden opened the door for a shackled Li Xiong, who asked with pressing urgency, “Has my big bro come to pick me up?”

The warden clapped Li Xiong on the back and said nothing to him. Qiao Tianya had arranged for a horse carriage to come and take Li Xiong away. Fearing that Li Xiong might make a racket and stir up trouble on the way, the warden made a special point of securing the fetters around Li Xiong’s ankles. Li Xiong was not used to riding in the carriage, and all that swaying made him dizzy. Finally, he arrived at the place, but when he got off the carriage and saw the mansion entrance, he refused to move his feet.

“I’m not going in.” Li Xiong stood where he was, like a stake nailed to the ground. No matter how they pushed and shoved him, he remained absolutely still. “This place is too big. Once I enter, my big bro won’t be able to find me.”

The weather was oppressively hot, and everyone was sweating profusely just by standing there. The warden, afraid of offending them, was overwrought with anxiety, and so he attempted to hoodwink Li Xiong, “Go in first. We’ll bring you out after you go in.”

Li Xiong found this man to be very much like a weasel with how his eyes shifted around when he spoke; he looked like a liar, so Li Xiong shook his head sullenly and refused to budge. The warden tried his best to persuade him, but to no avail, so he steeled himself and squeezed in together with the others behind Li Xiong in an attempt to push him inside.

Li Xiong’s heels scraped across the ground. Annoyed from the pushing, he jerked his arms and bellowed, “I’m not going in! Nope!”

The men behind him stepped back in unison from the force. The warden saw him struggling and was worried those shackles could not hold up, so he hurriedly ordered, "Hold him down! Don't let him make a commotion!"

When Li Xiong saw them pouncing towards him, he spontaneously spread his legs in a horse stance<sup>1</sup> to hold his body firm and steady. His suntanned face raged with fury. The warden strained himself to the limit and exerted all his strength, but Li Xiong did not budge the slightest. It looked like they were going to be delayed at the entrance.

Ji Gang happened to return from his stroll outdoors with Fei Sheng following at his side. Even from afar, he saw the crowd at the entrance along with the horse carriage parked in the middle of the road. With a hand at his back, he was just about to inquire when he saw the wardens exclaim out loud just as Li Xiong threw all of them off him.

"Such strength!" Fei Sheng cheered and watched Ji Gang's expression.

Ji Gang was a practitioner of the Ji Clan's boxing style, and he valued strength most. Sure enough, his eyes lit up and said, "Where's this lad from?"

Fei Sheng hurried over. He did not need to ask; he could more or less guess from the way the wardens were dressed. He clutched, then immediately released the Xiuchun blade at the side of his waist, before lifting the chain on the ground with one foot as he said, "Out of the way. I'll truss him up!"

Shen Zechuan was in the room waiting for Kong Ling and the rest when he heard the commotion before the courtyard. He lifted the bamboo blinds. When he saw Ji Gang entering, he could not help but be taken aback. "Shifu, what's wrong?"

Ji Gang handed his birdcage to Qiao Tianya and had him hang it up on the veranda. He bent over to scoop up a few handfuls of water from the copper crock to wash his hands. "Picked up a lad before entering. Take a look, see if he is the one you want?"

As soon as the words were out of his mouth, they saw Fei Sheng drag in a sturdy lad with iron chains as though he were hauling in a bull. The lad was still throwing a tantrum, and he yanked Fei Sheng towards himself. Fei Sheng was, at the very least, the vice commander of the Imperial Bodyguards, and yet his clothes were already drenched in sweat just from the short distance of pulling and dragging.

“Oh!” Ding Tao poked his head out from the room and yelled, “That’s him, Li Xiong!”

Shen Zechuan asked, “What’s happening?”

Fei Sheng wanted to answer, but the chain suddenly went taut, and his entire body was thrown backward and quickly dragged over.

Li Xiong pulled at the chain, struggling until cracks appeared on his wooden shackles.<sup>2</sup> He dragged Fei Sheng round and round the courtyard. Fei Sheng’s back scraped across the beds of flowers, and mud splattered all over his neck. He had the intention to put on a display of his prowess, but discovered that he could not still his body at all.

Qiao Tianya was about to react in that instant, but Ji Gang put out an arm to block him from moving and bellowed, “Tao-zi!”

Ding Tao uttered an acknowledgment, stuffed his book into his robe, and nimbly leaped over the railing on the veranda. Fei Sheng was still being dragged around. Ding Tao chased after them for a few steps, but knew he could not stop Li Xiong by pulling him, so he stepped down on the chain and called out, “Li Xiong—”

But he slipped, and his foot got caught in front of the chain. The moment Li Xiong tugged at the chain, Ding Tao fell over backward. Quick-witted as he was, he used both arms to protect his head and shield his cheeks with his elbows as he fell into the soft, loose soil with a “thud” and tumbled. Flower stems stabbed into his outer arm, blocked by the dogskin arm guard he had just secured on himself.

Fei Sheng hooked a foot around the edge of the stone to bring himself to a stop and felt the sharp pain from the chain winding tightly around his arm. Gritting his teeth, he flipped over to his feet and pulled hard until he was almost leaning backward in a crouching position. His veins bulged, and he could not help but cuss, “This darn bearlike strength!”

Ding Tao leaped to his feet<sup>3</sup> and ran for a few steps before he sprang. Using the momentum from a kick on the railing to propel himself forward, he landed on Li Xiong’s back. He pulled at Li Xiong’s back collar with one hand, clamped his legs around Li Xiong’s nape, and raised a fist, but he did not punch him. Instead, he yelled, “Let go!”

Li Xiong’s shoulders sank from the weight. He was thrown off balance by the force of impact when Ding Tao pounced on him. He bent slightly at the knees to stabilize himself, then released the chain and reached back with one hand to pull Ding Tao off him. He had only just stretched out his hand halfway when he was encumbered by the shackles. Flying into a rage, he whipped his upper body around in an attempt to throw Ding Tao off. Ding Tao held on like a monkey, but while he did not slip off, the book in his robe fell out.

Ding Tao's was the most skilled in qinggong, which was imparted to him by none other than his old man himself. Their family worked as guards in Libei, and they always brought a notebook along with them while on the job to record every single incident regardless of its significance. This book was far more important than their own lives. In order to prevent the book from falling on the battlefield, Ding Tao's old man mastered the qinggong skill specifically used for the purpose of fleeing for his life. A pity that his old man eventually died chasing after his book, slit in the throat by another.

Ding Tao was anxious upon seeing the book slip, and reached out an arm to catch it, but Li Xiong grabbed his arm instead and flung Ding Tao over one shoulder and slammed him to the ground like a fish he had caught from the stream.

A loud thud rang out. Ding Tao's entire back slammed onto the ground, and he yelped soundlessly from the pain. Even so, his feet swiftly caught hold of the book even as Li Xiong clutched Ding Tao's collar and hauled him off the ground. Too preoccupied to bother about the blows, Ding Tao tossed the book up with his legs and caught hold of it with one hand. In the next moment, he was slammed down to the ground again.

This time, Ding Tao could not hold back. He choked and coughed, feeling the bile in his stomach rise. He lifted his legs and wound them around Li Xiong's arm, then turned over and used the momentum to fling Li Xiong to the ground. Li Xiong's shackle broke from the impact. He rolled to his feet and bulged his eyes in a glare as he charged towards Ding Tao with a raised fist. Halfway there, his whole arm suddenly felt immensely heavy, as if he had, in a blink of an eye, struck a steel plate. Even with that astonishing strength of his, his arm would not budge.

Ji Gang held Li Xiong's fist in one hand, and rebuked, "Back off!"

Li Xiong was reluctant, but his legs did not seem to obey him, as he was beaten back a few steps by this white-haired old man. Unable to maintain his balance, especially after just getting up, he fell on his butt.

Ji Gang flicked his sleeves and pulled Ding Tao up from the ground.

Ding Tao stuffed the book back under his robes and said, "Grandpa! He hurt me so much!"

Ji Gang patted the soil off Ding Tao's back and said, "I told you a long time back that you will sooner or later end up on the short end of the stick by resorting to trickery and evasive tactics! When you jumped on him earlier, you should have used the 'Bullfight' move on him. Why did you hesitate?"

Ding Tao wiped the sweat on his face, feeling very aggrieved. "He ate the sweets I gave him, and just yesterday he was still chummy with me."

Only then did Qiao Tianya fold his arms as he leaned against the pillar. He whistled at Fei Sheng and quipped, "Old Fei, not up to it, huh."

Fei Sheng simply took off his filthy outer robe and laughed as he cursed, "Son of a bitch, why don't you try? This lad's strength is out of this world."

Shen Zechuan was a little surprised. Xiao Chiye was the strongest person he had ever seen. He could draw the hundred-jin Conqueror's Bow relying on just his arm strength alone, with no need for external aids. It was easy for Xiao Chiye to hoist him over one shoulder while getting up a horse or heading into a river. But even Xiao Chiye was not this frightening when he was Li Xiong's age.

"Which one of your parents is from Biansha?" Ji Gang pulled Ding Tao behind him, took a few steps forward, and asked Li Xiong.

Li Xiong's buttocks were hurting from the fall. His shackles were gone, but the fetters on his feet were still there. He was reluctant to come in in the first place. Fei Sheng's treatment had sparked his rage, and this was followed by Ji Gang beating him back. Now seeing Ding Tao being coaxed by others after making his way back under the eaves, he pouted, threw his head back, and burst out wailing. He kicked his legs and cried, "Why are you people bullying me?!"

Shen Zechuan let his hands droop and said to Ji Gang, "This one's still a child."

Ji Gang observed the back of Li Xiong's shoulders and said, "He was fighting in such a haphazard way earlier, relying fully on brute force... Feels a little like wrestling. Lad, tell me honestly, is one of your parents from Biansha?"

Li Xiong ignored Ji Gang. Nothing anyone said could register in his ears at this moment, as he cried particularly hard. He had been following

Lei Jingzhe since young, and now, without him, Li Xiong was like a little tot abandoned on the streets—at a loss for what to do, and with nobody to turn to.

His cries gave Shen Zechuan a headache. Shen Zechuan did not sleep well last night, and long periods of standing made him feel tired all over. He said to Ding Tao, “Give him some more of your sweets.”

Ding Tao was feeling even more aggrieved now. He felt around his sleeve pocket slowly before finally digging out an oil paper. “.....It’s melted.”

Qiao Tianya picked up a branch of blossoms from the ground and held it between his teeth. Looking at Li Xiong with a smile, he stepped over the railing and squatted down before him. He waved his hands and said, “This big brother shall remove your fetters for you and get someone to bring you some food. Do you want rice or noodles?”

Li Xiong hiccuped, his face glistening with snot as he sniffled, “I want meat.”

The bamboo blinds were partially lifted, and it was cool inside the house.

Li Xiong sat cross-legged by himself before the small table, grabbing the meat with his hands and feasting on them with great relish. Ding Tao secretly counted the plates, feeling as if he was going to be full just from the counting.

“His mother is most likely a woman abducted by the Biansha Cavalry. It’s chaos along the Chashi River banks, and things like this were common occurrences during the earlier years. The Duanzhou garrison troops didn’t want to cross the border to give chase either.” Ji Gang half turned his body and studied Li Xiong. “But with a sturdy physique like this, his father is unlikely to be an ordinary person. I wonder how he fell into the hands of the bandits.”

“If he really has Biansha blood, then it’s not strange that he was abandoned.” Shen Zechuan recalled Li Xiong’s earlier display of strength. “Qudu case files have annual records of names of those reported to be abducted at the frontiers, with the highest numbers reported in Duanzhou. If those abducted women were to get pregnant, the Biansha tribes, unwilling as they were to raise the kids, would throw those women back along the banks of Chashi River. Though their original families wouldn't want to take them back again either."

Fei Sheng had just changed into clean robes. Seeing Qiao Tianya's silence, he said, "It's fine if he just happened to fall into the bandits' hands. What I fear is that the bandits raised him for a specific purpose."

"That won't be the case." Ji Gang shook his head slightly. "You've never seen the people from Biansha. They are just like us; not everyone can be born to be that big and tall. Look at Libei Armored Cavalry. Other than requiring you to have the requisite household registration to join the army, they also require you to have the physique, but not all of them are as sturdy as the Prince of Libei. I do think that this lad's father isn't likely to be an ordinary person; he would have been able to get some official posts in the Biansha Cavalry just with this strength alone. However, there is no one like that among the Biansha generals I know near Zhongbo."

"Lad." Qiao Tianya said as he drank the chilled soup, "You've had your meat. It's time for you to talk."

There was still meat in Li Xiong's mouth, so he was too occupied to reply. He swept a glance over the group of people, finally resting his gaze on Shen Zechuan, and mumbled something.

Ding Tao leaned over and listened carefully for a moment before he turned his head to tell Shen Zechuan, "Young Master, he's asking you why you are wearing an earring... Young Master's wearing it because he wants to, what are you asking this for... Oh, you saw the same one before... not the same? So is it the same or not... uh-huh... Of course Young Master's jade earring wasn't bought with money... You've seen it before?"

Li Xiong swallowed the meat. Without bothering to wipe his mouth, he looked at Shen Zechuan and said, "I've seen you before, at 'Gedale'<sup>4</sup> of Chashi River!"

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

- 1.
2. 马步 horse stance, a common posture in Chinese martial arts and takes its name from the position assumed when horse-riding.

- 3.
4. An example for reference
- 5.
6. Specifically 鲤鱼打挺 carp kip-up, a martial arts move where one leaps from a supine position into a standing position.
7. Again, for foreign names in this novel, we decided to go with pinyin for the time being due to unfamiliarity with the language involved and to avoid mistranslations with the actual names in its original language. If we do get official subtitles someday, we will replace them in the translation (the same goes for titles). Until then, please bear with us.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 127 : VULTURE

Editor: Ami<3

Ji Gang rose to his feet abruptly. “Nonsense!”

Although Li Xiong had been beaten back by Ji Gang, he was not afraid of him. He retorted resolutely, “I’m not talking nonsense. I have seen him before. There’s a portrait of him in Gedale. My big bro used to live there. I remember it clearly!”

Fei Sheng thought this did not augur well, considering that he was not Shen Zechuan’s trusted subordinate yet, so there were some matters he was not at liberty to remain here and listen. Thus he got up and said, “Seems to me like he’s more or less done with eating. Master, I’ll inform the kitchen to stop serving up the meat.”

Once Fei Sheng withdrew, Shen Zechuan asked Ji Gang to sit and said to Li Xiong, “Look carefully. Are you sure it’s my portrait?”

Li Xiong grasped the handkerchief he used to wipe his mouth with two fingers and scrutinized Shen Zechuan for a moment. He answered hesitantly, “It kind of looks like... yet also kind of doesn’t...”

Shen Zechuan felt a slight stir in his heart. He stirred the spoon in the soup and lowered his eyes. “The person in the portrait you’ve seen is a woman, yes?”

It finally dawned on Li Xiong. “Oh, right. That’s a woman; you’re a man.”

In just a short moment, Shen Zechuan made plenty of conjectures. He watched the sour plums stirring in the soup and thought back to what Zhou Gui had once said. He also remembered his mother, Bai Cha, as well as Lei Jingzhe who had just returned to the Prefecture of Dunzhou’s territory.

“What place is this ‘Gedale’?” Shen Zechuan asked without batting an eyelid.

“Gedale lies to the east of Chashi River and is a part of the area within the Biansha’s borders. In the early days, it was a temporary residence for the Zhongbo bandits to hide from the pursuit of the Zhongbo garrison troops, but later, they engaged in the illicit trade of selling women from decent families and was wiped out by the garrison troops of two prefectures led by my elder brother, Tantai Long. The remaining people defected to the Biansha Cavalry, and the one roaming around this place back then was the Biansha's Liaoying Tribe." Tantai Hu raised his head to watch Meng pass through the layers of clouds. "Lei Jingzhe came from that place. After leaving the Zhu clan, he had nowhere to go. He thought of following the Zhongbo bandits to make his fortune, so he went to Gedale. But for some reason, he failed to build up a brigade of bandits there and eventually returned to the Prefecture of Duanzhou, where he met up with Lei Changming and started to make his mark."

"After Tantai Long wiped out the Gedale's bandits, the Liaoying Tribe headed north. Those bandits who had initially defected to them followed them north too." Chen Yang squatted on the ground and rubbed at a handful of dry soil. "The Liaoying Tribe is now the reserve cavalry of the Hanshe Tribe. All the saker falcons of the Biansha people are tamed by the Liaoying Tribe. At first, their status among the Twelve Tribes of Biansha was pretty low, equivalent to that of an 'eagle slave', but twenty years ago, an 'esuheri'<sup>1</sup> appeared in the Liaoying Tribe."

Tantai Hu was not from Libei, so he did not know the implication of this form of address.

Gu Jin explained from the side, "That is, 'hero'."

"You know Biansha is made up of numerous tribes, right?" Chen Yang looked back and smiled at Tantai Hu. "Only tribes where 'heroes' have appeared can be called as one of the Twelve Tribes. Coincidentally, our lord and this 'hero' were both born in the same year. Ever since His Lordship established the Libei Armored Cavalry at Luoxia Pass, this 'hero' conquered the three tribes of Liaoying, Gouma, and Changjiu in the desert and defeated the old chief of the Hanshe Tribe in the north with saker falcons. From then on, he became the one and only 'Great Hero' to command the four tribes since the reign of Yongyi. He also became Libei's arch-enemy."

Tantai Hu gave a start. "Don't tell me it's..."

Xiao Chiye had been standing behind them at some point onwards. He tilted his head to drink up the water in the water bag, then picked up from where they left off as he secured the opening of the water bag, "It's Amu'er."

They made way for him, and Xiao Chiye stepped onto the clod of earth to look at the Hongyan Mountains in the far distance.

“Amu’er is currently the person most likely to be the monarch in Biansha. He has the ambition to subdue the Twelve Tribes.” Xiao Chiye had a prominent nose that cast some shadows when he turned his head to the side. He continued, “He formed the strongest cavalry in Biansha and became the person since the dawn of history to attack and breach the furthest into the lands of Dazhou. Laohu, the Biansha Cavalry you see now is actually the Biansha Cavalry that Amu’er has reformed. He combined the horses from the Gouma Tribe and the saker falcons from the Liaoying Tribe together, lowered the height of the Hanshe’s Tribe but increased their speed, and completed the deployment that would allow him to battle with Libei in the air.”

“Lowered the height?” Tantai Hu looked at Lang Tao Xue Jin and said, “Master, are the battle steeds from Libei and Hanshe Tribe different?”

“Of course they are different.” Xiao Chiye let loose a laugh, but his smile was faint. “At first, in order to keep up with the Hanshe Tribe’s speed, my father opened up a new stable at Luoxia Pass and stopped using the battle steeds from Suotian Pass. The current battle steeds of the Libei Armored Cavalry are all reared from that time on. Strong and muscular, they are all wild horses from the foot of the Hongyan Mountains, and also the same breed of horses the Hanshe Tribe once used. But Amu’er later came to realize the drawbacks prematurely. He thought that for the same breed of horses, the Libei Armored Cavalry’s weight-bearing capacity was stronger. Once the Libei Armored Cavalry removed their armors, the Hanshe Tribe’s speed would no longer be an advantage. So he took down the Hanshe Tribe’s horse ranch on the Hongyan Mountains and swapped them for the Gouma Tribe’s ponies.”

Lang Tao Xue Jin shook its mane and circled around Xiao Chiye to eat grass.

“We have come to grief because of those ponies.” Chen Yang gestured to indicate the height for Tantai Hu. “The Gouma Tribe’s horses caught the Libei Armored Cavalry off guard.”

Tantai Hu did not understand. He had been in the Prefecture of Dengzhou and the Imperial Army successively, but neither of these was the main forces of the cavalry, so he did not know what was so formidable about the ponies.

“They are astonishingly fast.” The expression in Xiao Chiye’s eyes grew a little frosty as he recalled the fleeting glimpse he had caught many years before. “Those horses are valiant and strong. Although they are small and short, they have great endurance. The Gouma Tribe has been fighting battles with the Bianjun Commandery all this while. Outsiders do not understand; they think Lu Guangbai doesn’t live up to his name and isn’t worthy of being ranked as one of the four generals in the world, but put them in his position, and they will know after a trial run that it isn’t an ordinary cavalry his infantrymen has been launching night raids on to wear them down, but the world’s fastest cavalry. Qidong has been stationed in the south with increased military strength for many years, yet they have never managed to weaken the Gouma Tribe, and this is all because they could not catch up with the latter. This is also the reason why Qudu isn’t willing to let Lu Guangbai dispatch his troops. When they appeared in the grasslands of Libei, they nearly crushed the Libei Armored Cavalry, which was just beginning to take shape. The weight increase by my father turned the Libei Armored Cavalry into prey at the mercy of the Hanshe Tribe’s machetes after the Hanshe Tribe’s change of horses. To solve this problem, my father chose to continue piling on the weight and turned Libei Armored Cavalry into an iron wall that could move.”

With the strong wind stirring on the grassland, Xiao Chiye lost himself in his thoughts.

“Laohu, the reason the Biansha Cavalry was able to fight their way through Zhongbo six years ago had everything to do with Amu’er’s change of battle steeds. If they had continued to use the wild horses at the foot of the Hongyan Mountains without any army supplies, they would not have the stamina to last that long. These horses are not only fast but also tough, and they won’t slow down at all when passing through the desert. Paired with the saker falcons acting as reconnaissance outposts, they will prove to be a great catastrophe to the Zhongbo garrison troops.”

In fact, this was an issue that had Xiao Chiye tossing and turning all night after the defeat of the Zhongbo troops. He had followed Xiao Jiming into battle when he was in Libei, and his memory of the Hanshe Tribe’s present structure had been deeply impressed in his mind. He even pondered to himself more than once what else he could do – other than increasing the weight – if he had been his father faced with such strong troops back then. He looked forward to his eldest brother’s answer, and Xiao Jiming’s choice to this was to thin down the Libei Armored Cavalry's armor and enhance their mobility. However, Xiao Chiye was not satisfied.

He was a greedy wolf. He could not simply give up the Libei Armored Cavalry's advantage.

However, this was not a problem that could be solved with imagination. For this reason, Xiao Chiye opted to head south with the army before entering Qudu to witness the slaughterhouse that was Zhongbo with his own eyes. He also saw Lu Guangbai's infantry.

"I can't catch up with them. They are too fast." Six years ago, Lu Guangbai squatted on the ground and drew a map for Xiao Chiye. "But Bianjun Commandery is pretty good. The beacon towers stretching ten thousand of li can transmit news quickly. At night, we are the 'bag'.<sup>2</sup> As long as we block off the narrow opening, they won't be able to enter and exit freely. When the truncated squad falls behind, then no matter how fast their speed is, they can only be headless chickens."

Zuo Qianqiu once said, "A-Ye, 'an attack is an opportunity to defend, and defense is a strategy to attack'.<sup>3</sup> The reason the Tianfei Watchtower is able to stand firm without falling is not because of how strong I was as a leading general, but because Heaven has bestowed upon Tianfei Watchtower a strong geographical advantage. However, Tianfei Watchtower was forced to take a defensive stance because once our troops head out, we will not be able to stand up to the Biansha Cavalry's assaults. I was the general who cower behind the city gates. In this world, the only army who can pit themselves against the Twelve Tribes of Biansha when it comes to going on the offensive is the Libei Armored Cavalry. I told your father numerous times never to let the Libei Armored Cavalry become a real shield; that would cause Dazhou to lose its spear completely. If you become a general one day, remember the set-up of opportunities and strategies. The battlefield is a place that undergoes myriad changes in the twinkling of an eye. The moment you fall into the rhythm and pace of the other side, you will lose all your advantages. You have to seize your opportunities firmly; you must learn forbearance. Sometimes, a perfunctory, painless blow is the prelude to exhaustion. The fist has to strike the vital point."

But it was too hard.

Xiao Chiye had yet to think of a solution better than what his father and eldest brother had come up with. He could not even engage in guerrilla warfare like Lu Guangbai did. But he could not forget Zuo Qianqiu's admonition, and he agreed wholeheartedly that the Libei Armored Cavalry could not be just shields. They had come this far after having gone through countless refinements not to bask in past glory. In Xiao Chiye's eyes, it was all too easy to beat back the Biansha Cavalry, but way too difficult to repel Amu'er,

Because the Biansha Cavalry was continuously becoming stronger and stronger under Amu'er's command. This man had the final say in four tribes; he had nothing to worry about from the rear. He was like a vulture born in the desert, eyeing the meat that was Dazhou, all the while attempting to invade it. When Xiao Fangxu changed the Libei Armored Cavalry, Amu'er changed the Hanshe Tribe. When Xiao Jiming changed the Libei Armored Cavalry, Amu'er changed the Hanshe Tribe right off. He had an uncanny understanding of the pack of wolves from Libei. Looking at it from a certain angle, they were confidants. He understood the Libei Armored Cavalry even better than most of those from Libei themselves.

Xiao Chiye's gaze was blocked by the Hongyan Mountains, just like how he had always been blocked by his father and eldest brother. He had not gone head-to-head with Amu'er before, yet he was already seeing the other party as an opponent he had to defeat.

That was a worldly-wise vulture, well-versed in the ways of the world. Xiao Chiye was still a wolf who had just embarked on his journey home.

Meng suddenly swooped down, bringing along a gust of wind in its trail that brushed across the guards' faces. It landed on Xiao Chiye's shoulders, the bloodstains on its sharp talons leaving rough streaks of blood behind. It had already exceeded the size everyone used to imagine it would be; the only ones who were able to hold it up were Xiao Chiye—and Shen Zechuan, who was particularly gentle with it.

Xiao Chiye collected his runaway thoughts and indicated to Chen Yang that there was no need for him to take the leather bag. He turned his head to look at Meng and said, "It has already hunted its fill."

But Meng was acting a little unusual today. It stared at the sky with a sharp, penetrating gaze, never once shifting its gaze even when Xiao Chiye bent his fingers to stroke it.

Xiao Chiye followed its gaze and looked over.

It was quiet up there in the skies and down here on earth. The strong wind springing out of the grass was like a long serpent. At the same time it bared open its bloody mouth, Meng took to the air once more and pierced through the wind to clutch hold of the saker falcon that was attempting to extricate itself from the grass. As the other bird spread its wings and flailed, Meng abruptly rose. By the time it brought the saker falcon before Xiao Chiye, this lone saker falcon had already become a bloody pulp of ripped flesh.

Xiao Chiye abruptly mounted his horse. As he pulled on the reins, he surveyed his surroundings. His gaze finally landed on the east. He frowned.

He had just entered Libei's territory and had not even reached the Libei relay station yet, so how could the saker falcon of the Biansha Tribes appear here?

"The sound of drums." Gu Jin raised his head and turned around with the wind. "Master, it's coming from the east!"

"That's the Bianbo Camp, which is also the patrol camp. They have a backup support track that leads right to the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path." Chen Yang swiftly got on his horse too. Before he lifted his whip, he suddenly remembered something and turned his head back in astonishment to say to Xiao Chiye, "The Shasan Camp lies to the east of the Bianbo Camp.<sup>4</sup> That's where His Lordship's frontline military forces are, along with a year-round reserve of battle steeds to be supplied to the battlefields up north for emergency use—"

Has the Biansha Cavalry fought their way here?

Then what about Shasan Camp?

What about the Prince of Libei?

Xiao Chiye clenched the reins and spurred his horse into a gallop.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Suika, Eggy, Alex

Footnotes

1. Again, for foreign names in this novel, we decided to go with pinyin for the time being due to unfamiliarity with the language involved and to avoid mistranslations with the actual names in its original language. If we do get official subtitles someday, we will replace them in the translation (the same goes for titles). Until then, please bear with us.

2.

3. Example

4. ‘攻是守之机，守是攻之策’ from “Questions and Replies between Tang Taizong and Li Weigong” 《唐太宗李卫公问对》，a dialogue between Emperor Taizong (599-649 AD) of the Tang Dynasty and Li Jing (571-649 AD), a prominent Tang general. It discusses matters of military strategy and is considered to be one of the Seven Military Classics of China.

5. For those referring to the map for reference, it says Shasan Camp is to the east of the Bianbo Camp in the text but it's Shayi Camp that's to the east of Bianbo on the map. :V It's likely the AD mixed it up and Shayi and Shansan were swapped around. I've revised the maps to reflect the correct position in the novel (that is, until the next time it changes again lmfaao).

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 128 : ENEMY ATTACK

The Bianbo Camp was an important supply site at Libei's borders. To keep the physical strength of the frontline military forces up, Xiao Jiming successively set up the Shayi, Sha'er, and Shasan Camps<sup>1</sup> at the southeastern side of Libei to act as protective barriers to the Bianbo Camp. The Bianbo Camp was always stocked with reserve military provisions and equipment meant to be supplied to the frontlines. There were stables here too, with battle steeds on standby to replace those on the frontlines.

Dawn had yet to break when Wu Ziyu woke up. He squatted at the tent entrance and had the soldier who was his personal guard pour water over his head. "The fighting at the frontline is too intense. We start running right on opening our eyes and lie down right on closing our eyes. It has already been half a month since I last bathed."

The guard handed him a handkerchief, which he used to wipe his face.

"Eat well these two days. We still have to head north three days later to replace Guo Weili's soldiers. The Tudalong Banner has also been cleared out by the Biansha baldies. This battle has already made its way right to our doorstep."

Wu Ziyu was the youngest general in the current ranks of generals in Libei. He was originally a guard in the Prince's residence, and because he had gone drinking and stirred up trouble, Xiao Jiming dismissed him from his original post and had him sent to the military camp. He did not really know how to fight battles, but he was resourceful when it came to transporting military supplies and allocating provisions. Libei had a shortage of military grains in the early spring, and he went to swindle a batch of grains out of the bandits in Zhongbo, thereby resolving the pressing emergency of the battlefields ahead.

When Chen Yang escorted the grains to Libei, the one he had met was Wu Ziyu. The latter had been following Xiao Fangxu these two months, running all over until his legs were about to break. Finally, it was Bianbo Camp's turn to take a break; the soldiers under his command were already all exhausted.

"I originally thought that it'd be a breeze to drive off the Hanshe Tribe now that His Lordship is here." The guard took Wu Ziyu's dirty handkerchief and washed it in the water basin. “Who would have known that it would become harder the more we fought? The boundary line has already been shrinking until it now lies on the fringes of the Shayi Camp. If this keeps up, Bianbo Camp would have to shift back.”

A bare-chested Wu Ziyu wiped his nape with a damp handkerchief. He looked to the east and said, “Once the Bianbo camp moves back, the Hereditary Prince’s deployment in the southeast will cease to be effective. This place is the bedrock that will enable the Shasan Camp to keep on fighting as usual. We can’t afford to lose it.”

The guard picked up the basin and splashed away the water. He said, “We can’t afford to play the long game either. Leaving the soldiers aside, there are still military craftsmen in these camps who need to eat. If the Second Young Master had not rebelled and remained in Qudu as the Marquis of Dingdu, then we might just be able to fight the battle this way. But he has now killed the emperor, and Juexi is no longer supplying us with military provisions. The Northeast Provisions Bridle Path’s reserves won’t last for long either.”

Wu Ziyu covered himself with a towel and looked at the sky with squinting eyes as the water dripped. He did not respond to the guard’s gripes.

The guard set aside the basin and said, “General, how about steamed buns and milk tea for breakfast? The milk is good stuff that has just been transported over from the back. It can’t be stored for too long, so we have to drink it as soon as possible. I asked the mess cook to brew tea made out of plain leaves with clotted cream.<sup>2</sup> You—”

Wu Ziyu raised his index finger as a signal for the guard to shut up. He listened to the hubbub of splashing water and footsteps all around and looked at the sky, but he did not hear the whistle of today’s eagle patrol. He listened for a moment before asking, “Has last night’s patrol squad returned?”

The guard happened to be rinsing his feet with water. On hearing him, he looked up at the sky too and answered, “It’s not time yet. The earliest they’ll return after turning back from Shasan Camp is, at the very least, the third quarter during the hour of chen.”<sup>3</sup>

“Why am I not hearing the whistles from the eagle patrol?”

“Didn’t let them out.” The guard hesitated for a moment. “We were too tired when we arrived at the camp last night, so we didn’t report it to you immediately. The eagles we brought back this time are all wounded, having been brutally clawed by the Biansha Cavalry's saker falcons at the battlefield. Even 'Hou' died. Those who raise eagles all treasure their eagles like they would a child. After we came back here, we dispensed with the eagle patrol today and had the physician tend to their injuries."

Eagles were not easy to rear. Patience was required when domesticating them,<sup>4</sup> and those that could act as scouting eagles were the cream of the crop. Even though they were not gyrfalcons, they were similarly valuable. Xiao Fangxu was fighting a battle in the frontline this time, and the battle was not going smoothly for both the soldiers and the eagles. In Libei, horses and eagles were good buddies with friendships that ran deep with the armored cavalry. No matter which was to get injured, the soldiers would not be happy.

Wu Ziyu pulled off the towel and bent a finger to whistle. An eagle swooped down from the top of the tent. As Wu Ziyu was not wearing an upper garment, this eagle did not land on him but instead hopped onto the drying pole where the clothes were hung up. Wu Ziyu said, "Release my 'Chi'. We are fighting a battle now. Doing away with the eagle patrol is just like losing an eye. Even if we are in Bianbo camp, we mustn't be negligent and careless."

The guard said, "... Chi has already been patrolling the battlefield for half a month. General..."

"We have no choice." Wu Ziyu has a gruff voice, yet he was very gentle when he looked up at Chi and commanded, "Go."

Chi spread its wings and soared into the sky. It hovered over Bianbo Camp for a moment, then charged into the morning sunlight in the east.

A bare-chested Wu Ziyu entered the tent and warned, "The batch of battle steeds that have followed us down should be replaced too. The reserve horses have to be taken to the north in three days. Guo Weili's defense at the Tudalong Banner has been breached by the Hanshe Tribe. A group of brothers was killed, and quite a number of horses have sunk in the swamp. He has already sent three military reports to urge us. He's in urgent need of new horses."

The barefooted guard slipped on his shoes and followed behind him. "I've already gotten the men to prepare the horses early in the morning, but this batch of horses is the last batch. Autumn isn't here yet, and our new battle steeds from Dajing aren't here."

“I’ll talk to him about it.” Wu Ziyu put on his clothes.

Guo Weili was single-handedly promoted by Xiao Jiming. This person could fight, but he was most suited to be used by Xiao Jiming, because Xiao Jiming was like an iron chain that could pull Guo Weili back every time Guo Weili let it go to his head, thereby preventing the main force from suffering heavy losses. Xiao Jiming was also the one Guo Weili was the most willing to submit to. Now that the commander-in-chief had changed to Xiao Fangxu, the way of combat was different. There was no one to pull him back, and so there were plenty of areas where he ended up on the short end of the stick.

Wu Ziyu retreated and brought along a batch of equipment that those at the frontline needed to repair. The Libei Armored Cavalry used a tremendous amount of equipment and relied heavily on army supplies and gears, so they had over ten thousand military craftsmen. These military craftsmen were split up among the various camps. Once the battle started, they had to repair equipment for the armored cavalry day and night.

Wu Ziyu’s own armor was also badly worn out. He went to the military craftsmen’s tent to check on it, and on the way, he asked the guard several times, but there was no news of Chi’s return. Sparks spattered out of the stoves when it was nearly noon; it was so hot inside that it was hard for anyone to breathe.

The weather was too hot, so hot that it made them sleepy. Even the wind outside the tents was hot. Wu Ziyu was sweating profusely as he looked at the ground. This steaming hot temperature had already caused many military craftsmen to suffer from heatstroke. Wu Ziyu got his men to splash cold water, but this was simply a futile attempt, much like trying to put out a burning cart of firewood with a cup of water.

“Get the kitchen to boil green beans. Boil as many as you can.” Wu Ziyu covered his face with the cool handkerchief and instructed the guard, “The equipment repair cannot be delayed. His Lordship and the rest are still donning worn-out armors on their end.”

The guard nodded in acknowledgment. He was feeling so hot that he was not wearing his armor, and his collar was open. He was about to turn around when he felt a few drops of water dripping onto his face. Puzzled, he wondered aloud, “Why is it raining...”

Wu Ziyu’s nape was wet with water too, but this water was sticky. He raised his head and saw Chi’s figure charging out from the hot sun before it suddenly plunged. But halfway down, two saker falcons swooped out midair and simultaneously grasped hold of Chi before soaring once more. Chi let out a shrill cry as it was torn into shreds, its feathers scattering in the air.

Wu Ziyu promptly rose to his feet. Someone atop the watchtower in the distance was already shouting, “ENEMY ATTACK—!”

The drums sounded, each beat pounding Wu Ziyu hard in the chest. He immediately gave his commands. “Put on your armors. This is a sneak attack by the Liaoying Tribe. They are not Hanshe Tribe’s cavalry—don’t panic!”

Flaps of tents lifted in unison. From wearing their clothes to putting on their armors, the Libei Armored Cavalry carried out every step without a hitch. With swift and orderly movements, they gradually turned from individual men into men of iron and steel enveloped within the oppressive, heavy armors.

“Squad Six, go guard the stables. Squad Three, go guard the granary. If the vanguards led by me die in battle, Bianbo Camp is bound to fall. When you see that the situation is critical, don’t wait any longer. Release the stables immediately and lead the military craftsmen along the horse track towards the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path where Zhao Hui’s Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang are.” As Wu Ziyu spoke, he saw that Chi had already fallen to the ground. That shocking mass of red made him pause a moment, then he quickly turned his head away and hauled up the guard. “The horses and the military craftsmen can leave when Bianbo Camp falls, but the grains can’t be sent away, so when the need arises, set them on fire and burn them clean. Do not leave even a single grain of rice to the Liaoying Tribe! Head back home. There is still the Hereditary Prince back in Dajing to assume command.”

Conventions dictated that the general should retreat with the troops and leave the vanguards behind to stall for time when the situation was bad. But Wu Ziyu knew that the sneak attack this time was a force to behold. There were only two possibilities in which the Biansha men could bypass the Shasan Camp before Bianbo Camp.<sup>5</sup> The first was that they took a shortcut and made their way over in silence. The second was that Xiao Fangxu, Zuo Qianqiu, and the rest had all perished in battle; the frontline had already collapsed, and Shasan Camp was completely wiped out even before they had the time to send back the military reports.

Regardless of which it was, the men who had come along for the sneak attack this time could not be underestimated. Wu Ziyu did not dare to hand the responsibility of stalling for time to others; he had to guard this place himself.

Wu Ziyu passed through the squad as he put on his helmet. “Which—”

Wu Ziyu had yet to finish his words when a large boulder came falling from the sky and smashed into the middle of the newly erected watchtower with a thunderous crash. Even before the sound of the watchtower’s collapse could be heard, it knocked down a tent.

“Stone catapults!” The guard shouted at the top of his voice from behind. “General, they are coming around from the south!”

“Fucking bandits!” Wu Ziyu spat. “Get on your horses! It’s inconvenient for them to move around since they’re bringing along heavy equipment, and they won’t dare to make a show of it when taking the detour. Without the ponies from the Gouma Tribe, this group of people can’t get away!”

But following right after, the sounds of neighing rang out from the horse stables, and the battle steeds scurried all over amidst the machetes and flames. The other party had the same idea as Wu Ziyu—slaughter all the horses they could not grab and burn away all the grains they could not take away with them. That way, the materials heading north in Libei will be in short supply immediately. They could think of ways to transfer the grains again, but without this batch of battle steeds, Guo Weili’s Cangzhu Camp would lose their combat capability.

“Motherfucker...” Wu Ziyu slowly gripped his blade. “Tell Squad Six to leave first with the horses!”

The guard flipped onto his horse. The tents near the stables were all on fire. He led his men and charged over. His saddle suddenly sank, and the guard felt an ill sense of foreboding. Following right after, the horse beneath him raised its hooves from an attack. A Biansha soldier clung to its abdomen like a spider. The Biansha soldier pulled out a dagger from the side of his leg and stabbed the horse in its belly.

The dagger made a white mark on the armor but did not pierce through it right away.

The battle steed landed back on the ground, and the guard tumbled off his horse and drew his blade to trade blows with the Biansha soldier. The Libei Armored Cavalry’s armor was too heavy, and the impact was so strong that the Biansha soldier was forced back, his feet scraping against the ground. However, the soldiers' armors were not as hard as the horses' armors. The guard hacked off the other party's head, but he also ended up taking a blow from the other party's blade.

This bunch of Biansha soldiers was like locusts that opted to surround the enemy and fight to their death when faced with a trapped beast like the Libei Armored Cavalry. The helmet Wu Ziyu had just worn had been struck off him. He was surrounded by several people. The fire from the stables had already burned its way to the horses that had yet to run out, their blood-soaked neighing jarring on Wu Ziyu's ears.

He was not a general who could fight. The soldiers under his command were also from the Libei Armored Cavalry's backup transportation squad. They had only just retreated from the battlefield a few days ago, and their already exhausted bodies could not withstand such a strong assault. What's more, he still had to divert manpower to protect the Libei military craftsmen who were just as important as the battle steeds.

The guard flipped atop the horse once again and spurred his horse on to knock over the blazing railings of the horse stables. In a split second, the battle steeds within galloped out.

Wu Ziyu said, "Let the military craftsmen get on the horses. Remove the armors and hurry on to the horse track..."

Wu Ziyu was still speaking when he felt a sudden weight on his back as he was forced down by two men before being flung to the ground. The back of his helmet-less head struck the ground hard. The next moment, a rope was put around his neck, and both men dragged him in unison.

Wu Ziyu tugged at the rope tightening around his neck. It strangled him so hard that the timber of his voice changed as he hissed at the back of the guard, "When... coughs, when you reach the camp... tell Zhao Hui to head north..."

Beads of sweat dripped into his eyes, stinging them until Wu Ziyu could barely open them. He tumbled amid the smoke and dust, unable to breathe as he watched the sky turn yellow. That group of saker falcons that had torn Chi to pieces was hovering up there.

"Fuck..." Grief overwhelmed Wu Ziyu. His vision blurred as eyes that stung from the sweat brimmed with tears. He cursed without letting up. "... Fuck!"

He had already been dragged to the edge of the sea of fire amidst the chaotic sounds of horses' hooves. Wu Ziyu knocked against the rock and caught hold of the railing. The pain from being burned by fire was excruciating.

The saker falcons in the sky suddenly dispersed, and a falcon cry reverberated through the sky in the wind. Meng gripped the back of a saker falcon in midair, and both parties engaged in a fierce battle. At the same time, the sound of galloping horses closed in on them from afar. Choked by the smoke, Wu Ziyu could not get a clear look; he could only get a vague glimpse of a tall figure riding steadily on horseback.

Surprised, he shouted, "Your Lordship!"

Wu Ziyu felt a grip on his ankle and heard Chen Yang bellow, "Drag him out!"

The rope tightened around Wu Ziyu's throat. He hurriedly cried out in a hoarse voice, "Drag, my ass! I, I'm still being hanged by the neck!"

Chen Yang promptly let go and brandished his blade at the side of Wu Ziyu's neck, scaring Wu Ziyu so much that his hairs stood on end. And just like that, he was dragged out with the rope still around his neck. He rolled as they swatted at him to extinguish the fire. Gasping for breath, he lifted eyes against the sunlight and saw the man on horseback dismount. The man raised a finger between his lips and let loose a long whistle.

Meng flung the saker falcon from side to side as it swooped down. Its feathers were in a mess from all that tearing at one another. The saker falcon let out a cry of pain. Meng's sharp talons were like blades as they ripped into the saker falcon. Breaking through the wind, Meng rushed over to Xiao Chiye and kicked out its talons to toss the saker falcon to the ground.

"I'm not my old man," Xiao Chiye raised his arm to let Meng perch and turned his head back to look at Wu Ziyu, "I'm your Second Young Master."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Ami

Footnotes

1. Literally Sand I, Sand II, Sand III Camps

2. 奶皮子 öröm/urum in Mongolian cuisine, a rich, highly caloric cream from animals such as yaks, goats, and cows.
3. 辰时 7-9 am, based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times.
4. 熬鷹 literally torturing falcons, it's one of the ways to train them by not allowing it to sleep and torture it to exhaustion to wear down its wild nature.
5. For those referring to the map for reference, it says Shasan Camp is to the east of the Bianbo Camp in the text but it's Shayi Camp that's to the east of Bianbo on the map. :V It's likely the AD mixed it up and Shayi and Shansan were swapped around. I've revised the maps to reflect the correct position in the novel (that is, until the next time it changes again lmfao).

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 129 : GRAVEYARD OF DREAMS

Initially, the guard had already left the camp when he saw the men from the Imperial Army charging in like wolves and tigers. This squad was more excited than afraid; to date, they had never fought a battle to their hearts' content, having been held in check back in Qudu and Zhongbo. It had not been easy for them to encounter the Eight Great Training Divisions lead by Han Jin, but the other party was like dough that shrunk back at just a squeeze, and now, they finally got to come face to face with the Biansha soldiers. With a frenzied spurt of energy and vigor, the Imperial Army drew their blades and charged.

Not many men from the Biansha Liaoying Tribe had come, since they were relying on the stone catapults to take the Bianbo Camp by surprise. It seemed as if victory was within their reach, but they were caught off-guard by these troops that came killing out of nowhere.

The Imperial Army resided in Qudu all year round, and the battles they fought were all street fights. Their blades were not as long as the Libei Armored Cavalry, yet they were artful in wielding them. They were an incomplete squad before Xiao Chiye took up the post of the Imperial Army Viceroy, and their main force had another name in Qudu, called "the military oilmen"; they were the best at mucking around and loafing on the job. In other words, this was a 'slippery' squad. They were not an organized wall like the Libei Armored Cavalry was. As long as they could stab their blades through the enemy forces, they would even resort to using low-down means.

And now, the Biansha soldiers had become the target of a surprise attack. The guard who had turned back cut off their retreat route. The men at the periphery quickly withdrew with the stone catapults, while the Biansha soldiers who were still inside the Bianbo Camp could only fight to the death with the Imperial Army.

By the time Wu Ziyu was able to get up, the fire had abated some. With his blade in his hand, Chen Yang checked the corpses and reported to Xiao Chiye, "Master, they are indeed from the Liaoying Tribe."

"The stone catapults, being heavy equipment, are inconvenient to move around. If they want to take it with them when they flee, they won't be able to run fast.” Xiao Chiye said to Tantai Hu, “Laohu, lead the cavalry and give chase.”

On seeing this, Wu Ziyu immediately said, “My horse can still run. Buddy, take mine.”

Tantai Hu said his thanks and flipped onto the horse. Gu Jin turned his horse around. “Laohu, follow me. We’ll go after them together.”

They led the men away. Half of Bianbo Camp had already been razed by the fire. Xiao Chiye was looking at the horse stables and granary. Wu Ziyu followed close behind him and called out, “Second Young Master...”

“Although Bianbo Camp is a patrol camp, it’s also a camp where reserves are stored. This place is still a distance away from the boundary line. There’s Shasan Camp to the east acting as a shield, and there are also sentry posts and checks along the way.” Xiao Chiye squinted his eyes from the glare of the sun. He looked at Wu Ziyu again. “Yet they made their way this far back. Where is your patrol squad?”

Wu Ziyu recognized Xiao Chiye. In his early years, he was picked along with Zhao Hui and Chen Yang to serve as Xiao Jiming’s guard in the Prince’s residence, and that was when he saw Xiao Chiye. But the Xiao Chiye back then and the Xiao Chiye at present were just like two different people. His excessively tall stature meant he was always looking down from above, and being gazed at in such a way made Wu Ziyu feel a lot smaller for no reason.

Wu Ziyu averted his gaze. “The patrol squad that went out last night did not return.”

“The patrol squad that went out last night did not return, and yet you, as the commanding general, sensed nothing odd about it even when noon came around.” Xiao Chiye looked as if he was just engaging in idle chatter. He had an intimidating presence that gave others great pressure, but his attitude was quite mild and calm. “Shayi Camp is the battlefield, while Bianbo Camp is the resource supply site for Shasan Camp. Every slight disturbance here will affect the battle at the frontline. You’re really quite the laidback one.”

Wu Ziyu could tell what he meant by these words. Xiao Chiye had never held a post in the Libei army. His only military rank now was that of an Imperial Army Viceroy in Qudu; what’s more, he was a viceroy whom Qudu no longer acknowledged, so he was in no position to reprimand Wu Ziyu. But the more insipid his tone was, the more it made Wu Ziyu ashamed.

News that the Second Young Master was going to return to Libei had been circulating in Libei for over two months. Leaving aside the common soldiers, each of the high-ranking military officers like them had their own thinking about it. Of the current military officers in the Libei Armored Cavalry, other than the few who were seniors from Xiao Fangxu's era, the rest were all juniors whom Xiao Jiming himself had promoted.

Xiao Jiming was wounded, and no one knew when he would be able to return to his position. Would the Second Young Master take Xiao Jiming's place upon his return? All sorts of rumors were running rampant. Whether they were those who were ready to throw in their lots with Xiao Chiye or those who continued to reject and ostracize Xiao Chiye, they were all waiting for Xiao Chiye to return and reveal his true colors. Six years was not a long time, but it was not a short time either. There were all kinds of strange rumors about the Second Young Master. Wu Ziyu was also observing Xiao Chiye.

"We are the troops that retreated from the battlefield at Shayi Camp only yesterday. Our main task is to plan and coordinate the transportation of equipment and grains for the battlefield." Wu Ziyu paused for a moment. "The original garrison squad from the Bianbo Camp has already been switched over to Shayi Camp, so there are no main force troops here for the time being. What's more, Bianbo Camp is located behind Shasan Camp. I truly didn't expect..."

Wu Ziyu's voice gradually faded away. The disquieting atmosphere was getting to him. That niggling, pressing sense of urgency was even more pronounced than the blazing sun. He quickly looked at Xiao Chiye. His Adam's apple throbbed, but he did not dare to continue speaking.

Meng turned its head a little to look at Wu Ziyu. Its beak, which looked like an iron hook, had yet to be wiped clean.

Xiao Chiye's nape lay exposed to the scorching sun. He lifted the other hand to cover it and raised his head slightly. He was still looking at the horse stables. "Aren't you people the Libei Armored Cavalry?"

Wu Ziyu remained standing still in silence.

Xiao Chiye's left arm was steady. The combined weight of Meng and the arm guard was nothing to him, but he did not let Meng rest for too long.

Once Chen Yang was done doing a headcount of the bodies, Xiao Chiye released Meng into the air again.

“Master.” Chen Yang lifted his head to look at Meng. “Should we get a squad to follow?”

“Considering that the Biansha men brought along the stone catapults to launch a sneak attack, it’ll be tough for them to avoid the Shasan Camp’s patrol. But they were able to make their way here, which shows that Shasan Camp has already fallen into the enemy’s hands.” Xiao Chiye did not smile. “Father allowed the transportation squad to retreat to Bianbo Camp, likely because he still doesn’t know that Shasan Camp has already been breached. Meng is going over to Shayi Camp to deliver news of it. We’ll rest for a night and head for Shasan Camp tomorrow.”

“Second Young Master has no cavalry or supplies. If you continue on east, you will come face to face with the Biansha soldiers. Since they are able to take down Shasan Camp without so much a noise, then it’s very likely that the people stationed there are from the Hanshe Tribe who are skilled in the art of storming enemies.” Wu Ziyu could not refrain from speaking out. “Right now, it’s safer to wait for the reinforcement from the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang. I’ll send someone to deliver the message right away. The Hereditary Prince will definitely dispatch Zhao Hui over.”

“If you had sent the message to the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang yesterday when you arrived at Bianbo Camp, then there might still be a chance to make it before sunset tomorrow. Send the message now, and it’ll take a day and a night to rush at top speed to the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path. Zhao Hui needs another one day and one night to rush to the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang from Dajing. By the time he arrives at this place, Bianbo Camp will be of no more.” Xiao Chiye pointed to the spot where the watchtower collapsed. “Rebuild the watchtower now. Don’t set it up in areas facing the east; shift it to the southeast corner. Do a headcount of the grains and battle steeds, and have the military craftsmen prioritize the repairs of the camp’s defense walls that the stone catapults have smashed.”

“If Young Master is worried about the Biansha soldiers returning, then you should move the grains and battle steed to the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path.” Wu Ziyu caught up with Xiao Chiye. “There’s simply no time to rebuild the Bianbo Camp. Shasan Camp is only tens of li away from this place. The horses of the Hanshe Tribe can make their way over within a day.”

Xiao Chiye took a few steps up the railing and jumped over it to the other end. He turned around, motioned Wu Ziyu not to follow him, and asked in passing, “Honestly speaking?”

Wu Ziyu did not understand what Xiao Chiye meant by this. He continued at lightning speed, “All we can do now is to abandon the Bianbo Camp and try our best to reduce the loss of supplies—”

As Xiao Chiye stepped back, he asked, “Well, don’t you have the slightest notion to step out of this place and give chase?”

By now, the sun has begun to tilt. Wu Ziyu stood on this side of the ruins, baffled by Xiao Chiye’s gaze. The burns on his back stung from the scorching sunlight. With a frown on his face, he watched as Xiao Chiye turned back. He could not help shouting with all his might, “I can’t win them. Second Young Master, I said it before, I’m from the transportation squad...”

Xiao Chiye did not reply to him and merely waved his hand at Wu Ziyu with his back to the latter. The meaning was clear—Wu Ziyu could shut up now. He stood before the collapsed granary, his expression cold and detached, and his lips, tightly pursed.

He stood there for a very long time.

Xiao Fangxu sat unreservedly in the tent and raised his head to drink up the last mouthful of milk tea. The salted milk tea brewed with plain leaves had already gone cold from being set aside. The clotted cream felt moist in his mouth, and there was a milky aroma. His shoulders were bare, and the military medic was applying medicine.

“Amu’er is a good opponent.” Xiao Fangxu moved his shoulder after it was bandaged. “I’ve been observing the Hanshe Tribe for the past ten years or so, but I didn’t expect their attack power to be so strong. When people grow old, their reactions slow down. I’m no longer the man I once was.”

“Libei’s advantages are prominent, and its disadvantages are, likewise, obvious.” Zuo Qianqiu grabbed up a handful of sand and watched as they trickled down between his fingers. “Amu’er changed his attack strategy for you. He definitely won’t dare to make a sudden assault like this in the past when he was facing off against Jiming. Jiming is skilled in the art of war. The camps he set up on the boundary line are all interlocked. The armored cavalry heads out to face the enemy with chains on their back, supplied by Xiao Jiming himself. Once the situation changes, Jiming can haul the main force back any time to avoid heavy losses. Now that Jiming has retreated and you're back in command, the speed in which news is passed on is a lot slower. What's more, your style is completely different from Jiming. The vanguards don't dare to go all out when they charge, and the reserve troops' initial rhythm is all messed up. Will Amu'er let this opportunity slip?"

Xiao Fangxu got up to get dressed. Scars covered the bulging muscles on his back. He said he was old, but this intimidating body of his was far more sturdy than before. He put on his robe and started to put on his armor meticulously every step of the way.

"If Dazhou is still in the period of resurgence, then Jiming would be the best commander-in-chief of the Libei Armored Cavalry. Ha has performed extraordinarily well, and is the best candidate to keep Libei at the top of its game." Xiao Fangxu strapped on his blade and continued with a stoic expression, "But Dazhou is already in a state of collapse, and our dogged strategy to be the 'wall' is no longer suitable for the Libei Armored Cavalry. Amu'er is the 'Great Hero' Heaven bestowed upon Biansha. He roams around the various tribes, wanting to create a new world. Jiming's conservative strategy is just giving him enough time to grow and develop. Qianqiu, you and I both need to face up to one thing, and that is Biansha is no longer a bunch of incohesive small tribes that rely on looting and plundering to make a living. They are like rivers converging together to become the boundless sea under Amu'er's leadership. Has it ever occurred to you that by the time Amu'er unifies the Twelve Tribes, Biansha will become a behemoth capable of devouring Dazhou? To fight and defeat him, it can only be now."

"I'm the 'spear' of Libei, and Jiming is its 'shield'. At the same time the Libei Armored Cavalry shed off its weight, they are gradually falling into the trap of complacency. An armored cavalry that has lost its desire for victory is akin to a wolf that no longer feasts on meat. Sooner or later, it will be replaced by some other armies."

Xiao Fangxu was expressionless when he spoke to this point.

"Jiming's defeat is not a bad thing for him and for the Libei Armored Cavalry. I put him in the military camp when he was just a teenager not because I hope he can maintain the so-called glory and honor of zero defeats. There are no legends on the battlefield—even I myself will suffer a defeat. I have to make the current Libei Armored Cavalry understand earlier that what we want is not constant victory, but to win; even if we lose, we will climb swiftly back on our feet. As long as our limbs are not broken, we can still fight. Both Jiming and I have successively accomplished what we ought to have done, and now, it's time for Libei to feel the 'hunger'."

Xiao Fangxu paused for a long time, his gaze meaningfully deep.

"The Libei Armored Cavalry is in urgent need of a new commander-in-chief. This person must be different from us, even to the extent of being our polar opposite. He has to tear off the layer of scholarly elegance that Jiming has implemented. He has to be avaricious and savage. He has to make the Libei Armored Cavalry ravenous and let their wolfish nature rear its head once again."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Eggy, Ami, and AliceLiddell for correcting the typo!<3

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 130 : JADE EARRING

At the time Bianbo Camp was attacked, Shen Zechuan was taking a nap.

Qiao Tianya sat under the eaves fiddling with his zither, while Ding Tao and Li Xiong surrounded the copper crock playing with the fishes. It was quiet inside the room. The sunlight spilled over half of Shen Zechuan's shoulders. He had just settled the details of the census register registration with Zhou Gui and the rest last night, and they had begun to do an inventory count of Cizhou's granary reserves this morning. Autumn was just around the corner. If they wanted to do business with Chazhou, this was the best time. He busied around until the afternoon, and that was when he took the opportunity to doze off for a moment while he was sitting at his desk.

An unspecified amount of time later, he woke up.

Shen Zechuan leaned back against the taishi chair<sup>1</sup> and pinched the center of his eyebrows. After taking a moment to compose himself, he called for Qiao Tianya.

"The bandits from half a month ago have already returned to Mount Luo. Have there been any movements from Lei Jingzhe?" Shen Zechuan took up his brush and continued to write what he had yet to finish earlier on the paper.

"Even if there are any signs of activity, it will reach us a few days later." Qiao Tianya picked a chair to take his seat. "Besides, the marquis is thorough in his arrangements. When Lei Jingzhe returns to Mount Luo, he will be the target of criticism. Just trying to resolve his own internal affairs on Mount Luo alone will take him about a month or so."

Shen Zechuan said nothing and continued writing. Finding him to be somewhat distracted, Qiao Tianya added, "Master only slept four hours last night, and you still have to go over to the Zhou's residence to discuss official matters with them after dinner later. There's no harm in taking a rest while you can now."

Shen Zechuan said, "I'll sleep after I return. Is Fei Sheng still idling around? Since he wants to do something, give him something to do."

Qiao Tianya rubbed his fingers and said. "I've been thinking about it these few days. You've been leaving him out in the cold for more than a month. If this goes on, I fear he will harbor resentment.”

“The gears in this person’s brain sure turn fast. He knows Ce’an isn’t willing to take him in, so he wants to remain in Cizhou. Zhou Gui and Kong Ling fear his Imperial Bodyguards background and don’t dare to use him, so he can only follow shifu around, hoping to get a job from me through shifu.” Shen Zechuan set down the brush to let the ink dry and continued, “Now that Gu Jin has returned to Libei, we are indeed short of people to scout for us.”

When Qiao Tianya and the rest arrived in Cizhou, the various Imperial Bodyguards who had followed them out of Qudu also arrived one after another. But even if these Imperial Bodyguards were to gather, there were only about a hundred or so men, half of which were Fei Sheng’s old subordinates. At first, when Shen Zechuan set Fei Sheng aside without using him, it was because Fei Sheng did not have the intention to follow him; that gaze of his was fixed squarely on Xiao Chiye. A pity Xiao Chiye was unwilling to take him as a subordinate, so Fei Sheng could only settle for the next best option and remain by Ji Gang’s side, deferring to him on every issue. In Cizhou, Fei Sheng was not involved in any of the matters, yet he would often put himself within Shen Zechuan’s sight. His intent was simply too obvious.

Fei Sheng had it all read pretty accurately. Even if Shen Zechuan left him out in the cold for a moment, Shen Zechuan would eventually have to use him still, because he had observed Shen Zechuan’s every move, and he knew that Shen Zechuan lacked manpower.

Qiao Tianya leaned over slightly and asked across the table, “What does Master want him to investigate?”

“Two things.” Shen Zechuan answered. “The first is to get him to keep constant track of the price of tea and rice in the various Zhongbo prefectures and the prefecture of Huaizhou. Cizhou’s proposed price will be in the middle. If we want to avoid suffering any losses, we will have to get a good idea of the prices in these places. The Imperial Bodyguards used to have the same assignment back in Qudu, so he can assign men to carry out this task. The second is for him to get to the bottom of Lei Changming and Lei Jingzhe’s relationship with the Yan Clan of Hezhou. Especially Lei Changming. I want to know all the details of this person’s life.”

Qiao Tianya was a little surprised. “Lei Changming was merely a live target Lei Jingzhe set up for himself on the outside. Why is Master not investigating Lei Jingzhe but Lei Changming instead?”

Shen Zechuan paused for a moment before saying, “When I was taking a nap earlier, I recalled the way Lei Changming looked before he died. I find him a little odd. The custom of wearing earrings is the most prevalent among the noble clans in Qudu and the Eight Great Cities. Li Xiong is an orphan Lei Jingzhe raised. He rarely socializes with these people and has only met them once, so it isn’t surprising that he can’t remember it clearly. But Lei Changming was the bandit chief of Mount Luo. He had dealings with the prefectural prefects and garrison troops’ commanders of the two prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou; he even had dealings with Yan Heru, the youngest young master of the Yan Clan, a family of wealthy merchants. He should have come across men wearing earrings countless times, yet he kept focusing on my jade earring before his death...”

Shen Zechuan furrowed his brows slightly. He could clearly recall Lei Changming’s expression before his death. If Li Xiong had not mentioned it, he would not have noticed it either. Lei Changming’s deranged and delirious gaze was clearly looking at another person through this jade earring.

This matter was originally inconsequential. Anyone who heard it should not be taking it to heart. This was because Shen Zechuan’s jade earring was nothing rare; it was merely something that Xiao Chiye had polished out of leftover material while he was fleeing. Compared to the box of earrings he gave to Shen Zechuan back in Qudu, this one was nothing valuable. Others could tell at a glance how “treasured” it was only because of its roundness and smoothness. The noble clans considered it a “blessing” to let their most precious children wear jade earrings.

But Shen Zechuan felt subtly bothered by it. He intuitively felt that there was something in there he would want to dig deeper into. There were still some secrets regarding the uncle and nephew pair of the Lei clan that Zhou Gui and Kong Ling were not aware of.

Li Xiong sat by the copper crock, fiddling with a red string.<sup>2</sup> But he was clumsy and kept failing in his attempts.

Ding Tao scooped up the fish, and water splashed over Li Xiong.

All of a sudden, Li Xiong snapped the string broken in anger and threw it at Ding Tao. He pulled a long face and said, “I’m going to look for my big bro.”

Ding Tao, with his sleeves still rolled up, said, "Better not; what's so good about your big bro? Why don't you treat Qiao Yueyue and me as your elder brothers and follow our Young Master? Our Young Master gives out sweets every month, and he never withholds our salaries."

"I don't want money." Li Xiong suddenly stood up. "I want my big bro."

Ding Tao cast a glance at the main room and saw Qiao Tianya still discussing matters with Shen Zechuan on the other side of the partially hanging bamboo blinds, so he pulled down his sleeves and said, "Why don't you come with me to grab some meat?"

"I'm not eating!" For some reason, Li Xiong was agitated. He scratched his cheek and demanded anxiously, "Why aren't you people letting me go? I want to leave the city. I want to return to Mount Luo!"

Ding Tao felt that Li Xiong was truly a brat. He could not reason with Li Xiong, but if they were to come to blows, he was no match for Li Xiong either. Seeing that Li Xiong was about to make a scene again, Ding Tao suddenly hit on an idea. "You miss your big bro so much. He must be really a formidable one, huh?"

Li Xiong answered, "My big bro is the number one hero in Mount Luo. Of course, he's formidable."

Ding Tao clapped his hands together and said, "So what if he's a hero on Mount Luo? Is he as formidable as my master, my young master? I don't think of him as a hero!"

Sure enough, Li Xiong was furious. He glared at Ding Tao. "Your master and young master isn't formidable at all! He's so skinny; my big bro can kill him with just one punch!"

Ding Tao spat inwardly to himself, feeling a little displeased, but he still tried his best to put on a happy act. "Oh? Then that's pretty formidable. Your big bro is Lei Jingzhe, right? His uncle is Lei Changming. I know all about it."

Li Xiong was already envious of Ding Tao to begin with, and he was not willing to lose out to Ding Tao here. To prove that Lei Jingzhe was stronger than Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan, he hurriedly said, "Lei Changming is formidable too. He can lift the little people upside down, but my big bro is even more formidable than Lei Changming!"

Seeing that he had taken the bait, Ding Tao played along and asked, "What kind of martial arts move is lifting the little people upside down?"

Li Xiong had blurted it out offhandedly. Now that Ding Tao was asking, he racked his brain to recall Lei Changming's life. Memories flashed through his mind. "That is, lifting children upside down. Lei Changming loved to do things like this." He suddenly remembered something. "Oh! I remember it now! Earring... round and white earrings. The children Lei Changming hung upside down wore them too!"

Shen Zechuan planned to head out after his meal. As he was changing his outer clothes, he heard Ding Tao and Li Xiong running around the courtyard, yelling and screaming. The maidservant retreated with a bow to the door and was about to instruct them not to make a din when Shen Zechuan looked back and said, "It's fine. Let them play."

Qiao Tianya originally wanted to put his zither on the small table under the eaves, but on seeing this, he feared the two kids would recklessly crash into it while they were playing and damage it, so he sent it back to his own room.

When Shen Zechuan was leaving the courtyard, Ding Tao followed behind him, looking as if he wanted to say something. But seeing that it was already late, he swallowed back his words and said as he stuck to the moon gate. "If it gets dark, I'll go over with a lantern and wait for you."

Shen Zechuan beckoned to Ding Tao. Once the latter walked over, he said, "After your meal later, head over to Grandpa's courtyard. He wants to teach you the Twenty-four Stances of the Ji Clan. I'll be back by the first quarter at the hour of hai<sup>3</sup> at the latest."

Ding Tao nodded and saw Shen Zechuan to the door, feeling a little loath to part with him. He had heard a bunch of stories in the afternoon. He did not know if Li Xiong was lying to him or if it was all real. It was almost dark now, and he was a little afraid too. As soon as Shen Zechuan left, he hurriedly brought Li Xiong over to look for Ji Gang. There were still quite the number of guards and the Imperial Bodyguards staying in that courtyard. With more people around, he was not afraid anymore.

Shen Zechuan arrived at the Zhou's residence. The study was brightly lit, with several advisors sitting within. The summer night was warm, and the windows on all three sides of the study were open. They had also lit incense to repel mosquitoes. The room felt stuffy when it got crowded. Kong Ling feared that Shen Zechuan would feel uncomfortable, so he had the doors kept wide open.

“These are the grains that have been counted today. Vice Commander, please look it over.” Zhou Gui presented the book to Shen Zechuan and said from his seat, “The autumn harvest is just around the corner. The way we see it, this is the most appropriate time to discuss business with Chazhou.”

“During autumn in the past, the company of traveling merchants from Hezhou and Juexi has to pass through Zhongbo to head for the area where Libei’s and the Huiyan Tribe’s mutual trade market is to deal in goods. However, the war is intense this year, and with this business undoable, they will most likely head for Chazhou to make up for it.” Kong Ling lifted his robe slightly and sat down. “If we were to fall behind them, then no matter how cheap we sell the grains when the time comes, Chazhou will not have the money to buy. So this matter has to be done as soon as possible.”

“That’s the thing.” Shen Zechuan looked over the quantity of grains carefully and said, “This matter is the most important right now. If all goes smoothly, life in Cizhou will be better next year. No such trade was made in the past, so the merchants from Juexi and Hezhou could not have anticipated it, but they should more or less get wind of it when our men go over to discuss business. This involves us getting a slice of their pie; they might not necessarily be willing.”

“That’s the hard thing.” Zhou Gui chimed in. “Leaving aside the question of whether the negotiations with Chazhou’s prefectural prefect and the bandits can go smoothly, we have to rack our brains just to guard against the others. Our Cizhou’s garrison troop has been established for less than a month. The military drill ground isn’t ready, and the soldiers are still untrained. If the others were to have designs on the grains and plot against us, we wouldn’t be able to win against them.”

Shen Zechuan had been waiting for a few days for Zhou Gui to say these words. He closed the book and tapped soundlessly on it with his finger. “Cizhou has no commanding general at present. You gentlemen and I are not well-versed in the art of training soldiers. However, the Imperial Army left some soldiers and horses behind at Beiyuan Hunting Grounds to keep guard. If Your Excellency is willing, why not let them train the garrison troops first? We have to come to an agreement with Chazhou first before we give them the grains. Has the negotiator been decided? I’ll get Qiao Tianya to lead the Imperial Bodyguards and escort him for protection.”

Zhou Gui looked at Kong Ling before looking back. “I can’t leave Cizhou, so I can only send Chengfeng over and assign some clerks who can do the accounts to tag along. If the Vice Commander is willing to dispatch some men to protect them, that’d be really for the best.”

Zhou Gui did not understand, but Kong Ling understood it perfectly well. He composed himself and said to Shen Zechuan, “But I’m a greenhorn when it comes to doing business, and I feel very apprehensive not knowing if there are experts there... so I’d like to ask the Vice Commander to bestow upon me an ingenious stratagem I can bring along.”

Shen Zechuan smiled and said, “Mister Chengfeng, you are too modest. Where on earth would I have an ingenious stratagem? If it’s permissible, I’ll go with Mister Chengfeng on this trip.”

How would Zhou Gui dare to let Shen Zechuan venture deep into the tiger’s den where dangers lurked? Xiao Chiye “hasten over within a day” was still echoing in his ears! He hurriedly said, “The Vice Commander is ___”

Kong Ling was already making his bow and expressing his gratitude. “I feel reassured with the Vice Commander around.”

This man really knows how it is done.

Shen Zechuan looked at Kong Ling with a gentle expression.

Truly too clever.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Ami, Eggy<3

Footnotes

2. 太师椅 Taishi Chair or Grand Preceptor Chair, is a classical style of a wooden armchair in ancient China.

- 3.
4. Cat's cradle, a game which involves making string figures with the hands.
5. 亥时 9-11 pm, based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 131 : SPIDER WEB

It was already the end of the sixth month, so the departure date was scheduled for the seventh month. After Shen Zechuan left, the advisors withdrew from the room, and Zhou Gui asked Kong Ling, “Why did you insist on letting the Vice Commander go? It’s complete chaos in Chazhou. If the Vice Commander were to meet with mishap, there would be no way Cizhou could explain it to the marquis. I was initially thinking of getting you to go and have yourselves disguised as merchants during the journey. We are still on friendly terms enough to negotiate with Luo Mu, the prefectural prefect of Chazhou.”

Kong Lin poured tea and nodded when he heard him. After swallowing it, he replied, “We can still disguise as merchants with the Vice Commander going, and there are Imperial Bodyguards going along too. It’s much safer than our own plan.”

Zhou Gui pointed at Kong Ling and said, “You’re generally smart as a rule, but this time you’re a fool. With the Vice Commander’s... appearance, how can he disguise as a merchant? Those sharp-eyed ones can tell something off at just a glance.”

Kong Ling looked at Zhou Gui for a moment with tea leaves in his mouth. He felt that Zhou Gui really did not understand, so he said, “You’re truly an honest one. Let me ask you, from the rebuilding of Cizhou’s garrison troops to the planning of our business in Chazhou, which one of them is not a proposal of the Vice Commander? Cizhou has been truly benefiting from him, but there are no free meals in this world.”

Zhou Gui said, “I don’t understand? I do! We currently can’t afford to recompense them for military expenses; that’s why we are supplying the Imperial Army with grains and giving them Beiyuan Hunting Grounds. Doesn’t this more or less repay our debt to them? Cizhou is also doing its best to repay the Vice Commander for his kindness to Cizhou.”

Kong Ling swallowed the tea leaves he had chewed on until bitter. “We can’t repay it now, and all the more we can’t repay it in the future. The marquis repelled the bandits from Mount Luo, leaving plenty of time for Cizhou to rebuild itself. We currently can’t even afford to supply half a year’s worth of grains for the 20,000 Imperial Army soldiers. We did give them the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds, and I'm telling you, that will be the Imperial Army's camp-cum-drill grounds in the future. No matter how we try to draw a line between them and us on our end, Cizhou already belongs to the Imperial Army in the eyes of others. Moreover, once the business in Chazhou gets moving, how are you going to repay the Vice Commander for this bonus? Also, the Vice Commander said he's going to assign Qiao Tianya to protect me, but who is Qiao Tianya? He's the former Imperial Bodyguard Vice Commander in Qudu; his rank is way higher than you if you were to compare. When we enter the capital in previous years, we not only have to get off our sedans to pay our obeisances to him when we see him, we also have to move aside to make way for him. The Vice Commander assigned him to protect me, but how is a mere commoner like me worthy of receiving such a favor? And between him and me, who exactly will be in charge when we reach Chazhou? Yet you still agreed to it so readily! That's why I said you are truly an honest one."

Zhou Gui had never been an official before. He was already holding office in Zhongbo right from the start. His teacher was also his superior and benefactor. Zhou Gui served as a Tax Circuit Intendant under him. He did a good job of it, and he was a man of knowledge too. His teacher valued talents, and so he betrothed his daughter to Zhou Gui. As such, Zhou Gui was spared a lot of the nastiness that took place in the official circles. He was later promoted to the position of Cizhou's Prefectural Prefect based on his qualification and experiences. Before the defeat of the Zhongbo's troops, his career had been pretty much smooth-sailing. He was not like Liang Cuishan and the rest who were trampled upon by the officials from the noble clans in Qudu. He never had to endure that kind of hardship, so he truly did not understand much of that circuitous and convoluted stuff.

Zhou Gui was stupefied on hearing this. He said hesitantly, "I am worried too. I have to worry about your safety when you head over with the others to discuss business. The garrison troop is recently established, and the Imperial Army has left. The only ones at present who can be of use are the Imperial Bodyguards by the Vice Commander's side."

Kong Ling said, "Initially, when the Vice Commander said he wanted to remain in Cizhou, it was because we could not trust the Imperial Army then. Before the marquis left, you and I no longer harbor the same doubt, but the Vice Commander still stayed behind. To Cizhou, he is 'the rain that bedews all things in silence'.<sup>1</sup> I fear he has already planned it all before entering Cizhou. It's too late for you and me to realize it now."

After getting along with Xiao Chiye these days, Zhou Gui felt that Xiao Chiye was hard to speak to, but he was very efficient when it came to handling matters, and he showed others the respect due to them. He was someone who laid his cards on the table. However, Shen Zechuan was different. Shen Zechuan sat in the seat of honor when he discussed matters with them, yet he treated all those advisors courteously and even respectfully addressed Kong Ling as "Mister Chengfeng". He was open to discussion when an issue cropped up, thereby giving the others the impression that he was a humble and unassuming person who showed respect for the learned. Zhou Gui's wariness of him had already vanished over time.

Zhou Gui stood up, his hands still grasping his robe. He was rendered speechless for a long time. No matter how obtuse he was, he understood it now. Shen Zechuan had been going all out to help them all because he saw Cizhou as good as his. He said in a daze, "If the Vice Commander... is willing to restore Cizhou to its former glory, then I wouldn't mind giving this prefectural prefect position to him."

Kong Ling looked out into the night. A gray moth, attracted by the light from the study, pounced towards the side of the eaves, only to barge into the spider web concealed between the upturned eaves.

After a moment of silence, Kong Ling said, "Zhou Gui, it's time to dispense with the title 'prefectural prefect'. With Hai Liangyi's death, the moderates in Qudu have come under attack by the students. There is no longer anyone who can maintain the peace in Dazhou on his own. The empire is falling apart. If Qudu is the 'deer',<sup>2</sup> then Cizhou is the 'rabbit'. Without the wolf and fox to guarantee our safety, Cizhou will be the 'meat' in the eyes of the jackals in Qudu, and you and I are powerless against them."

Zhou Gui and Kong Ling were fellow students in their youth. They had many years of friendship between them, and Zhou Gui had rarely seen him so solemn. Thus, he said, "I know how much care and thought you have expended on it. All I ask is that the Vice Commander will live up to our expectations today and won't let us down... I'm afraid of such a person."

Kong Ling remembered the night when he met Lei Changming. Shen Zechuan had simply changed on a whim, chatting with a smile while surrounded by sharp blades all around. He spoke so genuinely, and even the expression in his eyes was sincere. Not only had Lei Changming believed him, but even Kong Ling himself had also believed the act. It was precisely after that incident that Kong Ling began to size up the man, Shen Zechuan.

Kong Ling retracted his gaze and said with a slightly troubled heart, "I stood out too much tonight and is already considered to have crossed the line. I fear the Vice Commander will remember this. I'm your advisor, and I shouldn't have shown off before the Vice Commander... I should watch myself in the future."

While both of them were having an in-depth discussion in the study, Shen Zechuan returned to his residence. Ji Gang was already resting, so Shen Zechuan did not send someone over to disturb him and simply returned to his own courtyard. He crossed the veranda and saw Fei Sheng still on night duty in the courtyard, keeping guard with his men.

It was only when Shen Zechuan went into his room that Fei Sheng relaxed a little. Qiao Tianya shared some of his remaining tobacco with Fei Sheng. When he saw the light in the main room extinguished after a while, he got the men to put out the lanterns in the courtyard as well.

"It's hard for Master to fall asleep without the marquis here." Qiao Tianya stood under the tree and said in a hushed tone. "And his sleep is fitful too. So if you hear any noise in the second half of the night, don't let anyone enter and disturb him."

The gears in Fei Sheng's head turned, and he knew what was up. He shifted the pipe away and puffed out a breath into the night. "Understood. The Chashi Sinkhole is a nightmare. Thanks."

Qiao Tianya, however, did not smoke his pipe. He braced an arm on the tree trunk and listened to the croaks of the frogs in the pond for a moment. "You've been idle for so long. Master finds it a pity for you to be a guard. There are two missions. I'll get shifu to hand you the authority token tomorrow morning."

Fei Sheng understood very well that Shen Zechuan wanted to use him, but did not intend to keep him close by. At least, he would not be able to replace Qiao Tianya. He smoked in silence for a moment, then knocked the pipe a few times, and answered with a smile, "Sure, I look forward to it. But give me a hint. What missions?"

Qiao Tianya looked at Fei Sheng and said, "Keep track and record.<sup>3</sup> Easy-peasy."

Fei Sheng probed, "And the other one?"

"Investigate both men from the Lei clan, especially Lei Changming. Report every detail of his life to Master." Qiao Tianya smiled. "It's truly a waste of talent to hand this task to you. Actually, Ding Tao works fine too, but he's too young, and I fear he has no sense of priority when it comes to carrying out the task, so you are still needed. You're an expert when it comes to this. How about it?"

Fei Sheng smiled too. He nodded and said, "As long as it's Master's instructions, there's nothing that can't be done."

Qiao Tianya went on. "On my end, there's another matter that I'd like your help with."

Fei Sheng twirled his pipe. "You and I are brothers, so no need to stand on ceremony. What is it?"

Qiao Tianya retracted his arm and said, "I'd like you to check the whereabouts of a person for me when you send someone out to keep track of the prices."

Fei Sheng took note of it and cast a few glances at Qiao Tianya. "Who?"

Qiao Tianya answered, "Yao Wenyu."

It was in the dead of night, and the Imperial Army had yet to rest.

Wu Ziyu was drinking milk tea with Chen Yang. The military medic applied medicine for him, and he simply squatted on the ground and asked Chen Yang, "What exactly does the Second Young Master intend to do?"

As Chen Yang sorted out the name registers of military craftsmen in the Bianbo Camp, he said, "It's Master who has the final say. Why ask me?"

Wu Ziyu said, "You and I are old acquaintances. Can't you just give me a little hint here?"

Chen Yang compiled the name registers and looked at Wu Ziyu, unruffled. "If you want to have a personal chat, we will drink and dine here. If you want to discuss military affairs, I'd first have to address you as the battalion general. What am I supposed to answer you when you mix personal and official affairs together?"

Wu Ziyu put on his clothes and said, "Well then, I'll lay it all out clearly for you. The Second Young Master wants to head over to the east to fight the invaded Shasan Camp. I don't think it's workable. It can't be done. The current Libei Armored Cavalry in Bianbo Camp is my squad. We are not the vanguards; we are the transportation escort squad between battlefields. We can still play with the Liaoying Tribe, but if we have to fight the Hanshe Tribe... then I'm sorry, I'll retreat with my men right away."

Chen Yang nodded. "Excuse my inability to escort you farther."

Wu Ziyu clicked his tongue. With a look of impatience, he asked, "What do you mean by this?"

Chen Yang set aside the name registers and said, "If you say these words to my Master, this is how he will answer you too. If you want to leave, then sure, just go."

Wu Ziyu said, "When I talk about leaving, it's not because I'm afraid of fighting a battle with the Hanshe Tribe, but because I can't afford to fight a battle against them at present. Why throw an egg against a rock and court defeat by fighting against overwhelming odds? The battle steeds and military craftsmen from the Bianbo Camp are valuable resources for Libei. What good will it do to waste more time here with those Bianbo people? Send them on to the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path as soon as possible, and we will have reinforcements from the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang. It won't be too late to turn back again then."

"Won't be too late." Xiao Chiye just so happened to lift the curtain. He stooped over to enter, then wiped away the water on his hands. "How did you come to this conclusion? Tell me about it."

As soon as Xiao Chiye entered, Wu Ziyu felt it growing darker in the tent. The military medic packed his medicine case, bowed in farewell to Xiao Chiye, and withdrew from the tent.

Feeling somewhat embarrassed, Wu Ziyu did not dare to continue looking at Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye tossed the handkerchief to Chen Yang and made his way over to sit by the stove. There was still milk tea being kept warm on it. It had been a long time since Xiao Chiye had last drank it. Gu Jin came over from behind and poured a bowl for Xiao Chiye.

Silence descended in the tent, and Wu Ziyu felt unaccustomed and uncomfortable. Even when he erred in Xiao Jiming's presence, it was not as oppressive as being in Xiao Chiye's presence.

Xiao Chiye drank a mouthful and asked Wu Ziyu, “Any more fresh milk?”

Wu Ziyu shook his head hastily and said, “No, just this one pot, and this one was specially kept for the Bianbo Camp to satisfy its cravings.”

“How about plain tea?”

Wu Ziyu answered in the affirmative and said, “How would we not have something to perk ourselves up? There are plenty of tea leaves in the granary. If you like it, I’ll get someone to pack some for you.”

Xiao Chiye propped up his elbow and looked at Wu Ziyu. “Even if you stand here all night, I’ll still leave before dawn tomorrow morning. You run at the sight of an attack. Aren’t you people the Libei Armored Cavalry?”

This was the second time Wu Ziyu heard Xiao Chiye say “you people the Libei Armored Cavalry”. He was fuming inside. He endured it for a moment and was just about to say a word when Xiao Chiye spoke up. “Go pack some. Gu Jin, seal it in the case later and send someone to deliver it to Cizhou tomorrow morning. While you are at it, tell Lanzhou that all is well.”

How would Wu Ziyu know who “Lanzhou” was? The way he heard it from Xiao Chiye’s tone, Xiao Chiye wasn’t taking the war seriously; instead, he was thinking of gifting tea to someone else. Unable to bear it, he blurted out, “Second Young Master—”

“When we are talking about military affairs, I’m not the ‘Second Young Master’; I am the Viceroy of the Imperial Army, Xiao Ce’an. I asked if you are the Libei Armored Cavalry, and not once did you answer me in the affirmative. Libei doesn’t have an independent ‘transportation escort squad’ in Libei; it only has the Libei Armored Cavalry. Your soldiers ride the same battle steeds at the vanguards and are equipped with the same long sword<sup>4</sup> as the vanguards.” Xiao Chiye stared at Wu Ziyu, drank up the milk tea, and said in a slightly mocking tone, “Is this all a commanding general of Libei has to offer?”

Author Words: (Lianyin’s addon in brackets)

Six Prefectures of Zhongbo: Cizhou, Dunzhou, Duanzhou, Dengzhou, Chazhou, Fanzhou

Eight Cities of Qudu: Quancheng, Dancheng, Chuncheng, Chuancheng, Dicheng, Jincheng, Wucheng, Cuo Cheng

Five Commanderries of Qidong: Cangjun, Chijun, Cejun, Chujun, Bianjun

Huaizhou is located behind Luoxia Pass, northwest of Quancheng. Hezhou is south of the military grounds on Mount Feng, the outskirts of which can be connected to the mountain ranges where Suotian Pass is. (Probably a typo. It's Tianfei Watchtower on the map :V) Although these two are called "prefectures", they are not under Zhongbo's jurisdiction. For reference, please refer to the military grains case in book 1.

Yuzhou is in Juexi, along with Baimazhou, Qinzhou, and the Thirteen Cities, including two great harbors/ports.

So far, the tribes from the Twelve Tribes of Biansha that have made their appearances are: Liaoying (Eagle), Gouma (Horse), Hanshe (Snake), Changjiu (Vulture)

Referring to chapter 43 of book 1, the Huiyan Tribe that Ce'an first mentioned has already defected to Dazhou. It's a small tribe that's active around the fringe of the mutual trade market.

The Libei's Camps that have appeared thus far are: Changzhu, Bianbo, Shayi (Sand #1), Sha'er (Sand #2), Shasan (Sand #3), Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang.

I'll draw a more detailed map for everyone when I have the time. (NOTE: you can refer to the audio drama map HERE.)

Thank you for reading.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Special Thanks to: Peach for the correction!

Footnotes

1. 润物细无声 from Spring Rain (春夜喜雨) Du Fu (杜甫), a distinguished poet of the Tang Dynasty who is widely regarded as an undisputed genius of Chinese poetry. In Tang Poetry, spring rain is seen as gentle and crucial for the spring sowing season by moistening the soil, which in turn helps germination and thus, bringing hope and life, and it does this gently and quietly, almost unnoticed.

2. Deer is also a metaphor for the throne, as in 「秦失其鹿，天下共逐之」 from Records of the Grand Historian • Biography of Marquis Huaiyin 《史记·淮阴侯列传》
3. To recap (chapter 85), “keep track and record” was to have the Imperial Bodyguards record all minor and major matters in a book, including the prices of grains, rice, noodles, and tea

- 4.
5. Specifically a changdao, or a two-handed, single-edged Chinese sword.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 132 : TROOPS ADVANCE

When Wu Ziyu ran from the battle site to Bianbo Camp, he passed by Shasan Camp and also went to Changzhu Camp. However, in the eyes of the commanding generals from these battle camps, he was not considered a “commanding general”. He was only good for grain delivery during discussions relating to military affairs. When the Hanshe Tribe launched a sudden assault on the Libei’s mutual trade market in the eighth year of Xiande, the fastest squad to respond to the enemy attack was the transportation escort squad led by Wu Ziyu. That was the one and only battle he had ever fought.

“You are the commanding general of Bianbo Camp now that the main forces of the Bianbo Camp have been dispatched into battle up north. The Imperial Army currently wants to scout for news of the Shasan Camp, and I hope to have the assistance of the Bianbo Camp.” Xiao Chiye set down his bowl and continued, “It’s obvious that the Liaoying Tribe’s surprise attack this time has been planned for a long time. Cut off access to the Shasan Camp’s horse track, and the Bianbo Camp will lose its source of information in addition to its protective barrier. It’s indeed true that you can ensure the safety of the supplies by retreating this moment, but the site of battle – with Shayi Camp as the boundary line – will completely end up surrounded by the Biansha people on both sides. No matter how many people there are in Zhao Hui’s Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang, they will still have to split up and assign a team to bypass Dajing and head for the battle site in the northeast as long-distance reinforcement. By then, even if there are supplies left, all the frontline troops will have been wiped out.”

Xiao Jiming chose to use Bianbo Camp as a supply site because it had horse tracks directly connecting it to Shasan Camp and Northeast Provisions Bridle Path. It could swiftly provide supplies, as well as rapidly send in troops for reinforcement. Once this place was gone, Xiao Fangxu, who was still on the frontlines, would be cut off from his backup forces. There were no direct connecting horse tracks leading to the northeast from the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path. Zhao Hui would have to take a detour, which would still take four days at the earliest. In these four days, Xiao Fangxu would have to face the Hanshe Tribe to the east and the Liaoying Tribe to the south without reinforcements and supplies. The Biansha men could just deploy the tactics of taking turns to fight them, and it would have been sufficient to wear down Xiao Fangxu's elite forces, who were already exhausted from the long battle.

Wu Ziyu's fury had already been extinguished. He stood in silence for a moment before saying, "The Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang under Zhao Hui's command is one of the Libei Armored Cavalry's elite forces. The Liaoying Tribe that has launched a sudden assault here won't be able to stop him. He can abandon the faraway route in the northeast and head over to the battle site from this place."

"The Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang, as the cream of the crop in Libei, have exchanged the most blows with the Hanshe Tribe. Amu'er's understanding of them won't be inferior to your and my understanding of them. You know that Zhou Hui can forcibly break out of the encirclement and rush to the battlefield from here, so Amu'er should have also thought of it at the start of the surprise attack. Today was such a good opportunity for a sudden assault, and yet he only sent the Liaoying Tribe over. Guess what he's thinking?"

Wu Ziyu's expression gradually turned dark.

Of the thirty-six stratagems,<sup>1</sup> there was a stratagem called "letting the adversaries off in order to snare them". Wu Ziyu's squad encountered a surprise attack today at the Bianbo Camp, and in the midst of the crisis, his guard rushed on to the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path with the supplies. By the time Zhao Hui received this batch of crucial supplies, it would have already been too late. Reinforcement from afar was the most inadvisable and unwise. So he could only turn his attention back to the seized Bianbo Camp and make the corresponding adjustments to his strategy based on the number of soldiers from the Liaoying Tribe as provided by the guard. Once he came, it was very likely that Amu'er would have already withdrawn the Liaoying Tribe and replaced them with the Biansha's elite cavalry to lie in wait here. Zhao Hui would then be up against an all-out assault from Amu'er.

Win or lose, Zhou Hui would be held up at the Bianbo Camp, and Xiao Fangxu, over at the site of battle, would be wholly stranded without reinforcement. Amu'er simply understood the Libei Armored Cavalry all too well.

“Zhao Hui can’t come. We can’t win either. The army provisions on the battle site are rapidly depleting. His Lordship is still going to have to fight an arduous battle in a few days.” Wu Ziyu walked over to the shelf, pulled down the map, and spread it out forcefully on the ground. “Shasan Camp is close to Sha’er Camp. When Amu’er launches a sudden assault up north when the time comes, it’ll be His Lordship’s back that he’s attacking.”

Tantai Hu was done washing up and walked in barefooted with his robe hanging off him. When he saw them gathering around the map, he squatted at one side to look too.

“What are we to do?” Wu Ziyu lifted his eyes and looked at Xiao Chiye. “We’ll lose if we advance, and we’ll lose if we retreat. Any move we make will be within Amu’er expectation.”

Tantai Hu touched the scar – caused by a blade – on his face and said, “Not really. He doesn’t know about the Imperial Army. We are the troops he couldn’t have anticipated.” He pointed to Shasan Camp. “This place is close to Mount Luo in Zhongbo, where bandits abound. The Liaoying Tribe must have had the help of the bandits to be able to evade Libei Armored Cavalry’s eagle patrol and bring along heavy equipment – that is, the stone catapults – around to the south of Bianbo Camp to launch a sneak attack. I don’t know much about all these devious schemes, but there’s something the Vice... Young Master said that makes sense.”

Xiao Chiye raised his eyebrows slightly. “What did Lanzhou say?”

“Smart people don’t do redundant things.” Tantai Hu’s expression turned grave. “Why would Amu’er go to all the trouble of stopping Zhao Hui? If it has been going smoothly for him in his battle with His Lordship at the battle site, why would he need to split up his forces and send them here?”

Xiao Chiye bent over slightly and looked at the map. As he twirled his thumb ring, he said, “That’s right. Making such plans shows that Amu’er is having a hard time on the battlefield too. It’s already the seventh month now. If the war drags on beyond autumn without any progress, Amu’er will have to face the bitter coldness of winter. All the Biansha grain reserves this year have been delivered to the battlefield. The longer the war drags on, the more unfavorable it will be for Biansha.”

Wu Ziyu remembered something.

It just so happened Xiao Chiye spoke up. “After my eldest brother was injured, Amu’er changed the battle strategy he has been using these few years. When I was in Cizhou, I heard that the Biansha Cavalry had already fought their way to the Tudalong Banner. In the past, their cavalry always fled after a fight, yet it wasn't the case this time. Not only did they not run, they even advanced in full force. Amu'er has already lost his patience back in the desert. He's progressively encroaching upon Libei, trying to occupy our grasslands and camps. It can be seen just from this point alone that Bianbo Camp is vital. If we lose this place, Libei will have to take a big step back. Shasan Camp will soon fall, and our so-called line of defenses in the east will completely collapse. But if we can hold on to Bianbo Camp, we will be able to give Father some breathing space to recharge himself. With him at the site of battle, Amu'er will not be able to shift this boundary line even the slightest."

At this point, Xiao Chiye pointed out Bianbo Camp's location to Wu Ziyu.

"You just have to hang in there until the first snowfall of this year, and you'll deal a heavy blow to Amu'er. No matter what, we cannot lose Bianbo Camp. Mark a north-south boundary line here. We can only pull forward; we must never retreat again."

Wu Ziyu said, "Since Amu'er wants to trap Zhao Hui's Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang here, how can we stop him with the 25,000 men we have at present? Shasan Camp is a key strategic point. If Amu'er had the Hanshe Tribe stationed there to guard it, then all the more we will have no chance to launch a counterattack."

Xiao Chiye retracted his arm and thought for a moment. "The Biansha Cavalry is already used to the passive rhythm of the Libei Armored Cavalry. Amu'er dared to place such a bet because he was sure that the troops in Bianbo Camp would not dare to head east and launch a sudden assault arbitrarily. Their surprise attack troops were caught off-guard. Going by the distance, they will retreat to Shasan Camp only tomorrow morning. If we set off before dawn, we will arrive at the border of Shasan Camp just at the time when they are resting."

Wu Ziyu shifted the legs on which he was squatting and looked at the map without a word for a long time. It was only when his legs went numb that he hardened his heart and decided. "If you have made up your mind to go, we can let you use the remaining battle steeds in Bianbo Camp."

"The Imperial Army isn't a cavalry, and so has no need for battle steeds. Besides, the battle steeds of Libei are too heavy, and they make quite a commotion when they run. They aren't suitable for launching a surprise attack." Xiao Chiye swept his gaze around to look at Tantai Hu, Chen Yang, and Gu Jin. Finally, he said to Wu Ziyu, "Let the Imperial Army say hello to Amu'er this time."

Before dawn the next day, the Imperial Army set off.

Although Gu Jin was still injured, he still assumed the position of a scout. Tantai Hu followed Xiao Chiye, and only Chen Yang was left behind in the Bianbo Camp. Wu Ziyu did not understand, but seeing as Chen Yang had no complaints about it, he did not probe further.

Dew was still visible at this time. The Imperial Army had only been walking among the grassy fields for a short moment, and already their armors were wet with dew. They did not follow the horse track, but the path the Liaoying Tribe took when they retreated.

"This place isn't that far away from Zhongbo's borders. Master, why isn't there a relay station arranged here?" Tantai Hu looked south and said, "Cross this grassland and run for a day and a night, and you'll be at Mount Luo."

"The defenses of the Libei Armored Cavalry are all set up with the Biansha Cavalry in mind." Xiao Chiye looked for a moment with his blade at his side. "The bandits did not dare to go this way before. But times are different now."

"Whoever throws in their lots with the Biansha baldies are fucking bastards." Tantai Hu said hatefully as he plucked at the grass.

The speed at which the Imperial Army advanced was not slow, and it was already afternoon when they arrived within range of the Shasan Camp.

Gu Jin lay prone among the grass and remained still for a long time. Tantai Hu followed suit and waited for a moment, but he could see nothing of interest ahead, so he asked, "What do you see?"

Gu Jin reached out his hand to brush aside the grass and said, "Wu Ziyu is right. There is cavalry from the Hanshe Tribe in Shasan Camp; the horse dung is fresh. And they have set up patrols around the camp with far more vigilance than the Bianbo Camp."

Then Gu Jin turned over and squinted up at the sky.

"No whistles, and no saker falcons. The Liaoying Tribe that carried out a sneak attack on Bianbo Camp yesterday was indeed just a front."

“This isn’t a good place to fight a battle.” Tantai Hu said. “The camp site has an open view, and it’s all grassy fields. There will be nowhere for us to hide if we go any closer.”

“This is the Shasan Camp.” Gu Jin felt for the tobacco in his robe and stuffed it outright into his mouth to chew on. “Not only will we have no place to hide, but there are also iron spikes<sup>2</sup> on the outskirts of the camp, and defensive barriers<sup>3</sup> set up in the front and at the back. All four corners have a watchtower too.”

“How about going through the ditch?” Tantai Hu looked back and said softly to Xiao Chiye. “They still have to eat, drink, shit, and take a piss.”

Xiao Chiye did not answer, and Gu Jin looked a little embarrassed. He lowered his head and lay low among the grass, saying in an even softer voice, “There were indeed ditches that lead out in the past. Didn’t Master use this move to take down the Biansha soldiers during the battle at the eastern mountain ranges? The Hereditary Prince felt this to be a loophole and so sealed off the various camps’ ditches upon returning.”

Tantai Hu wordlessly shut his mouth and lay low too.

The advancing troops’ selection of a site to set up camp was very important, and the latrine was the most important of all. Generally, filthy ditches like this could not be close to the army provisions and the tents for dwelling. It had to be deep, or lead out. As a commonly used camp, a ditch that led out was naturally the most convenient for the Shasan Camp. But Xiao Chiye previously dug his way into the Biansha Camp with just a small number of cavalry and fought from within the Biansha Tribes until the Biansha Tribes were utterly routed. This left a deep impression on Xiao Jiming. In order to play it safe, the ditches of Libei’s military camps were reconstructed into deep ditches with wastes to be disposed of on a fixed schedule. Who would have known that such a change would instead go on to be a problem for Xiao Chiye a few years later?

How were they to fight now?

Xiao Chiye looked at the sky and said, “No worries... I have a way.”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 三十六计 a Chinese essay used to illustrate a series of stratagems used in politics and war.

- 2.
3. 铁蒺藜 Specifically caltrops, a four-spiked iron ball or four joined spikes laid upon the ground as a device to lame cavalry horses, etc.

- 4.
5. 拒马 Specifically chevaux-de-frise. I have no idea what this term is in English, and it seems weird to have them suddenly spouting French lmfao. It's a portable barrier of spikes, sword blades, etc, used to obstruct the passage of cavalry.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 133: NINE YEARS

At the third quarter of the hour of you,<sup>1</sup> the sun made its descent in the west.

At this time, Huhelu<sup>2</sup> was having his meal. He was the Biansha commanding general who launched a surprise attack at the southeastern camp of Libei. He was born in the Changjiu Tribe, and at almost forty years of age, he was in the prime of his life. After Amu'er took command of the four tribes, Huhelu not only became Amu'er's adopted son, but also a capable general under Amu'er's command. Coincidentally, he was also the one who led the squad Xiao Chiye launched a sudden assault on nine years ago at the eastern mountain ranges.

Huhelu was an irascible and narrow-minded man, but he was also quite resourceful and knew when to advance and retreat in a war. Guo Weili had previously suffered in his hands. Both men had hurled insults and spat spittle at the other on the battlefield more than once. The reason Amu'er had transferred Huhelu to the southeast was because the Tudalong Banner had already been captured, and also because Huhelu was a fearsome one when it came to military field operations. He once had Guo Weili surrounded in the swamp for a day and a night, routing Guo Weili's main forces and sending the morale of the Changzhu Camp plunging.

"The Hero wants me to treat the Libei military craftsmen well, but these people won't yield at all. It's a waste of food to keep feeding them." Huhelu stripped the mutton flesh clean from its bone and said to his vice general in the language of the desert. "I'm thinking of transporting away all the equipment and food here and slaughtering off this batch of military craftsmen. The Changjiu Tribe still has some remaining troops in the east that can temporarily hold the supplies for the Hero."

"Before you left, the Hero specifically instructed you not to hurt the military craftsmen." The vice-general, Bayin, was a man with a dark complexion. He was no longer young, but as he was a follower of Huhelu, he never had the chance to be promoted. He faced Huhelu and tried to persuade him, "The Hero has high regards for this batch of military craftsmen. Don't infuriate him."

Huhelu threw the dagger in his hands onto the tray and grabbed a handkerchief to wipe his hands. He got up and looked out through the gap of the tent flap that had been hung up.

“But they infuriate me.” Huhelu bent over slightly and looked askance at the bound military craftsmen detained outside in the open field. “You understand the language of Dazhou too. They called me a butcher of the eastern mountain ranges, and they even want to screw my mother.”

Bayin said, “They have been exposed to the sun for four days without food and water. Even the saker falcons of the Liaoying Tribe have to consume meat at this point in time in order to survive. It is said in Dazhou’s Art of War that if you want to make them submit, you should not only make them feel fear, but also gratitude. You have already made them afraid, so you can give them water and food next, untie them, and show them concern with a pleasant countenance. Then they will be grateful to you and to the Hero too.”

Huhelu stroked his short stubble and did as advised. But they overturned the water he sent them, and the curses continued until the hour of hai.<sup>3</sup> Huhelu could not sleep well. He decided to abandon the Dazhou way and use his own method, so he ordered his men to skin the military craftsmen who had made noises and had them hung up on the pole rack before the open space.

“Xiao Fangxu doesn’t have enough to eat at the site of battle.” Standing in the open space, Huhelu gestured at his belly with his hands and said in the language of Dazhou, “How can he fight a war on an empty stomach? You people are so fat. It’s a win-win situation if I have your meat delivered to him after air-drying them.”

Huhelu whipped all those people to teach them a lesson. Military craftsmen who could not fight war were worthless in his eyes. He even felt that it was a kind of a burden to be retaining these military craftsmen. Only by killing them as soon as possible would they be done with the matter once and for all. He hung up the head of the commanding general of the Shasan Camp on the watchtower and slaughtered all the captured battle steeds. If not for his fear of Amu’er, he would not have remained in the Shasan Camp to await orders. He had already defeated the Shasan Camp; he wanted to charge forward and be the first among the Twelve Tribes of Biansha to breach the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path.

Silence reigned supreme all around at the third quarter of the hour of chou.<sup>4</sup>

The Liaoying Tribe did not succeed in their sneak attack of the Bianbo Camp yesterday, which sent Huhelu flying into a rage. As punishment, the squad from the Liaoying Tribe was deprived of food and sleep; they even had to take the night watch. The soldier standing on the watchtower was already so exhausted and sleepy that his eyes glazed over.

The night sky was presently quiet and still, with only a gentle breeze blowing in the air. The soldier on the watchtower rubbed his eyes. Under the faint light of the torches, he saw the grass a distance away from the camp stir in the wind. The walls of the Shasan Camp were high and strong. Limited by the location of the watchtower, the soldier could not see the movements at the foot of the city walls. As the soldier yawned, he heard rustling.

He initially thought that it was the rustle of the grass amidst the wind, but this sound soon intensified into what sounded like tidal waves right in his ears.

The soldier's ears twitched, and he leaned over the railings of the watchtower to look out beyond the camp. It was too dark. All of a sudden, a row of arms reached out from the battlement, followed right after by a row of men flipping up in unison. Both sides looked at each other, equally stunned.

The soldier from the Liaoying Tribe reacted swiftly. He promptly let loose a long whistle even while they were trading wide-eyed stares. The sound resonated through Shasan Camp, and Huhelu, who had only just fallen asleep, immediately got up and put on his boots quickly.

Huhelu lifted the tent flap and was about to mount his horse when Bayin stopped him. "We still don't know the details of the enemy forces. I fear we will fall into an ambush if we rush out after them this rashly."

Huhelu hesitated for an instant, but in this instant, a rain of arrows burst forth from the top of the fortress walls. Enraged, he shoved Bayin aside and said, "Those from the Bianbo Camp are all wimps, and there is no elite squad from the Libei Armored Cavalry stationed here. They just want to launch a sneak attack under cover of the night and throw my deployment into disorder. Get on your horse. The battle steeds of Libei can't outrun us!"

“The Hero’s command isn’t here yet!” Bayin tugged at Huhelu’s reins and said quickly, “This is too strange! It’s true that Bianbo Camp has no more troops, but since they dare to take the initiative to launch an attack, then they must have come prepared! Huhelu, this is a trap! We should remain here at Shasan Camp. Don’t go out. They can’t breach this fortress!”

Huhelu spurred his horse on, causing Bayin to stagger a few steps. He pointed his horsewhip fiercely at Bayin. “You’ve gone silly from reading their books! To hell with your defense. We are the heroic fighters who pursue our enemies on the prairies. If we remain here, we will be defeated!”

There were merely five hundred men in the squad that had scaled the walls, but they occupied the great bows on the battlements, thereby preventing the Biansha soldiers who were responding to the attack from climbing up. The sharp-eyed Huhelu had already seen the ropes on the battlements and the unfamiliar soldiers, who were still continuously climbing into the fort one after another.

“That’s not the Libei Armored Cavalry.” Bayin flipped atop his horse behind Huhelu and chased after him. “They’re not the Libei Armored Cavalry!”

But Huhelu did not care who the other party was. He had fought Guo Weili, one of Libei Armored Cavalry’s elite forces, at the boundary line of the Tudalong Banner, and then he had moved southeast and defeated the Shasan Camp. He was a mighty general blessed by the gods of Gedale. He was on track to become an invincible legend on the battlefield. He had the power to fight, even if he were to come face-to-face with Zhao Hui’s main forces.

The heavy, overhanging gate of the camp opened with a loud rumble. Huhelu led his elite troops out on their horses, but what met Huhelu was not the gentle night breeze, but flames ignited by a lit arrow.

The horse track outside the camp had been padded with hay. The fire burned, but did not blaze. Billows of thick smoke that followed right after completely blocked off the horse track Huhelu was advancing on. Huhelu choked, unable to urge on his horse. The thick smoke threw the battle formation of the Biansha Cavalry into disarray. There was no way to see the path ahead in the dark of the night. Worried that there was an ambush ahead, Huhelu turned his horse and led his cavalry around the track towards the grassy fields.

Within a few moments of riding, the hooves of their horses suddenly sank. The horses of the Gouma Tribe were fast. The cavalry in front stumbled and tumbled, and the cavalry at the back, unable to rein in their horses in time, crashed into those before them and went down together with them.

Huhelu rolled into the grass and saw the newly dug pits in the ground along with the iron spikes. He was familiar with these spikes—these were all traps the Shasan Camp initially put up around the camp, but he never expected someone to move them right under his feet without so much a noise.

“Retreat!” Bayin followed in pursuit behind them. “It’s an ambush!”

Huhelu climbed to his feet and suddenly heard a loud bellow. Tantai Hu, who had been lying in ambush among the grass for many hours, drew his blade and charged. More than a thousand Imperial Army men crawled out from the billowing grass and engaged the Biansha Cavalry, who had fallen to the ground, in a battle.

Tantai Hu had been wanting to fight with the Biansha Cavalry all his life. He did not recognize Huhelu, but he recognized these horses. The tragic massacre of the cities after the defeat of Zhongbo remained fresh and vivid in his mind as blade collided against blade. Tantai Hu, as his name implied, bellowed and moved swiftly like a ferocious tiger, his strike so powerful as he faced up against Huhelu that Huhelu was repeatedly forced back into a retreat.

The Biansha Cavalry was too used to fighting against the Libei Armored Cavalry, and the Imperial Army’s advantages over them soon became apparent. The Imperial Army completely departed from the ways of the Libei Armored Cavalry, wielding their blades with even more deviousness than anyone else among these pitch-dark clusters of grass. Huhelu’s elite troops, having lost their horses and faced with even shorter blades than the ones the Libei Armored Cavalry used, were unable to meet the attacks as they usually would. Those terrifying heaviness of Libei was gone. On the ground, the Imperial Army’s blades moved just as fast as the Biansha Cavalry’s machetes.

But Huhelu soon realized that this squad was pretty much small in numbers; they could not even encircle around him. Although Tantai Hu was fearsome in his strikes, he was merely fueled by righteous ardor. These people had no reinforcements to speak of at all in these vast plains. Their so-called ambush was merely those horse traps they had dug.

Rage overcame Huhelu. He slashed down a man and pressed forward towards Tantai Hu, bellowing, "So it's just a few rats."

Tantai Hu was injured. He kicked Huhelu away, wiped away the blood and sweat, and continued to attack for all he's worth. The more Tantai Hu fought, the more Huhelu was convinced that the other side had no reinforcements; otherwise, the reinforcements would have long come to help after all this time.

Both sides fought viciously for nearly an hour. Eventually, Tantai Hu withdrew in disarray. They had no horses and could only beat a hasty retreat among the grass.

Huhelu's bloodlust was already at an all-time high by this time, so how would he be willing to let Tantai Hu go? He immediately regrouped the battle steeds and led his men in pursuit of the latter. He brandished his machete, his curses sounding vague in the night wind. This provocation by the Imperial Army had enraged him so much that he was determined to kill them and sacrifice them to his blade.

Holding on to his injured arm, Tantai Hu dashed wildly without even looking back. He was panting heavily, and he nearly tripped on several occasions. Huhelu was close on his heels behind him. Tantai Hu could not run faster than the horses, and it did not take long for the Biansha Cavalry to catch up right behind him.

A sweat-drenched Tantai Hu covered his nearly sliced buttocks and shouted at the open fields before him, "Fuck your ancestors!"

Battle drums suddenly sounded on the horizon, the sound of it so thunderous and deafening that it made all their ears ache. Sensing something amiss from the change in situation, Huhelu promptly reined in his horse and surveyed his surroundings with his cavalry. Dense clusters of men stood up among the grass all around, wearing grass crowns as they remained concealed under cover of darkness. For a moment, Huhelu could not get a clear count of them.

Huhelu's horse restlessly stomped its hooves. He looked ahead as the torches were lit in successive order, stretching like a long dragon from where Tantai Hu had run into the far distance. The concentrated sound of drumming sent the alarm bells in Huhelu's mind ringing as he sensed imminent danger. He immediately concluded that he had played into the other party's hands—the main forces of Libei were here, and their numbers far surpassed the Biansha Cavalry's.

"Retreat." Huhelu commanded sharply as he yanked his horse into turning around. "Retreat!"

Huhelu's horse broke into a run. He heard the sound of running horses flanking him. Lang Tao Xue Jin took the lead and charged to the head of the crowd. To Huhelu's surprise, it caught up with him.

Huhelu turned his head aside and promptly felt terror-stricken. He almost thought it was Xiao Fangxu, but Xiao Chiye was even taller than Xiao Fangxu. As they galloped in the dimness of the night, Huhelu got a clear look of the pair of eyes that was completely different from Xiao Fangxu's—a pair of eyes brimming with greed so insatiable that it shook him to the core.

Huhelu felt a chill on his nape. He suddenly had the impression that there was no running away under that gaze. Sharp fangs were pressing in, close at hand. To break free of this oppressive pressure, he lashed out at his horse hard. Huhelu remembered it now. Nine years ago, at the eastern mountain ranges, this wolf pup had bitten off a chunk of his meat. His troops, with exponentially more men, had suffered a crushing defeat at the hands of a youth covered in filth.

The horse galloped wildly in pain, breaking up the incohesive formation of the cavalry.

Huhelu could already see the Shasan Camp. He wanted to call out to Bayin for reinforcement, but he had only just opened his mouth when the sky spun before him as his head rolled off into the grass.

Xiao Chiye had already charged his way into the Biansha Cavalry's formation. Langli Blade flung off droplets of blood as he slashed. Spatters of the warm, spurting blood stained his cheeks. At the same time he reined his horse in, he wiped the blood off with the thumb that had the thumb ring on.

Huhelu's horse was still galloping when the headless body jolting on its back slid off and tumbled to the ground before the camp, a pool of blood spreading beneath it.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 酉时 5-7 pm, based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times.
2. As usual, using pinyin for foreign names in this novel for the time being due to unfamiliarity with the language involved and to avoid mistranslations with the actual names in its original language. (Basically, Lianyin sucks at names). If we do get official subtitles someday, I will replace them in the translation (the same goes for titles). Until then, please bear with me. _(:3 丿 ∠)_
3. 酉时 9-11 pm, based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times.
4. 丑时 1-3 am, based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 134 : MENGZHENG

Huhelu was known among the Changjiu Tribe as the person most likely to become the Hero. Although he was a cruel and savage man by nature, he was pretty skilled in fighting battles. His squad comprised the best from the various Biansha Tribes, and these cavalymen only had fear and no reverence for Huhelu, but it was precisely because of this fear that the shock hit them like a ton of bricks.

In just a few blinks of an eye, Huhelu was cut down, and going down along with him was the Biansha Cavalry's morale. Huhelu had hastily concluded that there were countless Libei reinforcements behind them, and this consequently snuffed out the determination of the now general-less Biansha Cavalry to fight on. They scattered in all directions, with Xiao Chiye as the center.

Countless torches formed into a long line that pressed in towards them from behind, like a procession of a million valiant soldiers.

Within the Shasan Camp, Gu Jin was also launching a surprise attack. Bayin was trapped both on the inside and outside. Seeing how composed Xiao Chiye was, Bayin was also of the impression that Xiao Chiye was leading the main forces of Libei. The crux was that when Bayin cast a glance over, he could see the obscure dark shadows behind those torches that seemed to stretch all the way into the horizon.

Bayin did not want to repeat the same mistake. Holding his horse by the reins, he took a few steps back and gave the command to abandon camp and flee. The Biansha Cavalry beat a retreat so hastily that they did not even collect Huhelu's corpse before they faded into the night. Xiao Chiye stopped where he was. Tantai Hu led his men and put on a show, shouting and baying for blood as he chased after them for a few li. Only when Bayin dared not look back did he swiftly withdraw and returned to Shasan Camp.

Even by the time Bayin looked back, he could still see those torches extending into the distance.

If Bayin had been willing to look a little more closely, or perhaps if he had been able to calm down, then he would have realized that tonight's sudden assault was riddled with loopholes. Huhelu's ability was a cut above the others, but as he had said himself, he was the commanding general in military field operations. Getting him to guard the camp and go on the defensive was to put the cart before the horse. If he had heeded Bayin's advice and remained in Shasan Camp instead of heading out, he could have swiftly dealt with the small batch of Imperial Army Gu Jin had led in, and he would have then gained the upper hand. The Shasan Camp was an impenetrable fortress with its gates shut. Xiao Chiye had no supplies, and that meant he had no military weapons to launch an assault on the fortress, so there was no way he could forcefully storm his way in. But Huhelu had gotten complacent with his repeated victories after the start of spring this year and could not hold his own against trickery and deception. He thought it was a sudden raid by the Bianbo Camp when he saw Gu Jin scaling the walls, and he thought it was the Libei Armored Cavalry's reinforcements when he saw all those uncountable torches. When he eventually saw Xiao Chiye, he had already been thrown into turmoil, and that was how he was defeated without ever fighting a battle.

Xiao Chiye lifted Huhelu's head and scrutinized that face with the stubbly beard for a moment, but he could not remember who this man was. He handed the head to Tantai Hu, who refused to take it, so he passed it over to Gu Jin and said, "Clean up all the bodies in the camp. Bury our brothers from Libei nearby, and bury the soldiers from Biansha far away. The weather is hot, so the corpses can't be kept around for long. Let's not start an epidemic."

Gu Jin took the head and recognized this to be Huhelu. He never expected Xiao Chiye to hack Huhelu dead at their very first encounter. Guo Weili had fought with this man for half of his lifetime, but in the end, the man was gone in just one night.

Xiao Chiye removed Langli Blade and asked, "Why? You recognize him?"

Gu Jin replied, "This man is called Huhelu. Master, he's the one who beat back Guo Weili in the north and occupied the Tudalong Banner."

Xiao Chiye had been running for two nights in a row. He still had other matters to attend to at present, so he merely nodded his head in acknowledgment before sending Gu Jin away on his task. He called out to Tantai Hu and tossed the blade over for him to hold as they both headed inside together.

"This camp sure is big." Tantai Hu surveyed the surroundings and marveled, "The construction of these walls can almost rival those of a decent city. There are even large bows on the battlements and trap pits at the foot, which would allow battles to be fought from close quarters and afar.”

“My big brother spent a lot of money on this place.” Xiao Chiye looked at the walls and said, “Memorize the layout on that wall. If there’s anything you don’t understand, you can keep it in mind to ask Chen Yang or Gu Jin later. Tomorrow, I’ll get the military craftsmen to pass the map of the camp layout to you as well. Memorize it too until you know it by heart.”

Tantai Hu hurriedly accepted his orders. Any discerning person could tell from this that Xiao Chiye was planning to entrust Tantai Hu with heavy responsibilities. From Qudu to the present times, Xiao Chiye had brought Tantai Hu along with him every battle. Despite being barely literate, Tantai Hu still made an effort to learn how to read from Chen Yang, just so he would not let Xiao Chiye down for Xiao Chiye’s recognition and appreciation of his worth and abilities.

It was to see the military craftsmen that Xiao Chiye had been in a hurry to enter. He had laid it all out clearly for Wu Ziyu, but there was one thing he did not mention—he had no plans to return to the Shasan Camp after he had reclaimed it. This place had the best of both offense and defense, and it was also a protective shield for the Bianbo Camp. It could provide Xiao Fangxu with support from the north, and access the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path from the east. It was simply too suitable a location for him.

Whoever wanted to ask him for it would have to come and negotiate with him in person.

By the time Xiao Chiye managed to lie down, it was almost dawn. He slept in the tent for several hours. Chen Yang hurried over from the Bianbo Camp while he was sleeping and did not disturb him. Xiao Chiye only woke up when it was near dusk. As he stood outside the tent with his head lowered to wash up, he heard Meng returning.

Xiao Chiye secured his arm guard and blew a whistle at Meng. Meng hovered in the air for a while before landing on Xiao Chiye’s arm. Xiao Chiye took out the prepared strips of meat from the leather bag and fed them to Meng. As Meng ate, he looked at the large walnut on Meng’s leg.

“His Lordship is well.” Chen Yang smiled. “He’s letting you know he’s safe and sound.”

But Xiao Chiye did not smile. He was, in fact, quite unhappy. He removed the walnut and grasped it in his hand for a moment before tossing it to Chen Yang. “By specifically releasing Meng back, Father is conveying his military orders. Open it up and read it to me. This old man is up to no good.”

Chen Yang opened the walnut and smoothed out the paper.

Xiao Fangxu’s handwriting was bold and wild. He said he had long known that Amu’er would send men around to the southeast camp, but he made no mention of why there had been no measures taken in advance. He also asked if Meng had secretly attacked Yu, and that Meng was too combative, just like Xiao Chiye. Finally, he told Xiao Chiye not to act recklessly and to remain where he was and await his orders...

Xiao Chiye extended a finger and turned the letter over. He skimmed through a few paragraphs in front and pointed to the few brief and concise sentences at the back.

Chen Yang coughed and read out in a steady voice, “No one knows a son better than his father. By the time this letter arrives, it’d have been too late. I know you will definitely go for Shasan Camp. In that case, you can handle the escort and transportation on behalf of Wu Ziyu... as the general in charge of military supplies.”

Dead silence all around.

Tantai Hu could not understand Xiao Fangxu. Even if the Prince of Libei would not praise Xiao Chiye, he still ought to have deployed Xiao Chiye over to the site of battle. Letting Xiao Chiye render meritorious service as soon as possible was the best commendation and recognition he could give. Under the present situation in Libei, making Xiao Chiye a logistical general behind-the-scenes was akin to suppressing back the abilities he had displayed in Qudu. Was His Lordship insane? Or, would he not hesitate to hide Xiao Chiye away for another nine years just to appease those in the Hereditary Prince’s camp?

Xiao Chiye pursed his lips into a tight, thin line and endured it for a while. Without saying a word, he turned his head to look once again at the setting sun descending in the west.

A few days later, the company of traveling merchants set out from Cizhou and made their way down south along the public road to Chazhou. Kong Ling played the role of the steward, while the Imperial Bodyguards disguised themselves as the attendants and servants of a wealthy family. Shen Zechuan, using illness as a pretext, remained within the horse carriage and rarely showed himself in public.

Kong Ling brought along the travel permit issued by Cizhou, which saved them from a lot of trouble on the way. Nowadays, those who were able to get the proper official documents could not be underestimated. What's more, with the large number of guards they had, the common bandits did not dare to rob them recklessly, for fear of offending someone powerful.

The beggars they came across on the way multiplied after they left Cizhou's territory. Even children as young as eight or nine years old were forced to swindle as a means of livelihood. They made all kinds of wild, exaggerated claims – even touching on the supernatural – all in an attempt to cajole the passing merchants into spending money for peace of mind and a safe passage.

It was still fine the first few days, but it rained the next few days. With the weather abruptly turning cold, Shen Zechuan fell ill. Swindlers and charlatans abounded everywhere they passed by, with unscrupulous shops lining the streets one after another. Even if Kong Ling dared to call a physician over to take a look, Qiao Tianya would not dare to let the other party get close to Shen Zechuan. The good thing was that his illness was not serious. His fever persisted for only two days before it slowly receded.

Shen Zechuan was now spending more and more time bent over at his desk, so it was inevitable for him to neglect his martial arts training. After he had sent Qi Huilian off on the Qi Huilian's final journey, he would often find his body easily overwhelmed, and he was prone to falling ill as the seasons changed. In fact, there had been warning signs of this as early as the epidemic case back in Qudu, where he had simply fallen ill without warning.

The carriage rolled over the mud and arrived in Chazhou in the rain.

When Luo Mu, the prefectural prefect of Chazhou, received Kong Ling's visitation card,<sup>1</sup> he was in his concubine's room. He turned it back and forth to look it over repeatedly, as though he was going to perform some magic tricks and conjure flowers out of it. Still, he remained seated and refused to move his butt.

His fourteenth concubine was new; they had only just held the banquet a few days back. As his recent favorite, it was inevitable for her to be spoiled and pampered. The concubine, who could read a few words, took the card from Luo Mu's hands and asked, "Who is this Kong Ling?"

Luo Mu held her on his lap and answered, “Kong Ling? A poor scholar. In his early years, he was a subordinate of Tantai Long, the commander of the Dunzhou’s garrison troops, but after Tantai Long’s death, he went to work for Zhou Gui.”

The concubine giggled as Luo Mu’s beard nuzzled against her. As if afraid of being contaminated by the aura of poverty, she shook the visitation card with her little finger sticking up and asked, “Then how did he come to know Master?”

Luo Mu replied self-mockingly, “We were fellow students.”

“Oh my, then you’ll have to play the good host to him.” This concubine was always giving Luo Mu’s principal wife the attitude. Her elder brother was Cai Yu, one of the bandits in Chazhou whom Luo Mu relied on for backing. She thus harbored the intention to make Luo Mu divorce his principal wife. Plotting to use these outsiders’ visit as a pretext to get the rights to host a banquet herself, she frivolously swatted at Luo Mu with the card and said, “I’ll host a banquet for you, and you can invite my elder brother over too to put them in their place. I heard that a batch of the Libei’s military grains this year came from Cizhou. These people have money.”

Luo Mu did not answer. He merely said, “Why waste all that money? We can just dismiss him with a few steamed buns. He’s most likely here to borrow money. I’m not going to meet him.”

The concubine would not budge and threw a little hissy fit like a spoiled child before Luo Mu. The visitation card slid to the ground.

Luo Mu’s eyes followed the visitation card as it fell. He loosely grasped the concubine’s arm and said, “It’s not too late to do so when we meet him again in Cizhou. Look, the card has fallen, pick it up...”

Seeing as persuasion did not work on him, she rose to her feet and threw a tantrum. Her embroidered shoe stepped upon the visitation card, and she stomped on it lightly a couple of times. “I have yet to entertain any guests on Master’s behalf ever since I married into the family. We are both formally wedded to you, but why am I lower in rank than her? I’m—”

Before she could finish her words, she saw Luo Mu’s expression turn frosty. He bellowed, “Move away!”

Concubine Cai had been doted on and spoiled ever since her marriage to Luo Mu; she had never been shouted at or scolded before by him. This thus came as a shock to her, and she took a few stunned steps back.

Luo Mu bent over to pick up the visitation card. There was a shoe print on it, and he could not wipe it away. He kept away the visitation card with a glum face, then took the concubine's hand and said with a forced smile, "Don't bother yourself with the affairs in the front hall. I'll have a detailed chat with Elder Brother myself. I won't be staying today, but I'll come and see you again later."

Without even waiting for his concubine to get over her shock, he lifted the curtain and left.

It was still raining outside. The attendant opened up the umbrella, and Luo Mu walked under it. "Is he still there? Invite him to the front hall. I'll go see him now."

When Luo Mu arrived at the front hall, Kong Ling had already been waiting for a while. On seeing Luo Mu heading up the steps, he rose to meet him. Both men smiled the moment they saw each other. Luo Mu gestured for Kong Ling to take a seat. They exchanged pleasantries for a moment before getting down to business.

"It's also at His Excellency's direction that I've made a trip here to see you." Kong Ling drank the tea and said, "Cizhou has gradually shown improvements these few years. The fields are recovering well, and there is an abundance of grains. However, the population in Cizhou has been on a steep decline, and we can't consume that many grains. Store the remaining grains for a year, and they will either turn moldy or end up being gnawed on by mice."

Luo Mu listened attentively as Kong Ling spoke and noted how healthy his complexion looked; he did not have that much white hair either.

Kong Ling met Luo Mu's gaze and gave him another smile. "So, we were thinking. The prefecture of Chazhou is still buying grains from Hezhou and Juexi these years at a high price. You're really getting short-changed. So why not work out a collaboration between our prefectures? Both prefectures are close to each other, which greatly facilitates the transportation of goods. We are willing to offer you a lower price than Juexi for the grains. How about it?"

Luo Mu realized there were wrinkles around Kong Ling's eyes when he smiled. Looking as though he had just awakened from a dream, he averted his gaze and thought for a moment before saying, "I more or less get what you mean. It's a good thing, but it can't be done."

Seeing as Kong Ling still had more to say, he raised a hand to stop him.

“Chazhou is not Cizhou. It’s indeed bold and resolute of Zhou Gui to just go ahead and do it, but just how much of this courage is built upon his father-in-law? In his early years, His Excellency Liu resolved to eradicate the bandits in Cizhou, and that’s why Cizhou is free of bandits today. But this is not the case for Chazhou.”

Kong Ling had expected this. He fell silent for a moment, then said, “Mengzheng, is there not a chance at all?”

On hearing Kong Ling call him by his courtesy name, Luo Mu hastily turned his head away.

Kong Ling thought Luo Mu was in a difficult position, so he said, “Cizhou has now rebuilt its garrison troops. As long as this deal can be sealed, we are willing to contribute to the important task of suppressing bandits in Chazhou in the future. Mengzheng, the world is in turmoil at present, and all kinds of heroes will no doubt rise from among the people. As long as you live among them, you cannot avoid the strife. You and I have a friendship that goes way back from being fellow students under the same teacher. Why not use this opportunity to free yourself from the control of the bandits?”

“You and Zhou Gui are in Cizhou, so you aren’t aware of my difficulties.” Luo Mu turned back and continued, “If the bandits in Chazhou were that easy to dispose off, then why didn’t you come to me instead of going to seek refuge with Zhou Gui?”

Kong Ling wanted to explain, but Luo Mu had already risen to his feet. “The current grains are all purchased at high prices from Juexi and Hezhou. Various bandit chiefs have a hand in this, and it is from this profit that they live off on. You now want me to buy grains from Cizhou instead, which means you’re cutting off their source of income. There is no negotiating this deal at all. If news of this were to get out, you and I would be in danger. I think you’d best go back.”

Luo Mu got his attendant to see the guest out. He strode a few steps out of the threshold and looked back.

They had not met for many years. Strangely enough, no matter how old Kong Ling looked now, the way he looked as a student still remained firmly etched in Luo Mu’s mind. The rain spattering under the eaves dampened Luo Mu's shoulders, and he remained standing in this position for a long time.

Kong Ling had missed plenty in his life, just like this moment, where he could not see Luo Mu's gaze clearly against the backdrop of light. He merely said, "I'm determined to succeed on this trip. If talks fall through today, I'll return tomorrow. Mengzheng, I'm confident that it will work out, as long as you're willing to discuss it with us."

Luo Mu was dumbstruck for a moment. "Who else did you bring with you? You used official paperwork from Cizhou when you entered the city, and you delivered your visitation card to meet me. You've already exposed your whereabouts. I'd advise you not to act rashly. You should return to Cizhou after a few more days."

Without waiting for Kong Ling to answer, he lifted his robe and went down the steps.

A little later, Shen Zechuan ate his medicine and listened as Qiao Tianya reported both men's conversation word-for-word. Unable to help it, he turned back and looked at Qiao Tianya.

Qiao Tianya nodded in understanding and said, "They have been fellow students for many years; their friendship is naturally unlike others. In Master's view, how should we negotiate this deal? Luo Mu is an interesting character. Although it's a mess in Chazhou, his position as the prefect of Chazhou remains firm and unshakeable."

"We'll negotiate however we ought to." Shen Zechuan's nose was a little congested, and his speech sounded a little muffled. "Since he's still standing, it means he has a mind to remain so. Everything he has said today is all grandiose words; they aren't necessarily from the bottom of his heart. Think of a way to avoid scrutiny. I want to meet him."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Eggy<3

Footnotes

1. 名帖 (also 拜帖), a visitation card (or name card) written on paper or wood used by officials, nobles or distinguished people to notify the other party of their visit. It would usually indicate his name, position, and so on. It's like a name card in the modern world.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 135 : EARRING

Translated with: Jia<3

The rain stopped the next day, but the sky was still overcast.

Concubine Cai, who had been rebuked yesterday, pleaded illness early in the morning. Luo Mu did not sleep well during the night either. After his breakfast, his servant came to report that Cai Yu had sent him an invitation to a gathering.

Luo Mu took the invitation, knowing full well Cai Yu's purpose for the invitation today. He wiped his hands. Without even changing his robe, he straight out said, "Prepare the sedan. I'll go over now. Let's not keep Elder Brother waiting for too long."

Cai Yu was a known bandit in the Prefecture of Chazhou. Yan Heru of Hezhou addressed him as pa.<sup>1</sup> Cai Yu was usually generous with his money, and he liked to assist the various bandits financially, so he was well-reputed among them as a loyal and righteous man who was always ready to offer help. However, he did not get along with Lei Changming from Mount Luo. No one knew the reason why. All they knew was that before Lei Changming's death, both men would pay no heed to the other during the bandits' gathering-cum-feasts.

When Luo Mu arrived at the Cai's residence, Cai Yu had already treated them to a round of drinks and food. Cai Yu's residence was even more luxuriously built than Luo Mu's, with more than a thousand servants inside. However, he was not a man who was particular about unnecessary and convoluted formalities; after all, most of his visitors were bandits and robbers. As such, the feasts he held were literally wine-and-meat feasts that boasted of all kinds of roast meats and strong wines.

The moment Cai Yu saw Luo Mu, he leaned back and beckoned to him with a smile, "Mengzheng, you're late. As punishment, you have to drink three cups of wine. Take a seat, quickly."

Luo Mu had always been servile and docile before Cai Yu, so he complied and took his seat. Even when he saw the weirdly-dressed strangers at the table, he did not probe. Cai Yu waited for Luo Mu to finish his drink before he said, "I heard my younger sister was bothering you yesterday."

Looking panicked, Luo Mu started, "Elder Brother—"

"You were right to tell her off!" Cai Yu pressed down on Luo Mu's arm and said with a smile, "You are her husband, and the man is in charge of the front hall. There are indeed many matters that aren't up to her to dictate as she wishes. She's used to being willful and spoiled at home, and even when she has gotten married, she has no respect for her elders. In the future, just tell her off where it is needed. There's no need to give me face. She's been so pampered that she's getting more and more out of hand."

Cai Yu knew everything that happened in Luo Mu's inner chambers like the back of his hand. He did not apply that much pressure on the hand that was pressing down on Luo Mu, but it was precisely because of this that it seemed to take him no effort at all. If he told Luo Mu to head left, then Luo Mu would not dare to go right. Luo Mu was an official who passed the rounds of imperial examinations at the various levels to make his way to Qudu the proper way, where he then underwent official inspections to be assigned this post outside the capital. But so what? In Chazhou, Luo Mu was just a yes-man. As they said, the sky is high, and the emperor is far—the local cities in remote places were beyond the reach of the authorities in the central administration. Banditry in Zhongbo was already a serious issue during the reign of Yongyi. Before the defeat of Zhongbo's troops, they did not give two hoots about the Prince of Jianxing, Shen Wei, and after the defeat of the Zhongbo's troops, they gave even less of a damn about Qudu.

Fine sweat oozed from Luo Mu's forehead.

Satisfied on noticing this, Cai Yu retracted his hand and said with a laugh, "Come to think of it, it's really unheard of. Half a month ago, I heard that there was going to be a change of emperor. That Imperial Bodyguards Commander, Han Cheng, was so anxious that he ran back to his hometown just to find a child to be the imperial heir. But who knew, Secretariat Elder Hai did not agree and banged his head in the hall to his death. Blood and brain matter splattered all over Han Cheng, scaring Han Cheng so much that he peed in his pants right there and then."

All of them burst out laughing in unison. News that had spread by word of mouth had long rendered Han Cheng as a boorish, hunchback scum that bowed to powers that be.

After Cai Yu was done laughing, he let out a long sigh and said, “But even though we are outlaws dealing in illegal trades, we still have to speak of loyalty and benevolence. Respect to the Secretariat Elder for his act! As the saying goes, men who wield brushes die in remonstrations, while men who wield swords die in battles. Dazhou has been through three changes of reign. Emperors have died one after another, and yet upright and unyielding ministers like this are few and far between.”

Luo Mu listened to him, but did not interrupt, nor did he look up. He seemed intent on eating, even if he only dared to pick up the food before him with his chopsticks. Although he looked dignified in appearance, he gave off the impression of someone weak and cowering.

Cai Yu did not look at Luo Mu again. He was speaking with gusto now. “But perhaps the Secretariat Elder himself did not expect the throne to now go to a woman after the Han clan’s child failed to sit on it. There has never been such an incident ever since the founding of Dazhou. Isn’t this a violation of the law of nature<sup>2</sup> and the reversal of gender roles?<sup>3</sup> This is an omen for the collapse of the Dazhou empire! I’d rather listen to the words of an ignorant child than listen to the orders of a woman. What would it look like for a man of indomitable spirit to pay obeisance to a woman?! Qidong has a Qi Zhuyin. I think she just happened to be in the right place at the right time when the Empress Dowager was in power. Otherwise, how could she have gotten the chance to be the Commander-in-chief? If Qudu were to have a female emperor next... gosh, what a mess!”

A chorus of agreement rose all around. One man with a beard smacked the table and said, “Elder Cai is right. That’s what it is. What is it with the female emperor? The first few emperors are indeed awful, but having a man as the head of administration is the law of nature, as Laozi<sup>4</sup> said. I’m not willing to concede either. Imagine if the entire court of civil and military officials were to kneel and pay obeisance to her as monarch and subjects, they would be an entire lair of cowardly good-for-nothings. No wonder we keep getting attacked by the Twelve Tribes of Biansha all these years.”

“A daughter she is, yes? Getting married and keeping domestic peace are her duties. No harm done if they dote on her and raise her into a pampered, delicate lady. But it’s a disaster to let them go out and fight battles or lead the government.” Having said that, Cai Yu sighed with emotion. “I heard the students in Qudu are all rather willing. I think they’ve all gone dumb and silly from studying! They can't even tell good from bad."

Their conversations went from the political affairs in Qudu to the military affairs in Qidong, then from the military affairs in Qidong to the war in Libei. Finally, the topic turned to Lei Changming.

The bearded man said, "Lei Changming was another one who got a lucky break to have encountered Young Master Yan when the young master was in distress. He gave him a hand, and that was how he could rise in the world. But he was a person who couldn't last long. He was overbearing as heck, and even wanted to establish a regular army in Mount Luo. But look what happened? He encountered the Imperial Army and immediately met his end, no?"

Cai Yu snorted coldly.

The person next to him said, "Elder Cai and Lei Changming could be said to be the Twin Heroes of Zhongbo, but how is Lei Changming deserving of the name? He doesn't even come close to our Elder Cai!"

Cai Yu was not moved by this flattery. He spread his arms open and sank comfortably into the chair. "Do you know why I turn my nose up at Lei Changming? I find him filthy." He emphasized the last word, just as the maidservant came over with his smoking pipe. He took two puffs and continued, "Lei Changming worked as an armed escort in his early years. All of you know this. But why did he stop later? The reason he gave the others was that he had married his younger sister off to the Zhu clan in Duanzhou. He wanted to live in comfort, and that was why he didn't want to carry on doing such work anymore. But that was not true. Well, he had an addiction."

At some point, Luo Mu had set aside his chopsticks.

As Cai Yu blew out puffs of smoke, he said, "When I first joined this trade and was about to complete my training, my shifu said that one must be benevolent and righteous even if one were to be a bandit or a robber. There are some things you can't touch and can't do. Those are depraved acts that will bring you bad karma. There have been plenty of traveling merchants with families coming and going in Chazhou all these years, but I'd never laid my hands on the widows and orphans when I came across them. However, it was a different story for Lei Changming. He'd also escort family members when he was escorting goods in the past. There was one time he was doing a job in Dengzhou, and the man who was the head of household died midway through the journey, leaving behind his hapless widow and orphan who couldn't even afford to pay the fees for the escort and transportation service. When they arrived at Dengzhou, the original in-laws on the husband's side only wanted their grandson, but not the daughter-in-law. The woman was unwilling to part with her child, and so, forced into the corner, she thought of attempting suicide. Lei Changming brought both mother and son back home, saying he was going to provide for them."

"At that time, I was still a robber in Chazhou, and I thought well of Lei Changming when I heard of this incident. I felt he was different from people like me; he was the chivalrous hero that shifu spoke of. I held him in esteem, and I'd take notice of him when I was out there working. I wanted to find an opportunity to become sworn brothers with him. But when I went to Dengzhou later, I heard that he had quit. It was only when I found the place that I learned that both the woman and child had died. How did they die? He brutalized them after drinking, laying his hands on that five or six-years-old child. The woman resisted, and he beat her to death. The child, having been tormented beyond recognition, lived for only a few days before he died too."

Cai Yu waved away the smoke and frowned as he had the maidservant take the pipe away.

"He went to Duanzhou, and this indulgence of his never changed. This man valued his own reputation, and he never dared to do it openly. Young Master Yan was still very young when Lei Changming saved him. I could be said to be friends with Old Master Yan at that time, and the Yan clan had helped me before. So even though I had yet to see the young master then, I treated him as my own precious son. On hearing of this incident, I immediately gave chase for four days and nights in a row before I reached Mount Luo and got him back. At that time, the young master was wearing a bright, jade earring. He was fair and lovely, and very smart too. As soon as he saw me, he called me pa. Such a lovable child. Seeing as the young master was unharmed, I didn't bother to settle scores with Lei Changming."

Each time Lei Changming met Cai Yu again later, he would self-consciously feel small. Cai Yu held him in contempt, and he did not approach Cai Yu either. To each his own.

“The young master is a good child. He was very grateful to Lei Changming for saving him, so he repeatedly extended a helping hand to the bandits in Mount Luo.” Cai Yu had initially meant to ask Luo Mu about Kong Ling today, but he got carried away talking about these past events. By the time he’d remembered, Luo Mu had already left.

Luo Mu got into the sedan chair, but he had not gone far before he changed course and headed for the cosmetic shop with the intent to buy some rouge powders that were all the rage in Qudu to coax concubine Cai. The largest rouge store in Chazhou was owned by a merchant from Juexi, and Luo Mu was a regular customer there. The moment he stepped off the sedan, a steward came over to welcome and serve him tea in one smooth motion. Finally, he bent over to inform Luo Mu, “Apologies, Your Excellency Luo. Unfortunately, we are all out of stock. All the good stuff is being prepared in the shop at the eastern end and has yet to be delivered here. What do you say if we deliver them to your residence tomorrow? Would that be fine?”

Luo Mu nodded and made to leave when he recalled the way Cai Yu was pressing down on his arm earlier. Changing his mind, he turned back and asked, “Which shop at the eastern end?”

The steward called over an assistant to personally lead the way for Luo Mu.

Upon arriving at the place, Luo Mu noted that while the shop was not a large one, it was indeed close to the horse tracks and convenient for unloading goods. He entered and saw only a few people inside. The assistant led him further into the courtyard in the back, then served him tea and told him to wait for a moment.

Luo Mu sat for a moment. The curtain lifted, but the one who came through was Kong Ling.

“Why are you...” Luo Mu asked in astonishment.

However, Kong Ling did not answer. He lifted the curtain and stepped aside, and a man in white behind him bent slightly at the waist to enter. The instant Shen Zechuan raised his head, Luo Mu rose to his feet.

Shen Zechuan came in a sedan chair, and so he did not get wet. He looked at Luo Mu and gestured for him to sit. Qiao Tianya, who was following behind them, came in to change the tea and handed a fresh cup of hot tea to Shen Zechuan.

Seeing that Luo Mu was still standing, Kong Ling said, “Mengzheng, this is...”

“Your Excellency the Vice Commander.” Luo Mu respectfully paid his obeisances. “I’ve long heard of the Vice Commander’s reputation. This pupil Luo Mengzheng is all ears to the advice you have to offer.”

“I’ve previously heard Mister Chengfeng speak highly of Your Excellency Luo for your prudence and excellent judgment. As I see it today, this is indeed the case.” Shen Zechuan smiled slightly. “I’m no longer the Vice Commander of the Imperial Bodyguards now. Without an authority token and an official post, I’m merely a commoner. It is I who should pay my respect to Your Excellency.”

How would Luo Mu dare to accept his bows? The official in the emperor’s inner ministerial circle, Shen Zechuan—just his position as the Northern Judge of the Imperial Bodyguards alone was enough to strike fear in the hearts of the local prefectural prefects. In the past, the Imperial Bodyguards collaborated with the Ministry of Justice, Court of Judicial Review, and Chief Surveillance Bureau to carry out field works at the local areas to audit the accounts and review the local officials’ accomplishments. Shen Zechuan was also on good terms with Cen Yu of the Chief Surveillance Bureau and Kong Qiu of the Ministry of Justice. Luo Mu did not just hear of him. Originally, the main objective of local officials like him who had been assigned posts outside the capital was to gain experience. After building up their political achievements and taking their credentials into account, they would be able to get a promotion to Qudu and become an official in the capital. Their inspections’ evaluations and the lives of both them and their family all lay in Shen Zechuan’s hands.

The key to this was evident in the way Luo Mu called himself “this pupil”.<sup>5</sup>

Shen Zechuan was different from the Judge preceding him. His origin was not “legitimate”. His birth father was the Prince of Jianxing, Shen Wei, whose Zhongbo’s troops were defeated. Back then, when he entered the capital, he was escorted by the Imperial Bodyguards who had picked him up from the Libei Armored Cavalry. Rumor had it that he was to be executed, but not only did he survive, but he was even repeatedly promoted by Emperor Tianchen, who made an exception for him. The post of the Northern Judge concerned both factions in Qudu, and yet even Hai Liangyi had been willing to give his assent. What's more, this person was young, which only filled the others with even more trepidation towards him.

It was only then that Luo Mu understood that it was not just a front when Kong Ling said he was confident of success. He was genuinely certain of success.

Fortunately, Shen Zechuan was merely just saying and did not get up to pay his respects. Luo Mu calmed himself down a little. Not daring to sit, he let his hands drop as he stood before Kong Ling and said, "Please excuse this pupil for not welcoming Your Excellency after Your Excellency has personally come all the way to Chazhou. I'll immediately send someone..."

"I followed the Marquis of Dingdu out of the capital, and I'm now already a traitor of Qudu, so there is truly no need for Your Excellency to stand on ceremony." Shen Zechuan drank the hot tea, soothing his throat a little before he continued, "I've been in Zhongbo for quite some time, and I've long wanted to meet Your Excellency Luo. Fortunately, I have Mister Chengfeng to accompany me today."

Kong Ling looked at Luo Mu and smiled. "Mengzheng, there's no need to be so formal. The Vice Commander is now the pillar of Cizhou. It's also to resolve the bandit issue in Chazhou that he came this time. We are all on the same side."

Luo Mu looked at him, his gaze not as blatant as yesterday. He asked cautiously, "How did you know I'd come?"

"Chazhou is only this big. There are plenty of matters that one can find out with just a little inquiry around. That fourteenth concubine of yours has backing, and she has a temper to boot. She loves the rouges from Qudu. You've always had a penchant for pleasing others by catering to their likes, so to coax her, you will naturally make a personal trip down yourself."

Kong Ling smiled at Shen Zechuan and shook his head. "The Vice Commander doesn't know it, but Mengzheng was very popular with the ladies while he was still in the academy. He was a flirtatious one too. Even before he entered the ranks of officials in the imperial court, he was very knowledgeable about all this stuff."

Luo Mu relaxed a little when he heard Kong Ling bring up the academy. "I conducted myself with decorum when I was studying. How could I have been flirtatious when I was with you all day? On the contrary, you had countless friends and could fraternize with just about anyone."

The atmosphere eased up a little at their banter. Kong Ling led Luo Mu to take a seat.

Shen Zechuan sat in the seat of honor. When he spoke, it was not as overbearing and aggressive as Luo Mu expected. “Mister Chengfeng has probably already told you about the purpose of our trip here. It wasn’t convenient to have a thorough discussion yesterday, so it’s inevitable that Your Excellency will have misgivings. Please speak your mind freely today, we can discuss any difficulty you may have.”

Shen Zechuan was mild in his speech, and his expression was natural and at ease. However, there was clearly no room for “discussion” in his last sentence. Beneath his seemingly placid attitude was an unshakeable resolve to get what he wanted. Luo Mu only had to hear this one phrase from Shen Zechuan to understand Shen Zechuan’s intent.

Discuss any difficulty you may have. What was the purpose of a discussion? To allow him to take swift action sooner. Shen Zechuan did not give Luo Mu a chance to refuse at all. The moment he opened his mouth, he had left Luo Mu with no other choice.

When Luo Mu looked up again, his timidity was gone. He said, “If the Vice Commander can suppress the bandits in Chazhou, then I’m willing to take the Vice Commander’s lead. However, Cai Yu isn’t Lei Changming, and the Vice Commander doesn’t have the Marquis’s 20,000 strong soldiers either. It will be indeed tough to rely on the strength of just one man alone.”

Shen Zechuan said, unruffled, “With our meeting today, we can stand up to a million strong soldiers.”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 阿爷 I’d use pinyin for this except the pinyin is A-ye lmfaio. An address used in Classical Chinese for one’s father in old times, although it’s also used as grandpa. (Using pa here since Cai Yu previously mentioned treating him like a son).
2. literally violation of Heavenly principles, or nature’s law aka feudal ethics as propounded by Song Dynasty Confucianists

3. literally reversal of Yin and Yang, refers to traditional gender roles here. The emperor was traditionally male; women were not supposed to be involved in politics.
4. Laozi (or Lao-tzu), reverent term of address for Li Er (李耳), Chinese philosopher of the late Spring and Autumn Period and founder of Taoism.
5. “学生” literally student or pupil, a humble form of self-address used by a scholar or an official when addressing one’s teacher, master or a member of older generation

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 136 : SOWING DISCORD

Translated with: Jia<3

Shen Zechuan spoke with such confidence, as Chazhou was not a place that could be secured through sheer military might alone. During the reign of Yongyi, the Prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou in Zhongbo were the richest and most prosperous. Back then, Shen Wei was in command of the garrison troops of the respective prefectures. He possessed both money and military forces, yet he still could not get rid of the bandits in Chazhou. Before Shen Zechuan made his way to Chazhou, Zhou Gui and the advisors in Cizhou had prepared a detailed report on Chazhou, and they all unanimously thought that the matter regarding Chazhou had to be dealt with strategically.

Cai Yu was indeed no Lei Changming. The biggest difference between the bandits in Chazhou and the bandits of Mount Luo was that while the bandits in Chazhou were still merely bandits, those in Mount Luo had banded together. They not only established their territory, but also had plans for expansion. It was clear that Lei Jingzhe, who was hiding behind Lei Changming, was no longer satisfied with being a bandit. He had the desire to entirely cast off his old self, while Cai Yu did not. Hence, they had to fight against those of Mount Luo, and scheme against those in Chazhou.

Luo Mu was perhaps not as devoted as Zhou Gui in serving the people, but since Shen Zechuan had tacitly assented to Kong Ling's visit, that meant they needed Luo Mu. Having served as the Prefectural Prefect of Chazhou for over ten years, no one understood the ins and outs of Chazhou better than Luo Mu.

"Your Excellency was assigned to Chazhou during the reign of Yongyi, during which you have made many celebrated achievements and previously remonstrated with Shen Wei to suppress the bandits. However, Shen Wei thought Dunzhou was too far from Chazhou, and with Fanzhou between the two prefectures, it would be too inconvenient and a waste of money for the troops to travel long-distance. As the odds of success were too small, Shen Wei rejected the request." Shen Zechuan did not even blink when he brought up Shen Wei's name. "I noticed that Your Excellency's position on governing affairs started to change from that moment on."

Luo Mu waved his hand and said, "What illustrious achievement is there for me to speak of? The Vice Commander is speaking too highly of me. I have accomplished nothing after my arrival in Chazhou. During the reign of Yongyi, Chazhou was notorious for its bandits. That year, Qudu considered sending officials over, and Jiang Qingshan and I were among those who were assigned. When I came down here, I had plans to distinguish myself and show what I'm made of, but it was too difficult. "

Luo Mu's expression gradually grew heavier.

"During the first two years, my objective was focused on reviving the garrison troops. Although Shen Wei did not approve, he did not stop me. The Ministry of War thought that it was feasible and increased Chazhou's military spending according to the recommendations I made in my memorial, and from this, I had the Chazhou's military garrison troops equipped. I was complacent then, wholeheartedly focused on suppressing the bandits. It was only when the fighting began for real that I realized it wouldn't work at all. The bandits of Chazhou can be traced back way before the reign of Yongyi. There was already a group of bandits here in Chazhou long before the establishment of Chazhou's garrison troops. Hezhou in its earliest times was not as prosperous as it is today, and back then, the Yan Clan had not made its fortune yet. The traders who used this route were mostly wealthy merchants from the Thirteen Cities of Juexi, and the bandits of Chazhou kidnapped these traders to make their living. By the time the Imperial Court took notice, it was already too late; the bandits had already planted their roots in Chazhou and developed into various gangs and factions."

This caused the people of Chazhou to be exceptionally rowdy, as there were fewer rules and regulations compared to other places. Census registration<sup>1</sup> proved to be the trickiest here, as pretty much half the people had been bandits before and were not considered decent citizens, so they could only be registered as military households. Back then, when the officials of the eastern palace discussed this matter in this place, they thought of having these people enlisted in the army so that these people could be part of a regular army. With military fields and a monthly salary, they could just about feed their families and maintain a livelihood, and there would be no need for them to become bandits and violate the law. At the same time, the officials could regulate the movement of the people, allowing them to stay in Chazhou to farm with peace of mind without creating trouble all around, in turn strengthening the Prefectural Prefect's law enforcement capabilities.

However, the officials of the eastern palace had made a huge mistake. They were all talk and no action, taking strategies that Zhongbo had used in other prefectures and implementing them directly in Chazhou without adapting to local circumstances. The bandits of Chazhou became an official army, but the land was not this easy to cultivate. They followed the rules for merely a short while before they started to leech off the army salary while continuing to be bandits at the same time. They did not even need to feign diplomacy: they could just loot and plunder under the guise of catching bandits. They chased after themselves, forever going round in circles with the imperial court. It was difficult for the assigned Prefectural Prefect to resist the already well-established might of the bandits, and it wasn't long before Luo Mu suffered losses and was dealt a ruthless lesson by the bandits.

And that was not just all. In the later periods, bandit chiefs like Cai Yu appeared in Chazhou. They spoke of the chivalry of the martial fraternity, and were also willing to spend money to finance and assist their like-minded brothers. Over time, their reputation spread, and they were much more popular and admired than all those stereotypical literati. The prefectural prefect was no more than an empty shell that existed in name only.

By the time Luo Mu spoke to this point, Shen Zechuan could more or less understand why Shen Wei had not been willing to deploy troops.

Because Shen Wei did not dare to.

Shen Wei was conferred the title of the Prince of Jianxing, which was just that—a nice-sounding title. In essence, there was no difference between him and a delegated official like Luo Mu; he was also an outsider. He initially did not approve or oppose Luo Mu's proposition because he was adopting a wait-and-see attitude. If Luo Mu succeeded, then he could follow suit. If Luo Mu failed, he could then hold him accountable. He was not willing to step to the fore to offend the bandits in Chazhou, because he knew very well that compared to Luo Mu, Cai Yu and these people were the real "local officials" of Chazhou.

“But times are different now.” Shen Zechuan’s throat felt slightly hoarse, and he coughed a couple of times. “Cai Yu is currently living off the dividends from the Yan clan, and the money he makes are tears of blood, which bandits in power like them profit off the suffering of refugees. There is no lack of basic necessities like food and clothing in Chazhou, but people dying of starvation is a common sight outside Chazhou. Over time, the common folks will come to harbor resentment.”

“To tell the truth.” Luo Mu weighed up his options and said cautiously, “After the defeat of the Zhongbo Troops, the grain supply in Chazhou shrank to pathetic portions. Back then, the Grand Secretariat cleaned out the granaries in the various prefectures and transferred the grains to Juexi in the name of disaster relief. By all reasons, it was necessary to sign a receipt of loan with Zhongbo, but Shen Wei was dead, and Qudu never sent over a person to take charge. The six prefectures each handled their affairs in their own ways. It was an uphill task just to make a living, and they all had no energy to pursue the issue of food arrears—of course, they could not afford to pursue either. Recent years saw a rise in law-abiding families breaking the law in desperation. These were people who were starving and could see no way out, so they could only sink low and become bandits. Initially, the bandits in Chazhou led by Cai Yu were willing to provide financial assistance to the poor, but then, the Yan clan of Hezhou joined the fray, wanting to make use of Cai Yu’s influence and power to push out the Xi clan’s businesses in Zhongbo, and it is for this reason they came to buy and sell grains. They joined hands and made a big fortune out of it. Cai Yu is now sitting on a mountain of money, and he grew increasingly fond of hearing others buttering up to him as he ages. Gradually, he lost the chivalrous heart he used to have. He tore down the porridge booths<sup>2</sup> and grain stores he had set up outside and settled down with peace of mind as the local overlord of Chazhou. Voices of resentments fill the streets of Chazhou. He is no longer the person he used to be.”

However, when the mighty fall, they still command more respect than the common man. Cai Yu still had some influence left in the south of Zhongbo and in the territory of Hezhou. That “pa” Yan Heru addressed him by also carried a lot of weight. It was hard for those small gangs Luo Mu had privately funded to make a mark. He could only remain anxious but helpless about Chazhou’s existing food shortage predicament.

A brief silence fell over the room. The partially opened windows offered a glimpse of the orange jasmine still adorned with the dew of rain. The sky was overcast. A long time had since passed, and Luo Mu was running out of time to remain here.

Despite the open windows, Shen Zechuan still found it stuffy. The teacup under the pulps of his fingers had gone cold. He voiced something contradictory to what was said earlier. "If Cai Yu is still on his guard, then he should understand that the so-called voices of resentments filling the streets are merely underhanded tricks by the other gangs. As his brother-in-law, Your Excellency can give him a reminder or two in this regard."

Luo Mu was slightly taken aback. He did not understand what Shen Zechuan meant.

Shen Zechuan brushed the tea foam aside with the white jade-like lid of the teacup and said, "With Lei Changming's death, Cai Yu is the great bandit whose name has spread far and wide in Zhongbo. This is the perfect moment when he is in high spirits. It doesn't matter if it's Chazhou or the Yan Clan; he will tolerate no one else getting a share of the spoils. What's more, a man in his twilight years fears 'not being the man he once was' the most. If he were to think that the present wrath of the people was the underhanded work of the younger generations, he will definitely not let them off."

It was then Luo Mu understood. He could not help but think to himself just how a ruthless move this was.

Shen Zechuan wanted to make Cai Yu regard public wrath as infighting between the gangs. He wanted him to think that there was someone inciting the others intentionally. Once Cai Yu thought this way, he would intensify his efforts to suppress the smaller bandits in order to tighten his grasp on the money in his hands. The small bandits were already discontented. If they were to be beaten down by Cai Yu again, then their thirty percent of discontent would balloon to seventy percent. As long as both sides bore a grudge against the other, it would be hard for them to join forces again. They might even clash and give tit for tat.

"The small gangs Your Excellency has previously funded in private can be of use here. Once each of them has been badly and brutally beaten by Cai Yu, you can give them a helping hand and a generous gift of grains. Get them to band together and become brothers that bond together in a time of adversity." Shen Zechuan finished his tea and motioned for Qiao Tianya to refill it. He looked at Luo Mu and continued, "When the small come together, they will naturally become a force to be reckoned with. It's just like a group of jackals hunting their prey. What we need to do is not to fight him head-on, but to add fuel to the fire and fan the flames."

Hearing this gave Luo Mu the chills. He only had to drop Cai Yu a few hints, and he would be able to make Cai Yu destroy himself. The stratagem of sowing discord was not uncommon, but Shen Zechuan had only been in Chazhou for merely one night, and he was able to get such a clear handle on Cai Yu and Chazhou. Luo Mu could not help but recall Shen Zechuan's original identity—the Imperial Bodyguards.

"Once we take Cai Yu out of the picture, we will be able to discuss the trading of grains between both prefectures in detail." Shen Zechuan said calmly. "Your Excellency's experience of having to endure shame and humiliation will become an edifying anecdote in Chazhou in the future. The fact that the commoners can fill their stomachs will be Your Excellency's most distinguished political achievement. Even in other prefectures, you'd be a local official admired by all. Your Excellency Luo, please watch your step. Goodbye."

Soon after Luo Mu left, it started raining again.

Shen Zechuan rode the carriage back to the courtyard. When he stepped off the carriage and saw the overcoat over Qiao Tianya's arm, he said, "The weather is still warm in the seventh month. There's no need to go so far as to wear this... Why did you even bring this?"

Holding up the umbrella, Qiao Tianya said, "I wasn't the one who thought of it. It was shifu who specifically gave the instruction."

Shen Zechuan strode through the door. He had gotten Ge Qingqing, who was far away in Juexi, to purchase this courtyard under the guise of doing business. It wasn't big, and was very old. The front porch was waterlogged, and there were not that many flowers or greenery planted in the yard.

"Ever since I arrived in Zhongbo, I've been neglecting my martial arts practice, and subsequently, I've made shifu worry. After going back, don't bring up my illness to him." As Shen Zechuan spoke, he looked back partially and smiled at Kong Ling. "It has also been hard on Mister Chengfeng this entire journey."

Kong Ling hurriedly deflected the acknowledgement.

“I saw the lush orange jasmines bathed in the dew of rain planted by the windows earlier when I was sitting inside the house. They are very soothing on the eyes.” Shen Zechuan said offhandedly. “Let’s plant some in the residence after heading back.”

They had only just started up the stairs when they saw Fei Sheng, who had been waiting within, step out to greet them. Not daring to be sloppy in his tasks, he faced Shen Zechuan with a smile and greeted, “Master has returned at long last.”

Shen Zechuan asked, “Looks like you have good news to report?”

“Master is wise.” Fei Sheng lifted the drapes for Shen Zechuan. “Before I set off, I received the items the marquis sent someone to deliver over. I know they are important, so I did not dare to stop on the journey and hurried all the way back to deliver it to Master.”

This person loved to speak in such an ingratiating way. Qiao Tianya found it funny and laughed out loud behind them. He followed them in and teased, “I always find it interesting when Fei the Eleventh comes. Amusing. And fun.”

Shen Zechuan removed his outer wide-sleeved robe and said, “Let me see.”

Ignoring Qiao Tianya, Fei Sheng took the items over from his subordinate and presented it before Shen Zechuan. Shen Zechuan touched the leather bag; it was still cold.

“The marquis sent someone to deliver it back to the residence with the specific instructions to keep it chilled on ice. We don’t have any ice at home, so we had to borrow from Madam Zhou. A pity it wasn’t covered on the way back and melted not long after.”

Shen Zechuan was curious deep down, but he did not let it show before the others. He pinched the leather bag with his fingertips. It was filled with liquid inside. He opened it, but before he could see it, he caught a waft of a pungent smell.

On smelling it, Qiao Tianya, who was not that far away from them, asked, “Isn’t this milk?”

“That can’t be.” Fei Sheng said in puzzlement. “Why would the marquis send milk all the way from afar? It can’t be kept overnight.”

They looked at Shen Zechuan. Shen Zechuan did not mind the smell. The corner of his lips lifted slightly in a smile. Sensing their eyes on him, he looked askance at them and asked, “What?”

Who would dare to say anything else?

Shen Zechuan closed it and opened up another box. As expected, there were loose tea leaves within. He stood for a moment and let loose a soft sigh, thinking that he really understood Xiao Chiye all too well.

Milk was the same everywhere to the others. But to Xiao Chiye, milk from Libei was milk from Libei. It could never be replaced by milk from elsewhere. He saved his own portion, and despite knowing that it could not be stored for long, he still wanted to have it delivered to Shen Zechuan.

What if it was delivered on time and was still drinkable? They ought to try all the delicious food and beverages together.

That was what Xiao Chiye thought. The others did not understand, but Shen Zechuan knew it best.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 黃冊 Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household's classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.

- 2.
3. 粥棚 a food relief center providing handouts of food to the needy. Like a soup kitchen in modern times.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 137 : LETTER READING

Translated with: Jia<3

Shen Zechuan was writing a letter in the room, so Qiao Tianya and Fei Sheng took their leave.

Fei Sheng felt the itch to smoke, but did not dare to do so while standing under the eaves, worried that he would reek of smoke should Shen Zechuan call for him later. He stood still for a moment, but when he saw that Qiao Tianya wasn't moving along, he knew what this was all about.

"Something's the matter, huh?" Fei Sheng took a few steps outwards, leaning against the banisters along the corridor. "Tell me first, what kind of relationship do you have with that 'Unpolished Jade Yuanzhuo'?"

"We've met before, but we're not close. I have some impression of him." Qiao Tianya mentioned casually.

The more Qiao Tianya tried to make light of the matter, the more suspicious Fei Sheng was. He asked, "Yao Wenyu isn't a court official but a commoner who spends most of the year traveling out there. It's even difficult for Marquis Helian to meet him. Where did you encounter him?"

"Fate brought us together." Qiao Tianya did not answer seriously. "I didn't expect it either. Isn't this why I'm asking you to help me ask around?"

As Fei Sheng could get nothing out of him, he gave up probing and reported. "Secretariat Elder Hai, before he met with mishap, had previously wanted Yao Wenyu to leave Qudu and return to Jincheng, the hometown of the Yao Clan. There are students of Grand Preceptor Yao there who could watch over him on behalf of the Secretariat Elder, but Yao Wenyu didn't go."

Qiao Tianya uttered an "oh" and remained standing under the eaves to watch as the rain continued to fall.

Fei Sheng continued, "Yao Wenyu had probably realized at that time that Secretariat Elder Hai asked him to leave because he had already made up his mind to remonstrate to the death. So Yao Wenyu got on the carriage and circled around once before returning to wait in the residence for Secretariat Elder Hai to finish court. Who would've known that what he ended up with was news of Secretariat Elder Hai's death instead?"

Droplets of rain dampened the toes of Qiao Tianya's boots as he watched the gradually intensifying haze in the courtyard. His gaze fell upon a puddle, and he saw his own reflection.

Fei Sheng paused for a moment. It was only when he observed that Qiao Tianya's expression was normal that he continued. "When Secretariat Elder was buried, tens of thousands of people came to send him off. Yao Wenyu was his only student, and he conducted the funeral for Secretariat Elder as a son would for his own father. It didn't take a few days for the students from the Imperial College to start a riot; all of his books were torn entirely. If not for Kong Qiu hiding him in time, he may very well have ended up getting ripped to shreds by the students. However, he seems to have vanished into thin air after the matter of the emperor's daughter was revealed. My informers in Qudu couldn't find a trace of him either."

Qiao Tianya shifted his gaze to him and repeated, "Vanished?"

"That's right, he vanished." Fei Sheng lifted the arm he had placed against the banister and drew a circle in the air. "When I escaped from Qudu with you, I lost contact with my informers for a period of time, and I only re-established contact with them a short while back. By then, Yao Wenyu had already vanished. Qudu is the territory the Imperial Bodyguards are most familiar with. If my men say he disappeared, it's more than likely he's dead."

Qiao Tianya immediately replied, "Impossible. Kong Qiu still wants to revive the moderates, and Yao Wenyu is an indispensable candidate. Whether it's for official or personal reasons, Kong Qiu would never let him die."

Fei Sheng stared at Qiao Tianya, waiting for him to finish before saying, "My claim that he's already dead is supported by evidence. Hear me out first. Initially, he was just missing. Kong Qiu and Cen Yu were both looking for him too, but to no avail. The last place he appeared at was Mount Bodhi, where Hai Liangyi was buried. When my men went to investigate, they found an abandoned carriage; he had been kidnapped. But if it was purely a kidnapping, the perpetrators would no doubt approach Kong Qiu to negotiate or, at the very least, discuss the conditions for release. That is only how Yao Wenyu could be useful as a ransom.

However, Kong Qiu heard nothing from them at all, and it wasn't just Kong Qiu; even the Yao Clan of Jincheng didn't receive news of him."

Qiao Tianya furrowed his brows. "If a riot hadn't broken out in the Imperial College, Yao Wenyu would be the new star of the moderates, but the Yao Clan suffered a drastic decline after the Imperial College's riot. He can no longer bear the responsibility of commanding all the students in the world. To Qudu, he's a useless pawn. There must be a reason to kill him, but if you ask me, there was absolutely no need to."

"Right?" Fei Sheng turned his head around and asked in puzzlement. "He is without an official position or title, but he is the eldest lawful son of the Yao Clan. Killing him will only bring nothing but problems. I don't understand it either."

Shen Zechuan called out to them from the room. Qiao Tianya ended the conversation and lifted the drapes to enter. He never broached the subject again.

Luo Mu, for the sake of prudence, did not bring up the matter to Cai Yu directly. Instead, he coaxed his concubine until she was happy and allowed her to follow him in and out of the study. The private letters, which were partially concealed in the study, were copied down by concubine Cai's maidservant before being surreptitiously delivered into the hands of Cai Yu.

Upon seeing the letters, Cai Yu immediately flew into a rage. He summoned Luo Mu to his residence and hurled a stream of verbal abuse towards him.

"I thought you were an honest man; that's why I was willing to marry my sister off to you. Was there a single time that I didn't contribute generously to help you out whenever your residence faced a difficulty? I treated you like a dear brother-in-law, yet you were scheming against me behind my back! Luo Mengzheng, look at yourself. If it weren't for my support, you'd have been just a nobody! Do you really think of yourself as a bigshot?!"

Cai Yu was an uneducated and crude man used to mixing around in the lowest stratum of society. He was so vulgar and coarse when he cursed that Luo Mu fell to his knees before the table to repent. "Elder Brother treats me well; how could I dare repay your kindness with enmity? These private letters are anonymous. I have no idea where they came from either. I've been feeling nervous and afraid, unable to sleep at night and spending the day in a daze, all just to find an opportunity to bring up this matter with Elder Brother.”

Cai Yu got even angrier. He tossed the private letters onto the desk and pointed at Luo Mu. “What opportunity were you looking for? You and I are just a courtyard apart. Have you been crippled that you can’t get over here? If I hadn’t found out sooner, you would’ve already fallen into cahoots with them!”

Cai Yu was so furious that he felt uncomfortable. He stood up to take a few steps, repeatedly stroking his chest.

“You certainly are a piece of work, Luo Mengzheng! I was just wondering why there were so many people scolding me all of a sudden after spring this year. Turns out you were all trying to stab me behind my back! A shameless group of filthy trash. Back then, when I was renowned, you were all just babies who have yet to wean off milk. I always gave all sorts of financial assistance to you, yet you turn around and bite the hand that helps you! Why? You’ve gotten greedy after seeing how profitable the grains are? Bah! Do you think you people are worthy of doing this business? Are you people even capable of handling it?!”

Luo Mu was seized with terror. He wanted to speak, but Cai Yu bellowed, “Keep kneeling! I showed you due respect when we’re outside and thought of ways to support you, yet you don’t cherish it and stubbornly choose to fraternize with those ingrates. I’m telling you, if it weren’t for my younger sister’s love for you, you wouldn’t be going home today!”

Sweat was pouring from Luo Mu like rain. He kept his head lowered and said nothing.

Cai Yu just sneered when he stood looking at Luo Mu’s sweat-soaked back. He spent the first half of his life on knife-edge, and he finally settled down now that he was older. Who didn’t respectfully address him as “Elder Cai” each time he went out for business? All the major and minor bandits of Zhongbo had to give him face, and not even Lei Changming, whom he despised to the core, dared to behave out of line before him.

It was only after Luo Mu kneeled for an unknown period of time that Cai Yu’s anger dissipated some. In his eyes, Luo Mu was a spineless man. If he dared to keep those letters hidden for so long, it was surely because he had been instigated by the other party. This meant the other party was genuinely plotting against him and was just about to take action towards him.

Cai Yu's heart was still fluttering with trepidation, but then he thought the better of it and ended up feeling so resentful that he was gnashing his teeth in anger. He had always thought of himself as a very generous man. Even though he had taken a large cut of the profit from the grains, he had still saved a share for those under them so that they would not starve to death. But these people did not know how to be grateful.

"Since they're so heartless, I have no choice but to be unrighteous." Cai Yu sat down beside the window where the light was spilling through and said maliciously. "Those insatiably greedy bunches are just like snakes trying to devour an elephant. I'll catch a few and make an example out of them as a warning to the others to make them understand that I, Cai Yu, may be old, but I'm not so old that I'd subject myself to humiliation from others."

While Cai Yu was publicly making a show of dealing with the smaller gangs on one end, Shen Zechuan's cold was gradually getting better on the other. Fei Sheng was very efficient in his record-taking. He not only had all the prices of goods in Chazhou documented in the book, but had also sent someone to Fanzhou to do the same.

During the first few days, Shen Zechuan did not spread the news that Cizhou was here to trade in grains; Kong Ling had only gone around Chazhou to buy non-local products, making it seem as though they had made the trip especially to purchase these goods. When someone came to ask about their visit, Kong Ling's reply was ambiguous and dismissive. After a few days, the number of people who came to probe lessened.

Kong Ling followed Shen Zechuan out to the shops owned by the Xi Clan. The shops operated by the Xi Clan here mainly dealt with parallel imports, rouges, and medicinal herbs.

"Starving refugees swarm the land outside the city, while the city remains peaceful and wealthy. Troubled times or not, the ones who suffer will always be the common people." Kong Ling picked up the medicinal herb, took a sniff, and praised, "This is good quality stuff."

"Xi Hongxuan was a man of foresight when it comes to business." Shen Zechuan glanced around the shop. "Regular people generally would not dare to open such a shop here for fear of getting robbed, or poor business. In these last few years, Zhongbo can't even afford to feed itself. Who would have thought that men with power in the city would be far more extravagant than the merchants of Juexi? All that's lacking is exactly this kind of shop."

"Money makes the mare go. Anything is possible with money." Kong Ling lamented.

When Shen Zechuan spoke to him about Xi Hongxuan, he was talking about his own money vaults. Kong Ling understood the weight behind his words; this was recognition for taking his side in Cizhou. Kong Ling felt his chest tighten, thinking that he had been far too impulsive that day. As the saying goes, one should hide his inadequacies by staying quiet. It was not a good thing to display his own intelligence before a brilliant master.

Kong Ling did not reply and played dumb, and so Shen Zechuan did not continue the conversation. He took a look at the accounts for a moment and carefully asked the shopkeepers about news on Juexi's end. The shopkeepers presented him with some trinkets as a tribute of respect, but Shen Zechuan rejected the jade ware and the likes and merely accepted a fan that had caught his eye. However, he had already gotten accustomed to the fan Xiao Chiye had gifted him, and it did not feel quite right to be holding this new fan in his palm. While he could make do with this fan, he was still counting on Xiao Chiye to not forget about the matter when he returned.

The rain finally ceased in Chazhou, but it started to fall in Libei. While the weather in Zhongbo was still hot, Libei was already starting to turn cool. With the winds picking up in the seventh month, it would get colder after the end of the rainy season.

Ever since receiving Xiao Fangxu's letter, Xiao Chiye had been in a bad mood. He was still stationed at the Shasan Camp but had set up a patrol range with the Bianbo Camp, taking both camps under his watch and keeping his guard up on all sides.

Wu Ziyu was initially going to send the battle steeds up north after three days, but he had already been delaying it for some days. He couldn't leave on his own and had to follow Xiao Chiye. After receiving the letter, Xiao Chiye was now the commanding general in charge of military supplies in Libei. Wu Ziyu did not have a say no matter where he went; he had to listen to the deployment orders of the respective divisions' quartermasters.

Xiao Chiye came down from the walls of the camp and headed back to the tent in the rain. The sky was about to darken, and the mess cook was banging a pot as a signal for mealtime. The Libei Armored Cavalry and the Imperial Army were like chalk and cheese as they each squatted on one side with their backs facing the other.

On one hand, the Libei Armored Cavalry, having tasted successive defeats, could not get past the humiliation and were thus awfully on edge. On the other hand, the ways of the Imperial Army were rather unorthodox, and everyone was an old hand at cracking jokes and jesting around. They had few rules to follow once they stripped off their armors, and they were all a playful bunch who loved their fun. This was not something the Libei Armored Cavalry could agree with.

Xiao Chiye received a handkerchief from Chen Yang to wipe his sweat. The tent was wide open, and the drapes were not lowered, or it would be too stuffy inside. Before he could sit down, he saw Gu Jin enter. “Master, Young Master’s letter is here.”

Xiao Chiye took it and raised a hand as a signal for them to leave. He brewed himself tea and drank it as he unwrapped the bundle that was neither too big nor too small. There was nothing much inside, just a neat stack of clothes under a bulging bag. He paid no attention to the clothing, but opened the bag first.

The bag contained only two items inside: a bunch of pressed, dried orange jasmine, and a letter. The letter was a little damp after being soaked for a long time. When Xiao Chiye picked it up, he could still smell the scent of flowers. He drank up the tea in one gulp, then opened the letter.

The letter was short. By the time Xiao Chiye finished reading it, he had already swallowed his tea. He turned his head towards the entrance of the tent, where Chen Yang and Gu Jin still stood, and said with composure, “Lower the drapes. I’m cold.”

Gu Jin wanted to ask, didn’t you find it ridiculously stuffy a moment ago, but Chen Yang had already removed the hooks and let the drapes down.

The moment the drapes shielded him from view, Xiao Chiye read the letter over and over again. Finally, he collapsed heavily onto the bed and held up the letter, reading it word for word.

Days have passed since we parted, I know you yearn for me. So here’s a little gift to comfort you with.

Touching it is akin to touching me.

Xiao Chiye stared at that line of text and repeated it once more.

Touching it is akin to touching me.

Xiao Chiye's throat felt dry. He inexplicably started laughing, his gaze a little fierce.

Written at the very bottom in light and cursive penmanship were the words:

It's hard to sleep by my lonesome self. When will you return?

A good night's sleep is only possible when you hold me in your arms.

Xiao Chiye loosened his grip and gazed towards the ceiling. Half a moment later, he flipped himself over and buried his face into the pillow. But it was as though Shen Zechuan was lying right next to him, nibbling his ear and whispering in that lazy, laid-back way of his, "A good night's sleep is only possible when you hold me in your arms..."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

SPECIAL THANKS TO : Eggy, Suika<3

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 138 : STRATEGIST

Translated with: Jia<3

When Shen Zechuan woke up in the morning, the day was just starting to break. After Shen Zechuan had his breakfast, he boarded the carriage and headed back to the cosmetics shop with Kong Ling. It was still business-as-usual in the front hall. Qiao Tianya and Fei Sheng stood guard in the courtyard, while the Imperial Bodyguards kept careful surveillance both inside and outside the shop.

Half an hour later, Luo Mu's sedan arrived too. He was wearing his usual attire—a deep red robe with a slanted collar. The shopkeeper at the front desk was sharp. Seeing as the attendants following behind Luo Mu were unfamiliar, he raised his voice and said, “It’ll be scorching hot soon, and it’ll be tough on you all to be standing outside. Men, lead these brothers into the room for some tea and a rest.”

Those few attendants exchanged glances. Presuming that Luo Mu would not be able to escape, they followed the shop assistant into a room. After entering, they insisted on hanging the curtains up so that they could keep an eye on the entrance of the front hall.

The shop assistant followed beside Luo Mu and offered a handkerchief to Luo Mu to wipe his hands. Luo Mu wiped his hands as per usual and took a look at the goods on the counter. The shopkeeper greeted him with a courteous smile and said, “The last time Your Excellency came by, we didn’t have all the goods. This time we have prepared them well in advance. There are even new jade pieces and trinkets that have just arrived from the east. They are all in the back. This way, please!”

Luo Mu appeared to be hesitating as he cast a glance at the attendants.

The shop assistant continued, “This short distance will not take too much effort. Some goods are hard to come by, it’s not very convenient to bring them to the front for you to choose from, and it doesn’t look good on you when you view them there.”

Only then did Luo Mu reluctantly nod and follow the shopkeeper to the courtyard at the back.

Qiao Tianya personally drew the curtains. Luo Mu said his thanks and bent over to enter. He first paid his obeisances to Shen Zechuan, then looked at Kong Ling. It was only after seeing that both their expressions were relaxed that he took his seat.

Shen Zechuan noted that Luo Mu was dressed as a literati today and presumed that he must have chosen his clothes and shoes carefully before leaving the house. Although he sat impeccably upright after entering, he would subconsciously look at Kong Ling wherever there was a conversation. The moment Kong Ling opened his mouth, Luo Mu's eyes would be fixed on him.

"Cai Yu has been going all out to hit out at the smaller gangs these days, but he knows not to go too far. He understands the principle of interdependency given that they share a common lot; if one falls, the other will be in danger too, and he also fears he will end up isolated by all if he crosses the line. So at the same time he strikes out at the smaller gangs, he attempts to win over the remaining younger generation by 'offering low-priced grains to help the masses'." As Shen Zechuan was at the side, Luo Mu was already trying to hold his gaze in check. "This approach is to sell the grains cheaply to the gangs who had not been stirring up trouble."

Kong Ling asked, "How much is that?"

Luo Mu answered, "One tael for five dou of grains."

Kong Ling smiled and said, "The price isn't really that lowered. His so-called 'low-priced grains' merely means he makes just a tiny bit less profit than the others out there. Cai Yu used to be generous in helping the needy, and he never used to think much of money and worldly possessions, but he's so miserly now that he's older."

At this price, the grains could not be called "low-priced grains"; instead, they ought to be called "expensive grains". Chazhou's current rate for the grains was one tael of silver for two dou of rice, while the rate in Qudu was one tael of silver for two dan of rice.<sup>1</sup> Cai Yu was making big bucks off the profits. What's more, it was profit that forced the common folks into dead ends. To think he merely changed it to one tael of silver for five dou of rice just to win over the others. It was clear he was hankering over the money and could not bear to drop the price too much.

Shen Zechuan brushed aside the floating foam in his tea and said, "Cai Yu is in a predicament too, with no way to back down. Everyone inside and outside the city is now complaining about the high price of the grains. If he were to drop the price drastically to win those smaller gangs of bandits over to his side, the common folks would hate him even more, so naturally he wouldn't dare to do so."

"It's not just Chazhou. Public wrath is running high even in Fanzhou." Luo Mu was the most acquainted with Cai Yu's business. "At the beginning of this year, Lei Changming broke off contact with the Yan clan for some unknown reason, and Yan Heru no longer gave financial aid to the bandits from Mount Luo. That was why they thought of seizing Cizhou and robbing Cizhou's granary. Part of the reason was that they could not afford Cai Yu's grains."

"Let Cai Yu sell for a few days first." Shen Zechuan turned over his folding fan and tapped it lightly against the table. "It doesn't matter if it's one tael for two dou, or one tael for five dou, the common folks and the smaller bandits all can't afford it. Cai Yu forced himself to show such kindness naturally because he hopes those under him will acquiesce to him and stop opposing him. But his attitude isn't humble enough, and this will only backfire on him."

"It's not just the common folks." Kong Ling lamented. "Even governmental officials can't afford to buy with their monthly salary issued by the imperial court. On our way here, we saw people selling themselves everywhere outside Chazhou, even to the extent of selling off all the children in the family in the hope that they would have a chance to live."

"People aren't worth much nowadays, and even if they sell the children, it's all at low prices." Luo Mu had long heard of this. "Besides, who in Zhongbo will be willing to spend money to buy the people given the present situation? Only the brothels in Fanzhou will be willing to take them in. And even if they sell down someone from a decent origin into a low-class trade... the money won't be enough for them to exchange for one dou of rice."

Shen Zechuan was still not familiar with the situation in Fanzhou, so he asked, "Since Fanzhou has difficulty feeding its people, then where does it get the money to operate all these brothels?"

Luo Mu answered, "They are run by bandits too, for the specific purpose of dealing in the flesh trade with the bandits from Mount Luo and the Prefecture of Dengzhou. Prices are extremely low, and even this bit of profit is all swallowed up by the procuresses of the brothels."

Perplexed, Kong Ling asked, "But they have to feed all those people they brought back to do business, right? Do they buy grains from Cai Yu too?"

Luo Mu shook his head. "Humans are worth less than dogs. They are fed swill and weeds. If they starve to death, the bandits can come and buy more again. Anyway, the prices are so cheap they won't suffer any losses either way."

Kong Ling sat in a daze. Anguish gradually came over his face. "Zhongbo has been reduced to such a state. If the imperial court had been willing to lend a helping hand, the situation would not have deteriorated to this point. I said many years back that Hua Siqian..."

Shen Wei's name was still wedged in his throat.

Knowing Kong Ling well, Luo Mu feared he would say something unfavorable and leave a bad taste in Shen Zechuan's mouth, thus he hurriedly switched the subject and said, "So what should be the next step according to Vice Commander's plans?"

Instead, Shen Zechuan replied, "If Shen Wei had not cowered and recoiled from battle, Zhongbo would not have been so badly defeated. I hold Mister Chengfeng in the highest esteem for his concern for the common people, so there is no need to make a special point of avoiding certain subjects."

Shen Zechuan was so sincere that Luo Mu felt embarrassed instead. Kong Ling felt his heart sink. He had recently been both following and avoiding Shen Zechuan. He was a clever man; he was willing to work for Zhou Gui because he was familiar with Zhou Gui's character. However, he still felt some unease towards Shen Zechuan, and one of the biggest reasons was that he thought that following Shen Zechuan was a dangerous move. Masters that were difficult to read were the hardest to serve. The more calm things appeared to be, the more he had to tread with caution.

Kong Ling could side with him, but he was unwilling to assist Shen Zechuan the way he supported Zhou Gui. Shen Zechuan had been dropping hints repeatedly this entire trip, but Kong Ling feigned ignorance and turned a blind eye to it all. And now, he was filled with even more trepidation when he saw how Shen Zechuan was not only not angry but even giving him a way out.

Seeing the changes in Kong Ling's expression, Shen Zechuan gently turned over his fan and paused for a moment before speaking. "Suppress the news that Cizhou is here to sell grains for a few more days. Wait until the bandits prioritize their own interests and are no longer willing to be pushed around by Cai Yu before releasing the news. When that happens, keep the reserved grain wagons from entering the city. We'll set up the porridge booth right outside of the city. Tell the refugees that Cizhou is here to sell the grains at a regular price."

Luo Mu probed, "What if they have no money?"

Shen Zechuan smiled and looked towards Luo Mu. "Isn't this all funds for Chazhou's future garrison troops and wasteland reclamation? The common people may be poor, but you've acquired quite the sum of money while sticking to Cai Yu. Furthermore, once Cai Yu is out of the picture, most of his family assets will fall into Your Excellency's hands. Use those taels to do business with Cizhou in exchange for winning the people's hearts, and that would solve Your Excellency's future problems. Now, I still need to remind Your Excellency that Cizhou is here to do business, not to tighten its belts just so it can offer financial aid to others."

Sweat materialized on Luo Mu's forehead. He dabbed a little of it off with a handkerchief, nodding as he said, "But of course, but of course..."

When Shen Zechuan returned to the courtyard this time, he did not return with Kong Ling.

Qiao Tianya, with a bamboo hat on his head, sat at the head of the horse carriage with both arms behind his head as a pillow. He said on the other side of the curtain, "Does Master not want him anymore?"

Unable to stand the heat, Shen Zechuan closed his eyes in the stuffy interior to take a rest. He listened to the peddlers hawking their wares along the street for a moment before he said, "I've tried both carrot and stick, but he's determined to turn me down."

With a young stalk of grass between his lips, Qiao Tianya said, "That's to be expected. He has been lying low and hiding his abilities in your presence all because he fears being coerced. After he graduated from the academy, he did not go along with Zhou Gui and Luo Mu to join the imperial court as an official. He had simply wanted to be a commoner. Men like him are natural-born strategists. His only pride is the ability to choose his own future."

Shen Zechuan opened his eyes partially. "It's not like he's my only option."

Shen Zechuan did not want to impose his will on Kong Ling and force him into it, but he really lacked manpower. At first, he thought the pair of Kong Ling and Zhou Gui were the best arrangement. Both men, when put together, could maintain the stability on one end. At the very least, it would not be a problem for them to maintain the stability in Cizhou. But now, Shen Zechuan was lacking a talent who could give counsel. What he lacked was no longer a pair of eyes or a pair of hands, but a strategist who could assist him in devising strategic and tactical plans for the overall game.

Kong Ling had quite the reputation in Zhongbo for his talents. He was fellow student with both Zhou Gui and Luo Mu. With just his personal friendships with both men, he would be able to assist Shen Zechuan with many issues in both the prefectures of Cizhou and Chazhou, just like how he was able to deliver a visitation card to pay Luo Mu a visit outright. He also had the social connections he had built up in the Dunzhou army from his time as Tantai Hu's adviser. As long as these people were still alive, they could be of use in the future. Besides, Shen Zechuan did not think highly of Kong Ling back then. When Lei Jingzhe plotted to hoodwink them, Kong Ling had been so easily deceived. But that shout Kong Ling made before the city of Cizhou made Shen Zechuan take note of him once again. It was not until Kong Ling had swiftly taken his side right before they set off for Chazhou that Shen Zechuan fully set his mind on taking Kong Ling into his employ.

But Kong Ling did not have the intention to swap masters.

Shen Zechuan was too young. His background not only left much to be desired, but he also studied under Qi Huilian. Qi Huilian had been through many ups and downs in Qudu, and he also served as the head of the eastern palace for many years. What kind of student would such a teacher produce? Qi Huilian was the emperor's teacher. Kong Ling simply did not dare to continue thinking further. The most crucial thing was that he feared Shen Zechuan; he was unable to trust Shen Zechuan.

In Kong Ling's eyes, Shen Zechuan was a cold-hearted man who could readily cast aside personal relationships. If it had been Zhou Gui today, he would never speak of such words to Luo Mu.

Vexed, Shen Zechuan raised his head to look at the curtain of the carriage that was swaying because of the jolts and bumps. Sunlight flickered through the gaps onto his knees and blossomed over that particular patch of his white robe.

After Qi Huilian's death, Shen Zechuan wore white. He never asked Qiao Tianya where Han Cheng placed his teacher's body after he left Qudu. His anguished wails that night were known only to Xiao Chiye. But the names of Xue Xiuzhuo, Han Cheng, and the Empress Dowager, along with the city walls of Qudu that had been stained red in that pouring rain, were all seared into Shen Zechuan's heart and mind.

He had to stand firm. He needed a strategist.

Shen Zechuan said to himself silently.

A strategist who could stand up to Xue Xiuzhuo as an equal.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Thanks to AliceLiddell for spotting the typo!

Footnotes

1. 斗 dou, a dry measure for grain equal to one-tenth of a 石 dan.
2. 石 dan, dry measure for grain equal. 1 dan = approximately 90kg (see author's note in chapter 113)

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 139 : THE PRICE OF GRAIN

Translated with: Jia<3

Knowing that he had humiliated Shen Zechuan with his rebuff, Kong Ling barely approached him over the next few days. Instead, he focused his attention on inspecting the goods in the respective stores, too busy to even pause. On the other hand, Shen Zechuan behaved as he always did and continued to greet him as Mister Chengfeng whenever he saw him. This filled Kong Ling with even more dread, and he deferred to Shen Zechuan in every matter.

Just as they had expected, Cai Yu's low-priced grain did not impress the smaller bandits. With Luo Mu in the midst acting as a go-between and pulling the strings, several parties gradually started developing feelings of dissatisfaction towards Cai Yu. Cai Yu had a taste for extravagance in recent years, and each year when he celebrated his birthday, he would surely receive rare and priceless gifts. He would also rank his friends and relatives close and far according to the presents they gifted him, and this subsequently stirred up a great deal of unhappiness among a great number of them in private. At the same time, news that Cai Yu was distributing cheap grains suddenly spread outside the city, and with the price falling lower and lower, the starving commoners outside the city grew more and more outraged.

Cai Yu used to consider himself a respected elder of Chazhou, and yet he was ignoring them all with the city gates shut, leaving them to fend for themselves. Shen Zechuan was right; it wasn't that he did not understand, but that he was in a predicament with no way to back down.

The grain in Chazhou was presently supplied by Hezhou and subsidized by the Yan Clan. By taking all these grains, Cai Yu had to pay back interest to the Yan Clan, and the portion he could not pay back had to be paid out from his own pockets. Lowering the price would only disadvantage himself, and as he was unwilling to make a loss, he could only force himself to push on ahead. He had already sent multiple letters in succession to Hezhou to enquire about the situation.

This was what Shen Zechuan had been waiting for.

Cai Yu could never imagine that over one night, the entire city would be in discussion over the price of grain.

“Where did these people come from?” Cai Yu called for the maidservant to help him put on his clothes, and asked his trusted aide, “Why have I heard nothing about Cizhou’s grain wagons entering our territory!”

His aide replied, “They took the public road and suppressed the news of their arrival outside of the city; it never managed to reach us.”

Cai Yu’s expression was somber as he put on his boots and took a few steps. “I’d found it strange when Kong Ling entered the city. What would Cizhou be doing here for no rhyme or reason? Turns out it’s to steal our business! They’ve prepared so thoroughly, all to challenge me! What did they say?”

His trusted aide picked up the hem of Cai Yu’s robe from behind. “I’ve sent someone to make inquiries this morning. The price of the merchants from Cizhou is one tael for seven dou of rice.”<sup>1</sup>

On hearing this, Cai Yu promptly sneered. “I thought they were here to play Bodhisattva and save the people, but they are also just here to profit from others’ misfortune. Has there been any reply from Hezhou?”

The aide estimated the time and answered, “At this point in time, the letter hasn’t been delivered yet.”

Cai Yu stood by the door and contemplated it in silence alongside the murmuring stream in the courtyard and the clear, melodious chirps of the birds under the covered walkway. He had spent a huge sum of money on this compound with the intent to pass it down to the younger generations as a family residence. He still had a few sons who were waiting to take over the family business and properties from their old man, and there were more than a thousand people in his family whose livelihoods depended on his sale of grains. He did not dare to lose this business.

“One tael for seven dou.” Cai Yu muttered. “One tael for seven dou... Isn’t Cizhou belittling me a tad too much by thinking of snatching away my business at this price? Since they lowered their price, then we will go even lower. Go tell the grain stores under us that I’m going to reduce the price to one tael for eight dou out of pity for the commoners outside the city.”

The aide hesitated. “But the Young Master has yet to reply. If...”

“Lower it.” Cai Yu’s expression gradually grew grave. “The Young Master still addresses me as ‘pa’. Even if we can’t make a profit this time, I can thicken my skin and go to Hezhou to ask for a favor. With the Young Master at the head of the Yan clan, no one would dare to do anything to me! Cizhou came bearing down on us so menacingly this time. There will be trouble in the future if we don't make them think twice and bow out."

Cai Yu's trusted aide had only just left the house, and Shen Zechuan knew all about it.

Fei Sheng's network was everywhere. When he whispered the information to Shen Zechuan, Shen Zechuan was handing out free porridge outside the city.

The weather was bright and clear today. Shen Zechuan left the city at the hour of mao<sup>2</sup> and started giving out free porridge to the poor and needy from the hour of chen<sup>3</sup> right up to the hour of shen.<sup>4</sup> The sun was so scorching hot at this moment that the muddy ground was cracked. Refugees all sought shelter under the shades of the trees. Shen Zechuan gave a slight nod after hearing Fei Sheng out and said, "Since he has taken the bait, he won't be able to escape. Go to Luo Mu and get him to tell the smaller gangs of bandits not to get anxious. Cai Yu's price of one tael for eight dou can be further reduced."

Fei Sheng was clearly aware of Shen Zechuan's intent, but he just had to play dumb before the latter and asked like a student eager to learn, "Then, Master, are we going to reduce our prices too? We can't let Cai Yu get his way."

Shen Zechuan tossed the handkerchief to Qiao Tianya and said, "Of course, but we'll have to wait for nightfall before we reduce the price."

Because he had matters to attend to during the day.

A white-robed gentleman wearing a white jade pearl with two or three attendants in tow suddenly appeared outside the city of Chazhou and stayed at the porridge booth from morning to night to personally distribute the porridge to the people. The refugees who received the porridge made a little inquiry and found out that these grains from Cizhou were initially meant to be sold in Chazhou, but Cai Yu refused to let them into the city. Since they pitied the commoners outside the city, they used those grains to hand it out to them instead.

Shen Zechuan's attitude was cordial and amiable, and he spoke humbly and politely. What's more, he was good-looking. If there were any households with orphans and widows, or with the old, weak, ill, and disabled, he would not only give them food but even send the physician over to take a look at them. He even absorbed all the consultation fees and cost of the medicinal herbs himself. In less than two hours, the refugees who had come forth on hearing of his name had converged into a flock. Whenever the others asked about Shen Zechuan's name, Qiao Tianya and Fei Sheng would answer with "His Excellency Zhou's aide" and "Mister Chengfeng's comrade".

Even still, Shen Zechuan was young, and he had a distinguished air about him when he moved and acted. Speculations started swirling around in no time. None of the common folks knew who this young master was, and that subsequently made him appear all the more mysterious and conspicuous.

Cai Yu was restless with anxiety as he kept waiting at home until the hour of chou,<sup>5</sup> all the while not daring to close his eyes. When he heard someone coming to report, he hurriedly stood up to let his trusted aide in before asking, "How is it? Is there an update on Kong Ling's end?"

The aide had been running to and fro the entire day, and even if he had taken the sedan mid-journey, he still could not endure this degree of exhaustion. His back was presently drenched in perspiration. He wiped his sweat with his sleeves and gasped for breath as he answered, "It went down! As Old Master predicted, Cizhou has also lowered the price again!"

Cai Yu worriedly asked, "By how much?"

The aide replied, "One tael for nine dou of rice."

Cai Yu's expression was calm; this price was within his expectations. He paced. "We lowered by one dou, and they followed suit. It seems that they do not have enough confidence either."

The aide followed alongside Cai Yu. "Old Master, then should we still lower the price? If we lower it any further, it's going to reach one dan!"

From two dou to one dan, Cai Yu was already thinking about the kind of punishment he was going to face when he went to Hezhou after this disaster. However, he could only continue forcing the issue right now. He clenched his jaw and said, "Lower it further! To one tael for one dan!"

When Luo Mu heard the news in his residence, he said to Kong Ling, "If Cai Yu continues to lower the price, it'd be difficult for him to raise it again in the future. He's fallen for the ploy hook, line, and sinker."

Kong Ling faced the window and confirmed that there was no one else around before speaking. "It's all thanks to the Vice Commander's foresight."

Thinking of Shen Zechuan made Luo Mu sigh. "If it had been me, I would have been deceived too. How could Cai Yu have known that Cizhou was planning to veer towards Qudu's price? This is a lucrative business. Every increase of one dou of grain per tael is a loss of real money."

"Riches cannot be brought to the grave; how long can he profit off misfortunes in Zhongbo? You're a fool! If Cai Yu had any foresight, he would've shown restraint this year. Cizhou had no confidence due to a lack of resources six years ago, but we've been recuperating and rebuilding our strength in these six years. The transportation of the army provisions for Libei's military from Cizhou last year was decided on by Secretariat Elder Hai and the marquis. Think about it, Qudu already knew then that Cizhou had the ability to bear this responsibility. Once Cizhou is revitalized, those with ambition from the respective prefectures will also vie with each other to rise to the top. When the time comes for these places to re-cultivate their grain fields, the price of grain in Zhongbo will surely fall. This path to fortune cannot last for long; the only question is who will be the one to crush it." Having spoken to this point, Kong Ling paused for a moment. "Both the time and place are right. The Vice Commander meant to make a killing in Zhongbo."

Upon noting that Kong Ling was in a daze, Luo Mu asked, "I noticed that the Vice Commander has intentions of using you, yet you continuously turn a blind eye to it. Chengfeng, could it be that the Vice Commander can't be compared to Zhou Gui either?"

Kong Ling gazed at the tree shade outside the window and replied only half a moment later, "My abilities are mediocre. The only reason I can support Zhou Gui is that he can only be the Prefectural Prefect of Cizhou in this lifetime. Keeping the calm in one corner of the world is easy enough that someone of my caliber can do it. But stabilizing a vast territory can only require talents who are pillars of the state. The Vice Commander is no mere fish in a pond; I dare not be so presumptuous as to claim connections with such a man."

Luo Mu was struck dumb.

Neither the men inside or outside of Chazhou slept well this night. Cai Yu drank cup after cup of strong tea, afraid to shut his eyes lest the other party surreptitiously lower the price again the moment he lay down. He had never been a man with business acumen, and he had been only relying on his status as a bandit to keep up a farce for the Yan Clan. And now, he was a bundle of nerves, having been driven to a state of anxiety.

The people from Cizhou remained passive for a long time. Only the porridge booth outside the city was still operating. Cai Yu had heard that more than a thousand people had converged outside the city, but he was sure that what he had in his hands were the bona fide armed forces; the gathering outside the city was merely a motley crew. Even if they were to converge together, they could not affect the situation.

Time continued to pass by. When afternoon came around, Cai Yu decided to take a nap fully-clothed, but he had only just shut his eyes when he heard a report coming in. He hurriedly sat up and let a maidservant support him on his way out. The moment he saw the aide's expression, his heart sank. "How much did they lower it to?"

The aide anxiously reported, "Old Master, the price drop this time is crazy! They've dropped it to one tael for one dan and three dou of rice. The people who were adopting a wait-and-see attitude yesterday are already starting to leave the city one after the other. They are all making a beeline for the Cizhou's grain wagon to buy grains!"

Cai Yu was rendered speechless for a moment. "That low?!"

The aide replied, "It's already close to the price of grain in Juexi. If it keeps getting lower, we will have to give up all our profits after spring this year to repay Hezhou!"

Cai Yu held on to the man and said in disbelief. "Didn't Cizhou just send army provisions to Libei? Now that Libei has rebelled, they'll be getting all of their provisions from Cizhou in the future. If Zhou Gui sells off all of the grains, how is he going to account for it to the Prince of Libei? Furthermore, what are they even earning by lowering the price this much?!"

The trusted aide followed behind Cai Yu, similarly panicking as he spoke, "Exactly! If they continue lowering the price, it will be no different from Juexi. Wouldn't that be making a loss? What profits could there even be?"

Cai Yu was getting on in years, and he had not slept all night; he was presently so unsteady on his feet that he had to let someone help him to the seat. “They’re determined to steal our business...” Hatred bubbled up in him. “How dare they! Go gather my men. Tonight, we’ll overturn their grain wagon, capture Kong Ling, and kill all those that came along with him! I have ferocious bandits on my side; why would I be scared of them? Zhou Gui, that ignorant brat. I’ll see if he has the guts to fight me head-on!”

The aide slapped his knee, thrilled as he spoke, “That’s the way, Old Master! We should’ve retaliated long ago and not wasted all that effort playing nice to them! I’ll go right now!”

Author’s Words

Okay, I get it. You all want them to meet, right? Alright, alright.
Coming your way soon.

Thank you for reading.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 斗 dou, a dry measure for grain equal to one-tenth of a 石 dan.
2. 石 dan, dry measure for grain. In QJJ, 1 dan = approximately 90kg (see author’s note in chapter 113).
3. So a dou would be about 9 kg.
4. 卯时 5-7 am based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times
5. 辰时 7-9 am
6. 申时 3-5 pm
7. 丑时 1-3am

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 140 : CITY OUTSKIRTS

Translated with: Jia<3

As Cai Yu gathered his men with great fanfare on his end, the refugees outside the city had already amassed into a horde. It took merely one night for the news that someone had set up a booth to give out porridge to spread more than ten li around. Refugees who were so starved that they were sallow and emaciated came in droves and crowded around the Cizhou's porridge booth so closely that not even a drop of water could trickle through.

Qiao Tianya watched as the people came swarming to them. There were no longer enough hands at the front to help maintain the queue of people who came to receive their porridge, so he signaled to Fei Sheng with his eyes. Fei Sheng backed away in understanding and led the Imperial Bodyguards to guard the wagon. He also swapped the guards from Cizhou over to help with the maintenance of the queue order. These Imperial Bodyguards were all dressed in black robes with blades on them, and every one of them looked capable and tough, thus producing a deterrent effect on the restless people all around.

"Master." Qiao Tianya raised his arm to hold back some people and whispered to Shen Zechuan. "It's getting dark. We've already been here for two days and a night. It's almost time. You should retreat to the rear."

Shen Zechuan had just finished chatting with an elderly among the refugees. He did not look back upon hearing him, but he put away the blue handkerchief that he had taken out and said, "There's no harm in staying."

Qiao Tianya surveyed the surroundings and looked at the people around them jostling against one another. These were all emaciated refugees. Worried that there would be a conflict in a while and someone might fish in troubled water to make a grab for the grains and hurt Shen Zechuan in the process, he said, "Master, stand behind, or stay close to the wagon."

Shen Zechuan looked at the forest bathed in the sunset glow of red clouds that looked like torn pieces of red cotton. The setting sun was already midway in its descent; it would not be long before the sky turned dark. He had already stayed outside the city for two days and a night, and now, he withdrew his gaze and said, "There's no hurry."

The sky gradually darkened, and the various stores along the streets in the cities all hung up their lanterns. Chazhou had no wine taverns and tea houses at present, but owing to the proliferation of human traffickers here, there were plenty of brothels set up at remote corners. Cai Yu wanted to rally his men, and the ones he called were all the various heads and chiefs within his own gang. These people relied on Cai Yu for a living and rarely did any proper jobs to earn their keep. Instead, they liked to bully the weak and tyrannize the city. They loved to make their way to the brothels and laze around in there all year round. When they were called out one at a time, they were still holding up their pants, looking all bleary-eyed. Many of them were dead drunk. Cai Yu's trusted aide did not dare to offend them and had to coax and flatter them before he could get these people to step out.

While they were taking a roll call and lining up in formation on this end, Luo Mu and Kong Ling had also started making their moves on their side.

Kong Ling bowed to the various chiefs of the small-time gangs that Luo Mu had helped in secret and said, "As everyone knows, Cizhou is here this time to sell grains. As long as we can get through this crisis safely tonight, the price of rice tomorrow can only be even lower."

One of them asked, "Talk is cheap. How do you expect us to believe you with no proof or guarantee?"

So Kong Ling turned aside and gestured to Luo Mu and said, "My words can't be trusted, but surely you can believe His Excellency Luo's words?"

Luo Mu had repeatedly extended a helping hand to these gangs, funding them with quite the amount of silver in just this half month alone. They had been beaten down by Cai Yu so badly lately that they did not even dare to step out of their alleys in broad daylight. They were not given a share of that cheap one-tael-for-five-dou grains. Cai Yu had already driven them into the corner, and it was all because of Luo Mu's financial support that they could survive, so naturally, they were willing to believe Luo Mu's words.

Luo Mu cleared his throat and said, "At present, all the granaries in the city are managed by Cai Yu alone. The prices are indeed exorbitant. Even people like us can't afford it, let alone the common folks. Cizhou's offered price is just right; it's close to Qudu's price. What's even rarer is Cizhou's promise never to inflate the price in the future. I have already signed the documents with Cizhou. It can't be fake when it's all been written down in black and white."

The various chiefs put their heads together to discuss it among themselves.

Kong Ling continued, "I know all you fellows are worried about the Yan Clan, but it's better to just get it over with than to prolong the agony. Instead of allowing the Yan Clan to lean on Cai Yu's authority to control the lifeline of Chazhou, why not let my fellow brothers here decide yourselves? Moreover, the only reason Cai Yu is willing to lower the price today is because Cizhou's grain price is too low. If we can't get rid of him tonight, then once Cizhou's grain wagons leaves, the price of grain in Chazhou will rise back up to what it was originally."

If one wanted people to work together as one, one first had to talk to them about the benefits. Kong Ling knew this very well. The original price set by Cizhou was one tael for one dan and eight dou of rice,<sup>1</sup> but Shen Zechuan had not mentioned this amount at all during these past few days of price reductions, and this was precisely because he was waiting to use this information to inspire the people at the right moment.

Kong Ling paused for a moment before continuing, "According to the Vice Commander, as long as everyone is willing to pitch in, once Cai Yu has been taken down, the price of grain will be lower than one tael for one dan and three dou, by three dou!"

The moment those words were out, the people began to seethe with excitement.

The price of grain in Qudu was just one tael for one dan and five dou of rice, yet Cizhou was willing to offer one dan and six dou. The impact had far exceeded that of Cai Yu's small gesture. What they were concerned with was not just the grains, but also their future means of subsistence and survival in Chazhou. Most importantly, the first batch of grains this autumn were not paid out of their pockets, but by Luo Mu. After Cai Yu was knocked off his pedestal, Chazhou could still loot from the granaries of Cai's residence. With the combination of these two sources of grain, they would not have to worry about getting through winter this year!

Sounds of assent beneath rose in harmony, and in no time, morale was running high.

Kong Ling nodded to Luo Mu, then said to the various chiefs, "Cai Yu's men haven't left the city, so there's no need for everyone to fret; we naturally have plans in place."

At around the hour of zi,<sup>2</sup> Cai Yu's men left the city. These bandits were all using army supplies from the armory belonging to the garrison troops of Chazhou, and even though the equipment was old, it was fully intact. With swords, blades, and shields all in place, they had, at a glance, the appearance of a proper army.

When the trusted aide had sent someone to check up on the situation in the morning, there were only a thousand or so people outside the city, but when he headed out of the city for a look now, the crowd was too dense for him to see through. Clearly, the number of people had doubled. The number of men and horses under Cai Yu in the city amounted to only one thousand five hundred, and he had brought one thousand this trip, and yet they felt a little cowed as they crowded around the city entrance.

"Why are there suddenly so many people here?" One of the chiefs in the back craned his head, "It's crowded to the ends of the earth!"

The aide turned around, smiling obsequiously as he said, "They're too hungry to even walk. How can they be considered people? What's important are the grain wagons. Old Master has already said, as long as everyone can take it down, the grain from Cizhou can be split between each of the chiefs here."

The chiefs silently observed and saw that they were indeed just some refugees in rags, and the number of guards from Cizhou was pathetically small; thus, they said, "With this assurance from the big boss, we'll do it! See those guards from Cizhou? We'll split up according to the number of wagons. The more you kill, the more share of the grain you get later!"

The crowd of the people rubbed their palms, eager for a fight. They did not even need the aide to give a command before they swarmed forth.

Shen Zechuan had only brought the porridge to his mouth when he heard the battle cries. A bunch of bandits charged out from the public road and brandished their blades to start slashing. Fortunately, the Cizhou guards were guarding at the periphery, and both parties began to combat at close quarters. Fei Sheng immediately opened his mouth and shouted at the group of refugees, "Robbery! Cai Yu sent his men over to snatch the grains!"

Fei Sheng shouted at the top of his voice. His shouts were not loud, but the refugees nearby were already scared out of their wits. They jostled and bumped into one another and shouted after him, "Robbery! Cai Yu sent his men over to snatch the grains!"

Upon hearing this, a chief on the other end grew emboldened and roared with savage laughter. "We're here to rob grains! Whoever dares to stand in our ways will be sacrificed to our blades! Brothers, charge!"

The Cizhou's guards were too few in numbers to withstand the momentum of the bandits' charge, what's more when all the refugees were right behind them. As they jostled together, cries of those being trampled on rang out all over. On seeing this, the bandits started to harbor the intent to toy with the people, and so they yanked out the elderly, the weak, women, and children and terrorized them with their blades. "Not only are we robbing the grains, but we are also going to kill, kill, kill!"

The bandits dragged along a woman with a child in her arms by her hair, and the gleaming blade frightened her so much that she was trembling all over as she wept and pleaded. But the bandits were used to committing all kinds of atrocious acts, and when they saw her wailing, they did not feel any pity and instead burst out laughing in unison. They even reached out their hands and made to haul over the child in her arms.

Unexpectedly, a hand suddenly reached out from among the crowd of people to stop that blade.

Qiao Tianya tossed aside the hem of his robe and grinned, "Killing is one thing, but why humiliate others? It's so annoying to hear all these weeping and wailing. Raise your hand and drop the blade in one swift move; get it done and over with!"

This bandit exerted his strength, but the blade did not budge the slightest. He bellowed, "Good grief, bro! Let go!"

Seeing his face flushed with anger, Qiao Tianya took a few steps back, causing the chief to stagger to keep up pace with him.

Shen Zechuan, who was standing back, said, "What's the point of making a fool of the others? Qiao Yueyue, let go and give it back to him."

Qiao Tianya said, "Sure, no problem. I'm letting go. I'm letting go right now!"

The words had only just left his mouth when Qiao Tianya really did let go. That bandit was forcefully dragged forward in a lunge towards Qiao Tianya. Qiao Tianya stepped aside to dodge him, then lifted his foot and kicked that bandit in the ass, sending him flying into the crowd and landing right in front of Shen Zechuan's feet.

As that bandit made to get up, his gaze shifted up along the white robe. Just as it was about to slide up to Shen Zechuan's chest, the tip of Yang Shan Xue's sheath pressed against the center of his hair, bringing the upward trajectory of his head to a stop.

Shen Zechuan's expression turned cold, his gaze sharp and fierce as he spoke with righteousness. "Cizhou is here to provide aid relief to the common folks of Chazhou. It's fine if Cai Yu doesn't allow me into the city, but do you people have to tear down the porridge booth too? Then go ahead and tear them down. Don't hurt anyone."

His voice was neither loud nor soft, but it had enraptured those in the surrounding vicinity. Chazhou had suffered greatly at the hands of Cai Yu and the Yan Clan's schemes to increase the price of grain, and the people were presently overwhelmed with sorrow and indignation. As the woman who was rescued cried, quite a number of the others also started to cry.

How could the bandit have known that he'd fallen into a trap? All he could remember was the headcount the chief had mentioned earlier. Unable to raise his head high due to the humiliation, he braced himself and spat hatefully, "Chazhou is the big boss' domain. If he wants to tear it down or kill its people, can you people stop him?!"

Shen Zechuan very slightly decreased the amount of strength he had been using, "These grains—"

In an instant, the bandit grabbed the blade that had fallen nearby, lifted his arm, and moved to slash Shen Zechuan's chest. Qiao Tianya had already moved, but the bandit was far closer, and that blade went straight for Shen Zechuan. However, it was at this very moment that the bandit saw the composure in Shen Zechuan's eyes, as if he had been waiting just for this.

The sheath of Yang Shan Xue made a 'thump' sound as it struck the side of the bandit's blade. However, a few drops of fresh blood followed in the wake of the sound, splattering on Shen Zechuan's sleeve.

A man standing alongside Shen Zechuan dropped onto his butt, paralyzed and terrified. "They're killing people!"

Qiao Tianya had initially thought the blood belonged to someone else, but upon closer inspection, it was actually Shen Zechuan's left hand that was bleeding.

Cries of alarm rang out all around. Fei Sheng, who was far away, bellowed with all his might, "Who dares to harm my master?!"

As soon as he said that, the Imperial Bodyguards all drew their blades. From the moment Qiao Tianya intercepted the blade, one of the chiefs standing in the back knew that they had encountered someone difficult to deal with. He quietly took a few steps back and commanded, "Do as the big boss says. Hack them all to death!"

The bandit in front of Shen Zechuan was not dead yet, so Qiao Tianya kicked him from the back, sending the man rolling onto the ground. But, before Qiao Tianya could draw his blade, several people rushed forward from behind Shen Zechuan, swarming towards the bandits as they threw punches and kicks at them. The crowd was roused to action, their anger having reached its peak. The refugees stampeded forth in unison, fearlessly colliding with the bandits without a care for their lives.

"Cai Yu, open up the granaries! You evil bandits must die! Don't hurt our benefactor!"

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 斗 dou, a dry measure for grain equal to one-tenth of a 石 dan.
2. 石 dan, dry measure for grain. In QJJ, 1 dan = approximately 90kg (see author's note in chapter 113).
3. So a dou would be about 9 kg.
4. 子时 11pm-1am based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times

Qiang Jin Jiu – Chapter 141 : Rain

Translated with: Jia<3

How could the bandits have expected that the commoners would rally together and fight back? The deafening sound of trampling feet roared like sudden claps of thunder, while the cacophony of curses and cries blended together and engulfed the bandits like a surge of floodwater. The commoners were already all seeing red as they shouted in the melee, “The evil bandits deserve to be killed!”

The bandits were not a match for this many people. Stones and broken bowls went flying and smashing all over, causing the bandits to scurry for cover. Seeing as the situation did not bode well, that particular chief intended to flee, but when he looked back, Cai Yu’s trusted aide was already running away!

“Son of a bitch!” The chief flew into a rage and took to his heels too.

But he was unlucky, and the sharp-eyed Fei Sheng deftly hauled him back. This chief was merely a commoner, and there was no way he could defeat a well-trained Imperial Bodyguard like Fei Sheng, so he promptly fell into the horde of people who swarmed around him to beat him up while he covered his face and rolled on the ground wailing.

The rest of the bandits were thrown into disorientation. Seeing how the commoners outside the city were all acting like man-eating evil spirits as they pummeled the chief, they abandoned the battle and fled back into the city.

Cai Yu was waiting for updates in his residence. The dishes left aside on the table had already gone cold. He suddenly heard a commotion outside and hurriedly got up, but he had only taken a couple of steps when he saw his attendant stumbling his way in. The latter reported in a panic, “Old Master, there are plenty of people outside. They have surrounded our mansion!”

Cai Yu’s main forces had already been dispatched out of the city, and at present, he had no more than five hundred people left behind in the city. It immediately dawned on him, and he hissed through clenched teeth, “I’ve been had!”

He had no men by his side at present, and this gave the small-time gangs an opening to exploit the situation.

Cai Yu immediately said, "Tell the guards guarding the compound and the remaining men to keep an eye on the various courtyards' gates. Bring my cloak over. I'm going to meet them personally!"

Cai Yu draped his cloak over himself and secured his broadsword, then briskly made his way outside with his entourage. The residence's doors were tightly shut. Cai Yu peered through the gap in the door and saw torches everywhere outside the residence. Even though his heart was heavy, he still faked a laugh and said, "Who do we have here? I'm not hosting a feast today, and there's no joyous event going on either. So why raise such a big hooha coming over to give your congratulations?"

Outside, Luo Mu leisurely replied, "I heard Elder Brother has been haunted by nightmares lately and has trouble sleeping, so I made a special trip to invite the various brothers over tonight to dispel the evil energy in Elder Brother's residence."

Cai Yu expressed displeasure on hearing Luo Mu's voice. "Mengzheng, I married my younger sister off to you, and I treated you well too, and yet you return my kindness with enmity. I'm afraid that's a violation of moral principles."

Without batting an eyelid, Luo Mu said, "Cai Yu, you shut the granaries to sell grain and profit off others' misfortune, and you turn a blind eye to the destitute and displaced commoners outside the city. You are no longer considered a chivalrous bandit who robs the rich to help the poor. As the prefectural prefect of Chazhou, I had no choice but to socialize with you for years in order to make you let down your guard. Now that you've lost the heart of the people, you should surrender without resistance as soon as possible."

Cai Yu had never been one for pretenses. He was instantly beside himself with rage. "What a shameless lad! You were so sincere and earnest in your words when you asked for my younger sister's hand in marriage, and now you're turning against me. You, you despicable scum!"

Luo Mu strode a few steps forward, not wanting to engage further with Cai Yu. "Open the doors quickly and surrender, or we'll break the doors down!"

Cai Yu gripped the broadsword at the side of his waist and hollered, "I'll see who dares to force their way in! My blade hasn't aged one bit. I'll kill whoever dares to come forth!”

But even if Cai Yu cut an imposing presence, he still would not be able to withstand a siege on all sides. The guards in the Cai’s residence were all ordinary people, and they all had the urge to flee when they saw the sinister glints of the broadswords and swords outside.

Under the protection of his bodyguards, Cai Yu avoided the rain of arrows that had been unleashed upon him. “I’ll handsomely reward anyone who guarded the compound! My position in Chazhou was personally appointed by the young master; he even calls me ‘pa’. Luo Mu, if you harm even one strand of my hair tonight, the young master will definitely make you pay back two-fold in the future!”

Before Luo Mu could respond, he heard Kong Ling, who was standing next to him, speak, “And who exactly does this Chazhou belong to? It’s enough that you’re the Yan Clan’s lackey, yet you even want the commoners of Chazhou to join you and be his lapdogs too?! You’ve played accomplice to a villain and helped him do wrong by the people, causing many innocent commoners to die! Let’s not even begin to talk about tonight; we’re definitely taking you down!”

The main gates of the outer courtyard had already been smashed open the moment Kong Ling’s words left his mouth. Even as he watched them rush in, Cai Yu refused to resign to his fate and followed the few remaining men in his residence as they fought and retreated. In under an hour, they had already been forced back to the perimeter of the courtyard in the rear.

In the vast expanse of the night, Cai Yu became a prisoner caught in the trap. He had spent half his life being chivalrous, yet he had fallen, all for the word “money”. And now, at the sight of his fortune going up in flames, and of his wives and children weeping, he could not help but feel a sense of grief akin to that of a hero reaching the end of his rope. But it was too late for regrets.

Feeling contemptuous about Luo Mu’s behavior, Cai Yu was determined to fight back until the very end. It was pandemonium on the streets outside of the Cai Residence, with different gangs all joining the fray. Cai Yu’s men were decreasing by the minute. Just as Cai Yu had completely lost heart and was ready to take his own life, he suddenly heard a cry of “gege” from amidst the chaos.

Luo Mu, lamenting the ill-timed arrival, turned back and shouted, “Send the young madam back!”

Concubine Cai had always been pampered and coddled, and yet, she had run all the way in her haste to hurry over, losing not just her shoes in the process but also falling and injuring her arms. She couldn't care less about her sweat-drenched hair as she pointed at Luo Mu and trembled uncontrollably. For all her shrewish nature, there were now only insuppressible chokes of sobs emitting from her throat. "Luo... Luo Mu! You..." she wailed, "You despicable and vile man!"

Although cognizant of Kong Ling who stood by him, Luo Mu could not help but take two steps forward.

Concubine Cai's hair was disheveled as she held her head high amidst her panic. She spat at Luo Mu, tears streaming down her face. "I gave my heart to a dog! How could I have been deceived by a bastard like you?!"

Concubine Cai and Cai Yu were siblings, with a large age gap between them. Although she was his little sister, Cai Yu nurtured her like his very own daughter. Brother and sister had both grown up depending on each other and were thus very close to each other.

Seeing Cai Yu completely surrounded, Concubine Cai understood that Cai Yu would not escape death tonight. So she covered her face and cried out, "It was me who brought harm upon gege!"

When Kong Ling saw Concubine Cai covering her face, he realized things were about to go south and hurriedly said, "Quick, stop her!"

But it was too late. Concubine Cai made use of the action to pull out a golden hairpin in her hair. In the blink of an eye, blood had already splattered all over the silks and satins she was adorned in. Cai Yu was overwhelmed with grief at seeing this. Tears streamed down his cheeks as he stood among the crowd, his head tilted back as he shouted in sorrow, "My silly sister, it's clearly I who have ruined you!"

With that, he severed the idea of brandishing his broadsword to slit his own throat. With a loud bellow, he charged into the group of bandits and hacked away at several people until he eventually died of exhaustion, but even then, he was still shouting before his death, "I am Cai Yu of Chazhou. My time has thus come to an end!"

When the first glimmer of dawn appeared during the hour of mao<sup>1</sup> after a night of chaotic battle, the strife in the city had already ceased. Nearly half of the Cai's residence courtyard walls had collapsed, its prosperous image of yesterday completely evaporated. Attendants and maidservants swept the gold and silver ornaments in the residence into their bundles, taking it along with them as they fled into the night.

Kong Ling stood at concubine Cai's side and watched as the pool of blood stained the hem of his robe. Cai Yu's entire family lost their lives this night, most of them killed under the bandits' blades. Kong Ling waited for Luo Mu to come and collect concubine Cai's body for burial, only to hear an attendant say that Luo Mu had gone over to check out the Cai clan's granaries.

Kong Ling stood where he was and waited right until late afternoon. But Luo Mu never came.

Once Cai Yu fell, the grain stores in Chazhou all came under Luo Mu's charge. He was now not only sitting on Cai Yu's grains, but also Cai Yu's wealth. Cizhou's grain wagons finally entered the city, but the money he promised Cizhou earlier never materialized. The price of grain in the city was still one tael for one dan of rice, the same price Cai Yu had set while he had been alive.

Fei Sheng said with a sigh in the courtyard, "While I was still in the imperial prison in the past, I often heard that son of a bitch Han Cheng talk about how fieldwork isn't easy, and how the local "officials" are all very shrewd. Their notoriety is truly well-deserved."

"Their craftiness is much stronger than the officials in the capital." Qiao Tianya pillowed his head on his arms and laid down on a stone bench to bask in the sun. "No wonder he could be the prefectural prefect in Chazhou for so many years. He sure is something."

Beside them, Kong Ling brewed tea in wordless silence.

Shen Zechuan, who had been in the principal room, lifted the curtain and emerged. The three of them made to get up, but Shen Zechuan motioned for them not to. "What time is it now?"

Fei Sheng competed to reply, "It's almost noon."

Shen Zechuan grasped his folding fan. Seeing as the sun was blinding, he shook open the fan to cover his eyes. "Chazhou has scored a victory, but we still have yet to hold the celebration feast, right? Go send Luo Mu an invitation. Tell him that we'll be having a drink here tonight."

Fei Sheng acknowledged the order and added, "Master, but what if he doesn't dare to come?"

Shen Zechuan revealed his eyes that had a hint of a smile in them. "If he doesn't, then he's a gutsy one."

Fei Sheng could hear his displeasure. He hurriedly retreated out of the room and went over to deliver the invitation.

Kong Ling had been drinking and gambling these few days, looking as if he was having so much fun that he forgot all about his home and duties. But he still stood up when he saw Shen Zechuan coming down the stairs.

Shen Zechuan said, "I heard it was Mister Chengfeng who paid for concubine Cai's burial."

Kong Ling folded his arms in his sleeves and touched the remaining fried soybeans in his sleeve pocket. "Oh. Yes, it was me."

Shen Zechuan closed his folding fan and looked at Kong Ling for a moment.

Kong Ling thought Shen Zechuan was displeased, but he had no wish to explain further.

He did not expect Shen Zechuan to let the matter drop. Instead, Shen Zechuan drank half a cup of tea and probed no further.

Kong Ling remembered the wound on Shen Zechuan's left palm that night and felt even more tired. He was conscious of the fact that he had barely done anything this trip, and yet he was even more exhausted than he had been in Cizhou.

To Fei Sheng's surprise, Luo Mu not only showed up that night, but he had also come alone. The cook in this residence was new, and his culinary skills were just passable. Shen Zechuan did not nitpick on the food, so even though this was proclaimed a feast, the dishes were only very slightly more exquisite than usual. Refugees were still a common sight in Chazhou at present, and as such, Shen Zechuan ate simply too.

The atmosphere between both parties was harmonious by the time they had been through three rounds of wine. Fei Sheng noted that whether it was Shen Zechuan or Luo Mu, they were both cordial and amiable, neither one displaying any sign of displeasure over the standstill the last couple of days.

Luo Mu made a toast as he spoke. "We are all good to discuss matters about the grain now that everything is in place, but I was just wondering when is the Vice Commander planning to return? It will be easier for me to get the advisors in my residence to draft up a charter if I have a date to work with."

Cai Yu had already been dead for three days. This matter had been discussed long before they took action. Luo Mu's refusal now to proceed as per the initial agreement was because he was intentionally trying to stall for time and go around in circles with Shen Zechuan. It was just as he had said to Kong Ling, every increase of grain by one dou per tael equal to a reduction in profit, and that was all real money at stake there. And now that all this money had landed in his hands, it was simply impossible to expect him to forfeit it the way he used to think.

There was a girl and her blinded old man in the hall singing a tune. As Shen Zechuan watched the old man play the erhu,<sup>2</sup> he tapped his fingers gently on his fan, as though he had not heard Luo Mu. It was only after the tune was finished that Shen Zechuan responded with a smile, "I'm on a tight schedule; it'll be in the next two days."

Luo Mu looked to be in a spot as he spoke. "Two days is too much of a rush. Can't the Vice Commander stay for a few more days? Chazhou has many scenic spots that the Vice Commander has yet to visit."

Shen Zechuan's gaze shifted and landed on Luo Mu's face. "My family at home are worried, and I'm anxious to return."

Shen Zechuan's answer had been gentle, but Luo Mu unwarrantedly reined in his frivolity. He straightened up in his seat and said with a solemn expression, "That's true. How about this then? The Vice Commander may return first, and when my side is done drafting up the charter, I'll send someone to bring it over. Chengfeng can stay to supervise and act as a witness."

Kong Ling was about to speak up when Shen Zechuan tapped his fan lightly against the edge of the table at the same moment. He then kept his mouth shut and did not speak.

Holding onto his fan, Shen Zechuan kept his eyes on Luo Mu even as he spoke to the blind old man. "Play another tune, one from Chazhou. Doesn't Chazhou have that song<sup>3</sup> 'To Kill A Bandit'?"

That blind old man gave a slight nod of his head and shifted a little to get his granddaughter to switch over to the pipa<sup>4</sup> and start playing.

Shen Zechuan did not respond to Luo Mu's words, and Luo Mu, who sat across from him, did not dare to bring up the matter again. Initially, he could still look at Shen Zechuan in the eyes, but as the tune gradually took on a murderously sinister overtone, he began to sweat profusely.

Shen Zechuan opened the lid of the teacup. "This tea was a gift from Your Excellency. It's good-quality tea. Is it from Hezhou?"

Luo Mu forced out a laugh. "We found them from our search of the Cai's Residence. I'm not knowledgeable about tea, so it's better to present this to the Vice Commander as a show of my respect."

Shen Zechuan smiled and replied, "I don't like tea."

The girl's fingers slid along the pipa. The clanging of the pipa was just like slashes of blades slicing through the air to perforate into his ears and rupture his eardrums, so intense was it that Luo Mu's back was soaked with sweat. This one song felt unbearably endless to him. That entire table full of dishes had already gone cold, the most striking of which was the Lion's Head<sup>5</sup> in front of him. By the time Luo Mu left the feast, his legs had already gone numb.

Shen Zechuan stood under the eaves and said to Fei Sheng, "Send His Excellency back. It's a long journey to make."

Luo Mu forced himself to bow, looking over at Kong Ling several times before finally being led out the door by Fei Sheng. In no more than four hours on the very same night, the previously agreed-upon documents and money were all delivered to Shen Zechuan's residence. As he lay awake in the middle of the night, Luo Mu could only think of one thing, and it was that Shen Zechuan knew what he had been planning to do.

Luo Mu had been stalling for time because he wanted to send off Shen Zechuan and wait for the message from the Yan clan originally meant for Cai Yu. Cai Yu was no more, but he had stepped forth. He could also do what Cai Yu did for the Yan clan. The price of grain offered by Cizhou was indeed low, but that was only from the standpoint of the commoners. There was nothing beneficial in it for Luo Mu at all. He might not even be able to get that small profit he used to get from staying by Cai Yu's side.

He initially thought that Shen Zechuan had not brought that many men along and so would not dare to lay a hand on him. Then, by the time Shen Zechuan returned to Cizhou, Luo Mu would already have been in contact with the Yan clan. When the time came for Cizhou to consider coming back to collect their debt, he would have the backing and confidence to reject Cizhou.

However, Shen Zechuan's meaning tonight was clear. He had not fallen for Luo Mu's ploy at all. He was in a rush, and if Luo Mu couldn't get matters settled and placed his hopes on the Yan clan of Hezhou instead, then Shen Zechuan would dare to make his move and kill Luo Mu right away. That song was as clear of a response as ever.

Closing his eyes, Luo Mu thought about Shen Zechuan's actions outside the city. A man who even dared to put his own life at stake would not care about the consequences of killing him at all. Before they took action against Cai Yu, Shen Zechuan had said that "they were here to do business". Now that Luo Mu thought about it, he realized that those words had also been an early warning from Shen Zechuan to him.

Two days later, Fei Sheng remained stationed in Chazhou, where he could keep track and take records of the prices as well as keep an eye on Luo Mu. Cizhou's grain wagons entered the granaries, with the shopkeeper from the cosmetics shop keeping the accounts for them. And so, the grain trade between Cizhou and Chazhou was decided. The price Shen Zechuan settled on with Zhou Gui and the rest back in Cizhou was one tael for one dan and eight dou of rice, but it was now a little higher at one tael for one dan and six dou of rice. This price, though, was already lower than Qudu.

By buying the grains from Cizhou, Luo Mu not only had to set up booths to hand out porridge, but he also had to think of the most effective way to optimize the money being spent. Chazhou's problem of utmost priority was re-registration in the census register. He now held the food of the small-time bandits in his hands; he could enlist them in the garrison troops. There were still some issues when it came to the follow-through, but all of these could be discussed again when the large batch of grain arrived from Cizhou. With Fei Sheng here, they could also keep a constant eye on the movements of the Yan Clan in Hezhou.

Shen Zechuan had successively taken out two of the Yan Clan's main forces in Zhongbo, and the Yan clan was not one to forget about this debt. They initially had nothing to do with each other before, but now, he had to put his attention on Zhongbo, on Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan did not stay for long. He got on the horse carriage that very day and left. Just as they were almost out of Chazhou's territory, they suddenly heard someone in a carriage chasing after them from behind.

Qiao Tianya lifted a corner of the curtain and whispered to Shen Zechuan, "It's Luo Mu."

Luo Mu was here to see them off, but Qiao Tianya said Shen Zechuan was not feeling well today, so he let that matter drop. He was mainly here to see Kong Ling off, anyway. Both of them got off their carriages and walked for a while along the public road.

Luo Mu took out the pastries wrapped in oil paper from his arms and said, "You loved to eat these back at the academy. I saw someone selling them when I stepped out and bought them in passing. Take it with you to eat during the journey."

Kong Ling looked at the oil paper. "It was so many years ago, and you still remember it."

Luo Mu smiled ruefully. "It's... something I ought to remember. Will you come along with the next batch of grain wagons?"

Kong Ling took the oil paper and walked a couple of steps. He did not answer.

Luo Mu looked at Kong Ling like how he had always done so many years ago.

Kong Ling squeezed that bundle of pastries and said inexplicably, "Back then when we left the academy, you asked if I was going to Qudu, and I didn't answer. We later went our separate ways. Have you ever gone back for a look?"

Luo Mu said, "When I left the academy, I headed west with my family and lived in Qudu for quite some years..."

Kong Ling turned his head back and finally looked Luo Mu in the eyes. "Mengzheng."

Luo Mu waited for a moment, but Kong Ling did not continue. He could not help but laugh. "Later, while I was in Qudu, I heard that you threw in your lot with Tantai Long and worked under his command. He's a good official, and you guys have achieved quite the result there too... Why didn't you marry?"

Why didn't I marry.

Kong Ling silently repeated it to himself and slowly smiled. He was already old, and yet at present, he was giving off an aura of gentleness and composure that he had possessed in his youth. Somehow, there was still will and spirit in this pair of eyes that had already turned cloudy. He grasped that bundle of pastries tightly and merely said, "... I should leave now."

The wind surfed past the blades of grass. Kong Ling turned around. He did not wait for Luo Mu's answer.

Luo Mu stood in the wind and watched as Kong Ling's sleeves and robes fluttered along with the breeze. His throat tightened. He could not help but take a step after him; he even reached out with his hand. The white hair mixed in Kong Ling's bun disappeared in the wind, covered by the dancing leaves. In his trance, Luo Mu saw time as it was many years ago.

Kong Ling missed many a number of things in this life of his, but that was not because he never tried to fight for them. He once tossed and turned in bed because of an invitation, but all he got after pacing to and fro as he waited in the academy was a bout of seventh month's rain. He waited in that rain until his eyes were wet. And from then on, he went away to a distant land far from home.

Mengzheng was a free-spirited man.

This was something Kong Chengfeng came to understand in that rain. Many years later, he waited again, but all he had to show for that endeavor in the end was a robe with a bloodstained hem. No matter which time it was, Luo Mu never came.

From then on, Kong Ling and Luo Mu never saw each other again.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 卯时 5-7am based on the system of two-hour subdivisions used in former times

- 2.
3. 二胡 Erhu, a two-stringed bowed musical instrument.
4. Specifically 词 ci, a form of classical Chinese poetry dating from the Tang dynasty, in which verses are written to fit pre-existing tunes, often in lines of varying length.

- 5.
6. 琵琶 Pipa, a four-stringed Chinese musical instrument, belonging to the plucked category of instruments.
7. 狮子头 Lion's Head, or stewed meatball, is a dish from the Huaiyang cuisine of eastern China; nothing to do with real lions, these are large pork meatballs that are steamed/braised and served with vegetables

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 142 : INKLING

Translated with: Jia<3

Who exactly was the young master in white handing out porridge on the outskirts of the city? Countless commoners inside and outside the city were all scrambling over themselves to guess. Some said he was an adviser of Zhou Gui; some said he was a distant nephew of Kong Ling. Rumors flew all over without a single concrete explanation. It was only when Shen Zechuan left the city that his identity as the eighth common son of the Shen clan spread like wildfire and promptly became the talk of the town in Chazhou.

Compared to the storm of public opinion in the city, Shen Zechuan's return journey was calm and quiet; it could even be said to be silent. They returned along the public roads, in not that much of a hurry.

Because Shen Zechuan had fallen ill once on his way over. Kong Ling and Qiao Tianya went to great pains to make prior arrangements before they embarked on the journey back; they even bought an overcoat from a peddler from Hezhou, just to cope with the sudden turn of cool weather during their journey.

Kong Ling, being attentive, told Qiao Tianya, "It'd be better to get a physician to take a look at the Vice Commander when we return. He can afford to build up his health while he's at home. Otherwise, we're all going to be on tenterhooks if he has to venture out again on business the next time."

Qiao Tianya held the bowl of water in his hands and looked at the horse carriage parked under the shade of trees. "Where are we going to find a good physician? With the way my master's health is... only a formidable physician would be able to make a diagnosis. As his guards, there is no matter concerning our master that is troublesome. I'm just worried that my master will feel apologetic for inconveniencing us."

Kong Ling knew nothing of Shen Zechuan's consumption of medicine in his early years; he always thought that Shen Zechuan was just not in good health. But from the way Qiao Tianya put it, Shen Zechuan used to be in better health back in Qudu than he was now.

Qiao Tianya drank a sip of water and made no further mention of this matter.

He had been feeling bored during the journey these two days, and thus he had repeatedly thought back to that night the bandits went on a rampage to hurt the others. He felt that even if Shen Zechuan wanted to deploy the trick of injuring himself in order to trap the enemy, he should not have been so badly hurt. Once his body was used to reacting swiftly, it would be even tougher for him to control himself from warding off the blow right that very instant.

Qiao Tianya had seen Shen Zechuan draw his blade before. To the others, Yang Shan Xue was too long, but because Shen Zechuan was swift enough, it was solely just right for him. Qiao Tianya saw the wound on Shen Zechuan's palm after the incident and found this injury to be unusual.

Although Shen Zechuan looked as he always did usually and never revealed a word of it, Qiao Tianya guessed that it was for the sake of concealment that Shen Zechuan did not draw his blade recently. If that was truly the case, then Shen Zechuan might have sensed that his body was no longer what it once was much earlier than the people around him. However, it had not even been six months since the day they left Qudu.

This matter had to be conveyed to shifu and the marquis.

As Qiao Tianya thought about it, he splashed away the remaining water, kept away the bowl, and rose to instruct the men around him. "It's almost time. Let's hurry on with the journey."

The sound of movements outside woke Shen Zechuan up. His neck was sore and aching. Thus he leaned his head to one side to rest it against the wall of the carriage and slowly exhaled. The curtains of the carriage were not lowered, and he was too lazy to move, so he remained in this position and watched the trees along the way shift backwards slowly as the horses started to run.

"Where are we?" Shen Zechuan's voice was slightly hoarse.

Qiao Tianya put on his bamboo hat to block out the sunlight and sat outside the curtains to drive the carriage on. "We can arrive at Chazhou's borders tonight. Travel for another two more days, and we'll be within Cizhou's territory."

This public road had fallen into disrepair in the last few years, and traveling along it made for a journey so bumpy that it gave Shen Zechuan a headache. "The next time the grains are sent to Chazhou, get Luo Mu to fork out money and hire a repair team to fix it up properly."

Qiao Tianya pretended to sigh with emotion, "Then what about when we travel to Libei? The roads there are even more difficult to travel on."

"The tracks in Libei are all bridle paths." Shen Zechuan perked himself up a little as he spoke. "They were constructed to be wide and flat to facilitate the passage of the armored cavalry. Be careful not to let the marquis hear you fabricating stuff up behind his back."

Qiao Tianya took down the stalk of grass he had been holding in his mouth. "It's fine even if I said it to the marquis's face. If he comes back this time, you should first make sure he doesn't see that injury of yours."

Shen Zechuan raised his left hand. Even though the wound had been bandaged, the wound area was prone to being soaked with sweat due to the hot weather, and the sensation was akin to being bitten by ants. "Xiao Ce'an is currently busy; there's no way he'll be back for a month or so. If you don't mention it, he naturally won't find out."

Qiao Tianya bit back down on the stalk of grass.

Shen Zechuan asked, "Are you going to tell on me?"

Qiao Tianya said as he steered the carriage, "Later. Let's talk about it later. I can't hear you clearly from here."

Shen Zechuan lowered his arm. "I'll write him a letter when we get back, and we're considered done with this matter." He thought about it for a moment after saying so, feeling the nape of his neck starting to tingle with itch faintly, then as if remembering the sensation of being bitten by Xiao'Er, he emphasized his words, repeating once more, "The matter is considered over and done with."

Agreeing on the surface, Qiao Tianya pulled at the reins as he thought about it.

As expected, telling the marquis is the best way to handle him. Tried and tested!

Shen Zechuan had left for a little less than half a month this time. Gradually, the heat of the seventh month subsided. Due to its proximity to Libei, Cizhou was much colder than Chazhou, with signs of autumn already beginning to show.

Zhou Gui had been looking forward to their return, and he started waiting outside the city very early on. Upon seeing the horse carriage approach, he lifted his robes and walked over with a beam. “Vice Commander, Chengfeng! It has been hard on you the entire journey. Please enter the city now. I’ve already prepared a feast to welcome you back!”

They paused for a bit outside of the city gates to exchange courtesies before heading in together. Zhou Gui hosted the feast in his own residence, hardly discussing official affairs at the table. He knew that Shen Zechuan had fallen ill during the journey, and so after the meal was over, he personally saw Shen Zechuan out of the residence. He emphasized that there was no urgency regarding the affairs on hand, so there would still be time for a discussion after the Vice Commander had rested for the night.

Even then, Shen Zechuan still had Qiao Tianya remain in the Zhou residence, so that when Zhou Gui and Kong Ling gathered the fellow advisors in the study to discuss the trip to Chazhou, Qiao Tianya could stand by to listen and answer any questions so as to not slow down the proceedings.

On the other end, Ji Gang, who had also been waiting for a long time, came over to receive Shen Zechuan when he saw the latter coming from where he stood at the entrance of the alley a distance away. The sky had turned to dusk, and with Shen Zechuan’s sleeves hanging down, Ji Gang did not see his injury. He gave Shen Zechuan a once-over, and followed up with a question, “How did you fall sick on the road? I even asked Songyue to prepare a coat in advance, worried that the weather would change while you were travelling.”

Shen Zechuan lifted his right arm and led his shifu through the door. “It’s just a cold; I’m fine, it’s no big deal. Has shifu taken your meal yet? I sat down for a meal earlier in the Zhou residence, but I haven’t eaten my fill yet.”

Ji Gang walked side by side with Shen Zechuan through the door. He still meant to ask about his illness, but Shen Zechuan’s “haven’t taken my fill” steered him off course, and he happily said, “I’ve guessed it. I knew you’d arrive home today, so I made a special trip out this morning to choose some plump fishes. What do you want to eat? Shifu will prepare it now for you. They have already been cleaned up, and the ingredients are all prepared and ready, so it’ll be ready in no time!”

Ding Tao came up from behind them and poked out his head. “Young Master, Young Master is back!”

Li Xiong followed suit behind him and shouted “Young Master” too. Ding Tao’s sparrow leaped onto his shoulder and chirped away. It was merely a few steps from the entrance to the courtyard, and yet it was even more lively than it was outside. The flowers and plants in the courtyard had been tended to with such care that they were in an even better condition than they had been before he left. The hall of the principal room was spacious, and the bamboo blinds had all been lifted; it looked comfortable.

Shen Zechuan ate another meal with Ji Gang and asked about Ding Tao’s and Li Xiong’s progress in their martial arts. Fortunately, it was his left hand that was injured, and he rested it on his knee the entire time during the meal, so Ji Gang did not suspect a thing. The lively vibe in the room kept up until the hour of zi,<sup>1</sup> when Ji Gang told Shen Zechuan to rest early. As it was Qiao Tianya’s turn to be on duty tonight, he took up Ding Tao and Li Xiong away.

It was only when the room fell silent that Shen Zechuan breathed a sigh of relief and took off his outer robe. The maidservants let down the curtain and lit the incense. All along, no one was permitted to remain in the room to serve at night, so the maidservants withdrew from the room to the hallway, leaving only Shen Zechuan behind.

Shen Zechuan took a bath, changed his clothes, and returned to the room where he put on the outer robe again. Then he lit a lamp and began to write a letter. At the first quarter of the hour of chou,<sup>2</sup> Qiao Tianya returned and set the new book Zhou Gui and the rest had newly drafted up on Shen Zechuan’s desk.

Shen Zechuan sealed the letter and asked, “What’s the latest news in Libei?”

Qiao Tianya, who had his coat over his arms, said, “Bad news. It’d be better for Master to hear it tomorrow morning so that you can get a good night’s sleep tonight.”

Shen Zechuan flipped through the book. “The worst news I can hear is that those from Biansha have already fought their way to our threshold. So go ahead and tell me.”

Qiao Tianya turned the chair over and sat astride it. “Not to that extent. It’s the marquis. The marquis brought the Imperial Army into Libei territory, but he did not head north back to Dajing to meet with the Hereditary Prince. Instead, he went to Bianbo Camp near Zhongbo. The marquis stayed in Bianbo Camp for a night, then led the troops east the next day to launch an assault on the Shasan Camp, thereby scoring a military achievement and distinguishing himself to His Lordship the Prince.”

Shen Zechuan lifted his eyes and thought for a moment. He smiled. “The Shasan Camp is no small achievement.”

“Right?” Qiao Tianya picked up the conversation. “Such a significant merit ought to be rewarded.”

On hearing this, Shen Zechuan asked, “What did His Lordship reward him with?”

Qiao Tianya stretched out a finger. “One camp.”

Shen Zechuan raised his eyebrows slightly.

Qiao Tianya continued, “The Bianbo Camp. His Lordship kept the marquis there and handed over the Shasan Camp, which the marquis fought to take back, to Guo Weili instead. Does Master still remember this person? It’s the same dude who previously framed Gu Jin for colluding with the enemy. The handover between both parties was not pleasant. The marquis retreated to the back, sandwiched between Shasan Camp and the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang. There was completely no sign of him in the battles to the north and east.”

Shen Zechuan released his fingers and closed the book. “The Bianbo Camp is a main camp the Hereditary Prince used as a supply site. By remaining there, Ce’an would be managing Libei’s military supplies and gears.”

However, there was no shortage of generals of military supplies in the Libei Armored Cavalry, so why did Xiao Fangxu insist on getting Xiao Chiye to do it? All else aside, it was far harder for Xiao Chiye to be a general of military supplies than to be a commanding general of Shasan Camp. If Xiao Chiye were in the Shasan Camp, then as long as he led the Imperial Army to fight successful battles with the Biansha men and earned military merits to his name, all sorts of rumors and gossip against him would naturally evaporate into thin air. When the time came for him to step into the battlefield in the north, he would have the confidence and credence to engage with the other Libei commanding generals. But as the general of military supplies in Bianbo Camp, he would be lower in rank than the other commanding generals. He had to heed the requests assigned to him from the various parties and run all over Libei to deliver supplies. This was not only a hard job to do, but would also make him easily susceptible to being bullied and mistreated. When it came to it, his military achievements would not be up to par as the commanding generals fighting battles ahead of him, and yet the hardships he had to put up with would be no less than the others.

After a moment of silence, Qiao Tianya probed tentatively, "Did His Lordship pick up the marquis from somewhere and adopt him? The disparity in his treatment of the marquis and the Hereditary Prince is really great."

Shen Zechuan looked at him and said, "Seems to me like you're the one who was picked up."

Qiao Tianya raised his hands in surrender and shut his mouth.

Shen Zechuan passed the sealed letter to Qiao Tianya and said, "Get someone to deliver it tonight. It's late now; there's no need for you to stand guard outside. Go back to your courtyard and get some rest."

Right before Qiao Tianya was about to step out, Shen Zechuan called out to him.

When he looked back and saw Shen Zechuan's expression, he said in earnest, "I know. I remember it. The part about you getting injured is over and done with. I won't mention it to the marquis."

His quip made Shen Zechuan forget what he was about to say, so Shen Zechuan waved his hand at him in speechless silence as an indication for Qiao Yueyue to leave.

Shen Zechuan did not remain sitting for long after Qiao Tianya left. It was already late at night now. He blew out the lamp and lay on the bed, listening to the croaking of frogs from the courtyard pond. He did not know if it had been Ding Tao or Li Xiong who had caught them and brought those frogs to the pond, but they created such a din that he could not sleep.

It was only after an unspecified amount of time later that Shen Zechuan's consciousness started to dim. There was no one beside him except for the refreshing sweetness of the incense for company, but somehow, it turned into the metallic stench of blood in his dreams. The Chashi Sinkhole, which had not appeared for a very long time, now lay beneath his feet. Shen Zechuan looked down at it, but there was nothing inside.

The faint croaking of the frogs hovered in the air. Shen Zechuan broke into a sweat and subconsciously turned over with his back to the croaking.

There was no snowstorm over the Chashi Sinkhole tonight. The sun rode high up in the sky, blazing to the point Shen Zechuan felt the stinging pain on his skin and sweated profusely. There was evidently no corpse in this pit, and yet Shen Zechuan felt himself surrounded all around by people he could not see. They smothered him, making it hard for him to breathe. He could not help but pull apart his tightly fastened collar. Drops of sweat dampened both of his eyes as he gasped for breath. He saw a person lying in the sinkhole.

It was his own self.

A chill suddenly ran down Shen Zechuan's spine. He thought of Qi Huilian. His teacher shouted for him, but his voice was drowned out by the croaking of the frogs. Shen Zechuan never used to be afraid of returning to the Chashi Sinkhole again; he had no fear of this place at all. Yet, at this moment in time, he had the urge to flee.

Someone approached Shen Zechuan, and Shen Zechuan opened his eyes almost instantly.

Xiao Chiye had only just partially removed his armor as softly as he could. How could he have expected Shen Zechuan to wake up so suddenly? He promptly froze by the bedside, still with his arm guard in his lifted hand.

Both men looked at each other for a moment

Sensing something amiss, Xiao Chiye tossed the arm guard onto the desk and pulled up a portion of his sweat-drenched, narrow sleeves. He squatted at the side of the bed and cupped Shen Zechuan's cheeks with his palms. "What are you peeking at?"

Only then did Shen Zechuan seem to snap back to his senses.

Xiao Chiye drew closer to him and looked at Shen Zechuan with a sharp, penetrating gaze. His eyes were like stars in the pitch-dark room, so bright and calm that Shen Zechuan's mind gradually cleared. Xiao Chiye stroked his slightly damp hair and whispered, "It was such a bumpy ride here. Get Zhou Gui to fix the road as soon as possible. He closed off the city; I squatted outside and yelled for half a day."

For some inexplicable reason, Shen Zechuan was amused into smiling as he nestled in Xiao Chiye's palms. It was then that he woke up from his nightmare. The scene of his own corpse lying at the bottom of the pit was still clearly imprinted in his mind, but in just the twinkling of an eye, he had forgotten it all.

Shen Zechuan let out a partial smile before asking dubiously, "Then how did you get in?"

Xiao Chiye took a deep breath and answered slowly, “I somersaulted over. Lang Tao Xue Jin is still tethered out there.”

NOTE:

The next chapter 143 (° 5 °) is up in advance for readers who have purchased the web novel or physical copies of QJJ. ↓↓↓ Please read the whole section below first ↓↓↓

First things first, regular updates will remain the same @ the current schedule.

But readers who have bought the novel will get chapters in advance (no fixed limit; depends on how fast we go and how long the chapters are really, e.g. we might just post 144 tomorrow or so in advance).

We want to actively encourage readers to buy the novel to support the author whenever possible, so please do so if you can!

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 子时 11pm to 1am
2. 丑时 1-3 am

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 143 : HIDDEN

Translated with: Jia<3

Xiao Chiye's body temperature was running hot. He was bathed in sweat all over after riding for half a night. He retracted his hand and continued to disrobe, looking at Shen Zechuan as the latter sat up and asked, "Have you eaten tonight? I'll look for something to fill your stomach. I met the courier horse delivering your letter on my way back, so I intercepted it, and now the letter you wrote me is with me."

Shen Zechuan, who had been making to get off the bed, paused. He lowered himself and watched Xiao Chiye from that position with a hint of seduction in his gaze, "Where is it?"

Xiao Chiye raised a finger and tapped at his chest.

Shen Zechuan extended his right hand in an expectant gesture to ask for it.

Xiao Chiye placed his armor to the side and rose with his hands on his knees, staring at Shen Zechuan as he did so. "Want it back? Come get it yourself."

Shen Zechuan felt a tingle run down his spine from Xiao Chiye's gaze. He felt his way to Xiao Chiye's chest and slid the pads of his fingers down along his chest. All he could feel was Xiao Chiye's sweat-drenched muscles. He whispered in a soft voice, as if he did not seem to understand, "Give it back."

On the surface, Shen Zechuan still had the dazed look of one still not fully awake, yet his fingertips were feeling Xiao Chiye out with ease and familiarity. His fingers wandered, mindlessly and almost imperceptibly, not minding in the least to let Xiao Chiye know that his appearance now was merely an act.

Xiao Chiye relaxed his breathing, afraid that he would lose himself to his own desires and devour Shen Zechuan clean in just a twinkling of an eye. He seemed to be unmoved, using only an ardent gaze to pursue Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan felt all over that sturdy torso, his breaths intertwining with Xiao Chiye's as he moved. They pressed close together in this position, one higher than the other. Shen Zechuan's expressive eyes glistened with ripples of desire. Despite this, he still spoke guilelessly, “Ce’an, I can’t find it.”

Xiao Chiye allowed Shen Zechuan’s fingers to do as they pleased. He tilted his head slightly, catching a waft of Shen Zechuan’s scent.

Seizing the moment, Shen Zechuan pressed his cheek to him and nuzzled against him. The satiety brimming in the corners of his eyes took hold of Xiao Chiye’s heart, clenching it.

As he perspired, Xiao Chiye laughed out loud—a brief, harsh sound. He set his palm on the small of Shen Zechuan’s back, pulling him so close that Shen Zechuan was practically pressed against him in his embrace. There was no distance between them as they kissed, neck to neck. But while Shen Zechuan was kissing him, Xiao Chiye was biting him.

As Shen Zechuan was pinned down onto the bedding, he swiftly extended his arm and placed his injured left hand onto the nape of Xiao Chiye’s neck. The bedding sunk down under their combined weight. Shen Zechuan’s inner garment was in disarray, and as Xiao Chiye knelt with his head lowered to look at him, a fan fell out.

Shen Zechuan picked the fan up. He had only just grasped it in hand when he saw the letter fall out too.

Xiao Chiye made to pick up the letter, but the sharp-eyed Shen Zechuan deftly used the folding fan to push the letter aside to the edge of the bed. Immediately after, he flipped the folding fan over and propped it against Xiao Chiye’s chin, then lifted his head and planted a kiss on Xiao Chiye’s lips.

Xiao Chiye did not appear to notice his actions, absorbed as he was in the kiss to the point he was roused and poised for action.

Both of them had not done it in quite a while, so now that they had finally just met, Xiao Chiye went along with Shen Zechuan’s teasing. As though he had reached the end of his patience, Xiao Chiye fondled Shen Zechuan until Shen Zechuan was flushed red all over. Waves of passion crashed into Shen Zechuan to the point that he trembled uncontrollably. Shen Zechuan had learned well, no longer the picture of inexperience like he had been back in Qudu.

Shen Zechuan narrowed his eyes, using the last bit of his reason to remind himself to find a way to toss the letter under the bed later... Before he could finish putting together his plan, he was flipped over by Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye held onto Shen Zechuan's waist, admiring the contours of his back as they formed an absolutely beautiful curve.

Shen Zechuan's sweat-soaked inner garment had turned translucent. From the back, it appeared to offer an unobstructed view of the scenic scene underneath, yet it also seemed to be shrouded under a veil of fog—distant and unattainable.

Shen Zechuan looked back, wetting the corners of his lips.

Xiao Chiye went on the offensive to seize his territory—this all belonged to him. The scorching heat. The damp sweat. The moans. The expressions in his eyes. The shivers. Even the scent that Shen Zechuan emitted along with the rocking movements. All of this belonged to him. They were all his—Xiao Chiye's.

Whenever Xiao Chiye's thoughts strayed down this path, a limitless well of exhilaration would surge up inside him. Shen Zechuan knew him too well, and every sultry look he gave him was a knife to the chest. Xiao Chiye exerted himself physically; the more he cherished this man, the more terrifyingly rough he became.

He wanted to caress him to pieces.

Xiao Chiye nibbled on Shen Zechuan's right ear, holding the jade earring between his lips.

Shen Zechuan could not endure such a position; it was buried so deep that his sweat and tears flowed in never-ending torrents.

But there was nowhere for him to escape to; Shen Zechuan's waist and ankles felt as though they had been restrained with a chain. He felt a little strained, and a little pained, yet this pain sent tingles of electricity up his entire body, rendering it limp and numb. It made him forget all of his nightmares. There was only Xiao Chiye, Xiao Chiye, Xiao Chiye—Shen Zechuan shivered, all drenched in sweat. Just as he was about to lose control and let himself go, he murmured, "... Ce'an."

Xiao Chiye was clearly not done, yet Shen Zechuan's soft, lazy call made him come.

Half of Shen Zechuan's body had already sprawled over. He buried his head between his arms and gasped incessantly for breath. He was still trembling slightly. The bedding under his knees was already a wet expanse.

It was in this position that Xiao Chiye bent over and covered Shen Zechuan with his chest. He had yet to withdraw, and as he pressed down on him, he advanced deeper instead of retreating, causing Shen Zechuan to let out a muffled moan. Xiao Chiye offhandedly brushed aside the messy pillows and enveloped him in this way. “Hug you for a good night’s sleep.”

Shen Zechuan’s earlobes had been bitten red, and the exhaled breath of hot air made it numb and sore. He lifted his cheek from his arms, his eyes red and wet as he mouthed to Xiao Chiye: Too mean.

Xiao Chiye kissed him, and he remained motionless. There was a soft wet, watery sound, and only then did both of their ravenousness alleviate some. Shen Zechuan was bearing Xiao Chiye’s weight, and yet he felt incomparably relaxed, as if Xiao Chiye’s presence was his impenetrable shield.

Xiao Chiye caressed him. He understood him all too well. He could tell just how much weight Shen Zechuan had lost just by holding him in his arms. He nudged away the hair by Shen Zechuan’s ear with the tip of his nose and said in hushed tones, “Did things go smoothly in Chazhou? You’ve lost so much weight.”

Shen Zechuan thought for a moment and shook his head.

Xiao Chiye probed, “What happened with Luo Mu? Did he give you the attitude?”

Shen Zechuan pursed his lips tightly and continued to shake his head.

Xiao Chiye exhaled warm air and teased him. “Did the bandits in Chazhou create trouble? I’ll redeploy the Imperial Army over for you.”

Shen Zechuan half-narrowed his eyes. “From missing you.”

Xiao Chiye had yet to answer him.

But Shen Zechuan continued, “It’s rather cold to sleep alone on an empty bed.”

Xiao Chiye embraced him from behind, grasping both of Shen Zechuan’s arms tightly. He started to say something, but then caught a glimpse of white out of the corners of his eyes. He pulled over the left hand Shen Zechuan had been hiding under the blanket and abruptly turned it over, where he saw the gauze wrapped around it. His eyes shifted to Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan did not look at him and buried his head into the beddings.

“Shen Lanzhou.” Xiao Chiye pulled Shen Zechuan’s face back by the chin and enunciated each word, “You. Sure. Know. How. To. Hide. Huh?!”

The next morning, Qiao Tianya headed out of the city early on and led Lang Tao Xue Jin, who had been left outside the city in the cold for the entire night, back. When he arrived at the courtyard, he saw Meng striding around playing by itself under the eaves. He blew a whistle at Meng and asked in a soft voice, "Where's your Master?"

Meng paid no attention to him, not even with a tilt of its head as it went about its own way. It turned back and continued striding as though it had an endless stream of concerns weighing on its mind.

Qiao Tianya saw that the bamboo blinds in the principal room had been lifted, but there was no one in attendance standing under the eaves. It was bright and spacious inside the principal room. Shen Zechuan sat behind the desk with a book in hand covering his face, revealing only a pair of eyes looking across at Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye put up one of his long legs and leaned back in his chair with a hand propped up as he rotated his thumb ring. Although he did not look back, he had already heard Qiao Tianya's footsteps, so he said, "Come in."

Noting something amiss with the atmosphere, Qiao Tianya bent over to enter at the same time that he asked with a smile, "The weather is pretty good today. How about having lunch in the courtyard?"

Xiao Chiye did not answer.

Shen Zechuan shifted his gaze and motioned for Qiao Tianya to continue.

Xiao Chiye said, "You, shut up."

Qiao Tianya, who was standing at the back, sensibly shut his mouth and revealed a can't-help-you-there expression. He felt that he really shouldn't be standing here.

Xiao Chiye rotated past the crack on his thumb ring and caressed it with his finger. He still had a matter on his mind. "Go call Ding Tao over first."

Ding Tao was standing at the courtyard entrance when he saw Qiao Tianya coming out of the principal room. The latter stood under the eaves and beckoned to him, but Ding Tao felt a little reluctant to go. He placed his hands at his back and rubbed at the mud left between his fingers, then shuffled over at snail's pace to the bottom of the steps. Inexplicably feeling a little afraid, he craned his neck and said in a small voice, "I'm here."

Xiao Chiye said, "Get your ass in here now."

Ding Tao jumped up the steps, then slowed down as he cautiously made his way in. He saw Qiao Tianya standing by the side pretending to be a wooden stake, then saw Shen Zechuan looking down at a book, and he felt sure that he was going to get a beating today.

Xiao Chiye turned sideways and asked, "Where did the frogs in the pond come from?"

With his hands behind his back, Ding Tao lowered his head and answered, "Caught them from outside..."

Xiao Chiye said, "It must have been hard catching them from beyond the city and bringing them back home, wasn't it? That's quite some distance."

Ding Tao braced himself and said, "Not, not too bad..."

Xiao Chiye sneered, "Rebelling when no one's at home, aren't you? Before I left, I told someone to clean up the pond, and you turned around and threw frogs into it."

Ding Tao had caught them for fun. He initially planned to put them in his own courtyard, but their courtyard had no pond, and Shen Zechuan wasn't home half a month earlier, so he and Li Xiong had tossed them into the pond after catching a bunch. But in just a couple of days, he had forgotten all about them. Who would have known that the Master would return right then!

Ding Tao stole a glance at Shen Zechuan just as he was done thinking about it.

Xiao Chiye said, "Who are you looking at?"

Ding Tao instantly withdrew his gaze and lowered his head like a timid quail to listen to the lecture.

"Go." Xiao Chiye continued. "Get rid of all of them before the hour of you<sup>1</sup> today. If I hear the frogs croaking again tonight, I'll get someone to fish them up, bring them to your room and make you sleep with them for company."

How would Ding Tao dare to raise any objections? He nodded his head vigorously, then leaped up and dashed out of the room onto the hallway shouting, "Daxiong—" He was only just done yelling when he belatedly covered his mouth and whispered in a particularly small voice, "Come catch the frogs!"

Shen Zechuan changed his posture and held the book steady.

Xiao Chiye looked at him, although he spoke to Qiao Tianya, "What happened during the trip to Chazhou? Your Master's recount isn't clear. You tell me."

Qiao Tianya scratched his head. He was now starting to envy Fei Sheng, who was still in Chazhou. He had a good sleep last night, but he had been neglecting his appearance lately; he did not even have the time to shave as he stood in the morning light and spilled it all out in a concise and comprehensive manner.

Qiao Tianya did not even hide Shen Zechuan's illness. If Xiao Chiye had not returned, then his lack of mention was because of Shen Zechuan's instruction. However, now that Xiao Chiye was back, Qiao Tianya took the opportunity to give Xiao Chiye a reminder.

Once Qiao Tianya was done, he did not wait for their instruction before he added on, "The discussion of the affairs over in the Zhou's residence last night isn't done yet. Since Master is not heading out today, then I'll set off now."

With that, he made his way out from the bamboo blinds, fleeing even faster than anyone else.

Shen Zechuan did not sleep for long last night, and now he was feeling sleepy reading the book. His gaze shifted over to Xiao Chiye's face. When he saw Xiao Chiye looking at him, he blinked, as if he had only just noticed it, putting on a pretty convincing act.

Xiao Chiye said nothing.

Shen Zechuan loosened his grip and revealed his face. "A-Ye, I'm so hungry."

Xiao Chiye folded up that opened letter and stuffed it back in the same way it was before.

Shen Zechuan probingly stretched his leg out and stepped on the tip of Xiao Chiye's shoe. He set the book aside on the table and bent over, the tip of his foot nudging along Xiao Chiye's calf.

Xiao Chiye stared at him and said callously from a small distance, "You've knifed me in the heart so bad it's been torn to shreds. It's too late now. Shen Lanzhou, I'm dead."

NOTE:

The next chapter 144 is up in advance for readers who have purchased the web novel or physical copies of QJJ. ↓↓↓ Please read the whole section below first ↓↓↓

First things first, regular updates will remain the same @ the current schedule.

But readers who have bought the novel will get chapters in advance (no fixed schedule/limit; depends on how fast we go and how long the chapters are really).

We want to actively encourage readers to buy the novel to support the author whenever possible, so please do so if you can!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 144 : ORANGE JASMINE

Translated with: Jia<3

Xiao Chiye, having rushed his way back on his horse at top speed, rested for a night, although he had to get on his horse and head back after the hour of zi<sup>1</sup> tonight. He ran on a tight schedule, and he had gone to great efforts to painstakingly save up these two days of free time. He had been on the move for eight or nine days in a row in order not to delay the transportation of supplies to the site of battle. And he had done it all just to see Shen Zechuan.

But who would have thought that he would end up so angry?

Xiao Chiye held up Meng and removed the anklet on Meng's leg before putting it back on, causing Meng to flap its wings and throw a tantrum. Xiao Chiye threw a tantrum too. He was vexed, feeling angrier the more he thought about it.

Ji Gang returned from his stroll with his birdcage in hand. He was taken aback to see Xiao Chiye, but after a moment of hesitation, he entered all the same. Xiao Chiye paid his respects to the shifu. Due to Xiao Chiye's height, Ji Gang had to raise his head to look at him.

"The war in the north is in a critical situation." Ji Gang handed over the birdcage and said, "Your shifu must have been having a tough time fighting battles."

Xiao Chiye hung up the birdcage and said, "It has been tough on him. Shifu often thinks of you and mentions you from time to time."

Ji Gang placed his hands behind his back and said, "I've never fought a battle, so I can't be of help there. You rushed back in such a hurry; is there an important matter you have to attend to?"

Xiao Chiye thought not yet, although the reply from his mouth was, "The Beiyuan Hunting Grounds have been given to me, and the Imperial Army intends to remain stationed there. I came back to ask Lanzhou about the progress. Once it's almost time, I'll arrange for someone to come over."

Ji Gang knew that these were all matters they spoke of in detail and at length, so he nodded and did not probe further.

It was rare for Xiao Chiye to come across Ji Gang, so he seized the opportunity to say, “Did Lanzhou fall ill on the way to Chazhou? Shifu, he’s a picky eater. With you to keep an eye on him back at home, he would still pick a little of each dish to eat a little. Even when he falls ill, he is willing to take his medicine. But once he’s out on business, everyone around him listens to him, and without anyone to keep watch on him, he’d dare to pick and choose his food.”

Ji Gang was reminded of this as soon as he heard Xiao Chiye, “Oh, right! I was going to give him a piece of my mind yesterday!”

“He steered you away from the topic.” Xiao Chiye finally stopped tormenting Meng and lifted his arm to let it go. “He has a guilty conscience. No doubt he wouldn’t dare to mention it to you.”

Ji Gang nodded, but then, sensing something odd, he asked, “Why would he have a guilty conscience? Is Chuan-er hiding something else from me?”

“Yeah.” Xiao Chiye said with a slight furrow of his brows. “There is a large gash on his left hand. The return journey was long, and they didn’t change the dressing meticulously enough on the way back. When I saw it last night, the wound on his palm was almost festering from all the sweating.”

The color drained from Ji Gang’s face. He hurriedly followed up with a question, “Where’s he?”

“Sleeping.” Xiao Chiye paused for a moment before continuing. “He slept late last night, and he was pretty exhausted too. He was all worn out when he woke up this morning. Shifu will have to keep an eye on him in the future, lest he doesn’t take his health seriously. I’m far away in Libei, and plenty of what I know depends on what he shares with me in his letters. If he has the intention to keep it from me, then I would be kept completely in the dark.”

Ji Gang straightened up. “I have to watch him change his dressing.” Then, he thought the better of it and sighed. “He wasn’t quite nursed back to health back then when we were staying at the temple. The physicians we called for were all useless men who could not come to a diagnosis. His body is weaker than others. The longer time elapses, the more it has to be taken care of. You know it too. When he entered the capital, he was first tortured in the imperial prison followed by a flogging, and then there was your kick... That was one brutal kick! If not for my old acquaintances in the Imperial Bodyguards coming to his aid on the sly, Chuan-er would've been long dead. His health was in a terrible state at that time and to hide it from the others, he took medicine. Now I'm worrying day and night, precisely because I'm afraid."

Xiao Chiye kept silent for a moment, then suddenly lifted the hem of his robe and fell to his knees. He set both palms squarely on the ground and kowtowed formally to Ji Gang.

Ji Gang was promptly stunned. "What are you doing?"

Xiao Chiye maintained his position and spoke with his head bowed to the ground. "Six years ago, when I rode my horse across Zhongbo, the man I hated the most was Shen Wei. I held him in contempt for abandoning the city and fleeing, and I also feared the Empress Dowager's support for her puppet, and so I kicked Lanzhou in Qudu. Shifu is right. My kick back then had been brutal. I'd done it with the intent to take his life."

Ji Gang choked, momentarily tongue-tied. Afraid that Shen Zechuan could hear him from inside the room, he turned his head away and let loose a heavy-hearted sigh.

Xiao Chiye paused for a moment, then continued, "It's all my fault that Lanzhou is in such ill health today. The physicians in Zhongbo are incapable; I've already gone and invited Venerable Yideng over. When the war subsides after autumn, my shifu will come and take his pulse too. Even if Lanzhou is utterly difficult to care for, I still want to do it. But I'm currently stationed far away in Libei, and the deliveries of provisions for the military cannot be delayed; If I cannot see him, I don't feel at peace. Incidents like what happened in Chazhou cannot keep happening, but I have neither family nor close friends in Zhongbo, and can only ask this of shifu. Shifu, Lanzhou abruptly came face-to-face with adversity in his youth, and he likes to keep things to himself. Even when he's in pain or sorrow, he keeps mum about it. But he treats you as his father. As long as you're by his side, he will take your feelings into consideration and show more regard for his own health. I don't have any other request; all I ask is for you to scold him a little more, so that he will know the errors of his ways and feel pain—the next time he does something like this, shifu, lash out at me, Xiao Ce'an!"

Ji Gang stood rooted to the spot, stunned and stupefied, feeling as if there was something not quite right with those words, yet at that point in time he could not quite put his finger on what exactly was wrong with it. He looked towards the window, where he heard a light clink of a teacup from the other end of the bamboo blinds, just one sound, and then all was quiet again.

The frogs in the pond had been entirely removed, and the courtyard was very peaceful after dinnertime.

Xiao Chiye went to have a shower after his meal. Lang Tao Xue Jin and Meng had already been fed. Shen Zechuan stood under the eaves and scooped up a handful of the newly planted orange jasmine. There was no one else in the courtyard, but there was a small table with snacks under the eaves, bathed in the evening glow of the sunset. Shen Zechuan sat down and gazed out into the distance at the setting sun, lost in his thoughts.

Xiao Chiye walked out, damp from his shower, and crouched down behind Shen Zechuan as he dried his hair. Shen Zechuan grasped the orange jasmine and turned his head back. Xiao Chiye lowered his head and kissed Shen Zechuan. The setting sun was a hue of reddish-orange, and the world, silent and still; even the wind was tactful enough to leave this portion of the courtyard to just the two of them.

Shen Zechuan suddenly turned around and pounced on Xiao Chiye. Partially leaning back against the door frame, Xiao Chiye hugged Shen Zechuan tightly and pressed the tip of his nose against Shen Zechuan's cheek, saying in a fierce tone, "You're pressing against my injury."

Shen Zechuan threw the pieces of orange jasmine into Xiao Chiye's pocket, "Let me touch it."

Xiao Chiye did not let him. He grabbed hold of both of Shen Zechuan's wrists and pulled him towards himself. He was strong and fit, and so it did not strain him the slightest to bear Shen Zechuan's weight. Even the way he sat was carefree and unrestrained. Both of them cuddled together, from dusk to night.

Actually, Xiao Chiye had been very unhappy for the past half-month.

The Shasan camp that the Imperial Army had taken back had been given to Guo Weili, and when Guo Weili came to take over, he bumped into Gu Jin. Both of them found the other an eyesore, and friction was also increasing between the soldiers under their commands. Xiao Chiye swallowed this grievance and took over Wu Ziyu's position in the Bianbo camp, but escorting the transportation of supplies was far more difficult than he had imagined. He was bossed around by the commanding generals of the respective military camps at the site of battle, and even after retreating to Dajing, he still had to submit a full and detailed report to Xiao Jiming regardless of its significance. After leaving the military tents, he had to socialize with the merchants from Luoxia Pass and Huaizhou, often drinking through the night. Then he would have to ride off to another camp, even before the sky had turned bright.

But he had no intention of telling Shen Zechuan any of these.

Xiao Chiye thought of the folk songs of the Hongyan Mountains; he did not know how to sing them and could only hum its melody playfully. Shen Zechuan had his eyes closed as he slept amidst the delicate scent, his head resting against Xiao Chiye, and his hands clutching at the front of Xiao Chiye's robe. Xiao Chiye held him in his embrace, humming until it was about time before he picked him up and carried him back into their room.

Shen Zechuan did not loosen his grip, so Xiao Chiye bent over and blew lightly at his palms, then crouched down and watched for a short while before saying, "I'm still angry."

Shen Zechuan partially opened his eyes and poked at Xiao Chiye's cheeks, whispering, "Don't be."

"All you do is lie to me, you..." Xiao Chiye was momentarily at a loss for words. "Is er-gongzi this easy to deceive? You sure are remarkable to be bullying a pure and innocent young master."

Shen Zechuan rolled over to lie on his stomach and faced Xiao Chiye, head to head.

Damn, this gaze.

Xiao Chiye could only swallow his indignation. He pinched Shen Zechuan's cheeks and spoke in a raspy voice, "Go on, keep acting cute with me. It's futile, Shen Lanzhou. If you give yourself another stab the next time, I'll die immediately in Libei. I won't exist anymore, do you hear me?"

Shen Zechuan nodded, all well-behaved.

Xiao Chiye leaned closer and bumped his forehead against Shen Zechuan's. "I have to go."

Shen Zechuan did not let go. "When will you be back next?"

Xiao Chiye had no answer for that. He stroked Shen Zechuan's cheeks with the pads of his fingers. "Soon. There are still plenty of matters to attend to, but things should get easier once autumn arrives."

It was already the hour of zi. Shen Zechuan released his grip and gazed at Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye had never felt standing up to be this difficult. He swiftly put on his arm guard and let down the bed curtain. Finally, he lowered his hand and brushed across the tip of Shen Zechuan's nose with a finger. "Sleep well, Lanzhou."

Lang Tao Xue Jin left the city under cover of the night, with Meng following Xiao Chiye along as it soared the skies and headed north.

Chen Yang had already come to meet up with him mid-journey. Xiao Chiye could only sleep for a couple of hours upon reaching the Bianbo camp, after which he had to head north to the battlegrounds immediately. At the very exact moment Xiao Chiye left Cizhou, a donkey trotted into the territory of Zhongbo.

This donkey was carrying a man bent over its back. It was impossible to tell if this person was dead or alive. A couple of hungry meowing sounds rang out from within the opening of his sleeve. The man opened his eyes with great difficulty, looked at the pitch-dark road ahead of him, and closed them again.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 145 : BEGGAR

Translated with: Jia<3

Several days later, the garrison troops of Cizhou escorting and transporting the grain wagons arrived in Chazhou. Fei Sheng returned to the residence to give Shen Zechuan a full report of the happenings in Chazhou. At the same time, he handed over his records of the prices of goods in the two prefectures of Huaizhou and Fanzhou. Not only that, he had even gotten to the bottom of Lei Changming's and Lei Jingzhe's backgrounds.

Lei Changming was a native of Chazhou who had his beginnings as an armed escort; this was all open and common knowledge of his background. Fei Sheng, who had made inquiries all over Chazhou with the help from the shops in Juexi, learned that Lei Changming had engaged in the flesh trade during the reign of Yongyi, as divulged by the elderly people in Chazhou. Back then, both prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou saw a burgeoning rise in the numbers of the entertainment quarters across their territories, leading to the proliferation of famous courtesans like Shen Zechuan's mother, Bai Cha. Subsequently, Lei Changming scoured the lands of Dengzhou, hoodwinking innocent and naïve women and reselling them to Dunzhou and Duanzhou as prostitutes. Afterward, Shen Wei ordered for the brothels along the banks of the Chashi River to close down, thereby causing the businesses in Duanzhou to fall into drastic decline. Lei Changming had no connections in Duanzhou and could only look for another way out.

Lei Changming, who had until then been trying to get by, wanted to resume his old trade. He hence capitalized on the reputation of the Zhu Clan and went around making connections with the officials in Zhongbo. In his process of associating with these officials, he found out that these people dreaded the time after spring every year when the Chief Surveillance Bureau would make field trips to conduct inspections and audits. As the Imperial Censors had the right to impeach, the appraisals of the officials involved would undoubtedly be affected. This was an important affair pertaining to their own promotions and transfers, and as such, they did not dare to act rashly and visit the brothels for pleasure.

Lei Changming thus hit upon an idea. He set up a "Mingshu Hall" in Fanzhou, which was a poetry club-cum-teahouse on the surface. In actuality, however, he had the decent women he sourced put up there as secret prostitutes to bribe the various officials. However, this business did not last long either, ruined at the hands of Shen Wei.

At this point in the record, Fei Sheng had specifically made a note at the side.

Shen Wei had spies and informers everywhere in the various prefectures. Ever since he married Bai Cha, he had been rather heavy-handed in his attempts to crush the brothel trade in the various prefectures. Lei Changming's Mingshu Hall had not been established for even a year when it was wiped out at lightning speed by Shen Wei. Abducting and trafficking women of decent origins was punishable by law. To escape responsibility for the crimes, Lei Changming instructed his subordinate to take his place, while he hurried over to the prefecture of Dunzhou where he offered Shen Wei a large sum of cold, hard silver ingots before he managed to extricate himself.

After this incident, Lei Changming reverted to his ways of idling around doing nothing. His wife and son had passed away early, but he did not take a concubine at that point in time. He had a penchant for grooming children ever since he abducted and sold women a long time back. But he was too brutal towards them, and none of those children ever survived. At the end of the reign of Yongyi, Lei Changming took on the Yan clan of Hezhou's job to provide armed escort as a means of livelihood. Subsequently, he got into the Yan clan's good graces. It was from then on he really started to enjoy a meteoric rise.

There was no mention of a jade bead or earring in this record. Shen Zechuan closed the book and contemplated it for a moment. "It's strange. Children who can wear earrings are either wealthy or noble. Even if Lei Changming dared to abduct and traffic those of decent backgrounds in Zhongbo, he would not dare to lay a hand on the noble clans' heirs from the Eight Cities of Qudu."

"Master has guessed it right. I heard about this from my inquiries too, but I can't very well include it in the report without evidence, so I have to report this to you in person." Fei Sheng stood beside the table and turned his head back to look at Li Xiong, who was in the courtyard. "I spoke to that lad too, and I more or less have an idea. During the reign of Yongyi, Lei Changming saved the young master of the Yan clan, Yan Heru. That child did indeed wear an earring. He was a good-looking child too, said to be fair and exquisite, and he was the apple of the Yan clan's eye. Lei Changming took Young Master Yan back. Well, as Master has seen in person, this man was a beast, and he actually harbored indecent thoughts towards that Young Master Yan."

Shen Zechuan snapped his folding fan shut.

Fei Sheng continued, "But he didn't dare to. It just so happened at that time that Shao from the Ministry of War was imprisoned, and the male descendants of the Shao clan were all sentenced to execution. In order to preserve their bloodline, the old matriarch of the Shao clan had the last remaining grandson of lawful birth disguised as a girl. This lawful grandson of the Shao clan was escorted into exile in Zhongbo, where he happened to fall into the hands of Lei Changming."

When Fei Sheng reached this point, Qiao Tianya, who had a book on his face, suddenly sat up. "The Shao clan? The Shao clan from the Ministry of War during the reign of Yongyi? The Ministry of War Vice Minister, Shao Chengbi!"

Fei Sheng clapped his hands. "Right. That's the one. You know him?"

Qiao Tianya stood up in a flash, momentarily stupefied for quite a while before he answered, "Of course I know him... Master, I've told you before that I'm the son of Qiao from the Ministry of War. Shao Chengbi and my father were bosom friends. Not only that, Shao Chengbi was an official that the Grand Mentor single-handedly promoted. It was just that he wasn't good at socializing, so he hardly interacted with the Grand Mentor. Later on, he married the elder sister of the current Minister of War, Chen Zhen. It was because of this that he had a narrow escape when everyone in the Eastern Palace was being hunted down, and that was also how he was spared from being exterminated by the Empress Dowager."

Fei Sheng nodded. "That's what happened. But Shao Chengbi did not make friendly overtures towards the Hua and Pan factions. To remove him, Hua Siqian abused the power of his own authority at the end of the reign of Yongyi and had Ji Lei command the Imperial Bodyguards to frame him as one of the participants of the Eastern Palace's rebellion case, causing all his family possessions and properties to be confiscated and sealed off."

Shen Zechuan then understood. Lei Changming did not dare to lay his hands on Yan Heru, so he used the lawful grandson of the Shao clan as a substitute instead.

Fei Sheng continued, "The lawful grandson of the Shao clan was older than Yan Heru, but even so, he was merely nine years old at that time, and he was a grandchild of lawful birth doted on and pampered by all in the Shao clan. Before Old Matriarch Shao met her end, she pleaded with all her old acquaintances before she could have him swapped over and sent out of Qudu. But who would have thought that he would be ravaged by Lei Changming when he arrived in Zhongbo? Lei Changming was extremely brutal. The first reason was that he always liked to drink wine before doing the deed, and so his restraint was impaired, and he did not hold himself back. The second reason was that he wanted to stamp out the root of future troubles. Drag the child out and bury him once the child was dead, and this matter would be considered over and done with. Cai Yu was the one who asked around and found out about it. My guess is that it's also because of this matter that Lei Changming had a falling out with the Yan clan later."

This was the first assignment Fei Sheng was handling for Shen Zechuan, so he naturally had to do a beautiful job of it. Fei Sheng then continued to give his detailed report on Luo Mu of Chazhou. In the process of listening, Shen Zechuan eyed Qiao Tianya.

Qiao Tianya's mind was preoccupied.

After Fei Sheng took his leave, he took the opportunity to chat with Qiao Tianya in between the changing of shifts.

"There's no need to ask me." Fei Sheng rubbed his hands together, washing the space between his fingers clean. "Any news I have regarding the lawful grandson of the Shao clan came from the bandits in Chazhou. You know this too; he's nowhere as important as Yan Heru, so who would remember his existence back then? Eight or nine out of ten of the people who fell into Lei Changming's hands ended up dead, and even if they didn't..." Fei Sheng sighed, feeling complicated, "There's no way they can continue living."

Qiao Tianya faked a relaxed demeanor and merely said, "Did I even ask you? I didn't plan on asking."

"Fei Sheng looked at him in disdain and used his fingers to gesture at the distance between them. "You know, in all probability, the reason you waltzed over here was to ask about the matter. It has been so many years since this incident. If you really can't get over things, pretend he's still alive."

“There is no ‘pretend’.” Qiao Tianya took a few steps down the stairs and raised his arms to pillow them at the back of his head, squinting his eyes slightly as he faced the sunlight. He spoke with an air of nonchalance, “If he’s dead, he’s dead. It’s so much more pleasantly cool to lie six feet under.”

In just a few days, it’d be the end of the seventh month, where wagons of silver returned as wagons of grain left Cizhou. Autumn was just around the corner, and Zhou Gui was worried that the grains in Huaizhou would be bought up by the other places. Now that they had money, Zhou Gui began discussion with his advisors on the issue; this business with Huaizhou needed to be settled as soon as possible.

Shen Zechuan headed to the study for the discussion, and after listening, he only asked one question, “What does Mister Chengfeng think?”

Kong Ling hesitated for a moment. “As I’ve said to His Excellency last night, going to Huaizhou right now is too hasty. I do not approve.”

Zhou Gui, who was sitting in the less honorary seat next to Shen Zechuan, nodded as he spoke. “Chengfeng did indeed say that when we were discussing the details last night. However, Vice Commander, some parts of Juexi were struck by natural disasters this year, and the Provincial Administration Commissioner, Jiang Qingshan, has also been transferred away. The areas with grain shortage will no doubt have to buy it from other prefectures. Huaizhou is close to Qudu, and the autumn harvest is on the horizon. I’m worried that Juexi will ink a deal with them before we do.”

Zhou Gui’s worries were not without reason. The granaries that Cizhou had emptied out to conduct this trade were meant to be kept for emergency use, so it wasn’t reassuring to be holding on to all these silvers in hand with no grains in their reserves.

During the past few days, Shen Zechuan had been planning out a trip to Huaizhou, but he was hesitant not for just this one reason, but also because Qudu’s transfer papers for Jiang Qingshan had still not been issued. Regardless of whether this person was sent back to Juexi or reassigned somewhere else, he would inevitably affect the trade of grains in Cizhou. If Jiang Qingshan was deployed to Huaizhou, then their business deal with Huaizhou – if negotiated now – was likely to end up voided.

Shen Zechuan was in a quandary. “The concerns of Mister and Your Excellency are not without reason. I’ve also been pondering over the issue regarding Huaizhou for the last few days. According to our earliest proposed plans, it would naturally be better to get it done as soon as possible. But as things stand now, figuring out how to avoid Qudu’s scrutiny is a concern too.”

Kong Ling said from the side, “Moreover, we have to borrow the tracks from Libei for the passage of our money wagons, and this matter still needs to be discussed with the Hereditary Prince. But in all probability, the Hereditary Prince will not stop us. We are borrowing the bridle paths of the Libei Armored Cavalry and converting these silvers into grains to replenish their supplies. At present, Libei will naturally be happy to agree. I’m only worried about one thing, and that is, how do we get past Luoxia Pass? The Luoxia Pass Garrison Troops still fall directly under the jurisdiction and control of Qudu, and they lack neither grain nor money. Libei can still pull some strings with them, but what about Cizhou?”

Given Shen Zechuan’s relationship with Xiao Chiye, he could also ask for a favor with Luoxia Pass on account of their friendly ties when it really boiled down to it. But this was built on the basis that Xiao Fangxu and Xiao Jiming were willing to acknowledge Shen Zechuan. Otherwise, relying on Xiao Chiye alone... well, apologies, the Second Young Master at present doesn’t really have that much of a prestige yet.

By bringing this matter up, Kong Ling was also tactfully conveying the fact that they were not that close to Libei. They had to settle the accounts due if they wanted to borrow the tracks for their own use, and it would not be that easy either if they wanted to borrow troops in the future. At first, they all thought that Xiao Chiye was going back to succeed his father and elder brother and carve out a distinguished career for himself, but based on the way things looked now, Xiao Chiye was even lower in rank than the commanding generals at the site of battle. It was not that generals in charge of supplies were not important, but there was simply no comparison when it came to reputation and prestige.

They discussed in the study until dusk, but still failed to reach a conclusion.

When Shen Zechuan returned to his residence, he saw Ding Tao and Li Xiong waiting to receive him at the entrance.

Ding Tao did not return to Libei, and he was not included in any of the duty shifts either, so he spent the whole day practicing shadow boxing at Ji Gang's side with Li Xiong. They had nothing to do in the afternoon after they were done with training in the morning, and thus both of them ran wild all over the place, playing to their hearts' content for the entirety of the seventh month. Ding Tao was no longer upset now. He had forgotten all about Chen Yang and Gu Jin. There was also no one to nag at him when he ate sweets at night. It was only when he got a toothache that Qiao Tianya would lecture him.

"Young Master, there are quite a number of beggars in the city today." Ding Tao followed Shen Zechuan and said, "They are all starving to the point that they're sallow and emaciated. They said they came from the city of Dancheng. His Excellency Yu went out in the morning to buy an entire bamboo steamer basket worth of steamed buns, and they even fought with one another over those buns."

Shen Zechuan paused in his tracks. Seeing as the sky was still bright, he said to Qiao Tianya, "Let's go take a look."

Cizhou had barely started reorganizing its census registry. If refugees entered, they would all have to head to the prefectural yamen to report their names and places of origin. This was to prevent bandits from sneaking into the city. This matter was already being taken care of. The reason Shen Zechuan especially came down to take a look was because Ding Tao had brought up Dancheng.

When they arrived, Yu Xiaozai was giving out steamed buns. Fei Sheng and Qiao Tianya stepped forward to help, and Yu Xiaozai repeatedly thanked them.

"Youjing." Shen Zechuan spoke gently, "Bring them to the prefectural yamen, and there will be people giving out steamed buns and porridge. There is no need for you to bear the expense."

Yu Xiaozai had come to Cizhou on foot with little money on him. Now that he lost his official position and was unwilling to work for Zhou Gui as an aide, he stayed in Shen Zechuan's residence and let Shen Zechuan support him. But he was very thrifty and often provided literary services to the others. It was only during this period of time he managed to save up a couple of taels, and now they had all been exchanged for steamed buns.

Yu Xiaozai said, "There are only so many rations the yamen can distribute daily. Most of those who come late are the old, weak, sick, and widowed. It's rather pitiful for them to go hungry. In any case, money is but mere worldly possession."

Shen Zechuan was also getting suspicious after seeing such a great number of refugees. The city of Dancheng was one of the eight cities of Qudu. They did not encounter a natural disaster this year, and they even provided supplies to Han Jin's Eight Great Training Divisions. The Imperial Army even had a feast there when they passed by the city, so how could there be so many refugees all of a sudden?

Qiao Tianya was stuffing steamed buns into the hands of the refugees one at a time when he suddenly heard a commotion behind him.

Shen Zechuan shifted his gaze over and saw several ruffians causing a disturbance as they tried to pull away someone else's donkey. Fei Sheng saw Shen Zechuan's expressionless face and promptly bundled up the steamed buns and waved his hand to get the Imperial Bodyguards to go over and pull them apart. He yelled, "What are you people doing there making such a din?!"

One of the ruffians had seen the Imperial Bodyguards at work before. As he was dragged away, with both legs trailing on the ground, he said in a panic, "My good sir, it's not us who are causing a commotion! These few people first said they wanted to sell the donkey, but they wouldn't give it to me after I paid up. Tell me, is this not a scam?!"

On hearing that, Fei Sheng turned his head and spoke down at the men. "Don't you people ever check who is in charge here before coming over to swindle and defraud others? Hurry and give the donkey to him!"

The few disheveled and unkempt men timidly tugged the rope and stuffed it into Fei Sheng's hands. The donkey brayed from the tugs. A hand that had been squeezed back behind them slapped at the ground haphazardly and muttered ambiguously, "That's my donkey..."

Fei Sheng had sharp hearing, but he did not want to complicate the issue, so he pretended not to have heard it. The ruffians stomped on the hand so hard that it clenched into a fist from the pain and pounded on the ground. But an unidentified person at the back pulled him away until that hand abruptly vanished from sight.

Fei Sheng handed the donkey over. Feeling a slight weight on his shoe, he lowered his head for a look. It was a kitten so smeared with dirt that it was all gray and dusty. Fei Sheng bent over to pick it up. "Taozi, here's a little playmate—"

Before Fei Sheng could finish his words, that hand showed up once again, revealing only the tips of its fingers as it dug into the ground until it was all bloodied mud between the crevices of its fingers.

“My... My cat!”

This person crawled over, his forehead scraping against the ground. The ruffian behind saw Fei Sheng turning over and hurriedly dragged the person back by the ankles to hide him.

Fei Sheng realized that this person’s legs were in bad shape and wondered if they had been broken when this person had taken a beating.

NOTE:

The next two chapters 146 & 147 are up in advance for readers who have purchased the web novel or physical copies of QJJ. We want to actively encourage readers to buy the novel to support the author whenever possible, so please do so if you can!

The book costs only on 2849 (USD$4.84) on the mobile app or 4763 (USD$8.10) on the web version!*

*My suggestion would be to top up via paypal on the website, then buy the book on the JJWXC mobile app instead!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 146 : YUANZHUO

Translated with: Jia<3

Shen Zechuan suddenly said, “Ding Tao.”

Ding Tao kept his little book away and leaped over the obstruction to grab the arm of one of them. “What are you people hiding? Move away for the Young Master to take a look.”

Fei Sheng noted their shifty eyes and hemming and hawing, so he bellowed, “What? Is this donkey not yours?”

A sharp-eyed Ding Tao yelled, “Young Master, there’s a man below!”

The surrounding Imperial Bodyguards stepped forth and encircled them. Most of these people were local ruffians from the city of Dancheng, and they could not help but cower in fear when they saw the hostile expressions of the Imperial Bodyguards, what’s more when these Imperial Bodyguards were also all armed with blades. So before Fei Sheng could give his order, they all dispersed in an uproar, revealing the man on the ground.

Yu Xiaozai lifted the hem of his robe and moved in closer for a look. He bent over and exclaimed in shock, “Why is there so much blood? Quick, help him up quickly and call for a physician!”

Fei Sheng squatted down to check on the man. “These legs are a goner. Someone broke them.”

This man refused to look up, instead propping himself up for a moment to say in a hoarse voice, “... The cat is mine.”

Embarrassed, Fei Sheng picked the cat up and put it before the man, explaining, “I thought it was a stray cat. Is this donkey yours too? You’re not from Dancheng, are you?”

The man did not answer. He coughed at the ground. As he covered his lips, Fei Sheng caught a glimpse of the handkerchief in his palm. This handkerchief was exquisite. Even though it was dirty, its quality and material were not commonplace. These fingers were long and slender, without any calluses on them; it was not the hand belonging to someone used to manual labor or menial work.

In an instant, Fei Sheng changed his attitude and said, "Let me help you up. You can no longer walk on these legs of yours, and you are so badly ill. The most important thing at present is to have a physician take a look as soon as possible."

The man suddenly clenched his fists, and his coughing intensified. The handkerchief he used to cover his lips was stained with blood. He was clearly in a terrible state, yet his etiquette was impeccable as he lowered his eyes and said, "I wouldn't dare to trouble you. Thanks for asking."

Yu Xiaozai saw the zhaowen bag<sup>1</sup> hanging around the man's waist and realized that this man was a scholar. He could not help but feel more deeply concerned as he turned his head back to say to Shen Zechuan, "Vice Commander, he doesn't seem to be a wicked person to me. Why don't we —"

"Vice Commander?" The man's tone suddenly changed. "Vice Commander Shen, Shen Zechuan?"

The surrounding Imperial Bodyguards promptly held on to their blades. Shen Zechuan raised a hand as a gesture for them to hold it and asked, "Are we old acquaintances?"

The man felt a tidal surge of emotions. He wanted to say something, but he ended up coughing out blood. His Adam's apple bobbed, and his coughing grew even more intense as his pale, trembling fingers bent and dug into the ground, gouging out tracks while he mumbled over and over again, "Shen Zechuan, it's you!"

This voice gave Qiao Tianya a sense of déjà vu. He turned around.

Shen Zechuan slowly crouched down and looked directly at the man. The man moved away the handkerchief covering his lips and propped himself up on the ground with his arms. His eyes seemed to have been set ablaze, filled with the madness of someone who was staking it all on a cast of the dice. He lifted his head. Just as everyone thought he would wail and go hysterical, he let out a very soft laugh. This laugh was like the ripple of spring waters, fleeting and ephemeral, before it quickly plunged into a bottomless abyss of raging inferno, where the fire burned everything clean along with his unbending pride and free spirit, turning an immortal free from worldly cares into a pile of filthy ashes.

Qiao Tianya recognized him now.

A veil of misty rain descended upon past memories of a pair of like-minded confidantes playing the zither under the willows amidst the lush scenery of spring. That upright, one-of-a-kind young master in green had also ended up with his legs broken by another. Just like that, the unpolished jade that Hai Liangyi and the Yao clan had cherished and treasured for half a lifetime had been so easily besmeared with mud.

Qiao Songyue suddenly felt at a loss. He intuitively felt that he should not continue staring at Yao Wenyu like this, but he once again saw himself in him. They both lived in the Moon Palace.<sup>2</sup> Qiao Songyue had descended, and a dashing, fan-holding young master of a prominent clan had turned into a blade-wielding, down-and-out Qiao Tianya. He thought their chance encounter was transient, but he never expected that they would be fellow sufferers commiserating with each other the next time they met again half a year later.

The word “commiserate” was truly overwhelmingly agonizing.

Qiao Tianya hastily averted his gaze, unwilling to look any further.

It was already late at night, and the lights inside the house were not very bright. The physician’s apprentice came out with the prescription in hand. Fei Sheng took it and handed it over to his subordinate to fill the prescription of medicinal herbs. The few of them were standing in the corridor. Ding Tao was surprisingly well-behaved as he held that cat in his arms.

Fei Sheng forced a smile and said to Qiao Tianya, “Who would have expected it to be him? This...”

What was there for him to say?

Stories of the “Unpolished Jade Yuanzhuo” Yao Wenyu had been widely circulating for many years in Qudu, and in all of them, he was hailed as a “banished immortal”<sup>3</sup>—a wayward genius living among men. Even Fei Sheng, who had never associated with the literati, had heard much of this name. Who would have thought that the free and unfettered wanderer of the rumors would end up in such a state? He was even more downtrodden than Yu Xiaozai when the latter first came.

Yu Xiaozai had already cried once, and now he was facing the wall, overwhelmed with grief as he choked with sobs, “... How... how can they let the Grand Secretary down?!”

Fei Sheng consoled in a dry voice, “The way of the world is unpredictable. Youjing, please don’t be too upset.”

Qiao Tianya leaned against a pillar in the corridor, hidden under the shadows. He did not say a word.

They had not stood for long when Kong Ling saw the physician out and beckoned to them. Qiao Tianya fell a few steps behind and bowed his head down to ask the physician a few questions. The physician answered him truthfully, and Qiao Tianya fell silent for a few moments, then turned aside to let someone send the physician away.

The bamboo blinds that had been let down in the room kept out some of the candlelight. The interior had been partitioned off. Shen Zechuan sat outside the partitioned area and said something to Zhou Gui in hushed tones. On seeing them enter, he only said, "Fei Sheng, you will be on night watch. Ding Tao, go back to your courtyard and sleep. Youjing, there's no need to worry. The kitchen is decocting the medicine as we speak."

Yu Xiaozai turned aside to take his seat. After a moment of silence, he spoke, "Young Master Yao..."

Kong Ling was a perceptive and empathetic man; he knew it was inadvisable to discuss it in detail here. Bemoaning Yao Wenyu's fate or showing Yao Wenyu pity were, to Yao Wenyu, tantamount to torture at this point; it was no different from death by dismemberment. So he rose to his feet and led Yu Xiaozai. "It's late tonight. Youjing, Young Master Yao has only just arrived; let him rest for a night. It's not too late for us to come visit him again tomorrow."

With that, he turned back to bow to Shen Zechuan and said to Zhou Gui, "We still have to discuss matters in the study later. Your Excellency, please come with me too."

Yu Xiaozai, having received a gentle reminder from Kong Ling, followed suit and rose to his feet to bid farewell too. Before he left, he cast a glance at the inner room and saw the shadows of trees intersecting with the flickering shadows of the candlelight. The man within was silent. Yu Xiaozai thought of Hai Liangyi once more. His eyes involuntarily reddened. Holding back a long sigh, he hurriedly strode across the threshold of the door.

The night was bleak, and the veil of moonlight cast upon the flowers and plants in the courtyard made them appear sickly and listless. The few wind chimes hanging under the eaves swayed with the wind, dancing to the tinkling tune of metal against metal. Yao Wenyu lay on the couch, his consciousness scattering to the beats of the wind chimes. In his trance, he had returned to Qudu.

Misty rain pervaded Qudu.

Yao Wenyu donned mourning attire and sent off Hai Liangyi to Mount Bodhi. This mountain was once the burial site of his paternal grandfather, and now, it was the burial site for his teacher. He stood in that drizzle, unable to take in the scenery, unable to recognize the way that could take him back.

The Yao clan had produced national scholars of great talents. They were full of vim in the successive reigns of Dazhou, and they were also the mainstay of the divisive noble clans. But during Emperor Guangcheng's reign, Old Master Yao revolutionized the clan's traditions and renounced the prejudices between family status. He reached out to the common descendants of humble origins who were denied opportunities due to a lack of connections to the powerful and influential. From then on, the Imperial College flourished. The Yao clan began exploring a different path, but this path came to a premature end in the hands of the Empress Dowager, Hua Hewei, and Hua Siqian. By the time it came to Yao Wenyu's father's generation, the Yao clan was already on the decline. Although the Yao clan still had some influence and prestige left, it was no longer on par with what it once was during the time Old Master Yao had been alive. The most fatal of all was that the Yao clan was faced with a dearth of descendants in this generation—they only had one Yao Wenyu. The rest were all descendants from the collateral branch of the clan, and there was not even one among them who had come out top in the imperial examinations in spring.

In recent years, the eight clans had all undergone a change in heads and members. The Yao clan was no longer able to command the same level of respect from the others. Most of the juniors in their clan who still served as officials were in idle positions with practically no obligations; none were third-grade ministers in esteemed positions like those from the Wei clan. Although Yao Wenyu was a student under Hai Liangyi and was friends with many of the literati, he had no scholarly honor or official position to his name; he had not married Commandery Princess Zhaoyue of the Fei clan either. Other than the reputation he had for his talent, he had nothing at all, and in the end, even his reputed fame had forsaken him. He was like the falling leaves on this mountain, reduced to nothing but mud. Worthless.

Qiao Tianya lifted the bamboo blinds and turned sideways to step aside. Shen Zechuan entered the room and sat on the chair that the physician had previously sat on to take pulses. As the candlelight flickered, Shen Zechuan spoke, "You've been poisoned by someone, it's inadvisable for you to stay out in public. If you don't mind, you can stay at my home. My teacher and yours are considered colleagues, and you are old friends with Ce'an. There's no need to stand on ceremony."

Yao Wenyu's freshly washed face was a picture of calm as he continued to listen to the wind chimes beneath the eaves. After half a moment, he answered. "There's no need to be so tactful. The reason I came to Cizhou was to seek refuge and throw in my lot with the Vice Commander."

Shen Zechuan rested his folding fan on his knee and said, "I'm now living under another's roof making a living and trying to get by. I only dare to be called brothers with you, not master and servant."

"The revival of Cizhou was in no small part due to the efforts of the Vice Commander." The heavy trauma inflicted upon this body one after another was meant to make him die. Yao Wenyu started coughing again. He was but one scholar. It would prove to be hard to eradicate his illnesses now that they had taken root in his body. He was now heavily ill, much weaker and frail compared to half a year ago. He clutched his handkerchief, covering his mouth for a moment before continuing. "I heard about the Vice Commander's deeds on my journey here, and I'm of the opinion that the Vice Commander wasn't trying to obtain the six prefectures of Zhongbo, but Qudu. Once the trade routes between Cizhou, Chazhou, and Huaizhou are established, it will be able to provide direct access to the mutual trade market in Libei to the northeast, and keep the grain routes of Qidong in check towards the southeast. The military forces of Dazhou on both ends using the routes will have to pass through the Vice Commander's scrutiny. The way they fight and the timing of their battles in the future will all lie in the hands of the Vice Commander."

Shen Zechuan brushed open his folding fan with his fingertips and set it on the handle of the chair. He did not respond.

"Furthermore, the geographical position of this trade route is special; if the Vice Commander thereby establishes a trade route town, Qudu's east, south, and north sides will all be as good as secured. The Eight Great Training Divisions have limited military strength, so it'd prove impossible for Qudu to break through the Vice Commander's siege on all three sides if they don't have assistance from Qidong in the future." Yao Wenyu cast a sidelong glance at Shen Zechuan. "The Vice Commander is a visionary man with great foresight, strategizing ahead for years down the road."

Shen Zechuan stared at Yao Wenyu.

If not for the fact that this person was in such dire straits, even Shen Zechuan himself wanted to kill him, what's more the others. Shen Zechuan had multiple explanations regarding the intent for the trade routes between the prefectures of Cizhou, Chazhou, and Huaizhou, but it was what Yao Wenyu said that was his real motive—By causing Qudu to lose its direct military route with Libei, not only could Chazhou contain Hezhou, it could also obstruct Qidong's provision supply routes. Shen Zechuan wanted to encircle Qudu.

"But Qi Zhuyin might not be willing to give the Vice Commander time." Yao Wenyu could not hold back his coughs, covering his lips with a handkerchief again and again. "She is watching each and every one of your moves from behind in Qidong; she'll see through it, eventually. If the Vice Commander is successful with this move, it's naturally all's well that ends well, but if it falls through, you'll be caught in an assault by both Qudu and Qidong. When the time comes, you will be attacked from the front and rear. Even if Libei was willing to deploy troops to help, they cannot resist the Biansha Cavalry and fight the garrison troops of Qidong simultaneously. The lack of military forces is presently the most fatal chink in the Vice Commander's armor. That is why the Vice Commander is linking up Cizhou and Chazhou, re-organizing the census registers, and taking in refugees—it's all for the sake of quickly establishing an army under your command."

Shen Zechuan snapped his fan shut and said with a smile, "Yao Yuanzhuo's reputation is truly well-deserved. But with your level of intelligence, how did you end up wandering the streets of Zhongbo? If you want to build a career, the climate in Qudu is perfect right now. Regardless of whether it's the Empress Dowager or the Grand Secretariat, they are all better able to pay the price you deserve than I can afford, Shen Zechuan."

Yao Wenyu made to sit up, so Qiao Tianya stepped forward to help him up and put a pillow behind his back for support. He did not look at Qiao Tianya; it was as though he did not recognize him. With his long fingers holding on to the handkerchief, he turned his head aside and coughed into the handkerchief. The muffled sound of coughing persisted for quite some time. He stared at the shadows on the wall and answered in a hoarse voice, “Xue Yanqing, in his support of the heir apparent to the throne in Qudu, coerced the Grand Secretariat and Her Majesty the Empress Dowager and schemed to lead the Imperial College into pushing for reforms. However, it’s my belief that Dazhou is already beyond cure; rather than restore Qudu to its former glory, why not demolish it and rebuild it from scratch? Should Dazhou lose its deer, all under heaven will chase after it.<sup>4</sup> Even a commoner of humble origins like Lei Changming has had the desire to reign supreme. When Qudu’s reforms are put into action, people in all other places will begin to rise in rebellion. Disputes among the heroes are inevitable. The Li clan’s emperor is already too powerless to turn the tide around..”

Yao Wenyu turned back and looked attentively at Shen Zechuan amidst the dimming light. Complex emotion swam amidst the reignited fire in his eyes as he enunciated each word. “Anyone in the world can sit on the throne. The Li clan can. So why not you, Shen Zechuan?”

Shen Zechuan held up his folding fan and replied coldly, “My aspiration lies not in this.”

“You can’t fool me.” Yao Wenyu spoke under his breath. “You’re on this path right now.”

“I can jolly well support someone else to the throne.” Shen Zechuan smiled. “There is more than one person with the surname ‘Li’ in this world.”

“Six years ago, when the troops of Zhongbo suffered a defeat, you lost everything. And six years later, when Qudu suffered another defeat, you lost it all once again. When the next six years come around...” Yao Wenyu’s lowered eyes were distant and detached, “... will you still be willing to place your life and destiny in the hands of another? You are completely unsuited to be a mere subject of the state. Being subjected to the control of others has already become a lifelong indignity of yours.”

There was an abrupt shift in the atmosphere within the room. Shen Zechuan grasped his folding fan with his fingers. Although he was quiet, he still looked as if he could kill without qualms in the next moment. It was impossible to read what was in those expressive eyes of his. The wind chimes outside the window tinkled, and bleak shadows of rustling trees fell upon the edge of his robes, on which he trod beneath his feet.

Shen Zechuan abruptly smiled. “If Mister is willing to play for my team, then all matters in the future regardless of its significance can be discussed. Qiao Tianya, serve the tea.”

Yao Wenyu accepted the tea and stirred the foam aside, but he did not drink it immediately. His wrist was of the same color as the teacup, but it was piteously thin and frail. He gazed at the floating tea leaves and said, self-deprecatingly, “You can skip the ‘Mister’. I lost to Xue Xiuzhuo in Qudu, got both of my legs broken, and was this close to losing my life. Didn’t you ask me why I came here?”

Yao Wenyu was silent for a while.

“Because I want to finish this game of chess with Xue Xiuzhuo, win or lose, live or die.”

NOTE:

The next two chapters 147 & 148 are up in advance for readers who have purchased the web novel or physical copies of QJJ. We want to actively encourage readers to buy the novel to support the author whenever possible, so please do so if you can! The book costs approximately 2849 (USD$4.84) on the JJWXC mobile app!

Footnotes

1. 招文袋 a small bag hung at the waist for keeping documents or money.
2. 广寒宫 Guanghan Palace, or Moon Palace; a mythical palace in the moon. Legend goes that it is inhabited by the goddess of the moon, Chang’e, the Jade Rabbit, and the woodcutter Wu Gang.
3. 谪仙 literally, an immortal who has been banished from heaven to live on earth; an epithet for exceptional individuals such as the Tang poet Li Bai (who also wrote the poem, Qiang Jin jiu). i.e., a wayward genius
4. The original quote is “Qin lost his deer, and all under heaven chased after it” 「秦失其鹿，天下共逐之」 from Records of the Grand Historian • Biography of Marquis Huaiyin 《史记·淮阴侯列传》. Deer is a metaphor for the throne. It’s an illustration of the rise of numerous rivaling warlords contesting for supremacy to capture the prize, the empire lost by the Qin Dynasty. So Yao Wenyu is saying that if Dazhou lost its legitimacy on the throne/the empire, then all the heroes in the world are free to make a grab for it.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 147: STEPMOTHER

Translated with: Jia<3

Shen Zechuan had already gotten up before dawn the next day. The courtyard was a little chilly, so he put on a pure-white wide-sleeved outer robe and stood at the desk to look over Yao Wenyu's prescription.

"His body has been weakened by poison." Qiao Tianya held onto the teapot and brewed a cup of tea for Shen Zechuan. "It's by no means an easy feat for him to have managed to preserve his life."

Shen Zechuan held the teacup with both hands and said, "Given Xue Xiuzhuo's style, he definitely went all out with the intent to kill." His brows furrowed for a moment. "... Is there no hope for his legs?"

Qiao Tianya set the teapot down and put the lid on as he replied, "No."

Shen Zechuan could not bring himself to continue drinking his tea, so he returned the teacup with the undrunk tea back onto the table. "What about his body? Now that he's staying here, there's no need to be stingy with the medicine; give him whatever the physician prescribes.

Additionally, get a couple of meticulously attentive people to take care of him. We mustn't be too poor of a host."

Qiao Tianya fell silent for a few moments.

And so Shen Zechuan understood that Yao Wenyu's body was a goner too. While they were conversing last night, Yao Wenyu had repeatedly been coughing out blood. He paused for a moment. "Is he awake? I'll go pay him a visit."

When Shen Zechuan arrived, he saw the maidservants all waiting in attendance under the eaves, silent as cicadas in cold weather. He put on his usual expression and lifted the bamboo blinds to enter. The lamps were not lit inside the room, giving off an unwarranted vibe of cheerlessness. It was quiet and still within. Shen Zechuan could only catch a vague glimpse of Yao Wenyu's lonely back view.

As if sensing him, Yao Wenyu turned his head back partially and said through the hanging door curtain, "Vice Commander, please come in."

It was only then Shen Zechuan lifted the curtain and bowed his head to enter. Qiao Tianya stood in the outer chamber on his own initiative, leaning against the wall as he listened to the chirps of the birds in the covered walkway.

“Autumn is about to fall in Cizhou, and the matter of Huaizhou has been on the Vice Commander’s mind lately.” Yao Wenyu was impeccably dressed. Although he was severely ill, he was still unwilling to present himself before the others all sloppily dressed. It was just that his legs were not in a good state, making it difficult for him to move around. Even though he tried his best to hide it, the bruises on his hands were still conspicuous.

Shen Zechuan did not seem to have seen it. He said, “This matter is indeed worrying. It’s inappropriate to go too early or too late. I’ve discussed it over with His Excellency Zhou for days, and we still have yet to reach a conclusion.”

Yao Wenyu gave a slight nod of his head. “There are two difficulties when it comes to the matter of Huaizhou. The first is Jiang Qingshan, and the second is Luoxia Pass’s checkpoint. If these two difficulties aren’t resolved, then it’ll be hard for the trade routes between Cizhou, Chazhou, and Huaizhou to come to fruition. But if you ask me, neither of these two issues is a tough one.”

Shen Zechuan listened with rapt attention.

Yao Wenyu looked at the new window screens made of gauze. The birds were chirping noisily outside. He coughed a few times. “When Xue Xiuzhuo held the post of Chief Supervising Secretary at the Office of Scrutiny for Revenue, he made the acquaintance of Jiang Qingshan. Both men collaborate for many years working as one. They not only made up for the deficit in Juexi’s tax money, but also turned the thirteen cities of Juexi into Dazhou’s granaries. It’s only when Jiang Qingshan assumes personal command of Juexi that he can ensure the integrity of Juexi’s governmental affairs, as well as prevent another major case like the Libei’s military provision case during the start of spring this year from happening again. In other words, Jiang Qingshan cannot leave Juexi. Xue Xiuzhuo will definitely transfer him back to Juexi and allow him to continue serving as the Provincial Administration Commissioner of Juexi, so the Vice Commander’s worry that he would be assigned north to Huaizhou is unfounded.”

Xue Xiuzhuo, having remained in the position of Chief Supervising Secretary at the Office of Scrutiny for Revenue for many years, had made plenty of field trips down to the local areas where he was hands-on with his duties. He could be said to be very well-acquainted with the political situations of the various regions. That was why he could conduct an audit into Hua Siqian's accounts together with Hai Liangyi. But likewise, while Yao Wenyu had never served in the government, he was always wandering out there in the world all year round, and so he also had an overview of the political situation in the various areas, having observed them from the sidelines. Both of their identity and status were totally poles apart. Yet, they were more intimately aware of the commoners' circumstances than those like Kong Qiu and Cen Yu, who had always resided in Qudu.

"As for Luoxia Pass." Yao Wenyu withdrew his gaze. "Libei has already broken free of Qudu's control. Luoxia Pass is the predecessor of the Libei Armored Cavalry, and the garrison troops stationed there are all old subordinates of the Prince of Libei, Xiao Fangxu. They have long been at odds with Qudu despite their seemingly united appearance. As far as the current situation is concerned, Zhongbo's revival will only prove to be advantageous to Libei. Luoxia Pass will only be too eager to lend a helping hand; they would never obstruct the way willfully."

As Yao Wenyu spoke, he started coughing again. Shen Zechuan spontaneously handed him a cup of tea. Yao Wenyu thanked him and continued, "The matter with Huaizhou is practically a done deal. All it takes is for Mister Chengfeng and His Excellency Yu to make a trip there. My belief is that the most crucial matter on hand for the Vice Commander is not in the north, but internally in Zhongbo. The two prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou to the east can be discussed later, but Fanzhou must be taken down and secured with great haste."

The discussion went on until noon, when Fei Sheng came to deliver the medicine. It was only then Shen Zechuan stepped out. He looked around at the maidservants at the entrance. Finally, he said to Qiao Tianya, "There has been nothing much going on of late. Let Fei Sheng and Ding Tao tag along with me. You remain here and take care of Yuanzhuo."

Fei Sheng initially thought that this task would fall to him, as Qiao Tianya was in charge of the guards and was an indispensable trusted subordinate of Shen Zechuan. He never expected Shen Zechuan to leave Qiao Tianya for Yao Wenyu this easily. But looking at it from another angle, this just illustrated how important Yao Wenyu was. With Qiao Tianya here, no one would dare to treat Yao Wenyu shabbily.

As for Shen Zechuan himself, there was another layer of consideration.

Yao Wenyu was a prideful and aloof man. Although his legs were broken, he was still a distinguished young master of Qudu. He would not allow himself to present a sorry sight before the others. He did not call for anyone to serve him this morning because he was unwilling to let anyone see him in his injured state. It was not suitable for Fei Sheng to take care of him, because Fei Sheng's penchant for flattery and fawning would be self-defeating and make things awkward for all involved. In contrast, Qiao Tianya's circumstances and lot in life were similar to Yao Wenyu's. There were many areas that only Qiao Tianya could understand and relate to best.

Qiao Tianya made a sound of acknowledgment and stayed.

As matters regarding Huaizhou still had to be discussed in detail with Zhou Gui, Shen Zechuan spent the next few days in Zhou Gui's study. The advisors in Cizhou all wanted to catch a glimpse of Yao Wenyu in person, given his long-standing and well-acclaimed reputation, but Shen Zechuan declined all of their visiting cards on the grounds that the man himself had still yet to recover from his illness.

After Xiao Chiye received the letter, he turned back to call for Wu Ziyu and got him to find a military craftsman to head to Cizhou to craft a custom four-wheeled vehicle for Yao Wenyu.

Wu Ziyu had been with Xiao Chiye for a month, and his troops got along best with the Imperial Army, gradually bonding over a shared hatred for a common enemy. Since the soldiers from the combat battalions looked down on them, they would not suck up to said soldiers just to end up snubbed either. Each time the army provisions were delivered to the camps, someone would check them, and once the supplies were confirmed to be in good order, they would head back the same way to Bianbo camp, where they would then stand guard so as to avoid conflicts with the other camps.

"What kind of four-wheeled vehicle?" A bare-chested Wu Ziyu followed behind him. "Is it for our military sieges, transporting supplies, or..."

Tantai Hu looked back and jokingly punched Wu Ziyu as he scolded with a laugh, "Are you the one going, or is the military craftsman the one going? It's the Master's orders, so just make it happen!"

Wu Ziyu answered, "I've got to at least get the details clear, so that I can prepare the materials before heading out."

The military craftsmen of Libei were extremely skilled, with excellent workmanship, and the materials they used were all produced in the Hongyan Mountains; they did not care for items made in Zhongbo.

“For moving about.” It was only then Xiao Chiye dismounted the horse. He was filthy all over. They had just come from the battlegrounds and had been on the road for six days; everyone was exhausted.

Wu Ziyu turned back to command someone to carry out the task. Chen Yang and the rest followed Xiao Chiye into the tent. The tables and chairs that were originally in the tent had been removed, replaced with a newly constructed military sand table in the spot that had been vacated.

“Gu Jin.” Xiao Chiye quickly removed his outer robe and tossed it to Chen Yang. With both arms propping against the edge of the military sand table, he said, “Report.”

Gu Jin pulled off his helmet, his face drenched in sweat. He pointed to the position of the Tudalong Banner. “When we transported the provisions over this time, I led the cavalry and made a special trip around the Tudalong Banner. As Master expected, Huhelu has been redeployed to the southeast battlefield to make way for someone else; the person stationed there now is someone called Hasen.<sup>1</sup> According to Wu Ziyu’s information, this Hasen is Amu’er’s son in the Hanshe Tribe. During the beginning of spring this year, the Biansha Cavalry ambushed the Shasan camp, and Hasen, as Amu’er’s vanguard, engaged in a round of battle with Zhao Hui. The Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang suffered a casualty of eight hundred men at that time.”

Chen Yang pulled over the chair,<sup>2</sup> and Xiao Chiye sat down. He said, “That’s a heavy casualty.”

“That’s right.” Gu Jin brushed aside a couple strands of damp hair and continued. “This man is cunning and ruthless, but not reckless. When the Hereditary Prince was badly injured and encircled on all sides by Amu’er, Zhao Hui rushed over to provide reinforcement, only to end up getting entrapped by Hasen in the grassfields. The entire squad was thrown into complete disarray.”

“This person is educated.” Wu Ziyu, having just returned, slipped on a coat as he spoke up from the back. “To use our language, Hasen is essentially Amu’er’s lawful son. While Amu’er has over ten sons, he can only remember a few of them, and of those few, Hasen’s mother is the most respectable and distinguished; she’s the flower of the Hanshe Tribe.

Amu'er's ability to establish control over the Hanshe Tribe is in large part due to her. The status of the son depends on the status of his mother, and Hasen was the son who was, by virtue of his mother's status, raised at Amu'er's side and personally taught by Amu'er himself. In the future, he will inherit Amu'er's title of 'Great Hero'. Allegedly, and I mean allegedly, he's well-versed in the art of war; even Huhelu is afraid of him."

"Why didn't you say so earlier?" Tantai Hu stroked the scar on his face., "If I'd known of his prowess sooner, I would've stayed in Tudalong Banner and not returned."

"Then you'd just be serving your head up on a platter." Wu Ziyu stood still by the military sand table. "His fighting style... is actually a little similar to the Viceroy."

"Then he's ill-suited to be stationed for garrison duty." Xiao Chiye set his thumb ring straight. "And he likes to provoke others, right?"

The various generals did not respond, instead musing over how the Second Young Master was pretty self-aware.

Gu Jin gave a light cough before he continued, "Hasen wasn't the Biansha commanding general fighting against us Libei before this year. He was mainly stationed in the southeast of Dazhou in the previous years, and he was the commanding general who fought the most intensely against Qidong. Coincidentally, Hasen was also the one who heavily injured Qi Shiyu and almost took his head off back then."

So it was him!

Tantai Hu gasped. "Then I've heard of this man too. The person who fought with him back then was Commander-in-Chief Qi! When Qi Shiyu was entrapped at the eastern side of the Biansha linked camps and couldn't break out of the encirclement, his sons from the Qi clan did not dare to act impulsively and deploy troops for a rescue mission. Commander-in-Chief Qi went to the Chijun, Bianjun, and Cejun Commanderies one after another to ask for reinforcements. However, Cejun vehemently refused to do so, and it was the Lu clan of Bianjun who stepped forward to solicit assistance from Suotian Pass. It was only then that the Commander-in-Chief could gather military forces from the three parties to venture forth into the enemy's territory and carry out the rescue mission."

This battle was Qi Zhuyin's rise to fame. She took advantage of the wind direction and burned down ten li<sup>3</sup> worth of the Biansha linked camps' army provisions, and for this reason, she came to be known as the "Wind Guiding the Scorching Plains”, Qi Zhuyin. But this battle was not an easy one. In truth, the legend that followed had omitted a part of the story—Qi Zhuyin had been chased by Hasen for thousands of li after she had rescued Qi Shiyu; the Qidong garrison troops had returned treading over roads paved in blood.

Xiao Chiye’s eyes brightened slightly. “Got it. In that case, I know him too.”

This was Lu Guangbai’s archenemy.

“Zhao Hui had already led the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang up north to the Tudalong Banner three days ago to take over Guo Weili’s post and fight against Hasen.” Xiao Chiye turned his thumb ring around. “This means that we no longer have any reinforcements backing us at this moment. The two major camps Libei left in the southeast are Guo Weili and us. Even at the slowest speed possible, news that we have fought back Huhelu should have already reached Amu’er ears by now. This is a good opportunity. If he hasn’t changed his original plan, then the Biansha Cavalry will still launch a sudden assault on the Shasan Camp once more before the middle of the eighth month, at the very latest. So get it together and kick Guo Weili’s ass as hard as you can to keep him awake.”

“Uh.” Wu Ziyu popped out and said, “Guo Weili won’t fall asleep. He’ll get all excited, and that’s where the problem lies. Viceroy, this person is prone to getting ahead of himself, and he’s easily provoked into action. If he gets tricked away from camp and ends up slaughtered, then what are we a bunch of soldiers in charge of the transportation of military supplies going to do?”

The remaining three men turned their heads in unison and spoke in a chorus, “We fight.”

Wu Ziyu wiped the spittle off his face and said, “We don’t have the authority to, going by the current military order. Also, I’m not trying to put a damper on everyone’s spirits, but it was partially by sheer luck that we could win the battle at the Shasan Camp. Huhelu is another Guo Weili. He first took the Viceroy’s bait before being defeated by the element of surprise. But now that the Biansha men know the exact extent of our military strength, Amu’er will not repeat the same mistake twice. Their next assault will be a full-on attack like the kind on the battlefields. It will be a real siege war they will be fighting, and we no longer have the advantage.”

“That is why,” Xiao Chiye was brief and to the point. “At the same time that you kick Guo Weili, tighten the collar around his neck and keep the leash on him. Even if he dies, he has to be strangled to death.”

No one was willing to deal with Guo Weili. They nearly came to blows during the handover of the Shasan Camp. Chen Yang and Tantai Hu still remembered the incident with Gu Jin. Guo Weili did not give a damn about Xiao Chiye at all. In fact, maintaining a status quo like this was very dangerous. It would be an uphill task to accomplish anything if the generals were not of one mind. Even if Xiao Chiye had superhuman powers, it would be meaningless in the face of a mighty force with thousands of soldiers and horses. What’s more, the enemy forces were not fools; the old vulture in personal command was smart as hell.

Xiao Chiye tilted his head up a little and stared at the top of the tent as he said to himself,

So damn annoying.

Chen Yang, who had been quiet all this while, flipped open the book and said with a solemn expression, “And now I’ll convey a piece of message from Cizhou sent by the Young Master. Young Master said—”

Xiao Chiye abruptly shifted his gaze over. “I’ll read it myself.”

“The marriage alliance between Hua and Qi will take place in three days...” Chen Yang paused for a moment, then continued to read Shen Lanzhou’s original words without emotion, “It’s a joyous event for the Commander-in-Chief Qi to have gained a stepmother.<sup>4</sup> What shall we send as a gift?”

Xiao Chiye’s smile was perfunctory. “Send her our congratulations.”

Footnotes

1. Again, for foreign names in this novel, we decided to go with pinyin for the time being due to unfamiliarity with the language involved and to avoid mistranslations with the actual names in its original language. If we do get official subtitles someday, we will replace them in the translation (the same goes for titles). Until then, please bear with us.

- 2.
3. specifically 交椅, an ancient folding chair
4. 里 li, an ancient measure of length, 1 li = approx. 500m
5. 小娘 xiaoniang is a term for one's father's concubine. In Qi Zhuyin's case, it'd be closer to a stepmother, since Hua Xiangyi is marrying into the family as the second wife and not a concubine.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 148 : VICTORY & DEFEAT

Translated with: Jia<3

At the third quarter of the hour of yin, Qiao Tianya lifted the curtain open.

Yao Wenyu was talking in his sleep. The pain in his legs had made him sweat even in his sleep. The bedding was not that thickly padded, and as it was not yet the rainy season in Cizhou, the windows were open, with the bamboo blinds swaying in the wind. Yao Wenyu lay in the embrace of the wind, as if pillowing upon the rain of spring.

Several months ago, the storm of the Imperial College struck the imperial court officials of humble origins right in the face. Kong Qiu and Cen Yu were the first to bear the brunt of it. Even Yao Wenyu was not spared either. After the storm blew over, Yao Wenyu received shelter and protection from Kong Qiu and hardly appeared publicly in Qudu; instead, he accompanied Hai Liangyi on Mount Bodhi every day, until the day his horse carriage was ambushed.

That day, Yao Wenyu met Xue Xiuzhuo.

Xue Xiuzhuo and Yao Wenyu were fellow students. Long before Hai Liangyi, they had both studied alongside one another in Mister Changzong's school. Hai Liangyi had been partial to Yao Wenyu initially because of Old Master Yao. At that time, Xue Xiuzhuo had already sent three visiting cards to Hai Liangyi in the hope of being accepted as the latter's student, but all his attempts were rebuffed by Hai Liangyi.

Yao Wenyu often heard Xi Hongxuan talk about Xue Xiuzhuo, because Xue Xiuzhuo lived in straitened circumstances during his early years in the Xue's Residence. After the death of his father, the respective cliques within the Xue clan fought tooth and nail with one another over their inheritance of fields and mansions, stirring up such a ruckus that everyone in Qudu came to know about it, and it was for this that the noble clans held them in contempt. The lawful son, Xue Xiuyi, was a pretentious man feigning to be a man of letters; he knew nothing about antiques, yet he was constantly hoodwinked into spending tremendous amounts of silver for them all day long. In just a few years, the Xue clan's wealth had been squandered away clean. The collateral branches of the Xue clan gradually drifted away from the main branch, hardly bothering to continue sponging off them. Xue Xiuyi spent all day fooling around. He wanted to join the Hanlin Academy, so he had a great number of gifts sent to Hua Siqian, who was then concurrently holding the posts of Hanlin Chancellor and Grand Secretariat's Grand Secretary; it was all a desperate attempt at sucking up that only resulted in him getting snubbed. Even Marquis Helian and the Fei clan viewed him with disdain.

Everyone had thought that it was the end of the Xue clan, yet it was at this moment that Xue Xiuzhuo made his breakthrough. His initiation into the Hanlin Academy was legitimate, done through proper channels by passing the examinations. Hai Liangyi was the one who critically reviewed the works back then, and Xue Xiuzhuo's essays on contemporary politics were outstanding. It was not by chance that his name appeared on the list of those who passed. Yao Wenyu had read all of Xue Xiuzhuo's essays on contemporary politics. The Xue Xiuzhuo who had been freshly minted into the Hanlin Academy was brimming with drive and energy. One could even see Qi Huilian's shadow in him. He repeatedly submitted memorials to the emperor to speak on the re-surveyance of fields in the local areas, which was what Qi Huilian had left unfinished back then. Take the eight cities of Qudu as an example: the noble clans gobbled up the commoners' farms and fields without reporting it to the authorities, thereby canceling out the land tax of ten thousand hectares of fields. This was something that could not be discerned from audits when the Ministry of Revenue was under the control of Wei Huaigu and the rest.

However, Xue Xiuzhuo did not meet someone like the crown prince of the eastern palace who could protect him. His memorials offended not only Hua Siqian, but also the various imperial court officials from the noble clans of that time. He even offended Pan Rugui. All these people were later inextricably tied to the case of the Zhongbo troops' defeat. They had long formed an alliance between themselves during the end of the reign of Yongyi. Even the seemingly marginalized Marquis Helian and the Fei clan had made moves to encroach on the commoners' fields in Dancheng. Xue Xiuzhuo was like a baby rabbit caught in a siege, stirring up a storm on the imperial court. The denunciation came hard and fast. Hua Siqian used Xue Xiuzhuo as an excuse to strike against Hai Liangyi – who had promoted

Xue Xiuzhuo – as well as the officials from humble backgrounds that Hai Liangyi represented.

Those days were difficult. Even Yao Wenyu, who was out there roaming the country, could hear snippets of rumors. Officials who were demoted back then included Kong Qiu, and minor, low-grade officials like Liang Cuishan also inadvertently got caught up in the crossfire. Hai Liangyi managed to dodge Hua Siqian's blows and withdrew from his position as the last of the Deputy Grand Secretary of the Grand Secretariat, thereafter minimizing his participation in the imperial court discussions. Those from humble origins once again entered a stage of hibernation. Xue Xiuzhuo's future was limited, and he was publicly censured by Hua Siqian. He had only just joined the imperial court, and his seat in the Hanlin Academy had not even been fully secured before he was demoted to the position of a mere writer for the revision of state history.

However, it was not fear behind Hai Liangyi's retreat and concession back then. Rather, it was the beginning of the humble officials' preparations to fight back. Hai Liangyi had long been concerned about the predicament of the state treasury. Instead of raising difficult questions from within Qudu, they began to investigate from the local areas' account books. The person Hai Liangyi chose at that time was Xue Xiuzhuo, and it was all at the behest of Hai Liangyi that Xue Xiuzhuo would go on to be the Chief Supervising Secretary at the Office of Scrutiny for Revenue. Xue Xiuzhuo did not let Hai Liangyi down either. After going through that round of denunciations, he had become a lot more prudent and seasoned.

Xue Xiuzhuo remained as the Chief Supervising Secretary at the Office of Scrutiny for Revenue for an entire eight years. He ought to have been promoted a long time ago, according to his appraisals during this period. However, Hai Liangyi held him back and had him placed at the bottom to temper and hone himself. Yao Wenyu felt that this man was truly born to be an official, because he understood Hai Liangyi's intent all too well. Not only was there not a word of complaint from him, he even did a pretty good job. He knew the local political situation in Juexi and the Eight Great Cities of Qudu by heart. The fact that Juexi was able to restore its granaries to abundance had the most to do with Jiang Qingshan, but similarly, Xue Xiuzhuo's contribution could not be dismissed either.

Jiang Qingshan did not hold Yao Wenyu in high esteem, or even read Yao Wenyu's essays, because they were the practical doers rather than the idealistic talkers. To officials like them, Yao Wenyu was not as important as Xue Xiuzhuo was, even if Yao Wenyu was truly a genius.

Xiao Chiye once said that Xue Xiuzhuo was more like Hai Liangyi's student than Yao Wenyu. This was because Xue Xiuzhuo fulfilled the wishes of Hai Liangyi and the officials of humble backgrounds. His shocking memorial at the Nanlin Hunting Grounds forced Hua Siqian into rebelling, saving years of painstaking work and effort by the officials of humble origins from going to waste. Emperor Xiande passed away from illness, the Empress Dowager was forced into a retreat, and the Hua and Pan factions subsequently fell apart. They welcomed a new, young and healthy emperor.

But alas, it was not meant to be. Li Jianheng was not cut out to be an emperor.

Yao Wenyu bore no ill feelings towards Xue Xiuzhuo before Hai Liangyi's death. In Yao Wenyu's eyes, he was a person in a delicate position. He seemed to have abandoned the noble clans, and yet he could still garner the full support of Xi Hongxuan and the others. It was like he was standing on a certain line, where the forces on both sides were all pawns, including himself.

It was raining when Yao Wenyu met Xue Xiuzhuo on Mount Bodhi. They went to a thatched pavilion and settled down to play a game of chess. There was not a single conversation between them during the game, not even an exchange of glances. The game lasted for several hours, eventually ending in a draw.

Xue Xiuzhuo opened up his umbrella before departure. He looked back and asked Yao Wenyu, "Are you going for the imperial examinations in spring next year?"

Yao Wenyu kept away the chess pieces one at a time and said, "Since there's you, Xue Yanqing, on the imperial court, what need is there for me, Yao Yuanzhuo?"

Both of them – one standing and one sitting – listened as the rain and wind outside the pavilion intensified. The wind sent Yao Wenyu's sleeved robe fluttering. He held the chess box with one hand, looking like an immortal sitting at leisure as he dropped the jade pieces into their box; it was as if he would ride the wind and depart the very next instant. As Yao Wenyu spoke, a speck of mud splattered onto his green clothes along with the wind and rain, wetting that fluttering sleeved robe, consequently reducing him to a mere mortal.

Xue Xiuzhuo looked at that speck of mud and said, "When Teacher was seriously ill, Kong Qiu once paid him a visit. You gave him counsel in the main hall, but the one being plotted against was Han Cheng." He shifted his gaze away from the mud to Yao Wenyu's face, as if looking at him in the eyes anew. "It was at that moment I realized: that's all there is to Yao Wenyu."

The chess piece between Yao Wenyu's fingers slid into the chess box. He said, "You're right. That's all there is to Yao Wenyu."

"A year ago, Teacher thought that opportunity had come knocking. With Emperor Tianchen's trust, those from humble origins could show what they were made of, but that was all wishful thinking on his part in the end." Xue Xiuzhuo said calmly. "The fight between both factions has been going on for several years, yet the issues that have been resolved are few and far between. Twenty years ago, Qi Huilian proposed surveying the local farm fields to inhibit the noble clans from seizing it for themselves, as well as to restore the regular intake of the local taxes. To date, this has still yet to be implemented. What has Teacher's Dazhou held up by the moderates even amounted to?"

Yao Wenyu said, "In the third year of Xiande, Juexi was hit with a natural disaster. The state treasury was severely lacking in money, and Hua Siqian was unwilling to provide aid relief to the thirteen cities of Juexi, which left tens of thousands of commoners destitute and homeless. Jiang Qingshan alone opened up the granaries and risked his head to take on a huge debt. If not for the full assistance of the moderates led by Teacher in Qudu to audit the accounts to coerce Hua Siqian, the grains in Zhongbo would have all fallen into the pockets of the noble clans. Saving one person is not considered an achievement, and neither is saving ten of thousands of people. In your opinion then, what has to be saved for it to be considered an accomplishment?"

"If it was the moderates who saved tens of thousands of people in Juexi, then similarly, it's those same moderates who created the tragedy of Zhongbo. In this world, a physician saves one man, but it's the imperial court official who saves the masses." Xue Xiuzhuo clenched his fists and turned around. "How many years has it been? Yet Teacher still treated the conflict between the two factions as if it was his own duty. Look at Kong Qiu, and look at the current students of the Imperial College. Are the noble clans the only ones who are drawing a line between those of different family statuses? It had been so easy to incite and stir up the storm in the imperial college, and yet Kong Qiu still has not realized that those of humble origins under his leadership hold the same prejudices against the officials from the noble clans. The moderates' gradual monopoly of the imperial college has long run counter to your grandfather's original intention to revive the Imperial College."

"You devised a plan to murder Emperor Tianchen and intensified the conflict between factions to put the Grand Secretariat in a perilous situation. You instigated Han Cheng to encircle Xiao Chiye to kill him and forced Libei into rebelling, allowing the Empress Dowager to consolidate Qidong's military power. You urged the Empress Dowager to exercise the power of the Son of Heaven, then aided the emperor's daughter up the throne. You plan every single step meticulously, taking everyone into account in your plan." Yao Wenyu rose to his feet slowly, and the black and white chess pieces tumbled to the ground as he moved. "You forced Teacher to his death."

The sound of rain intensified, melding together with the shattering sound of the chess pieces, so jarring it could cut one into a bloody pulp of flesh.

The heavy rain pelted against half of Xue Xiuzhuo's arm, wetting it. He looked face to face with Yao Wenyu without the slightest flicker of wavering in his eyes. They were fellow students from the same school and of the same teacher. They were educated by the same tutor, guided by the same mentor. They addressed the same topics in the imperial examinations. Yet, they had both become polar opposites.

"One day, I will die." Xue Xiuzhuo said in a raspy voice. "Regardless of whether I will be forsaken and deserted by all, or bring ruin and infamy upon myself, I will walk along this path to the very end."

"You stop at nothing to kill others and yourself." Yao Wenyu released his grip on the chess piece. "You won't be able to save all of the so-called masses in the world."

"The restoration of Dazhou is nigh, this very moment." Xue Xiuzhuo pressed in a step closer. "The old-school noble clans have been purged; the leaders of those from humble backgrounds have all suffered a setback; and the calamity that is the eunuch clique no longer exists. With the Grand Secretariat, Empress Dowager, and Heir Apparent to the throne held in check, the rising talents in the imperial court will surge forth in great numbers. Dazhou is about to have fresh blood coursing through its veins. Yao Wenyu, I die without fear, and I will not begrudge it even if I were to go down in history in infamy and end up condemned by posterity. I've long merged into one with the fire ignited by Teacher. I do it for myself."

Having said that, Xue Xiuzhuo opened up his umbrella once again and turned around to step into the rain.

"You win for a time."

Yao Wenyu remained where he was standing and raised his voice.

"You win one game. But this isn't a victory at all. Variables are endless with the world in chaos; you can't take everyone into account. Xue Xiuzhuo —!"

The rain fell in torrents, venting it all in the world. The green bamboo at Hai Liangyi's burial mound broke off in response, and muddy water flowed down the slope, like a face covering itself as it wailed bitterly.

"It's a draw today. The victor has yet to be determined." Xue Xiuzhuo stopped in his tracks. He did not look back. "But since there's Xue Yanqing in the world, what need is there to keep a Yao Yuanzhuo around? You and I do not share the same path. After tonight, there is no need for us to see each other again."

"This game isn't finished yet." Yao Wenyu said. "There is no such thing as a draw by my hand."

Xue Xiuzhuo seemed to have smiled. He looked back for the last time and gazed fixedly at Yao Wenyu for a long time. A curtain of rain separated them. They seemed to have been separated by a deep chasm from birth, like the shadows cast of Heaven and Earth—they would never ever become fellow travelers. The words "Xue Yanqing" had always been obscured by Yao Yuanzhuo. From the legitimacy of their lineage to Hai Liangyi's choice, Xue Xiuzhuo had never once won. Yet, at this very moment, he was the picture of condescending pity.

You've lost.

The horse carriage raced along the mountain road, surrounded by the barking of dogs everywhere. The pursuers spurred their horses on in hot pursuit of the carriage. Yao Wenyu's coachman was dead. Unable to control the direction of the horse carriage, Yao Wenyu could only let the carriage flee hastily and haphazardly through the mountains. Stray arrows came whizzing from behind and stabbed into the carriage. Several of them nailed to the ground beside the horse. Startled, the horse completely broke free from its reins.

Someone had already leaped onto the back of the carriage. He aggressively pierced through the carriage's wall with a broadsword and ripped open the curtain to stab inside. There was no one else on Mount Bodhi; Yao Wenyu's death sentence was already set in stone. Xue Xiuzhuo had never thought of letting him walk out of there alive from the moment he went up the mountain.

The horse carriage overturned and fell into a ditch, damaging its walls in the process, and Yao Wenyu felt like his internal organs had gone tumbling with it. The horse fell so hard it was in pain. Yao Wenyu released the reins, and it got back up with difficulty. The growls of the dogs at the back were too vicious, and the horse continued to flee with one leg limping. Yao Wenyu did not have a saddle, and among the jolts and bumps, he was nearly swiped off the horse by the branches. However, this horse had only galloped for a mere moment where an arrow shot it in another leg.

The pursuit of the killers had already reached the foot of Mount Bodhi. The person taking the lead was worried that they would miss the perfect timing and delay matters should Yao Wenyu's escape attempt continue. Hence, he used a rope to restrain Yao Wenyu's ankles and dragged him along the mountain path towards their own horse carriage. The rain had subsided some while this had been happening, and the sky had still yet to darken. They had to do a clean job without leaving any traces, so they first used the scabbards of their blades to break both of Yao Wenyu's legs, then dragged him over to stuff him into their horse carriage.

It was at this moment that there suddenly came the sound of galloping horses' hooves from the mountain road. Realizing that this did not bode well, the leader of the pursuing troops yanked the carriage curtains down and shouted with urgency, "Put your blades away!"

The party that had arrived was an ostentatious display of extravagance; the escorts on both sides of the horse carriage were all men from the Eight Great Training Divisions who filled up the already very narrow bridle path. The leader of the pursuing troops signaled for the carriage driver to pull aside the horse carriage, and all of them stood subserviently in a row to make way for the other party.

Yao Wenyu's mouth was gagged. His entire body spasmed as it throbbed with excruciating pain, but his mind was still clear. As he dripped with sweat, he knocked his forehead against the wooden plank of the carriage.

When the leader of the pursuing troops heard sounds coming from the carriage, he signaled his subordinates with his eyes. One of them promptly whipped the horse several times and bellowed at it to cover up the sounds made by Yao Wenyu.

But the company did not leave. The curtains from the carriage crammed in the middle lifted to reveal the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue dressed in the fashion of a married woman.<sup>1</sup> She furrowed her brows slightly and said, "Don't make a racket; there's a young child in the carriage."

Yao Wenyu recognized the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue's voice. A vague sound escaped from his throat, and he slammed his forehead hard until it was bloody red.

Commandery Princess Zhaoyue suddenly spoke up. "Is there someone in the carriage? Tell your master to see me."

Having recognized her, the leader paid his obeisance to her and gave an excuse, "It's my master's mistress. She's making a huge racket and threatening suicide, so it isn't advisable to let her out lest she offend the Commandery Princess. Commandery Princess, please go on ahead."

Commandery Princess Zhaoyue arched her willow-like brows. "This is where the Secretariat Elder was laid to rest. What nonsense are you spouting?! Men, lift the curtains of the carriage!"

The leader immediately whipped out his authority token, which bore the copper seal of the garrison troops. He said, "We're on official business with official warrants in hand, acting under the orders of the Ministry of Justice. Commandery Princess, how can you, a person without official authority, meddle in affairs of the court as you please? Even if the Marquis Helian is here in person today, he wouldn't be allowed to lift the curtain by force!"

Ever since marrying into the Pan clan, the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue had been living in Dancheng. After Hai Liangyi's death, she followed her husband to the capital. She had originally arranged to visit the Yao clan today, but who knew that the married couple would arrive only to learn that Yao Wenyu had yet to return from his trip into the mountains. She was familiar with Yao Wenyu's character—he would definitely not miss an appointment without reason, and so she had her carriage driven over to take a look. She was already of the firm belief that this group of people before her was up to no good.

The leader of the group figured that there was nothing the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue could do. No one from the Fei clan of today was an influential minister serving in the imperial court, so the Marquis Helian would not go around offending people rashly. With this thought in mind, he sneered, “If the Commandery Princess isn’t moving, then we’ll be taking our leave first.”

However, before he could move, he saw the guards from the Eight Great Training Divisions hold down the hilts of their blades in unison.

An exquisite, slender finger from within the carriage gently lifted the curtain to partially reveal a temple with a flower on it. The narrow-sleeved palace-wear of a court lady trailed down to the floor of the carriage, exposing the tips of satin shoes of exquisite quality, while eastern pearls<sup>2</sup> hung down at the edge of her collar. Her voice was soft and gentle. “If the Commandery Princess doesn’t have the right, how about me?”

The leader of the group was still frozen in place when he heard a guard bellow, “Third Missy Hua is onboard. Get on your knees now!!”

In Qudu, besides the apple of the Empress Dowager’s eye, who else would still dare to take on the address of Third Missy Hua?

Cold sweat dripped profusely from the man as he immediately kneeled and kowtowed. “I deserve a thousand deaths for obstructing the Third Missy!”

Author’s Notes:

This chapter was initially meant to be written from the POV of Qudu. I won’t be looking at the comments for the time being; I decided to just go along with my original rhythm. There’s no need to worry; the plot is all within the scope of my control, all the plot holes that ought to be filled won’t be forgotten, and those characters who have so far appeared as a silhouette will also take the stage in turn. There are some areas where I cannot leap out of the story to provide an explanation; that would be the failure of the narrative and my failure as an author. Whatever should be present in the story will be there. I won’t be repeating it again.

Thank you for reading.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. A married woman was typically dressed differently from a single maiden. For example, married women in ancient China wore their hair in an updo instead of letting it down.
2. 东珠 literally eastern pearl; the rulers of the Qing Dynasty regarded the eastern pearls as treasures and used them to inlay their crown and clothing with it to represent authority and honor.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 149 : HUA THE THIRD

Translated with: Jia<3

It was dark in Qudu. Lanterns had been raised on both sides of the streets. Hua Xiangyi's horse carriage returned to the city and made a beeline for the Pan's residence. Giving instructions to those in attendance at the sides, she simply said she wanted to have a girl-to-girl late-night chat with Zhaoyue, and so sent someone to the palace to convey the message that she would be back later.

Commandery Princess Zhaoyue's path to marriage had been fraught with difficulties. Marquis Helian initially had his heart set on Yao Wenyu, and later Xiao Chiye when the Empress Dowager had taken matters into her own hands. But in the end, neither of them worked out. Marquis Helian found it rather humiliating. He felt that Commandery Princess Zhaoyue was no longer young. What's more, she was the lawful daughter of the Fei clan born of the principal wife. It was inadvisable to drag the matter any further, and it just so happened that Han Cheng came calling on them at that time, so he had the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue betrothed to a lad from the Han clan. But this marriage did not come to fruition, because the Marquis Junior, Fei Shi, was a loafer, and he was very well aware that the lad from the Han clan was one too; in fact, that lad was even worse than that Han Jin. Fei Shi held him in contempt, finding him unworthy and undeserving of his elder sister, so he brought some men over to create a big ruckus, forcibly ripping this marriage plan to shreds.

Marquis Helian could not control his son. Left without a choice, he pondered over several options, oscillating between them before deciding on Pan Yi, the second son of a concubine from the Pan clan. He was Pan Lin's younger brother. Both clans knew each other inside out, and they were both similarly part of the Eight Great Clans. Fei Shi carefully observed this potential elder brother-in-law for a period, and only then did Commandery Princess Zhaoyue finally marry.

Pan Yi was a scholarly and refined man who originally held the post of Director of the Bureau of Waterways and Irrigation under the Ministry of Works. Later, Pan Xiangjie safely made it through the public ditches case, and Pan Lin took over Wei Huaigu's post in the Ministry of Revenue. Subsequently, Pan Yi was promoted too. He was transferred back to the Pan clan's hometown of Dancheng to serve as the Commandant of Dancheng. This person was fond of reading, and he had a deep respect for Yao Wenyu's talents and learning. That was why he had accompanied his wife when the latter went to pay Yao Wenyu a visit.

Pan Yi was originally waiting at home when Pan Lin just so happened to get off court session. Both brothers were talking in the front hall when they heard someone come calling from behind.

Pan Lin was now in charge of the Ministry of Revenue. As plenty had happened in Qudu after spring, the appointment document from the imperial court had yet to be issued, so he still carried the title of Vice Minister. He was taken aback after hearing the servant's report and questioned, "The Third Missy wants to see me?"

Hua Xiangyi had yet to be married, and she was the apple of the Empress Dowager's eye. The guards accompanying her in and out of the palace could not be underestimated. It was tough for males who were outsiders to get a glimpse of her appearance. Even if Pan Xiangjie wanted to see her, he had to be summoned. Pan Lin did not know what was going on, and he did not dare to dally either, so he hastily got up with Pan Yi and hurried over.

The moment Pan Yi entered the courtyard, he saw his wife standing under the eaves weeping. There was also a physician inside the room. Pan Lin was shocked, thinking that Hua Xiangyi had been injured, so he hurried over to ask, "Younger sister-in-law, what's happened?"

Commandery Princess Zhaoyue cried so hard both of her eyes were red. She clutched her handkerchief, but before she could say a word, she was racking with sobs once again. She covered her face and turned away, and Pan Yi rushed over to protect her, asking as he pulled her along, "My dear, what's going on?!"

Hua Xiangyi said from within the room, "The Vice Minister and the Commandant are both elder brothers<sup>1</sup> of mine, so there's no need to observe the formalities so scrupulously. Please come in to talk."

Pan Lin felt relieved when he heard Hua Xiangyi's gentle voice, which did not sound like she was injured. He exchanged glances with Pan Yi and hesitated for a moment, then went ahead to lift the curtain and enter. There was a screen set up in the room, and Hua Xiangyi was sitting in the seat of honor. Both men knelt and greeted in unison, "These humble subjects pay their respects to the Third Missy."

Hua Xiangyi said, "Brothers, please rise."

Through the beaded curtain at his side, Pan Lin saw a physician inside, so he asked, "Who is injured?"

After a moment of silence, Hua Xiangyi answered, "Truth be told, the man lying inside is none other than the Grand Secretary's beloved pupil, Yao Wenyu."

Pan Yi promptly exclaimed in delight, "It's Yuanzhuo!" But his expression changed abruptly the moment the words left his mouth. Anxious, he asked, "Oh, no! Did he get hurt on Mount Bodhi? I heard the bridle path on Mouth Bodhi has been in a state of disrepair for many years and is accident-prone on rainy days."

Commandery Princess stood at the side and wiped her tears. "How is Elder Cousin Brother injured because of the bridle path? He was hijacked and robbed!" Sorrow overwhelmed her at this point. "Those legs... What is he going to do in the future?"

Many thoughts flashed through Pan Lin's mind in an instant. He was presently at the critical juncture of a promotion. Once the appointment document to promote him to Minister of Revenue had been issued, he would only have to wait a few years for the inspections' appraisals to catch up and cancel out the impeachments he had received during the public ditches case, and his future would be a bright one paved with unlimited possibilities. Yao Wenyu's identity was special, and there was a political undercurrent surging through the imperial court at present. Pan Lin initially had no wish to be a part of it, lest he was deemed to be a member or supporter of one of the factions. However, he respected Hai Liangyi.

Pan Lin paused for only a moment before he said, "Mount Bodhi is on the outskirts of the city, and there are patrol squads inside and outside of Qudu. Yuanzhuo's meeting with a mishap is by no means a trivial matter. Third Missy, please tell me the details first."

He did not evade the issue nor begged off the matter, so Hua Xiangyi knew she had been right to find him. Pan Lin had a bad temper, and the only friend he had to have fun with together was Fei Shi. The one he could not deign to deal with the most was Xue Xiuyi. Back then, after the public ditches case, Xiao Chiye had hosted a banquet after being conferred a noble title, and Pan Lin had gone at his invitation. Humiliated in every way possible by Xue Xiuyi during the feast, Pan Lin had made a vow that even if he were “to starve to death in the future, he would never sit at the same table as the Xue clan”. From then on, he did not interact or socialize any further with the Xue clan. Xue Xiuzhuo was now at the height of power in Qudu because of his support to the Heir Apparent to the throne, and even so, Pan Lin had never paid him a visit. Xiao Chiye helped the Pan clan out of their predicament back then, saving Pan Xiangjie from being put to death by Wei Huaigu during the public ditches case, and the Qudu public ditches blueprint that Pan Lin had repaid him with later went on to become the key that helped Qiao Tianya and the rest escape from Qudu.

Later, Xiao Chiye was trapped in an encirclement by Han Cheng, who meant to kill him. He bore the charge of plotting to murder Emperor Tianchen, and despite that, Pan Lin did not hurry over himself to draw a clear line between them. His father, Pan Xiangjie, was a fence-sitter who swayed wherever the wind blew, but he, Pan Lin, could stand up to being called “upright”.

Hua Xiangyi gave him an account of their encounter with Yao Wenyu in a hushed tone. Eventually, she said, “Would the Vice Minister be willing to hear a few words from me?”

Pan Lin answered, “This humble subject is all ears.”

Hua Xiangyi looked slightly out of the corner of her eye at that beaded curtain. A moment later, she said, “The storm brewing in Qudu is currently unstoppable. The trouble Yuanzhuo came face to face with today is by no means a coincidence. The Vice Minister knows better than me about the affairs of the imperial court. The Grand Secretary’s remonstrance by death will be a matter of regret for Dazhou through the ages. Yuanzhuo is not only the Grand Secretary’s beloved pupil but also the Yao clan’s beloved son. His reputation is now in tatters because of the imperial college incident, but his talents and learning still remain, and his moral integrity still exists. His resolution and ambition will be all the stronger after going through this tribulation, and there is no reason he can’t make a comeback in the future and lead the literati of the world to recreate the glory of the Imperial College.”

Pan Lin said nothing.

After a long silence, Hua Xiangyi continued, “Yuanzhuo must leave Qudu as soon as possible after tonight. I’m about to marry far away to Qidong, and it’d be inconvenient for me to come and go freely. Although I have an imperial palace rank, I can't openly send him out of the capital with great fanfare."

At this point, Hua Xiangyi rose to her feet and slowly kneeled to bow to Pan Lin across the screen.

Pan Lin's face turned pale. He strode a step forward and said, "This won't do! Third Missy, please rise quickly!"

Hua Xiangyi kowtowed and said, "Yuanzhuo is blessed to have been successively taught by wise teachers in this life. I've read all of his essays. The Heir Apparent to the throne has just been established, and the Hanlin Academy is now an empty shell. The tripartite balance of power with Auntie at the lead cannot last for long, and Kong Qiu can barely fend for himself. I may be a girl, but I know that outstanding men of talents are hard to find." She paused for a moment, then solemnly continued, "Chengzhi, please."

She addressed Pan Lin by his courtesy name, saying it from the bottom of her heart.

Pan Lin could not help but look ashamed to see the extent that Hua Xiangyi was willing to go to save Yao Wenyu. He hurriedly said, "Third Missy, please get up! I value Yuanzhuo's talents. This is what we ought to do, to begin with. Tomorrow morning, Yuanzhuo will follow my younger sister-in-law out of Qudu and rest up in Dancheng first. After he recovers from his injuries, he can decide what to do on his own." Hai Liangyi came to his mind at this point. He continued, "Although the Grand Secretary and some of us do not see eye to eye in politics, I still hold him in esteem. How gallant is it for a civil minister to remonstrate with his death! I ought to lend a helping hand, even if for the Grand Secretary."

Hua Xiangyi continued, "The other party must already know about Yuanzhuo's escape from death today. To be on the safe side, I'd like to ask the Vice Minister to think of a way to pull the wool over their eyes."

Pan Lin answered, "I already have an idea in mind."

"It's already getting late now; I can't stay any longer." Hua Xiangyi stood up and let the maidservant support her as she went over to the side of the beaded curtains. She looked at Yao Wenyu inside, his face white as a sheet. In the end, she said nothing and took her leave.

Two hours after Hua Xiangyi's departure, a corpse wrapped in a straw mat was sent out through the backdoors of the Pan's Residence. Those in the outer courtyard inquiring about it did not know the details. All they heard was that it was a beggar the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue brought back from outside who had died of sickness in the middle of the night. The pursuing troops who had been crouching in wait for many hours followed all the way to the burial grounds to examine the corpse. The leader found out that the body fit Yao Wenyu's physique to a tee; even the wounds from his broken legs were identical. The only thing was that the face of the corpse was disfigured; however, the bite marks on his lips were similar.

Not daring to dally, the man withdrew with his men back to the residence to make his report.

The next day, Commandery Princess Zhaoyue and Pan Yi departed for Dancheng. She had just given birth to a child, and there were so many nannies and maidservants accompanying her that just the carriage alone numbered in the dozens. Pan Lin went to attend morning court. As he stood at the foot of the stairs to wait, he saw Kong Qiu and Cen Yu standing in front. Worried that there were people in the imperial court watching, he did not go forward.

Nowadays, the Heir Apparent to the throne rose at the hour of yin and attended classes at the hour of mao. The participants in the classics colloquium put together by the Grand Secretariat were all carefully hand-picked scholars and academicians from the Hanlin Academy, and the morning classes could not be finished before midday. Meanwhile, the Empress Dowager was still the one holding court behind the screen.<sup>2</sup> Li Jianting merely switched from attending classes in the Xue's residence to attending classes in the palace. As long as the Grand Secretariat did not pass the vote, she would have to continue to be a student. The Ministry of Rites had long been making preparations for the enthronement, but the grand ceremony now seemed light-years away with Kong Qiu and the rest suppressing it.

Xue Xiuzhuo was still teaching Li Jianting. Li Jianting did not have the authority to participate in government and political affairs, although she had the right to attend court and listen in. She slept very little every day. After morning classes, she would take a short nap, then it would be the Grand Secretariat council led by Kong Qiu and Xue Xiuzhuo in the afternoon. All matters of the Six Ministries, regardless of significance, had to be reported by the Grand Secretariat. Li Jianting rarely spoke up as they stood and deliberated over those matters, but her attitude was respectful and prudent.

Whether it was morning classes or the councils, she would always arrive before the ministers and stand deferentially under the eaves of Mingli Hall to await them.

Kong Qiu and Cen Yu initially disliked Li Jianting, but even they had to concede that Li Jianting's attitude was sincere enough. Her desire to learn was far more evident than Li Jianheng's.

Pan Lin prepared to board the carriage after he left the court. Just as he was about to lower the curtains, he saw Xue Xiuzhuo walking out of the palace gates with another person. Both men's eyes met for an instant. Pan Lin nodded calmly and managed with some effort to bow partially to him. Only then did he let down the curtain of the carriage.

Qiao Tianya shut the window, making a slight noise.

Yao Wenyu woke up. It was as if he had just stepped out from the shaking carriage; the stifling heat was everywhere. He turned his eyes and saw Qiao Tianya.

Qiao Tianya said, "It's now the third quarter of the hour of yin; you can sleep for a little longer."

Yao Wenyu said expressionlessly, "Having awoken from a dream, I'm none too keen to return to it."

Qiao Tianya poured tea and took a sip, then raised his cup at Yao Wenyu. "Want a drink?"

After a moment of silence, Yao Wenyu said, "Tea is tasteless. Change it to wine."

"You have yet to recover from your injuries. It's inadvisable for you to drink wine." As Qiao Tianya spoke, he took down the wine at the side of his waist, shook it a few times, and twisted it open to drink it himself. "I'll drink it for you. You can watch."

After Qiao Tianya was done drinking, Yao Wenyu said, "Excellent wine."

The bangs on Qiao Tianya's forehead slipped down and covered his eyes. His stubble, which had grown out recently, had yet to be shaved clean. On hearing Yao Wenyu, he stroked it a couple of times and said, "Wine that costs a few strings of copper coins can't really be considered excellent. If you get better, I'm willing to spend tens of taels of silver to let you taste real, excellent wine."

The corner of Yao Wenyu's lips shifted slightly.

Qiao Tianya leaned against the table and looked at him. “The military craftsman from Libei will arrive in a few days. I can go out with you to appreciate the autumn scenery of Cizhou.”

Yao Wenyu’s smile faded. He looked out of the window; there was the tinkling sound of the wind chimes under the eaves again. He was quiet for a very long time before he said, “May I trouble you to ask the Vice Commander to prepare a generous gift on my behalf for the grand wedding between Hua and Qi tomorrow. Third Missy Hua saved my life. Please thank her on my behalf too. Don’t tell her anything else. Just say I’m fine.”

Qiao Tianya answered in the affirmative.

Yao Wenyu’s gaze relaxed. He said, “Let’s play the zither.”

When Shen Zechuan got up, he heard the faint sound of the seven-stringed zither<sup>3</sup> from the courtyard.

Fei Sheng teased, “This Qiao Tianya is truly a deep one with hidden talents.”

Shen Zechuan tilted his head and said, “The Qiao clan fell into decline, and all the delicate sensibilities he possessed as a young master vanished along with it. The most difficult time was during his exile, when he had to fight for food with stray dogs and take care of his elder sister-in-law at the same time. All that he has left today is that seven-stringed zither of his. He cleans and caresses it every day, and he cherishes it very much, so much that he never plays it for others—this is his pride.”

Fei Sheng had seen that seven-stringed zither before. Not even Ding Tao dared to touch it. He did not understand this bit of pride, but he did not speak up to vilify it. He had worked together with Qiao Tianya for many years. Although he had been wanting to take Qiao Tianya’s place all this while from Qudu to Cizhou, he was still nevertheless willing to acknowledge Qiao Tianya’s capabilities.

Author’s Words:

So what’s up with that poison?

You’ll find out in a couple of chapters.

Thank you for reading.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. Specifically 兄长 xiongzhang, a respectful form of address for an elder brother or a male friend
2. 垂帘听政 literally to hold court behind a screen or curtain. A practice in ancient China, where the Empress or Empress dowager was allowed to preside over the imperial court without actually being seen by her subjects since women were prohibited from politics. This would usually be done by a child emperor's mother, who would serve as regent and rule in place of the emperor

- 3.
4. Specifically 古琴 Guqin is a plucked seven-string Chinese musical instrument of the zither family.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 150 : TREACHEROUS MINISTER

Translated with: Jia<3

Due to the recent death of Emperor Tianchen, it was customary for the marriage between Hua and Qi to be postponed. However, Xiao Chiye rebelled his way out of Qudu, and Qudu had favors to ask of Qidong, so the Empress Dowager and Grand Secretariat mulled over the matter numerous times before eventually deciding to marry Hua Xiangyi off in the seventh month.

The Empress Dowager went all out this time, and the dowry she prepared for Hua Xiangyi spanned more than ten li. Arrangements made by the Ministry of Rites were all done in accordance with the wedding protocols for a princess. The ceremonial guards of honor sending her off were personally led by Han Cheng himself, and there were countless wet nurses and maidservants following along in her retinue.

Hua Xiangyi boarded the horse carriage. Just as it was about to depart, the Empress Dowager took two steps after it and almost called out to her. But she had to be mindful of her image and uphold her dignity after all, so she could only hold on to Matron Liuxiang's arm and muttered softly as the eastern pearls by her ears swayed. "My little darling..."

The ceremonial guards of honor left Qudu and headed for Qidong along Chuancheng's public roads, during which they would pass by Chazhou. Han Cheng was initially worried that the bandits from Chazhou would rob them, so he specially brought along men from the Eight Great Training Divisions, but the journey was unexpectedly uneventful; Luo Mu even sent over his congratulatory gifts when they passed by. They continued to travel south, where Qi Zhuyin was already waiting for them within Qidong's borders.

"Speaking of this Qi Zhuyin," Han Cheng's horse stuck close to the carriage as he spoke to Hua Xiangyi with the carriage curtain between them. "Third Missy hasn't met her before, right?"

A soft sound of affirmation rose from within.

Han Cheng loved flaunting his seniority. On hearing her, he perked up and said, "Let this old subject share some domestic trivialities with the Third Missy. Although Qi Zhuyin is a girl, she is not easy to get along with."

The Third Missy typically resides in the inner palace, so you must have not known how ferocious she looks every year she enters the capital. The Ministry of Revenue was in a tight spot during the reign of Xiande, and yet she dared to command her soldiers to obstruct His Excellency Wei's sedan for the military salaries for the Qidong troops. But the Ministry of Revenue genuinely could not afford to pay up, and left without a choice, she associated herself with the ruffians who were also loan sharks in Qudu and hung out with them in the streets.

Hua Xiangyi had only seen Qi Zhuyin through a screen before. In that Feast of A Hundred Officials where all the civil ministers and military generals were men, Qi Zhuyin was a special case. She did not stand out much during her early years in Qidong. Before Qi Shiyu handed over his commander seal, everyone was speculating about which of her brothers would take over. After the expedition to rescue Qi Shiyu, Qi Zhuyin was first denied entry to the capital. The imperial court dragged the matters on for several months on the grounds that her 'military achievements were still pending investigation'. Then, there was the Yulong Terrace fiasco when the day of her conferment drew closer. Even with the backing of the Empress Dowager, Qi Zhuyin merely took over Qi Shiyu's commander seal and did not inherit Qi Shiyu's title. In other words, every battle that Qi Zhuyin fought today only built up prestige for Qidong and not for herself. If she did not get married in this life, she would continue to be considered a 'daughter of Qi' even after retiring from the front lines, with no title to her name. Conversely, her brothers would be set for life as long as they beget sons soonest possible.

Han Cheng was still talking, but Hua Xiangyi seemed to have fallen asleep inside the carriage. Han Cheng gradually felt bored and stopped talking in awkward embarrassment.

The ceremonial guards of honor traveled until the hour of you when a streak of red suddenly emerged on the horizon. Horses' hoofs thundered in unison amidst the billowing waves of heat, revealing the light cavalry that stretched far into the distance, all dressed in red robes. The military flag of Qidong fluttered in the wind, like a dragon soaring straight for them, while a storm of yellow sand surged forth and slapped Han Cheng's entire face full of dust.

Qi Wei took the lead and dismounted his horse, brandishing the flag as he bellowed, "WEL—COME—!"

The light cavalry behind him got off their horses and simultaneously went down on one knee, their armors clanging resoundingly as they raised their arms and shouted in chorus, “We extend our respectful welcome to Madam!”

These two thunderous roars left the palace maids from Qudu so shaken that their hearts went pounding; even Han Cheng almost clutched at his chest. Beating away the dust, he knitted his brows and asked, “Where’s the Commander...”

The sound of horse hooves circled over towards them, then that red figure was already right before the horse carriage. Before Han Cheng could stop her, Qi Zhuyin lifted the curtain with the sheath of her blade and tilted her head to peer inside.

Hua Xiangyi had yet to have her head covered with a veil, and there was a golden jade phoenix coronet perched on her head as she looked at Qi Zhuyin in shock, her chest pounding hard. She did not have a clue what Qi Zhuyin was trying to do.

“Yo.” Qi Zhuyin greeted her. “Stepmother.”<sup>1</sup>

Shocked, Han Cheng hurriedly stepped forward to close the carriage curtain. He could not help but rebuke, “We have yet to arrive in Cangjun Commandery, so how can the Commander-in-chief simply lift the Third Missy’s curtain?!”

“Just taking a look.” Rebuffed, Qi Zhuyin retracted her hand and said, “How many times have you taken a break during the journey? According to the estimated time, you should have arrived yesterday.”

Han Cheng followed after Qi Zhuyin’s horse and answered, “It’s a long journey, and it’s hard to guarantee that nothing will happen if we are in too much of a hurry. I thought the Commander-in-Chief would be waiting to receive us at the southern side of Chazhou, but in the end, we didn’t see you even after all that waiting.”

“I’m only just hurried back from Bianjun, so I don’t have much time to spare.” As Qi Zhuyin spoke, she looked back and asked Han Cheng, “Why are you getting off your horse?”

Han Cheng looked around the place. “It’s already the hour of you now; it should be here...”

Qi Zhuyin pointed to the east with her horse whip and said, “Continue on your way for a little further, and you’ll be able to reach Cejun Commandery at the hour of hai. There's a bridle path in Cejun, and the road to Cangjun Commandery will be a tad smoother. Get on your horse."

Han Cheng had been on the go for an entire day, and he was exhausted at this point. He still wanted to say something, but Qi Zhuyin had already spurred her horse on and left. Qi Wei mounted his horse from his end and led his light cavalry to surround the ceremonial procession, then said to Han Cheng politely, "Commander, let's go."

Even if Han Cheng was a bigwig in Qudu, he had no authority over the affairs of the Ministry of War and Ministry of Revenue. The Imperial Bodyguards could throw their weight around in Qudu and other places, but to Qi Zhuyin, they were of no threat. She was the Commander-in-Chief of Qidong's Five Commanderies' troops. Qidong was her territory. Han Cheng had no say here, what's more when the Empress Dowager herself even had to rely on the Qidong Garrison Troops now.

Han Cheng bore a grudge deep down, but he could not let it show on his expression yet. All he could do was smile at Qi Wei and get on his horse to continue with the journey.

Hua Xiangyi returned to her senses, her heart still palpitating from the fleeting glimpse of the stunning sight earlier. The curtain of the carriage swayed, and she tilted her head slightly to look through the gap, where she saw the back view of Qi Zhuyin as she rode her horse ahead.

Qi Zhuyin was tall and slender. She must have made a special effort to dress up today. She had to ride a horse, so she did not have her hair up in a high bun as was common in Qudu, but she still looked very chic. There were no hair accessories like hairpins, double-edged fine-toothed comb, or exquisite pearls in her hair, making her appear all the more neat and tidy.

She was a pretty one.

Hua Xiangyi still wanted to continue sizing her up, but then she saw her look back abruptly.

Xiao Chiye said to send his congratulations, but he still had someone prepare a gift. Xiao Jiming also had to prepare a gift on his end. Their relationship with Qidong was not all that bad. Even if it was a little delicate at the moment, the friendship was still there, especially with Qi Zhuyin.

The wedding between Hua and Qi was a declaration of the temporary victory of the Empress Dowager in the tussle for power in Qudu. The Grand Secretariat could only first stabilize the Heir Apparent to the throne before they had the latitude to continue with the contention for dominance. It was at this moment Xue Xiuzhuo made a wise decision. He submitted a memorial to negotiate with the Grand Secretariat and had Jiang Qingshan released back to Juexi, thereby securing the granaries in Qudu.

Yao Wenyu sat in the wheelchair and let Qiao Tianya push him outdoors. The weather in Cizhou had been rather bad lately. Autumn rain was on its way, and the scenery in the outskirts of the city was even more bleak and desolate. Yao Wenyu had been out of the sun for many days, and right this moment, he seemed to have become a jade laid bare out there for all to see.

“It’s just as you expected.” Shen Zechuan looked at the vast expanse of autumn leaves and the solemnly quiet lands as he stood at Yao Wenyu’s side. “He really transferred Jiang Qingshan back to Juexi.”

“I originally thought Jiang Qingshan ought to have gone to Huaizhou even if it was to suppress Cizhou.” In a rare moment today, Zhou Gui was wearing a body-fitting outfit,<sup>2</sup> having also ridden his way here on horseback. He wiped his sweat and said, “Luoxia Pass is close to the city of Quancheng, and Quancheng is the native hometown of the Xue clan. It’s only to be expected for him to be worried. I didn’t think he would really be willing to send Jiang Qingshan back to Juexi.”

Holding the cat in his sleeve, Yao Wenyu said, “It’s because of the geographical location of Luoxia Pass and the city of Quancheng. It’s inevitable that both of you would have such concerns. Going by the present situation, putting Jiang Qingshan in Huaizhou would be the most advantageous to Xue Xiuzhuo and the Xue clan.”

The soles of Shen Zechuan’s boots trod across the fallen leaves. He stood still and lost himself in his thoughts.

If Jiang Qingshan was transferred to the prefecture of Huaizhou, he would, firstly, be able to challenge Cizhou and obstruct the trade route between Cizhou, Chazhou, and Huaizhou from taking shape; secondly, he would be able to ensure that Quancheng would be safe and sound, as well as join forces with Quancheng to put pressure on Luoxia Pass, and subsequently, Libei. These were all matters that Shen Zechuan could think of himself, and naturally, so could Xue Xiuzhuo. Yet, he still forsook the safety of Quancheng and chose Juexi, just like Yao Wenyu predicted.

“Xue Xiuzhuo had Jiang Qingshan released back.” Shen Zechuan’s expression was grave. “And this is what makes him tough to deal with.”

This maneuver not only meant that Xue Xiuzhuo would restrict Libei's and Zhongbo's development through the grains, but also that he did not give a damn about the personal gains and losses of the Xue clan. In other words, he harbored no selfish desires, which made him completely different from Hua Siqian, Wei Huaigu, and the others. What he sought was not benefits for one party.

"Jiang Qingshan takes a hard approach on policies, and his local governance is effective. There are rumors in Qudu that he will not tolerate a thorn in his side, but in truth, it's quite the opposite." Yao Wenyu flexed his fingers and stroked the cat. "Juexi has thirteen cities, with two prefectures and two harbors; it's now a veritable granary of Dazhou. The Xi clan's business is by far its largest in Juexi, and even the waterways of the Hua clan in Dicheng have to go through it. If the Vice Commander has been to Juexi before, you'd understand that Juexi's prosperity did not happen by coincidence. Jiang Qingshan is an extraordinarily broad-minded man who uses people regardless of their family status and social standing. He would never make excuses to decline in the face of major matters, but he also knows not to go too far when dealing with minor issues. He never lets go of all that he ought to have a firm grip on, and he never regrets all that he should relax his hold on. With such a Provincial Administration Commissioner, it's not surprising for Juexi to swiftly get back on its feet after the natural disaster in the reign of Xiande. Jiang Qingshan is such a person. He cited Xue Xiuzhuo as his bosom friend in life, precisely because they shared the same political views and ambitions."

On hearing this, Zhou Gui nodded. "I've long heard of the political achievements of these two people. When the Grand Secretary promoted Xue Xiuzhuo to the Court of Judicial Review back then, no one in the imperial court opposed."

"The Vice Commander has also read Xue Xiuzhuo's essays on contemporary politics before." Yao Wenyu said. "Does the Vice Commander still remember the Grand Mentor's wish?"

Shen Zechuan knew it by heart, because he inherited Qi Huilian's knowledge and understood best what Qi Huilian wanted to do back then. After a moment of silence, he said, "To unify the management of Dazhou's household registries; to survey all the fertile farmlands in the world; to consolidate the miscellaneous local taxes; and to restore the cash flow of the state treasury."

Yao Wenyu looked at the mountains in the distance and said, “These are what Xue Xiuzhuo wants to accomplish. He and Teacher are both striving for the same thing if you look at it on this point alone. Teacher has the support of Kong Qiu, Cen Yu, and the various officials of humble backgrounds, while Xue Xiuzhuo has the support of the industrious and practical action-takers with Jiang Qingshan at the lead. He’s not alone.”

But could the current Dazhou really do it?

It took Qi Huilian many years to implement the registration of households into the census registry<sup>3</sup> in the local areas. Why was the Eastern Palace framed for rebellion? Because the next on the list was the surveyance of farmlands. The misappropriation of the commoners’ fields in the Eight Cities of Qudu was rather severe. Once the policy was implemented, the noble clans not only had to return the commoners’ fields and receive their sentence according to the law, they also had to bear the land and field taxes themselves. Killing the Crown Prince would prevent the policy from being implemented. Hai Liangyi taught Li Jianheng the way he did to treat the problem at its source. He hoped Li Jianheng would be able to maintain a tight hold over the Grand Secretariat and wield his authority to make changes and overhaul the system from top-down. For this, he was willing to charge valiantly forth in Li Jianheng’s place.

But Li Jianheng could not do it.

Xue Xiuzhuo realized this way earlier than Hai Liangyi did. He instantly abandoned Li Jianheng, no longer holding out any hope for this emperor, or even the Li clan. He needed a new emperor, one who could sit quietly on the throne. It had to be the case that this emperor would never interfere with the Grand Secretariat, nor sway left and right in the struggle between those from the noble clans and those of humble backgrounds. Even more so, he would not be partial towards the frontier with heavy military presence for the sake of so-called brotherhood. And so he found Li Jianting.

But a plan like this took too long. Qudu was changing every single moment. Shen Zechuan himself was a variable. In Qudu, he was at best an abandoned pawn on Xue Xiuzhuo’s chessboard, one who could be off-handedly discarded after dealing with Xi Hongxuan and Wei Huaigu, wiped out in that heavy downpour just like Xiao Chiye. Xue Xiuzhuo had no selfish desires, and this was what was so terrifying about him. Xue Xiuyi had repeatedly ridiculed, mocked, and even humiliated Xue Xiuzhuo, but

Xue Xiuzhuo did not kill off this lawful eldest brother of his, because, in his eyes, Xue Xiuyi was not important at all. Dead or alive, he made no difference, just like the dust at his feet.

He wanted to kill Qi Huilian, because Qi Huilian was the tutor of the emperor of Dazhou. He wanted to kill Yao Wenyu, because Yao Wenyu was a phenomenal talent. He gave these two men the chance to choose before, but in the end, both of them turned him down. Releasing a strategist, who could not be used for his own purpose, back into the wild was akin to gifting the world's famous sword to another. And it was only by killing them that he would be able to eliminate the roots of troubles down the road.

A solitary wild goose flew across the horizon. Frost and fog gradually materialized, and a hue of colors washed over the cold-blighted forest. It was getting more and more chilly by the day. Qiao Tianya casually covered Yao Wenyu with a thick coat; they were still in the forest.

Shen Zechuan tapped his folding fan against his palm, his gaze following Hongyan Mountains southward as he said, "When Xue Xiuzhuo was teaching the Heir Apparent to the throne, he likely did not think that Dazhou would have collapsed to such an extent in just a mere few years. There is no one in this world who can take every single thing into account and come up with a foolproof strategy. The military provisions incident that forced Lu Guangbai into rebelling is a variable. Qidong missed the opportunity to hunt down Ce'an because they lost Lu Guangbai, and Qudu went from besieging Xiao Chiye to releasing a tiger back to its mountain."<sup>4</sup>

The events that befell men were always unexpected, be it Lu Guangbai, Shen Zechuan, Xiao Chiye, Yao Wenyu, or even any of the other nameless faces out there. Heaven gave every person a different challenge, and in climbing back to their feet and surviving, those who had initially been trapped in their circumstances had all fought and broken free of their shackles. Turbulent times meant that the order of the world no longer existed; anyone could fight for a slice of the pie if they so wished. If there were those who clung on to the fragments already broken, then there would also be those who brandished their weapons to break through the impasse.

This was the era of treacherous ministers and traitors.

It was in the midst of the thick fog when the raindrops fell. Fei Sheng opened up an umbrella and held it over Shen Zechuan. They reined in their horses and made their way back. Autumn had finally come to Cizhou. The wind sent the sleeves of Shen Zechuan's robes billowing, nearly blowing away his blue handkerchief. At the same time Shen Zechuan grasped onto the handkerchief, the falling leaves dancing all over the sky passed by him. Yellow, withered leaves spiraled up in the wind, where the rain pelted at them, sending them falling at Xiao Chiye's feet.

Gu Jin returned on horseback, waving a small flag as he shouted, "The bridle path ahead has collapsed. Master, we are trapped here!"

Xiao Chiye mounted his horse. Wu Ziyu spurred his horse on forward from behind and braved the rain to say, "Zhao Hui's troops haven't arrived, and the Tudalong Banner lies ten li away from here. Hasen's cavalry is nearby!"

"The grain wagons are too heavy." Tantai Hu wiped off the rainwater. "Unless we abandon the provisions and take a detour, we are bound to come across Hasen's cavalry tonight."

"There are insufficient supplies at the battlegrounds; if this batch of provisions falls into Hasen's hands, His Lordship is going to get hit hard." Chen Yang tugged at the reins, his face red from the cold. "We can stay here, but Master has to go."

Based on the military orders a few days ago, Xiao Chiye, on making a detour from Dajing to the north, had to go past the bridle path of the original Changzhu camp to first provide supplies for Zhao Hui, then head towards the battlegrounds to replenish Xiao Fangxu's stock. When they arrived at this spot, they should theoretically be received by Zhao Hui's Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang, but Zhao Hui had not appeared. Meng was also unable to fly too far to carry out reconnaissance due to the rainstorm today. It was as though Xiao Chiye had been blindfolded.

The expression in Xiao Chiye's eyes was unbelievably calm as he gave free rein to the raindrops trickling across his cheeks and commanded in a grave tone over the noise, "Turn around. We're heading for the Tudalong Banner."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Special Thanks: to Yuka! <3

Footnotes

1. 小娘 xiaoniang is a term for one's father's concubine. In Qi Zhuyin's case, it'd be closer to a stepmother, since Hua Xiangyi is marrying into the family as the second wife and not a concubine.

- 2.
3. 劲装 Jin Zhuang is a more body-fitting outfit (compared to the usual loose, flowing robes) with the sleeves secured to make movements easier and less restrictive. It's usually worn by martial arts practitioners to facilitate combat.
4. 黃冊 Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household's classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.
5. 放虎归山 i.e., set free a deadly enemy, thereby setting the stage for future disaster.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 151 : ROUND-UP

Translated with: Jia<3

The Tudalong Banner was located in the eastern mountain ranges of the Hongyan Mountains; it was to the northwest of the Shayi Camp, and leading directly east of was the Biansha Twelve Tribes. Before this year, it was not a place of contention for both sides, but with Libei's repeatedly retreating battlefront, this place became a strategic point above the battleground. Huhelu's squad broke through the checkpoints and watchtowers ahead, so Changzhu Camp could only confront them on the west side of the Tudalong Banner. Both sides often engage in slanging matches across the marshland of the Tudalong Banner.

Xiao Chiye took a detour from the Bianbo Camp, which just so happened to put him to the south of Changzhu Camp. But the collapse blocked off the bridle path leading right to Changzhu Camp, and the Tudalong Banner lay just to the right. Hasen's squad often wandered around this area. If Xiao Chiye refused to abandon the grains to extricate himself, then he could only come face to face with Hasen with the supplies in tow. However, the grain wagons were too heavy. Wu Ziyu's Armored Cavalry could not run on mud, and the Imperial Army did not have enough light cavalry to interfere. Under such circumstances, it was simply too dangerous to turn around and head for the Tudalong Banner.

Wu Ziyu wanted to refute, but Chen Yang and the rest had already turned their horses around. That was a kind of trust that could not be described with words alone. They unconditionally obeyed Xiao Chiye. Even if it was a critical moment of life and death right this moment, they could immediately carry it out, as long as it was Xiao Chiye's commands. Wu Ziyu, who stood among them, involuntarily shuddered.

It was now a quarter past the hour of shen, and the sky was overcast, having been affected by the rainstorm. Gu Jin was well-acquainted with this area, and the convoy squad entered Tudalong Banner. The grain wagons rolled heavily across the mudholes; just a little oversight, and they would sink in them. Everyone stilled their breathing and focused with rapt attention, not daring to be sloppy in the slightest.

Xiao Chiye wanted to conceal the grain wagons here.

No matter how brave the cavalry of Biansha was, they would not enter the Tudalong Banner rashly. The marshland was similarly a difficult place for them to navigate. Besides, rainy days affected not just Xiao Chiye, but Hasen as well. Meng's inability to do reconnaissance meant that the saker falcons were not able to either. Both sides could not get a clear look at the other party's movements through the rainstorm; they could only rely on their knowledge of the battlefield to make their moves against each other. But this kind of delicate balance could only be maintained in the rainstorm. Once the rain stopped, Xiao Chiye's current squad would not be able to withstand Hasen's assault.

"Wu Ziyu, stay to guard over the grain wagons." Xiao Chiye said rapidly. "Let the Armored Cavalry hang up the chains to surround the grain wagons."

The paths around the Tudalong Banner were all muddy, and the Armored Cavalry were too heavy on rainy days. It was easy for the horses' hooves to get bogged down in the mud, so staying behind to watch over the grain wagons was the most appropriate decision to make. The chains were something Xiao Fangxu had them equipped with. Hooked them on the armors, and they could turn the Armored Cavalry into the grain wagons' "armor". That way, even if Hasen could break through Xiao Chiye's guerrilla attack and enter the inner area of the Tudalong Banner, he would still be unable to break up the iron wall of the Armored Cavalry right at once.

Xiao Chiye remained in place and said to the Imperial Army, "Hasen is leading the Hanshe Tribe. Their speed is fast, and their strikes are powerful; we can't catch up to them or stop them. But the east side where they are located is overgrown with bushes, which makes it easy for us to hide. The saker falcon can't go ahead with their patrols on rainy days; this is an opportunity."

It was clear who was the stronger and weaker one between the enemy and them. Xiao Chiye could not let Hasen's squad remain intact; he would have no chance of winning if that was the case. He had the Imperial Army split up into small groups to feel their way out of the Tudalong Banner's marshland, set up ropes to trip the enemies' horses, then similarly break up and divert the unsuspecting Biansha Cavalry all over the Tudalong Banner.

As long as the Biansha Cavalry fell off their horses, they would lose their advantage.

“Gu Jin should bypass Hasen’s squad and rush over to the battlefield at top speed.” Xiao Chiye turned around and looked at Gu Jin. “Zhao Hui didn’t come, and that means the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang are unable to move at this moment. The war situation further north is likely to be more dire than we thought. We can only now ask the battleground for reinforcements.”

Gi Jin had been injured before in the Tudalong Banner. He knew the roads of the Tudalong Banner by heart. He promptly voiced an acknowledgment and led a row of lightly-equipped scouts on ahead.

“Laohu, head northeast. I’ll go to the east. Chen Yang, assume personal command here.” As Xiao Chiye spoke, he strode forward. “No matter what, we have to ensure the army provisions can be successfully delivered to the site of battle.”

Having followed Xiao Chiye bustle all over the place, Chen Yang knew best about the status of the various granaries’ reserves in Libei. If Xiao Chiye were defeated, then Chen Yang would have to release a falcon once the rain stopped to inform the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path to reallocate army provisions up north without further delay. As the convoy squad, their lives and deaths were nowhere near as important as the army provisions for the battlegrounds.

This place was close to Hongyan mountains; the rain would not be stopping any time soon. The Imperial Army who was lying low in the mudholes had to endure the bone-chilling cold. Their inner garment clung to their skin, having already been drenched through. All their limbs had to be soaked in the mud, and it took less than an hour for all their fingers and toes to be frozen.

The autumnal rains of Libei were like blades; August had barely begun, yet the temperature had already dropped so low it appeared snow might fall any moment.

The convoy squad had yet to change into outer coats to keep out the cold. Long before heading out, Xiao Chiye had already asked that they switch the water they carried on hand with “On Horseback”.<sup>1</sup> Strong wine could dispel the cold, and thus it was a pivotal item to have in this frontier of capricious wind and snow.

Xiao Chiye crouched in a mudhole and chugged down the wine, one mouthful at a time.

For the most part, the battle between Libei and Biansha would not drag past the eighth or ninth month, as a further delay meant the coming of snow, where the grasslands of both parties would be ravaged by raging snowstorms. During the long and harsh winter, groups of Libei's military craftsmen would spend this time tirelessly re-forging and repairing equipment for the Armored Cavalry. On the other end, Biansha would herd their flocks of sheep closer to the south. Everyone would spontaneously enter a period of truce without fail. It was only during the third year of the reign of Xiande that something unforeseen had happened. Then, the Hanshe Tribe headed south and breached the banks of Chashi River to relieve considerable pressure on the provisions for the Twelve Tribes of Biansha.

For some reason, in the past couple of days, Xiao Chiye had a premonition that there would be no truce this winter. Amu'er's combat style was too aggressive. If what Amu'er had done in early spring was to enter his enemy's territory to plunder food, then right now, Amu'er seemed more like he was full-on suppressing Libei with no intention of retreat. By transferring Hasen over here from Qidong, Amu'er was deploying and letting loose his most powerful troops on the battlefields of Libei, which were completely unlike the small-scaled battles and skirmishes they had engaged in during the last few years.

All of a sudden, the sound of horse hooves rose through the rain. Xiao Chiye hung back his flask and held up two fingers to signal for the Imperial Army behind him to get down. He crouched down, his face almost touching the mudhole, and used only his eyes to search the bushes in the rain. A troop of cavalymen appeared amidst the pouring rain, the hooves of their horses splashing muddy water all over as they galloped. Xiao Chiye silently observed them, and Langli Blade gradually slid out of its sheath as the distance between them shortened.

The sound of horse hooves intensified, while the sound of the Biansha Cavalry's whistle dispersed in the rain. Xiao Chiye had already felt a slight tremor with the palm he had pressed against the ground.

He did not move, and neither did the Imperial Army behind him.

The Biansha Cavalry was just right before them; just a couple steps more, and they would be trampling over the Imperial Army. But then, the horse in the lead suddenly neighed, its front hooves caught by the rope. The horse's front knees protruded forward, and it fell straight down. A wave of mud instantly splashed over Xiao Chiye's face. He moved. At the same time the cavalryman fell down along with the horse, Langli Blade had already broken free of its sheath. Xiao Chiye cleaved down at the man. Fresh blood that spewed from the neck of the man gushed into the mudhole. The cavalrymen behind the man were caught off guard, and consequently, their formation was thrown into disarray.

Xiao Chiye did not give the other party the chance to regroup. The Imperial Army followed him closely as he killed his way into the Biansha Cavalry. A blend of mud and blood trickled onto Xiao Chiye's nape. The pungency of "On Horseback" flooded through his stomach, causing him to burn up all over.

This was like a head-on blow that swiftly sent the Biansha Cavalry gathering their wits about them. Both parties were small squads, fighting at close quarters and killing one another as the rainwater poured over them. But it was a quick battle. By the time the Biansha Cavalry pulled themselves together, the Imperial Army had soundlessly vanished into the torrential rain again.

The Biansha Cavalry's squads set up around the Tudalong Banner all received varying degrees of assaults from the Imperial Army. As soon as they tried to follow up with an attack, these batches of ruffian soldiers would shrink back in retreat. The Biansha Cavalry was forced to come to a halt beyond the marshland of the Tudalong Banner. Whenever they wanted to turn back and rejoin the others, the Imperial Army would sneak up on them and attack. After a few times, the Biansha Cavalry was beyond fed up. They could not use their speed to full advantage, and their charges were all over the place. They were just like headless flies being harassed by the Imperial Army, who shoved and kicked them. Pent-up rage simmered in them as they fought with ire and resentment.

Xiao Chiye was hidden under the torrential rain all this time. The Biansha Cavalry could not make out the exact hiding place of the Imperial Army at all. Without the heavy armors and horses of the Libei Armored Cavalry, the Imperial Army could disappear from the Biansha Cavalry's field of vision as long as they lie low on the ground, coming and going elusively like a shadow.

Very quickly, Xiao Chiye's wine was drunk down to the last drop. At the hour of xu, the sky grew completely dark. The Biansha Cavalry was still trapped by the Imperial Army at the fringe of the Tudalong Banner, unable to advance or retreat. Chances of victory kept improving; it seemed as if Xiao Chiye had grasped the rhythm of the battle. He would not let it go to his head. It did not matter if the Biansha Cavalry showed weakness or resorted to intimidation, the rhythm remained firmly in his control. But time lapsed, and Xiao Chiye still had yet to catch sight of Hasen.

The chill was even more intense in the night, and it was incomparably pitch-dark all around. Xiao Chiye's boots were choked full of mud. Rainy days were wet and slippery. In order to prevent his blade from slipping off his hand, Xiao Chiye had it bound to the area between his thumb and index finger with a strip of cloth. At this point, the cloth was soaked through and utterly waterlogged. He squatted in place and tore away the old one to replace it with a new one.

Man's physical strength was limited. This kind of back-and-forth battle required both sides to be on high alert at all times. Nerves had to be stretched taut; they could not afford to make even the slightest oversight or negligence. But Xiao Chiye had to catch his breath too. He closed his eyes slightly and shook his head twice so that he would not go numb from the repetitive actions.

By tomorrow latest at the hour of chen, the reinforcements from the battlegrounds would have hurried their way over. Tonight was of crucial importance. But Heaven still favored Xiao Chiye. Even if the rain were to abate some, there would be no starlight and moonlight tonight. The night was still as the Imperial Army's disguise.

Xiao Chiye huffed out warm air and flexed his five fingers before tightening his grip on Langli Blade. But just as he rose to his feet again, the sound of disorderly footsteps rang out from the shrubbery. The person who brushed aside the leaves to reveal himself turned out to be Gu Jin.

Xiao Chiye promptly had an ill sense of foreboding.

Sure enough, he saw Gu Jin looking grim as he hastily kneeled on one knee and whispered, "Master, the roads to the site of battle are all blocked! Hasen's elite forces are right at the southeast, and they have cut off my access!"

Xiao Chiye's heart suddenly sank. It hit him almost instantly.

He had walked into a trap.

Every skilled commanding general knows the principle of imposing his will on the enemy but not allowing the enemy's will to be imposed on him.<sup>2</sup>

The reason Xiao Chiye had been scoring one victory after another from Qudu was that he was always taking the initiative. This allowed him to control the pulse and rhythm of the battlefield without fear of the enemy's numbers. But he had forgotten that Hasen was the same kind of commanding general as he was.

This rain was no coincidence.

It was a meticulously planned round-up.

From the time Xiao Chiye's squad headed north, Hasen had already laid down an encirclement trap to hunt and kill this wolf pup. At the same time Xiao Chiye was watching the Biansha Cavalry, he was also being observed by Hasen. Xiao Chiye thought he was taking the initiative, but he was, in fact, paralyzing himself. Right from the moment he decided to turn around and head for the Tudalong Banner, he had already fallen into the role of the passive player.

The sound of horses' hooves rose once more.

NOTICE:

New updated Character Chart from the QJJ Simplified CN Physical Copy! Check out the Character Glossary!

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 马上行 Wine from Libei. Background story in chapter 102
2. 致人而不致于人 From Sun Tzu's Art of War

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 152 : HASEN

Translated with: Jia<3

Warning: Horse Abuse :V

Raindrops rolled down the curved blade, dripping along its sharp edge.

The horse under Hasen was snorting hot puffs of air. Hasen had already been waiting for a long time in the rain. It was three-quarters past the hour of hai. The world had completely descended into darkness.

Hasen had a head full of red hair. He was not like the men of Dazhou, who typically tied their hair up in a bun; instead, he had it trimmed short, with a small pigtail tied at the back of his head.

After Huhelu's death, Bayin was transferred over to Hasen's side. He tugged at the reins as he followed behind Hasen and wrapped up his treasured military books before putting them back under his robe on his bosom. Cautiously, he asked, "How are you certain he will not escape?"

Hasen scratched at his rain-drenched hair, letting it pile up in a mess as he replied, "He was very bold when fighting Huhelu. To put it in the words of those from Dazhou, he is adept in the art of deception. I heard that he's the youngest son of the Prince of Libei, a wolf pup; as long as there's a chance to counterattack, he'll definitely not choose to flee."

Bayin said, "He's indeed very bold, and also very cautious."

"Compared to his elder brother, Xiao Chiye is an impulsive man." Hasen, having said to this point, was a little bashful. "Even though I'm no genius, I know the pride of a genius. No matter how he warns himself, he will still lose a little of his prudence after defeating our powerful Huhelu at the Shasan camp. His desire to win is too strong. Bayin, even I can feel it. Like my father, he won't allow himself to cower and retreat. This is his strength, but also his weakness."

Bayin quietly petted the horse. "Will we win?"

"We will definitely win." When he said this, his eyes were bright and his words powerful, "He can't beat me."

Hasen and Xiao Chiye had similar combat styles, with the way they fought their battles both wild and unrestrained. Both Qi Zhuyin and Lu Guangbai had been put through the wringer at his hands one after another, but he and Xiao Chiye were polar opposites in terms of their personalities.

He was introverted and even a little bashful; the beautiful maidens of the Biansha Twelve Tribes all had their eyes on him, yet just their gazes alone would make him go red in the face. He was Amu'er's favorite son, and this was not only due to the formidability of his mother's clan, but also because of his character.

Xiao Fangxu enjoyed nurturing little wolves in the wild. He even liked training his sons with hard knocks until they went howling in pain; but Amu'er was the exact opposite. Before Hasen had come of age, Amu'er never allowed Hasen to leave his side. Every battle that Hasen fought during his earlier years was all taught by Amu'er himself in person.

"You are also a genius." Bayin responded as an afterthought.

Hasen laughed out loud as he wiped his scimitar and shook his head. "Bayin, I'm not. I'm an ordinary man. I merely found my own path from battling against geniuses. To be honest, before heading north, I was worried about meeting Xiao Jiming here, because Xiao Jiming and Qi Zhuyin belong to the same category of commanders. They're better at defense than offense. Do you understand? Not in the typical sense of defense, but one that leaves you with nowhere to make your moves and unable to find any vulnerability to attack; they are thorny to deal with. But Xiao Chiye isn't the same. He's very..." Hasen struggled to think of a description. In the end, he laughed, "I can't put my finger on it, but he obviously has plenty of shortcomings, and he isn't even trying to hide them."

"Then he's arrogant." Bayin herded the horse over to Hasen's side. He raised his hand and lightly tapped Hasen's shoulder. "You are our new Great Hero, the eagle of the desert, and the future husband of Duo'erlan. It doesn't matter how humble you are; Hasen, in our eyes, you are a genius bestowed upon the Hanshe Tribe by the gods. You are not inferior to anyone else."

"Thank you." Hasen said, "My good friend, you should've come to my side earlier."

The both of them traded looks and exchanged smiles. All of a sudden, they heard a few urgent whistles resounding through the night. Hasen raised his head to the sky, and a raindrop landed between his brows; it was no longer pouring like it had during the day. He patted the horse, looking westward of the Tudalong Banner. "It's time for us to haul in the net."

Hasen's elite forces did not enter the battleground at all; the troops he had set before Xiao Chiye were all regular troops that were originally stationed east of the Tudalong Banner. Moreover, the troops he deployed to the eastern mountain range had a firm grip on Zhao Hui, preventing Zhao Hui from turning around and providing reinforcements. The path towards the battlefield was also obstructed; he had turned the Tudalong Banner into a sack-like trap to ensnare Xiao Chiye with.

Xiao Chiye had no way out. Hasen had long prepared for him an elite force that was all recharged and raring to go in the east. Even if Xiao Chiye opted to escape, Hasen would also chase him down closely on horseback, so that Xiao Chiye, with the exposed vulnerability on his back, would once again become the target of the hunt.

The sound of horse hooves rang out once again, this time accompanied by torches that pressed in from the east. The exhausted Imperial Army could only retreat. Although the rain had stopped, the chill had intensified. Even Tantai Hu had no choice but to huff warm air in his frozen hands.

Xiao Chiye walked in the mud, with the huffing and panting of the soldiers behind him. They had to retreat back to the marshland of the Tudalong Banner as soon as possible. But Hasen did not miss this opportunity. His elite forces had eaten their fill during the day, and now, they were lashing hard at their horses to spur them on, giving the Imperial Army no time to retreat at all. The Imperial Army that had been split into small groups hid themselves among the shrubbery and grassy fields, but Hasen's troops were meticulous in their scouting and left them with nowhere to conceal themselves.

Gu Jin, who had good hearing, very quickly discerned that the horses' hooves were coming this way.

Xiao Chiye raised an arm to wipe his cheek and looked back at the pitch-black night. Flames abruptly lit up the horizon. Hasen's cavalry was like the falcon encroaching upon the sky not far away, its two wings spread out as it charged forth in what seemed like a glide.

"Master." Gu Jin led his own horse out. "You should leave first!"

"Mount your horse and head north." Xiao Chiye remained where he was. "Pass on military information along the way and tell them to withdraw back to the marshland. Tell Tantai Hu not to persist in fighting and to retreat immediately."

The Biansha Cavalry was getting closer. Xiao Chiye could even hear the sounds of horses snorting hot air. Gu Jin remained in place and hesitated for a moment. Xiao Chiye said with calm and composure, "I have several hundred men here. It's not a problem to fight and retreat at the same time. I will make plans again once we retreat inside the marshland."

Gu Jin knew that Xiao Chiye would not change his command at his time, so he mounted his horse, whipped it into action, and charged into the night.

Hasen had already seen the figures. The cavalry whistled, as though they were encircling the wild beasts in the desert. They did not rely on military flags to convey messages. The whistle rapidly relayed from the center army to both flanks. Following right after, the cavalry on both flanks turned their horses around to assemble in the center, turning the falcon with its wings spread into a straight arrow whose target was Xiao Chiye!

In war, speed was everything.

Hasen knew the consequences of hesitation. When it came to Xiao Chiye, he had to fight a quick battle. Otherwise, if Xiao Chiye were to retreat to the marshland and get the opportunity to catch his breath, it could very well lead to the next surprise attack on them.

"That's him!" Bayin followed closely behind and pointed at Xiao Chiye as he hollered in Biansha language. "Xiao Chiye!"

Hasen pulled off his scimitar and bent low at the same time. He did not need Bayin to remind him; he had already recognized Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye's height and appearance were far too conspicuous. His expression as he pursed his lips and looked back was simply identical to Xiao Fangxu.

Xiao Chiye wrung the dripping wet strip of cloth and swiftly wrapped it tightly around the space between his thumb and index finger. He watched as the cavalry pressed in towards them, his attention all but sucked away but Hasen's red hair. He counted the distance quietly. Just as Hasen's horse was about to trip on the rope, Hasen suddenly turned sideways and lowered his arm to slice the rope that had been hidden among the grass with one blow.

The cavalry at the back dashed their way in without a hitch.

The galloping cavalymen brandished their scimitars, but Xiao Chiye did not move. In the blink of an eye, the hooves of the Biansha's horses sank into the camouflage horse pits, sending a number of men tumbling off their horses once more. The people in front fell to the ground, but Hasen, who was at the back, seemed to have anticipated it. That one step he had taken a beat slower earlier had been meant to test the grounds.

Xiao Chiye raised his finger, and the Imperial Army jumped over the shrubs and broke into a dash.

Hasen's horse was snorting hot air as Hasen blew the whistle again. These hastily dug pits for trapping horses were not deep enough, and they were able to simply leap over to give chase right behind Xiao Chiye.

Hasen's target was clear, and that was Xiao Chiye. As long as he could kill Xiao Chiye, the scattered Imperial Army would be just a bunch of men without a leader. The grain wagons within the marshland of the Tudalong Banner would then naturally fall into their hands.

Xiao Chiye stepped through the mud. A horse had already caught up next to him. The Biansha Cavalryman on the horse barked at Xiao Chiye in Biansha language. Xiao Chiye leaped forward and crouched down on stable feet to dodge the scimitar coming towards him. Following right after, he sliced apart the Biansha Cavalryman's saddle. Threatened by the blade, the startled horse was thrown into disorientation. Xiao Chiye caught hold of the cavalryman's arm that had been wielding the blade, but instead of hacking it off, he yanked hard on it to flip himself up the horse. Unable to withstand the force of gravity, the cavalryman tumbled off the horse, sending up a spray of mud.

The horse of the Gouma Tribe, having had a change of masters, wretchedly flung its head from side to side and refused to run anymore. Behind him, Hasen was pressing in close towards him. Xiao Chiye clamped down hard on the belly of the horse and yanked the reins, forcing the horse to crash its way through at an angle.

Hasen had been too hurried in his pursuit of Xiao Chiye. Muddy water went splashing as both horses collided. Langli Blade went slicing through the air towards Hasen's chest with such ferocity that Hasen did not dare to be negligent and parried the blow with all his strength.

So heavy!

Hasen's arms sank, and the scimitar almost slipped out of his hand under Xiao Chiye's force. He immediately understood just how extraordinary Xiao Chiye's arm strength was, so he avoided the glint as Xiao Chiye hacked down on him, no longer meeting Xiao Chiye head-on with force.

The cavalymen who were successively catching up behind them clung close to their horses' backs. The horse beneath Xiao Chiye stirred restlessly as they reached out with their scimitars to sever his horse's front knees. The horse whinnied in pain, and its entire front body fell over into the mudhole.

Xiao Chiye rolled off his horse. He was already surrounded.

The Biansha Cavalrymen formed a circle around Xiao Chiye, and the fleeing Imperial Army swore and cursed out loud, "Bloody hell, the Viceroy fell off!"

The Imperial Army who had yet to spring into the Tudalong Banner promptly turned back, drew their blades, and lunged into the group of cavalymen. They followed suit, doing what was done earlier; as long as they could not hang onto the Biansha Cavalry and leap onto their horses, they would hack off the horses' legs and send the Biansha Cavalry tumbling off their horses. They kept what Xiao Chiye had said firmly in mind—the Biansha Cavalry was not skilled at standing on the ground and fighting at close quarters.

But that was directed at the troops that had been crossing swords with the Libei Armored Cavalry in the north.

Hasen had fought battles with Dazhou's best infantry in the south. The one who had clashed with him was Lu Guangbai, and Xiao Chiye's experience with cavalymen, to sum it up, had all come from Lu Guangbai. Hasen's elite forces were not the least bit afraid of landing on the ground at all. On the contrary, they were rather composed and unhurried when they faced up against the Imperial Army after dismounting. They did not even need any buffer time at all; they could fight the instant they got up after rolling to the ground.

Fuck!

The Imperial Army, who had never suffered a defeat before, cursed in unison.

These fuckers are even stronger than us!

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Special Thanks: to Yu! <3

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 153 : DEFEAT

Translated with: Jia<3

The Imperial Army was very much like Xiao Chiye, but they were more sly than him. This was a group of soldiers that gave the Libei Armored Cavalry complicated feelings. After the reign of Yongyi, their reputation waned, and they were reduced to being mere ornamental decorations in Qudu; even their original patrol duty had been snatched away by the Eight Great Training Divisions. In the decades that followed, all they did were odd jobs, and they even appear to be more than happy to simply muddle and idle their way through life. But then, they met Xiao Chiye, and it was as if they had been wiped clean of grime to finally shine in all their full glory in Qudu.

The Imperial Army was unlike the Libei Armored Cavalry and the Qidong Garrison Troops. They were able to overlook all the noise and focus all of their attention solely on Xiao Chiye. They could not hear a single one of the criticisms against Xiao Chiye. As long as Xiao Chiye waved his hand and signaled them, they would be willing to go through the most severe of trials and tribulations alongside him. This was a brew of loyalty blended with the code of brotherhood.

A prime example: right this moment. The enemy clearly outnumbered them, yet the Imperial Army felt no fear. They chopped off the horses' legs belonging to the Biansha Cavalry's vanguard so that a break opened up in Hansen's encirclement. However, the number of follow-up cavalry multiplied exponentially, and these men were all highly adaptable to boot. Without even needing Hasen to give his command, they had already figured out the Imperial Army's intentions.

The Imperial Army still wanted to hack off more legs, but the Biansha Cavalry dismounted from their horses before charging into the battlefield. They had no armors, and the furs they donned were light and cold-resistant, so it was with extreme agility that they moved. Unlike Huhelu's squad, each of them had a spare scimitar at the side of their horses, and pike daggers tightly secured on the outside of their thighs. In the event that their scimitars were damaged, they could still use the reserve scimitars, or swap over to the pike daggers to fight at close quarters.

They were taciturn, well-trained men.

Xiao Chiye was gasping for breath as he savagely swept his eyes over this elite force.

Hasen did not say a word. He did not need to engage in any form of communication with Xiao Chiye. He did not want to use Xiao Chiye to threaten Xiao Fangxu either, and he knew very well that leaving Xiao Chiye alive would mean no end to troubles in the future. Now was the moment to kill off Xiao Chiye.

Hasen locked eyes with Xiao Chiye. He gripped his scimitar with one hand and released the reins with the other hand, letting it fall gently into the mudhole. They were like certain beasts facing off against each other in confrontation, their abhorrence for the other mixed in with the stench of blood. Hasen kept moving, wading through the muddy water while observing Xiao Chiye.

Sporadic raindrops left in the night sky dripped onto the back of Xiao Chiye's hand as he gripped Langli Blade and followed Hasen with his eyes.

This was a strange kind of silence. Tumultuous sound of killing clearly abounded all around them, and yet Xiao Chiye found it quiet, so quiet that his hair was standing on end. He had to restrain, restrain, and restrain himself before he could suppress that murderous intent to kill bubbling up in his body.

Hasen was no longer moving. He seemed to have noticed Xiao Chiye's testiness. They both vied for the right to call the shots on this battlefield and attempted to influence its atmosphere. This made it clear that there was no way they could co-exist; what they wanted was absolute control over their own rhythm.

A water drop slid along the back of Xiao Chiye's slightly bulging hand. At the very instant it dripped off, Hasen burst into action. His red hair was like a flaming torch in the dark night, charging right before Xiao Chiye's eyes the very instant the mud splashed aside.

In the blink of an eye, Hasen's scimitar pressed in towards Xiao Chiye's throat. Xiao Chiye took a sudden step back, and the mud splashed out in a fan-like arc along with the movements of his legs and feet. He swung up Langli Blade in a half-circle, and both of them collided in mid-air. The impact forced Hasen's feet to slide back some, but he regained his footing and bounced back into action the next moment, even cleverly learning to dodge.

Langli Blade was a heavyweight executioner's blade,<sup>1</sup> and Xiao Chiye's arm strength was what it relied on. Every move Hasen made during the fight was executed with the intention to hack off Xiao Chiye's arm. Each time Xiao Chiye wielded his blade, he would strike at empty air. Even if he caught up with Hasen, Hasen would immediately turn his scimitar sideways and brush past it so that he would not have to shoulder Xiao Chiye's terrifying strength.

Assaulters were also sneaking up behind Xiao Chiye out of nowhere. He used and pushed his sight and hearing to full capacity, but his physical strength was like water already splashed; in less than an hour, Xiao Chiye felt his own movements slowing down a little. Hasen lunged once again, and at the same time, a strong gust of wind suddenly came assaulting him from behind. Xiao Chiye abruptly strode half a step to sidestep and dodge the scimitar behind his back, then backhandedly grasped the arm of the man behind him. Following right after, he spun around to kick Hasen over and break the arm of the man who sneaked up on him from behind. The scimitar on the other side cleaved down on Xiao Chiye's arm. A loud "THUD" rang out as the blow was blocked by the arm guard Shen Zechuan had gifted him.

A slurry of mud erupted like exploding artillery shells as the Biansha Cavalry simultaneously bore their scimitars down on Langli Blade. Xiao Chiye promptly lifted a fist with his left hand and punched one of them over. The pressure on Langli Blade promptly subsided some, and he lowered his body and made to lift the blade. With his scimitar cracked from the impact from Langli's Blade, Hasen abandoned it, pulled out the pike daggers from both sides of his legs, and sprang when he saw his chance—all of a sudden, one of the Imperial Army pounced and grabbed Hasen around his waist; he even used a wrestling technique, but failed to trip Hasen.

Hasen flipped over the pike dagger, slid it along that man's armor, and viciously stabbed it into the side of his neck. Blood spurt like a fountain of spring water. Hasen had yet to pull out the pike dagger, instead turning his head aside first to dodge Xiao Chiye's blade.

Men were dying on both sides. The Imperial Army did not expect Hasen's elite force to be this formidable, and likewise, this elite force did not expect the Imperial Army to be able to hang in there for so long.

The Biansha Cavalry at the periphery took out iron chains attached with small copper balls. These kinds of chains were similar in appearance to the chains used by the Libei Armored Cavalry, but much lighter. They pressed in, shrinking the encirclement area, and when Xiao Chiye's Langli Blade was pinned down once again, they flung countless chains towards Xiao Chiye. The copper balls caught on to Xiao Chiye's arms and legs. With Xiao Chiye now entangled in the iron chains, they dragged him over to the ground in one abrupt move.

Hasen's pike dagger shot right towards Xiao Chiye's face. Xiao Chiye practically used up all of his strength to drag his arms over to block the blow, causing the Biansha Cavalry of the other end who was pulling at the chains to stumble in unison.

Once again, the pike dagger slammed into the arm guard with a thud, but this piece of top-quality iron could not withstand this kind of repeated blows raining upon it one after another. Xiao Chiye felt the dogskin string snap; the arm guard was already dented.

Xiao Chiye attempted to break free of the chains, but there were simply too many for his arms to bear. He tilted his head to spit out the muddy sand in his mouth, watching as the scimitars of the cavalry went straight for his own throat. At this moment, Xiao Chiye saw the billowy black sky. The winds of Hongyan Mountains blew against his drenched hair, and he thought of Shen Zechuan in between ragged gasps.

Hasen's victory was initially already within grasp, but who would have expected Xiao Chiye to shoulder the combined force of all the tugging and pulling from those holding him down and raise both legs to kick over a blade-wielding cavalryman. The iron chains securing him suddenly went swinging. It was impossible to tell if it was sweat or muddy water trickling along his temples, but blue veins visibly protruded as Xiao Chiye executed a kip-up<sup>2</sup> and flipped himself up to his feet.

However, one person alone could not salvage the situation, much like one log could not prop up a collapsing building. During the time Xiao Chiye executed his move, the cavalry had yanked the chains taut; he had gotten on his feet for only a mere moment before he was once again dragged back to the ground.

Even if he was blessed with wings, escape was impossible tonight!

In the nick of time, the ground suddenly started to quake. Water droplets among the shrubbery and branches leaped about as the battle call of a war horn reverberated through the boundless night.

Hasen looked out towards the south; as expected, he saw a person single-handedly charging over in a mad dash, and following close in his wake was a black tide that similarly steamrolled everything in its path under the crushing darkness of the night. The closer they got, the more aggressively the mudhole shook from that muffled thunder-like roar of horses' hooves—a testament to the heavy weight of steel armors.

Hasen immediately whistled. The cavalry flipped onto their horses in an orderly fashion and swiftly withdrew northward. Before he turned the horse around, Hasen regretfully glanced towards Xiao Chiye. He raised two fingers, tapped his temple, and leaned towards Xiao Chiye to bid him a polite farewell. Then he took his leave and sped away, leaving a scene of devastation behind in his wake.

The black-armored cavalry charged over to Xiao Chiye's side, circling around him once.

Xiao Fangxu removed his helmet and looked askance at Xiao Chiye. In a grave voice, he commanded those behind him, "Untie your Second Young Master. What an unsightly sight."

The expression in Xiao Chiye's eyes was scathingly cold and grave—it was the shame of having his first taste of defeat.

There were commanding generals of the five camps in the Shasan camp, all of whom reported to Xiao Fangxu. Based on ranking, Xiao Chiye's position was at the very bottom. However, he had been thoroughly defeated this time, and he cut such a sorry figure as he squatted outside of the tent and rinsed half his body with cold water that the commanding generals who came and went would all cast him a glance.

Xiao Chiye did not seem to feel the blade-inflicted wounds on his shoulders, chest, and back as the cold water scoured his body pale. Zuo Qianqiu lifted up the flap after the meeting in the tent had been dismissed, and as he looked at the sight of Xiao Chiye squatting at the side with his back to him, his reproach had all but turned into a twinge of bemusement. He called out, "Come in and drink a bowl of warm milk. Don't you fall sick on such a cold day."

Xiao Chiye mumbled an answer and rose to put away the water bucket before walking into the tent.

There was a fire going in the tent. Xiao Chiye's armor had been so badly damaged that it could no longer be used. Xiao Fangxu was currently examining the dented top-quality iron of the arm guard. Zuo Qianqiu instructed the military medic to dress Xiao Chiye's wounds, so Xiao Chiye sat bare-chested on the little stool and remained still.

After some time, Chen Yang, Gu Jin, Tantai Hu, and Wu Ziyu entered.

"Give your commanding general a report of the casualty count." Xiao Fangxu tossed the arm guard back onto the table, sat down, and said to Chen Yang.

Chen Yang quietly answered, "The Imperial Army lost three hundred men..."

"Louder," Xiao Fangxu looked at Chen Yang. "Why are you hanging your head looking all so dejected?"

Chen Yang raised his voice. "The Imperial Army lost three hundred men. Thirty-six men sustained severe injuries, and eight got away with light injuries."

The Imperial Army was Xiao Chiye's roots. He had to be responsible for all its casualties, fatal or otherwise. This army no longer held any possibility of further expansion, for it was unique and distinctive. The moment the entire force was decimated, even Xiao Chiye himself would not be able to rebuild it in Libei. This meant that as long as the Imperial Army suffered a defeat in a battle, it would face exponential losses. While three hundred people were nothing to the Qidong Garrison Troops or the Libei Armored Cavalry, it was considered heavy casualty to the Imperial Army.

Silence descended upon the tent. Tantai Hu snuck a couple of glances at Chen Yang and Gu Jin before finally plucking up his courage and speaking up, "Hasen caught us off guard, Master was also..."

"Now report the casualties of the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang to your commanding general." Xiao Fangxu ordered.

Chen Yang paused for a moment, "The Liuyang Southern Route Army lost eight hundred and ninety-two men, forty-five sustained heavy injuries, and two hundred and thirty-seven suffered light injuries."

"Zhao Hui was initially fighting on the northern route; this Southern Route Army was established at the last minute to rescue your Imperial Army. A total of two thousand men, while digging the collapsed bridle path, encountered a surprise attack by the cavalry that Hasen left stationed at the northern route. Practically half the men died." Xiao Fangxu continued, "If you had just stayed where you were, you would've met with them in just under four hours, but you impulsively turned around and headed for the Tudalong Banner. How are you going to account for this loss to Zhao Hui?"

Xiao Chiye said nothing.

Xiao Fangxu continued, "You should remember that you're the commanding general in charge of the escort and transportation of military supplies, not the commanding general for combat. To think you'd forcibly assault Hasen's squad with a few hundred men... Did a donkey kick you in the head, Xiao Chiye?"

Zuo Qianqiu originally should not have spoken, but Xiao Chiye had just retreated from the battlefield, and as his shifu, it was inevitable for his heart to ache for him. Thus he said, "Hasen has been planning for it for a long time this time, and it just so happened that they'd chance upon a rainstorm. The situation was urgent then. A-Ye—"

"You never treated the Libei Armored Cavalry as your own duty at all. In your eyes, there's only the Imperial Army." With his hand on his knees, Xiao Fangxu suddenly turned stern. "The battle at Bianbo camp went to your head, letting you get carried away by your success. You regarded everyone as Huhelu. Your defeat today to Hasen is a lesson. What exactly do you have that'd possess you to fight with him head-on? Lift your head up!"

Wu Ziyu could no longer bear it and fell to his knees on the ground with a "thud". Once he kneeled, Tantai Hu cluelessly followed suit and kneeled. Then, "thud, thud", Chen Yang and Gu Jin kneeled too.

Xiao Fangxu swiftly looked towards them.

Wu Ziyu said in an extremely feeble voice, "Your Lordship... It's, it's not what you think... My legs have gone all wobbly."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

- 1.
2. 鬼头刀 literally ghost-headed blade. It's a kind of blade used for beheading people sentenced to death in old times.
- 3.
4. Specifically 鲤鱼打挺 carp kip-up, a martial arts move where one leaps from a supine position into a standing position.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 154 : MAN

Translated with: Jia<3

After getting a scolding, Xiao Chiye still had to receive his punishment publicly in the military tent. He had been demoted, and now he could not even be considered a commanding general. So what if he was a talented genius? He still had to eat the humble pie after suffering a defeat. Never brag on the war zone about the battles once fought and the enemies once vanquished—all of these counted for nothing. Xiao Chiye killed Huhelu at the Shasan Camp, and this indeed was the subject of intense discussion in the army, but Xiao Fangxu did not reward him and instead made him a general in charge of military supplies. Others might not understand this move, but the old-school generals knew best that this meant Xiao Fangxu had the intent to entrust Xiao Chiye with heavy responsibilities.

Xiao Fangxu did not reward him because he wanted to shut up the mouths of those criticizing Xiao Chiye; he wanted to prove that he was far harsher and more exacting on his son than he was to others. Guo Weili rarely scored any wins in all his battles against Huhelu at the Tudalong Banner, but Xiao Fangxu promoted him and deployed him to the Shasan Camp to continue in his capacity as the commanding general. With such a stark contrast, the smart ones would all know to shut up, as this meant that Xiao Chiye's promotions in the future were all based on genuine and solid military achievements, and it would also leave Xiao Chiye room for defeat.

It was not that they could not afford to lose a battle on the battlefield. Xiao Jiming could, and so could Guo Weili and Zhao Hui, because they were all generals Libei was familiar with. Their defeats were pardonable and forgivable under the circumstances, and these were all what Xiao Chiye lacked. Once Xiao Chiye really came to stand in the forefront of the frontline, he could only win. He had to prove to the dispirited Libei Armored Cavalry that he was the best choice of candidate for Libei.

Xiao Chiye walked out of the military tent and put on his clothes. His waist and lower back were wrapped with gauze, and his right arm had sustained the worst injuries. For now, he would not be able to use the Conqueror Bow, and he even had to exercise caution while wielding Langli Blade.

Xiao Chiye huffed out a few breaths of hot air and whistled for Lang Tao Xue Jin. Lang Tao Xue Jin had just been washed and had yet to be saddled. Xiao Chiye flipped atop it, patted it on the neck, and leaned over to whisper a few words to it. Lang Tao Xue Jin then turned on its hooves and obediently galloped away into the night.

“He’s still the same.” Zuo Qianqiu stood by the entrance of the tent and lamented, “Every time he’s feeling down, he likes to go riding.”

“He’s holding in his anger.” Xiao Fangxu lifted up the boiling tea. “It can be seen that his six years in Qudu weren’t for naught; if tonight’s events had happened in the past, he would’ve even dared to fling aside the tent flap and run off when I scolded him for the second time. No one can beat those old foxes of Qudu when it comes to tempering a person.”

“The blame for this battle really can’t be entirely pinned on him.” Zuo Qianqiu looked back. “Hasen set up such a trap in the Tudalong Banner; even if it had been either of us, we might not necessarily be able to escape unscathed either.”

“The possibility of ‘if’ is nil in war. It’s his battle, and the outcome, win or loss, ought to be his to bear.” Xiao Fangxu paused for a moment.

“There’s no doubt this battle is lost. That he dared to turn back to the marshlands of the Tudalong Banner to outflank and fight makes me really happy deep down.”

“Right?” Zuo Qianqiu laughed as he pointed at Xiao Fangxu. “It’s just like you to say one thing but mean another.”

Xiao Fangxu held the teacup. “But I can’t praise him.”

Zuo Qianqiu replied, “You never held back your praise for Jiming.”

“Those brothers are different.” Xiao Fangxu turned his face sideways to face him. “Jiming takes after his mother. After having a little brother, he often hears others speak of how A-Ye resembles his father, as if he’s snatching A-Ye’s place by being born a couple of years earlier. As such, I must praise Jiming often. A-Ye takes after me. What’s more, he’s the baby of the family. He has Jiming as an older brother shielding him, and that makes him a wild one who dares to play with whatever his heart desires. He almost broke his neck when he fell while taming his horse when he wasn’t even fourteen, and the moment the injury healed, he insisted on carrying on with taming the horse even if he had to sneak out to do it. That battle he fought when he was fourteen was so beautifully executed that there wasn't a person who didn't praise him when he returned to Dajing. At that time, he didn't allow anyone to give him what he wanted; he had to obtain it on his own, even if he had to go without food and drink. A personality like his doesn't lack praises, but scoldings."

"Being a father is a skill; I can't be compared to you." Zuo Qianqiu's wife had died prematurely. After the battle of Tianfei Watchtower, he had wandered all over Dazhou and did not remarry, so he naturally had no children. He sat down and said, "But there has been no lack of talents from Biansha in recent years. Amu'er has a great son too. Hasen is neither arrogant nor rash, and he is decisive and straightforward in all the moves he makes."

"Amu'er has a good eye." Xiao Fangxu took a sip of the hot tea. "The rarest thing about Hasen is that he doesn't stick to one combat style, yet his character is rather steady."

"If Jiming were to be deployed back here," Zuo Qianqiu said, "he could more or less restrain him."

"That's right." Xiao Fangxu shifted his feet slightly. "Zhao Hui's combat style bears the closest resemblance to Jiming's after having learned from the latter while serving under him. But when Hasen previously fought against Qidong, the one he faced up against was Qi Zhuyin, who is of the same kind as Jiming—he's already accustomed to that kind of rhythm. Look at Zhao Hui. Although he was able to contain Hasen's onslaughts of attacks, he was also, at the same time, firmly nailed down in place by Hasen in the northern route."

Zuo Qianqiu started to laugh. "But when Hasen faced A-Ye, it was one formidable adversary against another. Even if their military strength were equally matched, I still think that the probability of both sides suffering losses is much higher."

"You're thinking too highly of him by saying both sides will suffer losses. He is currently no match for Hasen at all. Hasen has been on the battleground for even longer than Jiming, and experience is something that's far more fearsome than talent. The discrepancy between him and A-Ye is not insignificant." Xiao Fangxu stood up, flipping and turning a dagger between his fingers as he stared at the straw target across him. "The wolf pup can't win."

Zuo Qianqiu clasped his hands behind his back and said leisurely, "The general in charge of military supplies is a good post. Once he has a thorough grasp of its workings, he will know all of Libei's major and minor military routes, the strengths and weaknesses of the various camps, and even the personalities of the commanding generals like the back of his hand."

Xiao Fangxu threw the dagger hard and hit the bullseye. He turned his head and smiled smugly at Zuo Qianqiu. "I'm going to give Amu'er a gift and let him witness my prowess."

It was almost dawn when Xiao Chiye returned. He dismounted, and Chen Yang came forward to hand him a handkerchief. He wiped the sweat on his neck and saw Xiao Fangxu standing a short distance away, motioning for him to go over. He was not at all willing and thought of pretending not to have seen him.

So Xiao Fangxu hung one arm over the back of Xiao Chiye's neck, forcing Xiao Chiye to bend down, then used his other hand to vigorously tousle the top of Xiao Chiye's hair until it was all a mess.

"Where's my falcon?" With some difficulty, Xiao Chiye finally broke away and rubbed his neck. "Don't feed it raw meat."

"It's your falcon, so why are you asking me?" Xiao Fangxu took a few steps forward. Seeing him still unhappy, he turned around and made to kick him.

Xiao Chiye hurriedly leaped away and said, "I'm just asking!"

Xiao Fangxu ignored him and petted Lang Tao Xue Jin. "We had a new batch of horses from last year back at home. There's one that has just the opposite color as this one. White tinted with black. A real beauty."

"Oh." Xiao Chiye could tell his intent. "You want to give it to me?"

Xiao Fangxu looked askance at him. "You? Your elder sister-in-law is keeping it for your wife."

Xiao Chiye cast a glance at Hongyan Mountains behind him and said nothing.

"That arm guard is pretty good." Xiao Fangxu stepped on the wooden railing and hoisted himself up to sit on it. Seeing Xiao Chiye looking back, he followed suit and turned sideways to shoot a glance at Xiao Chiye's expression. "Where did you craft it? It's not Qidong's style."

“Of course it’s good.” Xiao Chiye turned his head back and said secretively, as if he had something to hide, “That’s my protective amulet.”

Xiao Fangxu uttered a perfunctory acknowledgment, then followed up right after with a question, “Where is she from? You couldn’t have taken her to Bianbo Camp, could you? It’s all stinky men there. How old is she?”

Xiao Chiye said, “Stinky man?”

Xiao Fangxu did not get it.

Xiao Chiye took several steps back.

Xiao Fangxu narrowed his eyes. “Don’t tell me you brought back a girl from the Hua clan?”

Xiao Chiye continued to retreat. On seeing his father’s lost and puzzled expression, he inexplicably laughed out loud, and while he was at it, he removed Langli Blade and tossed it to the side.

“Xiao Chiye.” Xiao Fangxu sensed something amiss. “You’d better tell me honestly.”

Xiao Chiye suddenly said in a loud voice, “Stinky man!”

“Huh?” Xiao Fangxu suspected he had misheard it and even cocked his ear to one side.

“I found myself a man!” Sunlight shone on Xiao Chiye’s face, dispelling the dark clouds of yesterday. This brat was truly a little rascal as he shouted provocatively, “The best-looking man in the whole of Dazhou is my wife!”

Having said that, he did not even wait for Xiao Fangxu’s reaction before he turned around and took to his heels.

Xiao Fangxu fell silent for a very long time. Chen Yang softly swallowed his saliva and saw Xiao Fangxu jump up abruptly. As Xiao Fangxu landed on the ground, he almost tripped over himself.

Chen Yang hurriedly called out, “Your Lord—”

“Xiao Chiye!” Xiao Fangxu let out an earth-shaking roar. He pushed himself off the ground with his hands to chase after him, but he could not catch up. In a fit of anger, he picked up a piece of horse dung and flung it at Xiao Chiye, cussing, “Get your ass back here and make yourself clear!”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 155 : NEGOTIATIONS

Translated with: Jia<3

Xiao Chiye received not only a scolding, but also a beating. But he had been thinking about this matter for a long time, and did not want to hide it from his family. He stood inside the military tent to accept his punishment of demotion. Before the commanding generals withdrew from the tent, they sneaked a glance at Xiao Fangxu, only to find His Lordship even angrier.

Zuo Qianqiu looked at the arm guard over and over again, then gave Xiao Fangxu a slight thumbs-up. “I really can’t tell from this.”

Xiao Fangxu stood at the other end with his back to them and said, “Would I not know what arm guard he uses? At most, it’s processed dogskin. He would simply presume on his thick skin and not put in any effort into this at all.”

Zuo Qianqiu was put in a spot too as he looked at Xiao Chiye and said hesitantly, “... Why didn’t you mention it to us when you were in Qudu? Tell shifu about him now, so that we can... mentally prepare ourselves a little.”

“Prepare, my ass.” Xiao Fangxu looked back. “He already had it all figured out and was just waiting for me to take the bait!”

“You’ll have to meet him sooner or later.” Xiao Chiye took the scolding with his hands behind his back. “What ought to be done has to be done. I still want to take him home this year to see Mother.”

“You sure have it all arranged, huh.” Xiao Fangxu’s words were loaded with sarcasm. “I might as well call you Father.”<sup>1</sup>

Xiao Chiye did not dare to continue this thread of conversation.

“Where’s he from?” Zuo Qianqiu set down the arm guard. “Qudu?”

Xiao Chiye answered honestly, “Zhongbo.”

So Zuo Qianqiu said to Xiao Fangxu. “That’s still not too bad; it’s close by.” He followed up with a question, “How old?”

Xiao Chiye answered, “Twenty-one. Pretty young.”

Zuo Qianqiu inexplicably found this prerequisite to be familiar, but he could not quite put his finger on it for the moment and merely continued, “The arm guard is quite well-done. Is he in this trade?”

Xiao Chiye replied, "... No."

Xiao Fangxu sneered, "Do you dare to repeat what you said outside earlier to your shifu?"

Xiao Chiye gave a slight cough.

Xiao Fangxu said, "I demoted you, and you stabbed me in the heart!"

Xiao Chiye found these words of his familiar. Not falling for it, he said, "I didn't. I wouldn't dare to."

Zuo Qianqiu was still wondering about what kind of person this man was, so he asked, "Then, what's his name? Is he from a clan we are familiar with?"

"Yes." Xiao Chiye paused for a moment, then answered, "Shen Zechuan."

Several days later, Kong Ling and Yu Xiaozai arrived at Luoxia Pass. Cizhou wanted to discuss long-term cooperation with Luoxia Pass, and both parties had more or less reached an agreement through their written correspondences. This time, they wanted direct passage through it so that they could arrive at Huaizhou before the end of the eighth month.

The eighth month had only just started when the original commander of Fanzhou's garrison troops revolted with the intent to proclaim himself king. He even deployed troops to seize Dengzhou first, wanting to use this opportunity to threaten Cizhou. In addition, he also sent a document to demand Cizhou transfer the grains they sold to Chazhou to them, calling it a "loan of grain".

Shen Zechuan, of course, ignored him and got Zhou Gui to draft up an official denunciation-cum-declaration of war and dispatched it to Chazhou with the intent to join forces and eradicate the bandits. With the exception of his own self, he slapped the label of "bandits" on all the armed groups in Zhongbo. This "King Yi" of Fanzhou naturally did not accept this, and both parties hurled verbal abuse at each other from afar. The advisors under their command traded letters to "send greetings to the other party's ancestors". At the same time, they also spared no effort to make the other party out as rebels, while describing themselves as being compelled to revolt for the sake of the people.

Shen Zechuan did not remain idle either. Time was precious at present. In between the exchange of abuses on both sides, he had the Cizhou's prefectural yamen start repairing the bridle paths and relay stations leading to the various prefectures. This was no small project and could only be completed at the end of the year. Meanwhile, Cizhou's garrison troops continued to push ahead with their training; Cizhou was now expanding at full steam.

"Apart from what is needed for Huaizhou, the profits from the sales of grain this time are enough for the repairs of the bridle paths. But the grains distributed by the yamen will no doubt be reduced as well. I don't have the heart to turn away the increasing number of refugees as winter comes around." Zhou Gui presented a book to Shen Zechuan. "And with the weather getting colder, we are seeing a gradual uptick in refugees from Dancheng."

"Speaking of the refugees from Dancheng." Holding the book in hand, Shen Zechuan turned to look at Yao Wenyu, "Yuanzhuo comes from Dancheng and knows more about the current situation there better than we do. Why is the number of refugees increasing so much all of a sudden?"

On hearing him, Yao Wenyu, who had a coat draped over him, answered with a serious countenance, "After the previous emperor's death, Han Cheng wanted to convince the Empress Dowager to create more official positions for the descendants of the noble clans and use the state treasury to support these descendants on behalf of the noble clans. The list comprised over ten thousand people, but the Empress Dowager didn't consent. To preserve their strength, the noble clans with Han Cheng at the head became even more aggressive in seizing the commoners' crop fields. They fraudulently under-reported the acreage<sup>2</sup> of fields to the higher-ups, thereby hiding away vast expanses of fertile farmland and leaving the common people without land to grow crops; these commoners even had to pay poll tax per head in their families. As a result, the number of people who fled increased."

"According to the law, once their household registration is confirmed, those who leave illegally without relevant documentation from the local authorities will be drafted into the army, or worse, immediately executed." Shen Zechuan thought through it for a moment. "The most suitable way to escape arrest from the local authorities is to come to Zhongbo. But Cizhou's capacity is limited after all, and relying solely on the yamen to distribute grain is not a viable solution in the long run. We cannot afford to feed this many people."

And it wasn't just that. A portion of the refugees who had come to Cizhou had gotten hooked on getting free meals. They made excuses to decline registering themselves in the census registry, instead assuming the status of 'refugee' so that they could freeload and idle their lives away at the entrance of the yamen.

"I made a special point of asking the census officials; many of the people in this group are the young and strong who loiter around the streets and stir up trouble. Public order was good before the seventh month, but after the eighth month, theft became a common occurrence. When the yamen constables arrest and send them to prison, they become unreasonable and make a scene." Speaking to this point, Zhou Gui fretted with worries. "After they found out that they could still fill their tummies in jail, they became even more brazen. Alas!"

Shen Zechuan had already come to a decision on this matter. He said, "They dared to be this dauntless only because Cizhou is accommodating and magnanimous towards the refugees and has not set the relevant penalties in place; it is still treating them as local citizens of decent origins to deal with. But the times are different now. Today, I'd like to ask you gentlemen to draft a document to strictly forbid refugees from putting off registering themselves in the census registry. By the middle of the eighth month at the very latest, anyone who has not registered themselves at the yamen will be all driven out without exception. Not only that, Cizhou shall put up notices everywhere the day after and assign the relevant clerks down to explain. Make sure to clarify what is at stake if they break the law clearly to the illiterate commoners in the city. Starting from the day after tomorrow, any violators and offenders shall be dealt with severely. No mercy will be shown."

Shen Zechuan's methods had always been pretty mild ever since he had arrived in Cizhou, and he always looked to be an amicable and easygoing person to outsiders. He never flaunted his talents openly, even when it came to Chazhou's matters, but this time, with a change from his former style, he could be said to be swift and decisive.

Zhou Gui said hesitantly, "But will we lose the hearts and support of the people if we put up severe punishments in place? After all, it was only a few months ago that Cizhou started taking in the refugees with open arms."

"These are two separate matters." Yao Wenyu timed his words perfectly. "Cizhou accommodates the refugees out of compassion, but if it were to lose its trust with the people because of this, then it'd be putting the cart before the horse. As the saying goes, to deal with external foes, we have to first resolve internal conflicts. Cizhou must first eradicate its internal threats as soon as possible; otherwise, it will prove to be a burden in the future."

"Fanzhou already has a 'King Yi' now." Shen Zechuan set down the book. "This King Yi wants to establish a small Zhongbo imperial court at the southeastern side of Cizhou, and he has assembled the military forces from the two prefectures of Fanzhou and Dengzhou and poised them for combat against Cizhou in an attempt to get us to be his granary. The situation will be even more chaotic after spring next year. We cannot yield and make any more concessions because of the words 'benevolence and righteousness'."

"Besides, this is also a good thing." Yao Wenyu said to Zhou Gui. "Repairing the bridle paths and relay stations need manpower, and the refugees just so happen to fill in the vacancies in Cizhou. With the yamen distributing grains to them based on the quantity of work, they have somewhere to use their strengths, and they also get to fill their tummies, so naturally, they won't go around stirring up trouble."

Zhou Gui nodded as well on hearing this. "Once the household registration is settled, the yamen will have an exact number of people in Cizhou. If we start with the surveyance of fields at the end of the eighth month, we will be able to finish the divisions of fields before the start of spring next year. As long as we don't encounter a natural disaster next year, Cizhou's granary will be able to maintain its abundance."

"This is the first year." Shen Zechuan was in a pretty good mood. "Chazhou will also be put on the agenda next year. Other than that, we should also prepare to open up a new bridle path on the Luoxia Pass and Huaizhou's route to the northwest."

Taken aback, Zhou Gui asked, "Are we not borrowing the bridle path from Libei?"

"That's right, but in the long run, we still have to remunerate Luoxia Pass accordingly." Shen Zechuan said, "Luoxia Pass is right above Quancheng; they are allies we need to befriend. Once it begins thriving along the trade route, the present routes will be insufficient for us. Not to mention that Beiyuan Hunting Grounds is going to become the Imperial Army's camp; it's essential to open up new bridle paths."

“Then there’s also the issue of army provisions for the various areas in early spring next year.” The weather was bad, and Yao Wenyu’s legs were hurting, but he looked no different from how he usually was. “Firstly, Qidong is the biggest threat to the south of Zhongbo. They had not managed to deploy troops to Zhongbo in time as they were affected by the late emperor’s assassination and Lu Guangbai’s desertion. But now that the marriage alliance between the Hua and Qi is already a done deal, chances are high that they might send troops up north to crush us if army provisions in early spring next year are sufficient. Secondly, now that Libei has broken free of Qudu’s control, the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path has been stripped of the rights to directly access the Juexi’s granaries. Libei shares a common lot with us, and Libei is the one to shoulder the responsibility of fighting back the Biansha Cavalry in the north, so the issue of army provisions has to be resolved before spring falls.”

The advisors were all discussing affairs in a partitioned-off area in the study, separated by a screen in the middle. As they were indoors all year round, many of them smoked pipes, and as time passed, smoke began to permeate the study, making it stuffy.

Shen Zechuan called out to Qiao Tianya, “Help Yuanzhuo out to take a breath of fresh air.”

Yao Wenyu bent over slightly in a bow to Shen Zechuan from the wheelchair he was seated in and let Qiao Tianya push him out. Shen Zechuan instructed Zhou Gui to open the windows and have the advisors in the partitioned area take a break too. The air in the room was too heavy and smoky, so Shen Zechuan headed out as well to take a breather in the chilly wind.

It was the rainy season in Cizhou of late. Sunny days were few and far between, and the weather was extremely cold. Worried that Shen Zechuan would fall ill again, Ji Gang was particularly cautious and watched him every day as he put on extra clothes and had Fei Sheng follow him around whenever he headed out.

The moment Fei Sheng saw Shen Zechuan step out, he walked over to hand him the cloak. Shen Zechuan draped it over himself and walked along the covered walkway for a moment. The flowers of the Chinese scholar trees in this courtyard had long withered, and the leaves on the branches had all fallen off, leaving bare trees set against the backdrop of gloomy skies. It was quite the picture of bleakness and desolation.

Thinking of a way to amuse him, Fei Sheng said, “Master, there’s also a copper crock in this Zhou’s residence that’s exactly a carbon copy of the one in our residence. There are a few brocade carps in it that got swatted around by that gluttonous cat of Mister.”

Shen Zechuan looked over and said, “The one in our residence is a housewarming gift from Madam Zhou.”

Shen Zechuan was a little chilly standing there, but he felt a lot more clear-headed. Noting that it was about time, he headed back under the eaves of the study. Qiao Tianya and Yao Wenyu had not yet returned, so he waited for a while longer. At that moment, Zhou Gui came over in a rush, gesturing for Shen Zechuan to head in.

By then, it was almost the hour of you, and after three more quarters<sup>3</sup> of discussion, it was time for dismissal. The advisors still had to work through the night to draft the new documents, and Shen Zechuan had to head to the study to review the details and discuss the finer aspects with everyone when he woke up the next morning at the hour of mao. It was a race against time to get the notice up before midday the day after tomorrow.

“Once winter comes around, the mutual market of Libei will also start bustling with activities.” Shen Zechuan stood by the door as he conversed with Zhou Gui. “Negotiate with the Yan clan if you can; if not, forget it. When the time comes, we can take a detour to Juexi from Huaizhou. Although it’s a long distance, we can think of a way to traverse the waterways owned by the Hua family of Dicheng. The army provisions also —”

Ding Tao entered from the courtyard entrance and leaped over the railings in a couple of steps. Shen Zechuan broke off their conversation and signaled for Ding Tao to speak first.

Ding Tao’s cheeks were slightly flushed as he excitedly exclaimed, “Young Master, the Hereditary Prince’s Consort is here!”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. Marriage arrangements in the past were typically arranged by the parents. Children typically don’t have a say.

2. 亩, mu, or Chinese acre, measure of land equal to 0.0667 hectares
3. 三刻 One quarter is about 15 minutes, so approximately 45 minutes.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 156 : ELDEST SISTER-IN-LAW

Translated with: Jia<3

The Hereditary Prince's Consort, Lu Yizhi, and Xiao Jiming were childhood sweethearts who went on to live in conjugal harmony after their marriage. She was a renowned figure in Libei for her virtues. When the Prince's Consort of Libei passed away from illness, Xiao Chiye was still an ignorant brat. As the saying goes, a virtuous elder sister-in-law is comparable to a mother, and that was precisely what Lu Yizhi was in Xiao Chiye's eyes. She was not only Lu Guangbai's younger sister, but also Qi Zhuyin's bosom friend.

The horse carriage stopped outside the city of Cizhou, accompanied by the Libei Armored Cavalry on both sides of the public road. Lu Yizhi sat within and listened to the incoming sound of footsteps beyond the curtain. Someone called out "Vice Commander".

Vice Commander.

Lu Yizhi gently clasped her hands and thought in delight.

That's him!

Zhou Gui stood outside the horse carriage and paid his obeisances from afar. "Greetings to Your Ladyship. It has been a long, tiring journey for Your Ladyship, so please head into the city quickly."

Lu Yizhi had never seen Zhou Gui, and naturally, she had never heard Zhou Gui's voice either. Since it was "Vice Commander" she heard earlier, she took Zhou Gui to be Shen Zechuan. The horse carriage drove towards the city gate, and as the wheels rolled over the gravel, she quietly lifted a corner of the window curtain and saw Zhou Gui's back.

Zhou Gui was standing with his back to her, so Lu Yizhi could not see him in the face and thought that this Shen Zechuan was rather different from the way Xiao Chiye described him in the letter. She soundlessly put down the curtain, but lifted it again after a moment for another look.

This time, Zhou Gui's face was revealed. He was much older than Xiao Jiming, of average stature, and had a thin and lean face with a handsome beard to match. Lu Yizhi was so startled that she was struck dumb.

Fortunately, she still had her wits about her and could still remember that Shen Zechuan was a good two years younger than Xiao Chiye.

Right at this time, she saw Zhou Gui bow over slightly to make way for a white figure. This white figure was tall and slender. Although he was standing sideways, she could vaguely catch a glimpse of his appearance. Lu Yizhi sized him up carefully, thinking that A-Ye truly wasn't bragging; he was indeed a looker. Presumably, he took after his mother more.

How would Shen Zechuan know that Lu Yizhi was sizing him up? He spoke to Zhou Gui in a hushed tone. "I'd like to ask the various advisors to draft up the new document today. Other matters can be temporarily postponed for discussion another day."

Even if Zhou Gui was an obtuse one, he also knew who Lu Yizhi was here to see. He followed Shen Zechuan closely and said, "I'll immediately assign some men from the yamen over."

Shen Zechuan was momentarily taken aback. "Whatever for?"

Zhou Gui's palms were sweating as he answered, "To protect you!"

Shen Zechuan was speechless. He looked at the accompanying retinue of about five hundred men from the Libei Armored Cavalry. If they were really here to capture him, Zhou Gui would not have been able to stop them, even if he wanted to. Xiao Chiye had not sent any letters after the eighth month, so he could only act based on his conjectures. He promptly reassured Zhou Gui in a casual tone, "Perhaps the Hereditary Prince's Consort is merely passing through. Cizhou leads directly to Chazhou, and it's a lot more convenient to head into Qidong from there. There is no need for Your Excellency to be overly worried. We are not enemies with Libei."

Who would have guessed that such a spontaneous remark from Shen Zechuan would really hit the nail on the head?

It was precisely to go to Qidong that Lu Yizhi headed south this time.

Due to Lu Guangbai's desertion, Lu Pingyan had been implicated, and the imperial court had ordered him to be taken into custody for a trial. However, Qi Zhuyin simply outright detained Yingxi, the Army-inspecting eunuch of the Bianjun Commandery, and demanded an explanation from the Ministry of War on the grounds of Yingxi's repeated interference in military affairs of Bianjun and involvement in the issue of Bianjun's army provisions. At the same time, she took Lu Pingyan into her own camp to look after him. Qi Zhuyin had sent a letter to Libei back in the sixth month, asking Xiao Jiming to fetch Lu Pingyan away as soon as possible.

This was a major case, and the crux lay in whether or not Lu Guangbai would throw in his lot with the Twelve Tribes of Biansha. Dazhou currently could not receive any news regarding the Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops, and by just looking at Lu Guangbai's act of penetrating deep into the desert, there was a high possibility of him defecting to the Twelve Tribes of Biansha. The court ministers' request to put Lu Pingyan on trial was meant to hold him hostage in Qudu, so that they would have the leverage to negotiate with Lu Guangbai in the future. The document relayed by the Ministry of War met with obstruction in Qidong, with Qi Zhuyin turning a blind eye to it. At this juncture, the Imperial Bodyguards ought to have been the ones with the responsibility of carrying out the arrest on orders of the imperial edict.

But the capture did not happen.

When the Zhongbo troops were defeated six years ago, it was on imperial edict orders that the Imperial Bodyguards led by Ji Lei detained Shen Zechuan for questioning. It required not only an arrest warrant, but also the official writ of arrest decreed by the Ministry of Justice at the behest of the emperor, as well as the emperor's orders in ink. After Li Jianheng's death, the Empress Dowager took over the mandate of heaven in his place. There was originally a plan for the Empress Dowager and Grand Secretariat to jointly issue the paperwork in place of approval personally penned by the emperor himself. However, Qi Zhuyin did not accept this; she only acknowledged imperial orders personally issued by the emperor himself, and as long as the Imperial Bodyguards who went down to Qidong did not come bearing the imperial edict drafted from the hand of the emperor, she would not release Lu Pingyan.

Han Cheng, in personally leading the ceremonial guards of honor for the marriage between the Hua and Qi clans, was also meant to negotiate with Qi Zhuyin. The remuneration offered by the Empress Dowager was rather generous, but no agreement was reached. As Qudu was now reliant on Qi Zhuyin's military forces, they did not dare force Qi Zhuyin to hand the man over. Xiao Jiming had previously sent people over to inquire about the situation on the pretext of sending congratulatory gifts, to which Qi Zhuyin had verbally given him an unequivocal answer. Lu Yizhi's current trip was thus for the precise purpose of fetching Lu Pingyan to Libei.

And to help her father-in-law back at home find out the kind of person Shen Zechuan was while she was passing through.

Shen Zechuan naturally could not allow Lu Yizhi to stay over at a relay station, which was rather unfitting of her status, so he made a special point of deploying people to tidy up the courtyard and invite Lu Yizhi to stay for the night in Xiao Chiye's name. Lu Yizhi noted that the upturned eaves of the residence were all in a style that Xiao Chiye was partial to, and the insides and outsides were both organized and well taken care of. She could not help recalling the letter Xiao Chiye wrote to her before her departure, of which three pages were devoted to showering Shen Zechuan with praise.

Lu Yizhi got off the horse carriage, and Ding Tao joyfully came over to greet her. Lu Yizhi was happy to see him and pulled him along as she gave him a once-over. "Tao-zi has also grown a head taller now. Why didn't you return home with the Second Young Master?"

Ding Tao replied, "Master commanded me to stay put and stay by Young Master's side."

Lu Yizhi called for the maidservant to bring candies for Ding Tao. She sat on the chair, put her hands together under her sleeves, and asked gently, "Does the Second Young Master often stay here?"

Ding Tao hemmed and hawed, having been cautioned by Qiao Tianya before, yet he also did not dare lie to the Hereditary Prince's Consort.

And so Lu Yizhi spoke in an even softer voice, "When you were home last time, you'd often come over to ease my boredom. The grandson-heir has always known of his Tao-zi gege; he's constantly longing for you to come home and play with him." As she spoke, she turned slightly to the side, looking a little sad. "It has been six years since we last saw our little Tao-zi, and he has grown so distant from me."

Ding Tao hurriedly replied, "No, not at all! Your Ladyship treats me well. Even before I left for Qudu, you instructed Jin-ge to look after me. I remember it all."

Lu Yizhi then turned back around and said, "You're young. As the older brothers, it's their responsibility to take good care of you. When I heard about how A-Ye was constantly bullied in Qudu, I couldn't eat and kept tossing and turning all night long. I worried for a long time..."

On hearing this, Ding Tao immediately responded, "Master wasn't injured when he left Qudu. The Eight Great Training Divisions couldn't catch up to us, and that Han Jin who came after us is still locked up in jail. Your Ladyship need not worry, Master is a very formidable man now."

“Since A-Ye is this impressive,” Lu Yizhi worriedly spoke, “Why did your journey take so long?”

“The Young Master was injured,” Ding Tao recounted. “Master was trapped in the capital by Han Cheng, and Young Master helped a great deal. But that Han Cheng was truly an abominable one—he even used Young Master’s teacher to threaten him. Young Master didn’t manage to save his teacher, and after leaving Qudu, he fell heavily ill. All the physicians along the way weren’t any help, so we didn’t dare to hurry.”

Lu Yizhi did not know who Shen Zechuan’s teacher was, but she was alarmed to hear this, and her expressions betrayed some of her genuine concern as she asked, “What happened after? Has he recovered?”

Ding Tao was unsure of how to explain this. “He looks to have recovered, but Master and Grandpa both say he hasn’t. The last time Young Master was in Chazhou for business, he fell sick en route, and Master flew into a terrible rage when he came back.”

Lu Yizhi knew it. As expected, Xiao Chiye did indeed come by often. “I’ve never seen A-Ye angry.”

“But Master was in a rush and only stayed a night before he had to leave.” Ding Tao thought about it for a moment before adding on in a small voice, “He got in by somersaulting over the walls.”

Understanding dawned on Lu Yizhi, and she said, “Then, are you happy staying here? If you want to go back with me, I’ll bring you along.”

Ding Tao hesitated; he wanted to return to Libei, but he could not simply just let go of Cizhou either. He had made plans with Li Xiong to go fishing at the outskirts of the city in winter, and had also promised Ji Gang that he would learn a set of moves before the new year. Most importantly, Shen Zechuan never deducted his allowance, and he had never scolded him even when he kept the frogs in Shen Zechuan’s courtyard.

Lu Yizhi looked pensive on observing this. She patted Ding Tao on the head and did not put him further in a spot. If Ding Tao was this hesitant, it meant that Shen Zechuan treated him very well, and this was proof that Shen Zechuan was not a difficult person to get along with; at the very least, he had exceptional patience with this half-grown youth.

Lu Yizhi mused to herself.

Here was a good-looking, domestic, patient, and loyal man who valued ties. Not only could he take care of domestic affairs, but he could also attend to official duties. He could keep A-Ye in check, and yet he was not overly domineering. His health wasn't the best, likely an old ailment from his earlier years in Qudu. And despite the many setbacks he had suffered in his life, he remained amiable and easygoing.

Such a wonderful child!

Lu Yizhi clapped her hands together and said in excitement, "Quick, prepare the brush and ink. I'll write a letter. Send it back to Dajing overnight, and have the Hereditary Prince deliver it to His Lordship on the battleground once he's done reading it."

As a man who was not in Lu Yizhi's immediate family given her status, Shen Zechuan could not pay his respects to her face-to-face, so he erected a screen in the courtyard to separate them. They had already learned that Lu Yizhi was transiting through and thus prepared a small feast to welcome this guest from afar, with Zhou Gui's wife as company during the meal.

Madam Zhou was an astute one. She repeatedly praised Shen Zechuan to the skies during her private conversations with Lu Yizhi and picked a few incidents to recount to Lu Yizhi. Lu Yizhi's initial impression of the Shen clan had all been based on Shen Wei. It was Xiao Chiye who sent her a letter overnight to gush on and on about Shen Zechuan's good points for a whole three pages. Eventually, he implicitly said that he had been beaten up by his old man at the battleground and even demoted. He also concealed the incident where he had been in danger at the Tudalong Banner and merely said that he was injured, which made Lu Yizhi's heart ache so much that she did not want to reproach him further regarding this matter.

Lu Yizhi was only staying over for one night. She still had to head south to Chazhou tomorrow. When the feast ended, she specifically summoned Shen Zechuan into the hall. The more she looked, the more good-looking she found him to be, and the more satisfied she was. Remembering Xiao Chiye's mention of Shen Zechuan's past, as well as what she'd heard from Ding Tao, she could not help but feel tender affection for Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan thought the way the Hereditary Prince's Consort looked at him was just like how one would look at a rabbit; she was as gentle as she could possibly be, as though being just a tad fiercer would send him into shock.

“Vice Commander Shen,” Lu Yizhi said in a soft, gentle voice. “I’ve imposed on you and caused you trouble, so I hope you can accept this gift as a gesture of my thanks and appreciation.”

Without even waiting for Shen Zechuan to answer, she gestured for the maidservant to present it to him. Contrary to his expectation, it was nothing rare, just satin in a box. As it was nothing valuable, Shen Zechuan did not turn it down after some polite civilities. But as he accepted it, he found the box heavy.

When Shen Zechuan returned to the courtyard, he opened it to take a look. There were gold and jade bracelets cushioned at the bottom, all intricately inlaid and exquisitely crafted family heirlooms of quality workmanship.

Fei Sheng sneaked a peek from behind him and marveled if this weren’t a set of family heirlooms meant to be passed down to a daughter-in-law! But he dared not vocalize his thoughts and silently shifted his gaze away, leaving Shen Zechuan to stand alone in place all puzzled.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 157 : ZHONGXIONG

Translated with: Jia<3

When Lu Yizhi left Cizhou the following day, Shen Zechuan had Fei Sheng join her entourage with the Imperial Bodyguards and instructed him to escort her into the territory of Qidong. Official business that had yet to be finalized yesterday still had to be discussed further, and so everyone settled back into their respective seats in the study with the windows open.

“This is the new document from last night for the Vice Commander’s perusal, if you may.” Zhou Gui presented the papers on the table, “We initially separated the registered citizens from the undocumented refugees and increased the severity of punishments, but during the discussion with Yuanzhuo this morning, he proposed we continue keeping both groups together and not govern them separately.”

“Post the notice up, and the issue of household registrations will be easily resolved.” Yao Wenyu let out a couple of coughs. “It’ll be unsuitable if we take the extra move of segregating them; it’ll create unhappiness among the commoners who are newly registered, as well as make it difficult for the yamen to differentiate between the old and new when they carry out their duties.”

After reading through it, Shen Zechuan nodded. “It’ll be a disaster waiting to happen too if anyone tries to fish in troubled waters when the time comes. Since this matter is settled, the only issue left for us to handle before the end of the year is that of the surveyance of fields. The current land records of the fields in Cizhou were all measured during the reign of Yongyi; they’re too outdated.”

“Cizhou has been reclaiming wastelands for three years in a row, and in truth, the acreage of land has seen a significant increase. We ought to have re-surveyed the land last year, but manpower was lacking then, and Lei Changming was driving us into such a corner; that’s why it has been delayed until now.” Zhou Gui calculated the time. “This task has to be completed before the end of the year, or errors will inevitably arise once the snow thickens.”

Cizhou now had plenty of yamen runners and constables, but capable government clerks and other lesser functionaries<sup>1</sup> were few and far between. The advisors were mostly in charge of deliberating over official matters and were not responsible for the transcription of official documents, let alone sending them down to survey the lands. The yamen had a manpower shortage, and so did Shen Zechuan.

“After the registration and classification of households, screen them on the spot. As long as they are literate, record them down on file first for future use, regardless of whether they are locals from Cizhou or non-natives from Dancheng.” When Shen Zechuan spoke to this point, he looked around the advisors. “If someone has committed a crime in the past, we won’t be able to find out if he doesn’t declare it to us, so we have to be prudent during the screening and vetting process. Some may well see it as a business too, and it’s inevitable that there will be people who attempt to curry favor with those in authority for personal gain. However, I trust that the various gentlemen here are all men of integrity who can distinguish between the crafty and the virtuous and do the right thing when it comes down to it.”

Given how frankly he had said it, who would still not understand? The seated advisors who were initially smoking their pipes all rose to their feet noisily. A few of them looked embarrassed, no longer daring to jest around again.

The advisors were all Zhou Gui’s honored guests with free access to the governmental office. Most of them were addressed as “mister”, with their daily needs provided by Zhou Gui. There were only two ways that they could earn some spare cash. The first was to provide literary services, and the second was to attend the banquets of the local squires and elders, where they would be able to obtain monetary rewards from the household’s masters. But now that they were in charge of recording the registrations and screening the lesser functionaries, there was no doubt some among the current flood of refugees into Cizhou would be thinking of pulling strings and sneaking them bribes on the sly.

Gao Zhongxiong was one of the unlucky ones.

After Han Jin was taken as prisoner, Gao Zhongxiong did not dare to return to Qudu for fear that Han Cheng would pursue the matter, so he relied on his connection to his maternal uncle in Dancheng and remained in Dancheng as Pan Yi's advisor. At first, Pan Yi had the intent to entrust him with heavy responsibility, but many of the plans and strategies he put forth were impractical theories that only looked good on paper, and so Pan Yi gradually gave him the cold shoulder. Bullied and humiliated by the servants in the Pan's residence, he had no choice but to return to his uncle's house. But when it rains, it pours, and his uncle fell to his death one night while in a drunken stupor. Gao Zhongxiong was a scholar who was too physically weak to carry out practical work, and his auntie, disdaining him for being useless, found an excuse to send him back to Yuzhou.

Gao Zhongxiong felt ashamed to return home to face his elders and fellow townsfolk, so he thought of selling calligraphy and paintings to rent a few acres of low-yield land and do an imitation of a carefree immortal leading a simple and virtuous life far from the struggle for power and wealth. But who knew? He had not even worked in the field a couple of times after saving enough money to buy it when the field was forcibly seized by the local despot from the Fei clan. Gao Zhongxiong went to the yamen to lodge a complaint, and on that very same night, he was stopped by some men in the alley and beaten up. Even his house was robbed. Without a penny to his name, he was driven to the streets and reduced to beggary. He wanted to return to Yuzhou, but he had no traveling expenses. Left without an alternative, he fled Dancheng with the other refugees and came to Cizhou, hoping to try his luck.

"Old Man Xu," Gao Zhongxiong stood reservedly outside the door and hurriedly called out when he saw the man coming out. "Any news about the matter from the yamen?"

To think he used to be an outstanding personage back in Qudu, but now, he had to humble himself when speaking to others. He wanted to ingratiate himself with the other man, but he was unwilling to overdo it due to his pride. However, standing fixed in place made him look rather out of place.

The yamen runner with the surname Xu brandished his yamen paddle<sup>2</sup> and shooed Gao Zhongxiong to a side. It was only when he turned back and could no longer see the interior of the yamen that he reproached Gao Zhongxiong in a hushed tone, "What are you doing here?"

Gao Zhongxiong felt so humiliated from the admonishment that he could not lift his head. He clenched his sleeves and forced a smile when he managed to raise his head again. "I passed by the wine store ahead earlier, and I brought some over for you to quench your thirst. Here, have some.” He presented the wine with both hands, continuing only when he saw the other man’s expression softened some. “I’ve been in Cizhou for a few days. About that matter I spoke to you about the last time—”

“That matter? That matter?” Yamen runner Xu drank the wine and denied it after wiping his mouth. “What matter?”

“About getting a job in the yamen.” Gao Zhongxiong did not lift his hand to wipe away the spittle on his face. “Please do me a favor and pass a message to the various advisors. Just say that I was formerly a student from Qudu who has received the Chief Surveillance Bureau, Cen...”

“Oh, that matter. That can be easily arranged!” Yamen runner Xu moved in closer. “Prepare three taels of silvers, and I’ll buy a few packs of tobacco for the various gentlemen. You’ll be able to get past this hurdle then!”

Gao Zhongxiong was stunned for a moment, his expression a mixture of joy and sorrow. “I’ve already given it all to you. I have no more money.”

Yamen runner Xu instantly turned hostile. The old man said, “How can you do anything without money? You think the gentlemen live on vegetables? They’ll only acknowledge cold hard cash! If I hadn’t taken pity on you and was willing to help you out, how could these silvers have been enough? No way it would have been enough!”

Gao Zhongxiong hastily tugged on yamen runner Xu’s arm. “I’ve already given you a total of seven taels of silver in all. You must have some news...”

“You want to get in through the use of connections, but you can’t bear to part with your money.” Yamen runner Xu threw the wine gourd into Gao Zhongxiong’s arms and stretched his neck out to spat at him, his words contemptuous, “You know, even when you pee or shit, you still have to undo your belt!”

All of Gao Zhongxiong’s money had been cheated out of him by yamen runner Xu, and since he had been hanging out with the group of refugees all day, he was as filthy as a beggar. As he looked at yamen runner Xu’s mug now, he recalled the humiliation he experienced in Dancheng. In a fit of anger, he charged towards yamen runner Xu without a care, threw him one tight slap, and yelled, “Since you didn’t do what I asked, give me back my money!”

Yamen runner Xu could not have imagined that Gao Zhongxiong would dare to hit him. He pointed at the tip of Gao Zhongxiong's nose. "You, you! A despicable cheapskate like you dares to hit me?!"

As they exchanged blows, yamen runner Xu swung his yamen paddle at Gao Zhongxiong's waist, kicked him over to the ground, and whacked away at him viciously. Gao Zhongxiong, a mere scholar who had been starving for days, felt a stab of intense pain on his waist as one of the blows landed on an undetermined bone in his body. He rolled on the floor, covering his head as he attempted to dodge the blows, crying so hard he was out of breath. Even so, he still shouted, "Are you human? You cheated me out of my money. Are you still human?!"

With more people crowding over, yamen runner Xu did not dare stir up a big commotion, lest the yamen came to investigate. He tossed aside his yamen paddle and straddled on top of Gao Zhongxiong, then gripped his face by the jaw and shoved a towel used for wiping sweat into his mouth to gag him. Gao Zhongxiong was howling as he struggled, so yamen runner Xu slapped him ruthlessly multiple times until Gao Zhongxiong's ears were ringing and his vision blurred; even the corners of his mouth were bleeding.

"I'm on official business here!" Yamen runner Xu shouted to the crowd around him, "This son of a bitch is a thief from Dancheng. I caught him the last time. To think he still dares come and seek revenge today!"

A sound escaped from Gao Zhongxiong's throat as yamen runner Xu dragged him by the collar towards the yamen's entrance. The side of his cheek scraped against the ground, bloodied by the gravel. He reached his hand out towards those before him in a plea for help.

Yamen runner Xu kicked Gao Zhongxiong a few more times on the chest and abdomen. As yamen runners, they were the most adept at running around detaining and summoning people for questioning—teaching a frail scholar like Gao Zhongxiong a lesson was simply a piece of cake. As long as he dragged Gao Zhongxiong in today and kept the latter gagged while he processed the latter with a thievery charge, he could throw him in jail. By then, all he had to do was to give the wardens he was on familiar terms with a heads-up, and Gao Zhongxiong would have it coming for him. Whether or not he could survive past the eighth month would all depend on yamen runner Xu's mood!

At the same time the commotion was ongoing, Zhou Gui was returning with Shen Zechuan from the fields on the outskirts of the city. The horse carriage had been obstructed midway along the path, and he thought it was yet another instance of the refugees causing trouble.

Shen Zechuan did not say a word. Zhou Gui hurriedly stepped off his own carriage and hoisted up the hem of his robe as he pushed through the crowd and asked, "What's going on? Who is kicking up a ruckus by the entrance of the yamen?!"

Yamen runner Xu immediately replied, "To answer Your Excellency, I've caught a thief! He not only refuses to submit, but even hits others!"

For the past few days, Zhou Gui had been perturbed over the lack of public order in the city. He furrowed his brow at hearing this. "Even so, that's no way to handle the situation. What do you mean by beating up others in the streets? That's not right!" He took a glance at Gao Zhongxiong. He initially intended to chastise him and educate him on the proprieties and morals. However, he remembered that Shen Zechuan's horse carriage was still obstructed at the back. They could not afford a delay, so he said, "Hurry and bring him in. Give him a proper trial once he has been cleaned up."

Upon hearing this, Gao Zhongxiong started struggling with all his might and attempted to spit out the towel in his mouth.

Yao Wenyu was currently discussing the reviews of the clerks and other lesser functionaries over these few days with Shen Zechuan. The carriage had remained stuck for a long time with no signs of movement. Qiao Tianya returned and lifted a corner of the curtain to report to Shen Zechuan. "Master, they're still making a ruckus. Let's take a detour."

Shen Zechuan pushed the curtains higher with his folding fan and asked, "What's the matter?"

"They're saying it's a thief; the yamen runner arrested him on the streets." Qiao Tianya shifted his body slightly to give way. "I didn't see any calluses on his hands; he seems to be a scholar."

Yao Wenyu, who rarely enjoyed being in noisy places now, looked over together with them. The area ahead was swarming with a crowd of people; he could see nothing at all.

"Let's take a detour." Shen Zechuan released the drapes and let it fall. "Head straight to the Zhou's residence. There are still people waiting in the study. We have to discuss the matter of the mutual market before the hour of you."

Qiao Tianya ordered the carriage driver to turn the horses around. As they were turning, they suddenly heard a heartbreaking wail from ahead. “You people are forcing me to my death! What kind of yamen is this?! Oh heavens, do you have to reduce me, Gao Zhongxiong, to such straits?!”

Yao Wenyu abruptly lifted the drapes and said to Qiao Tianya, “Hold on, that person is Gao Zhongxiong, whose essays Cen Yu have given pointers to before.” He then looked towards Shen Zechuan. “He’s the student who led three thousand students from the Imperial College to denounce Pan Rugui that rainy night. Vice Commander, this person is of use to us!”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 胥吏 Throughout history, one of the most general generic designations for a class of minor staff who performed the more menial tasks in all governmental units and had no ranked civil service status, though at times they could be promoted into official status for meritorious service.

- 2.
3. 水火棍 a red and black rod or paddle used by yamen underlings in the past.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 158 : BROKEN JADE

Translated with: Jia<3

Lesser functionaries like clerks<sup>1</sup> should not be confused with governmental officials. They were at the bottom of the hierarchy with no rank and were technically not considered officials. But they could write and count, and they were far more proficient in local law than the local officials, so they could dispose of all incriminating evidence and leave no traces for anyone to use against them whenever they oppressed, hoodwinked, and even extorted the local commoners. Furthermore, mutual cover-ups were prevalent, given the geographical limitations in place.

When Luo Mu initially arrived at Chazhou, there were plenty of matters he did not manage to work on, and one of the reasons was that he was impeded by the functionaries of Chazhou. The local administration not only affected the official's political track record; sometimes, they could also become obstacles to the implementation of local policies.

The imperial court had assigned a Provincial Surveillance Commissioner to Zhongbo after the defeat of its troops, but Dunzhou had already lost the ability to control and hold the other five prefectures in check. Consequently, the corruption of local administrations in Zhongbo degenerated over the years to the point it was grim.

Gao Zhongxiong had already been taken to a physician, and Zhou Gui was pacing the study. The advisors all sat in the partitioned area and waited silently with rapt attention for Shen Zechuan to speak. This matter concerned the screening of the functionaries, and it was also a question as to whether the yamen would be replacing its current yamen runners.

Zhou Gui spoke in a grave tone. "We were just discussing this matter yesterday, and things have gone awry today. That Old Man Xu is a yamen runner, and he has already obtained bribes over a dozen silver taels just for the screening of the functionaries alone. There are so many staff and subordinates from top to bottom in the yamen. If others are also conducting deals on this, then how many of the functionaries we employ as a result of this screening process will be truly of use?"

Yao Wenyu drank the tea and said nothing as he put the lid back on.

Anyone who was discerning could tell at a glance that this affair undoubtedly implicated Zhou Gui's advisors. Old Man Xu was just a yamen runner, yet he dared to take advantage of the opportunity presented to make a quick buck. This would not have been doable for him at all, not unless someone was in communication with him from behind the scenes.

Yao Wenyu was Shen Zechuan's advisor. If he were to speak up and ask for them to deal with the matter severely, he would be suspected of trying to supplant Zhou Gui's advisors. In all the recent discussions, he had remained secure in the seat by Shen Zechuan's side as his council, but he was a newcomer, and he could not compare in terms of seniority. The reputation of "Unpolished Jade Yuanzhuo" had reached far and wide. Others treated him as an immortal when he had been beyond their reach, but now that he had fallen, they treated him as a live target. Criticism among peers was a minor affair, but if this led to friction between Shen Zechuan and Zhou Gui, it would be to the detriment of Cizhou.

"As the saying goes, every injustice has its perpetrator, and every debt, its debtor." Shen Zechuan weighed his folding fan in his chair, his expression unreadable as he sat on the chair. "Whoever did it, just deal with said person in accordance with the standard procedure. The screening process is no small matter, and there is plenty at stake. We cannot end up hurting the various diligent and hardworking gentlemen because of paranoia."

The advisors in the partitioned area did not dare make a sound, although a few inwardly let out sighs of relief. Shen Zechuan was in Cizhou; he still had to count on Zhou Gui's power and influence, so it was only to be expected for him to handle the matter with care. It was still salvageable if the administration was corrupt, but it was obviously not a good time now. If they cracked down too hard and ended up implicating over half of Cizhou's yamen by following the trail, then how were they going to get any work done when all the functionaries and subordinates' positions have been emptied out?

Conversely, Zhou Gui was reluctant now. "Vice Commander, it is precisely because it's no small matter that it has to be investigated! We cannot let people ruin the ethos of the yamen. If others were to imitate this behavior in the future, then it's still the commoners who will suffer."

“Of course, it has to be investigated. What I meant is for us to go by the book.” Shen Zechuan called for someone to steep the tea, then continued, “Old Man Xu has already been taken into custody. If Your Excellency doesn’t feel reassured, then, by all means, send someone you can trust to sit in and transcribe it down. With the Imperial Bodyguards conducting the trial, there will be results by tonight. Baseless accusations cannot be trusted, but conclusive evidence cannot be disregarded either. Whoever wants to violate the regulations of the yamen then will have to bear the responsibility for their actions. Wasn’t the newly transcribed penal laws just posted? This incident came at the right time; Your Excellency can set up court and hold the trial before the citizens of Cizhou. The more turbid the waters, the more they have to be sifted clear. But once the case concludes, we must never take inaccurate rumors for truth and jump to conclusions; the yamen does not do anything that will implicate the innocent.”

Zhou Gui said, “This matter must be taken as a warning.”

Shen Zechuan replied, “But of course; those who are lightly punished shall be dismissed from their position, and those who are severely punished shall be exiled to barren lands. If public sentiment runs high, an on-the-spot execution in the court can also serve to bring immense satisfaction to all.”

A crash rang out from the partitioned area, and the stunned gasps of the advisors suddenly rose.

Zhou Gui hurriedly asked, “What’s the matter?”

A few people responded, “Your Excellency, someone fainted!”

They initially assumed that Shen Zechuan meant to punish only Old Man Xu and show mercy to the rest of them, but who would have thought that Shen Zechuan wanted to make an example out of them. The Imperial Bodyguards were the ones presiding over the interrogation, so how could an old chap from the countryside like Old Man Xu withstand it? Not implicating the innocent meant not pursuing the matter for the others, but not a single one of the parties involved in Old Man Xu’s case this time was going to get away with it. The more those sitting in the partitioned area listened, the more seized with terror they became, so much that when Shen Zechuan uttered the four words’ on-the-spot execution’, one of them promptly passed out cold.

It was a state of pandemonium in the study. On the other side, Gao Zhongxiong was grimacing in pain under the hands of the physician. After the physician left, he changed into a clean set of clothes with the help of the maidservants. He was one to keep himself in good health back in Qudu, so even if he was starving right now, he dared not gobble down his meal.

After he was done eating, the maidservants led Gao Zhongxiong to the courtyard. On the way there, he did not dare to look around. He knew Shen Zechuan was now residing in Cizhou, and he felt rather apprehensive. For someone who had given Han Jin counsel on the pursuit and capture of Xiao Chiye, coming to Cizhou could be said to be a risky, last-ditch move.

Gao Zhongxiong entered the courtyard and saw that the jasmine orange beyond the wooden railing of the covered walkway had all withered. No one had swept away the blanket of white petals on the ground; presumably, it was on the specific instruction of the master of the house to allow its natural fragrance to remain lingering in the air. Meanwhile, the green moss and gravelstone left along the edge of the pond bridge made it appear as though it was paved with a new, visually pleasing mattress.

Gao Zhongxiong ascended the stairs as he peeked at it, and in a moment of inattention, he nearly slipped. After he awkwardly braced himself up, he hurriedly bowed to the maidservants in front who were snickering behind covered mouths, sweating profusely as he repeated the bows.

Wind chimes dangled beneath the eaves. Ding Tao waited for Gao Zhongxiong to come over before he lifted the curtains for him and led him inside. Gao Zhongxiong did not know Ding Tao's identity and so did not dare to offend him. Instead, he lifted the hem of his own robe, intending to stride in, only to realize that there was no threshold in this room.

The interior of the hall was bright and spacious, with no valuable ornaments. When Gao Zhongxiong was in Qudu, he often heard that Shen Zechuan kept company with Xi Hongxuan and the rest and was fond of extravagance, carrying small ivory fans on him all the time. Thus, he guessed that the owner of this residence was perhaps Zhou Gui.

Gao Zhongxiong sat upright, all prim and proper, his butt barely touching the edge of the chair as he focused and paid close attention to the signs of movement in the courtyard. A short moment later, he suddenly heard the sound of wheels from the courtyard. Ding Tao, who had been under the eaves, stepped out to greet, "Young Master."

The curtain was lifted up, and Gao Zhongxiong promptly rose to his feet. However, the first one to enter was not Shen Zechuan or Zhou Gui, but a tall, unconventional bodyguard. This bodyguard did not look at Gao Zhongxiong. Instead, he leaned over to take over the wheelchair and pushed in a young master dressed in green with an overcoat draped over him.

Gao Zhongxiong was about to go by the propriety and kneel, but then, when he got a clear look at who was in the wheelchair, he could not help but gape with wide-opened eyes. Then he took a step back and exclaimed in shock, “Yao... Yuanzhuo!”

This exclamation put a frown onto the face of Shen Zechuan, who entered after the two. He removed his overcoat and made a beeline for the seat of honor.

Qiao Tianya pushed Yao Wenyu to the front, and the maidservants came forth to serve the tea. Yao Wenyu held the teacup in his hands and said with a neutral expression, “It has been a long time. I didn’t expect Shenwei to come to Cizhou too.”

For some reason, Gao Zhongxiong broke out in a cold sweat. He dabbed at his sweat and uttered a sound of acknowledgment. Not daring to continue looking Yao Wenyu in the eyes, he hastily paid his respects to Shen Zechuan. “Your, Your Excellency...”

Shen Zechuan found this man’s expression odd. After he took his seat, he said, “There’s no need to be so formal. Take a seat.”

How would Gao Zhongxiong dare to?

“Since Shenwei knows who the Vice Commander is, then there is no need for me to waste my breath.” Yao Wenyu initially wanted to introduce Gao Zhongxiong to Shen Zechuan, but on seeing how deathly pale Gao Zhongxiong was, he paused and changed his tone to soothe him. “Shenwei, don’t be afraid. I’m a living man.”

Gao Zhongxiong still did not dare to look up and merely repeated “yes.”

Shen Zechuan asked, “Yuanzhuo, what makes you say that?”

Yao Wenyu was succinct in his answer, “I had a chance encounter with Shenwei in Dancheng once. The poison and my injuries acted up simultaneously at that time and gave him a scare.”

But Gao Zhongxiong looked nervous. It was clearly not as simple as a chance encounter. After Yao Wenyu had his legs broken and left the capital, he went to Dancheng, where he received the care of Pan Yi and the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue. He was apparently poisoned in Dancheng, although he had never told anyone the story behind it.

Gao Zhongxiong, however, knew about it.

"I left Dancheng in such a hurry. Are the Commandant and Commandery Princess well?" Yao Wenyu asked.

At Yao Wenyu's tone, Gao Zhongxiong gradually relaxed enough for him to answer smoothly, but he was still turned to the side and did not dare to look at Yao Wenyu. "Yes, they are both fine..."

Shen Zechuan could sense something from this exchange.

The maidservants had all retreated, while Ding Tao was striking the wind chimes for fun under the eaves. They clinked and clanked noisily, as if a gale was wreaking havoc. Qiao Tianya lifted the curtain to chase Ding Tao away, and it finally quietened down on the other side of the beaded curtain.

Yao Wenyu seemed neither happy nor unhappy to hear this piece of news. He set aside his teacup and broke the silence to say to Shen Zechuan, "When I arrived in Dancheng, the Commandery Princess was looking after me, but she is, after all, a married woman, and there were many areas that was inconvenient for her to intervene with. The Commandant thus sought out Pan Yuan, who was still living at home at that time. This Pan Yuan is the Commandant's younger brother of common birth."

Pan Yuan was an idler who loafed around all day. He was fond of gambling, but he was not a direct descendant of lawful birth from the Pan clan, so he could only rely on Pan Yi and his wife to repay the huge debt he owned. Pan Yi had him take care of Yao Wenyu, hoping that he could be inspired to "emulate the virtuous" and better himself. Furthermore, Pan Yuan had been very dedicated to taking care of their father in the past and could be considered a filial son.

At first, Pan Yuan could be said to be attentive. With Commandery Princess Zhaoyue's exhortations, he did not dare to be shoddy in his treatment of Yao Wenyu. He did not have to do anything personally, either. All he had to do was watch the physicians and attendants to ensure that they were timely with the meals and medicine and that they were not loafing off on the job. But after time, Pan Yuan got tired and fed up with it and started to find excuses to venture outdoors to gamble.

"Pan Lin used a prisoner's body as a decoy, but this move did not dispel Xue Xiuzhou's suspicions. The Commandery Princess left in a hurry back then, and it was inevitable for there to be spies in her entourage." Yao Wenyu continued. "The gambling den later came hounding Pan Yuan for payment, and Pan Yuan went into hiding all over. He did not dare to tell his family, so he often poured out his woes to me. But I was penniless, and I was in no position to help even if I wanted to.”

Gao Zhongxiong nodded. “Pan Yuan sought me out at that time to borrow money too. He said he had been forced into a corner. Despite selling off the fields belonging to his branch of the family, he still could not pay off his debt. I advised him to tell the Commandant as soon as possible before it was too late, but he simply refused to.”

Yao Wenyu did not speak again when Gao Zhongxiong spoke to this point.

Gao Zhongxiong continued, “In less than half a month, Pan Yuan suddenly came to me for a drink. He said his gambling debt had been fully paid off, as he had met a benefactor who had extended him help. I was worried he had been deceived by the gambling den, so I sounded him out during the feast about this benefactor. He only said this person was a Longyou merchant<sup>2</sup> from Qudu who had asked him to run an errand for him.”

Another half a month passed. Yao Wenyu’s injuries not only did not heal, but had instead even deteriorated further. Commandery Princess Zhaoyue asked all the physicians at home, but Yao Wenyu’s condition showed no improvement. At that time, Pan Lin suffered a setback in Qudu, and even Pan Yi was impeached along with him. The issue at hand turned out to be about the Pan clan’s fields in Dancheng. Pan Xiangjie did not dare to speak up for his sons, fearful that the matter would snowball into disproportionate proportions. But even the Pan clan’s repeated concessions did not manage to stop this storm from blowing their way, and the imperial censors got so heated that they vehemently demanded Pan Lin to be suspended pending trial.

There was indeed an issue with the Pan clan, but that was a debt borne out of Pan Xiangjie’s greed. The reason Pan Lin bore the brunt of it was rather obvious—it was because he harbored Yao Wenyu. But he acted in a fit of pique at this injustice, adamant on fighting Xue Xiuzhuo till the end.

It did not take long for Pan Xiangjie to learn of the inside story. Fearing that the Pan clan would be implicated, he wrote a letter overnight to Pan Yi, who was in Dancheng, and demanded him to send Yao Wenyu back to Qudu as soon as possible. Pan Yi refused, and so Pan Xiangjie blew his top and subsequently became bedridden in illness, putting Pan Yi in a dilemma. At the same time, the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue noticed the oddness of Yao Wenyu's condition and grew suspicious, so she bypassed the front hall and got her personal maid to call over a physician from outside the residence to take a look.

Yao Wenyu had no wish to get into the details. After a moment of silence, he merely said, "The Commandery Princess was worried that Qudu would use the matter of inspecting the fields as a pretext to come over and capture me. She initially wanted to send me to the manor that came as part of her dowry to recuperate, but there were problems with the medicine, and she could no longer trust the people in the Pan's residence. So she prepared traveling expenses and entrusted someone with the task of sending me secretly to Jincheng, where my late teacher's long-time friends still reside."

But misfortune never comes singly. The people in his entourage saw that Yao Wenyu was not only seriously ill but also had both his legs broken, so after they left the city, they forgot all that the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue had entrusted to them and ran away with the traveling expenses and horse carriage under cover of the night.

That night, Yao Wenyu was thrown into the wilderness. All that remained other than the donkey was the cat. He used to sleep in the wild with mother earth as his pillow when he was wandering the mountains and plains, but the experience of it this time was completely poles apart. For the first time in his twenty-four years of life, he realized that he was nothing. He was a nobody once his reputation was stripped from him. Unpolished Jade Yuanzhuo—it was at that moment Yao Wenyu loathed these words to the core. They were like humiliation branded deep into his bone marrow.

In the wilderness, Yao Wenyu broke down and cried inconsolably.
For his teacher, and for himself.

He refused to see anyone when he was in Dancheng, merely lying all day long on that bed shrouded in dimness. His legs were the ones that hurt, but his self-esteem was the one that had shattered. He had to face up to the fact that he was no longer able to take care of himself. All that carefree spirit of his had turned into a thing of the past. Such were his dreams for each sleep he took, and it remained the same when he woke.

He was broken through and through.

He still wanted to live.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 胥吏 Throughout history, one of the most general generic designations for a class of personnel who performed the more menial tasks in all governmental units and had no ranked civil service status, though at times they could be promoted into official status for meritorious service.
2. 龙游商人 Longyou merchants, from the Longyou Group (龙游商帮), were famous merchants during the Ming and Qing dynasties for its operations in jewelry, book publishing, and paper-making industries.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 159 : NAMELESS

Translated with: Jia<3

There was something amiss with Yao Wenyu's medicine; the physicians from the Pan's residence could not figure out what was wrong, but this no doubt had something to do with Pan Yuan, considering that he had been the one taking care of Yao Wenyu. The Commandery Princess Zhaoyue later checked on the Longyou merchant who had paid off Pan Yuan's debt, but the other party had long disappeared without a trace. Not long after Yao Wenyu left, Pan Yuan fell off his horse and died, and thus, the trail leading to the identity of the person who instigated him to poison Yao Wenyu hit a dead end. However, Pan Lin had the blame pinned on Xue Xiuzhuo, and both parties' relationship in Qudu continued to deteriorate.

Gao Zhongxiong sensed the atmosphere in the room growing tense. When he remembered he was also on friendly terms with Pan Yuan, he felt as though he was sitting on pins and needles, worried that Yao Wenyu would blame him for it by association. The silence was too much for him to bear, and he could not help breaking it. "Although I am acquainted with Pan Yuan, we do not share the same ideals. All the typical exchange of formalities over wine we had are merely a matter of necessity." He was not adept at flattery and stumbled over his words, "On the contrary, I am in admiration of Yuanzhuo's talent... we once had an encounter over a poetry meet during the reign of Xiande, and Yuanzhuo's talent and bearing were so out of this world that it was truly an ethereal sight to behold..."

Yao Wenyu waited for Gao Zhongxiong to finish before he calmly said, "The past is but a dream: it's all now water under the bridge. It's fate that we can meet again in Cizhou alive. Now that I've found a good master, may I ask what plans you have for the future?"

Gao Zhongxiong stole a glance at Shen Zechuan. "What plans could I even have now that I've been reduced to such a state?" He revealed a bitter smile as he spoke. "I've made a laughingstock of myself with my behavior today. I've persevered in my studies for so many years, but in the end, it has all come to nothing."

Shen Zechuan clasped his folding fan under his sleeves. The room felt chilly to him; it was time to get someone to prepare the hand warmer. He pulled his wandering mind back in an instant, his jade earring turning to the side slightly as he spoke politely to Gao Zhongxiong, "The political climate is currently unstable, and the various heroes are fighting over themselves to make a play for the top. Since Mister Shenwei has come to Cizhou, why don't you reside temporarily in my residence and take your time to decide?"

Gao Zhongxiong could not help feeling greatly touched when he heard Shen Zechuan calling him "Mister Shenwei". He had been through a lot of hardships on this life journey of his, and the masters he had successively encountered and served had not been good masters. And so he stood up and bowed deeply to Shen Zechuan, his words even more awkward and inarticulate. Shen Zechuan comforted him a little, and it was an hour later before Gao Zhongxiong withdrew.

Yao Wenyu looked at the bamboo blinds falling back into place. He waited until Gao Zhongxiong had walked out of the walkway before he asked, "Does the Vice Commander find this man to be of no use?"

Even if Shen Zechuan truly thought so, he could not say it outright. Thus, he answered, "He must have his forte for you to recommend him to this extent."

"That's right." Yao Wenyu said. "Gao Zhongxiong's courtesy name is Shenwei, and he has always been known as the 'eloquent brush' when he was in the Imperial College. Back then, when Xi Hongxuan was setting the storm in motion in Qudu by inciting the Imperial College, he chose Gao Zhongxiong precisely because of the latter's penmanship. Gao Zhongxiong was a student who entered the capital in the fourth year of Xiande, which coincided with the defeat of Zhongbo's troops. It was a scene of devastation everywhere in the Six Prefectures then, and the 'Lamentation of Chashi' he wrote under the influence of wine caused the students to fall over themselves to transcribe private copies for distribution. When it made its way into Cen Yu's hands, it even made Cen Yu shed tears by the candlelight, deeply moved as he was."

Shen Zechuan drank the tea and said, "So that's how it is."

The Imperial College's disturbance that Xi Hongxuan had facilitated was, in fact, instigated by Shen Zechuan. Gao Zhongxiong led the students to demand answers for Shen Zechuan's release from the temple and ended up being forcibly quelled by Pan Rugui and Ji Lei. This led to a turnabout of the then-students' direction, turning the entire farce into a dispute between them and the Pan faction. Ji Lei and the others were caught off-guard before they could act, and subsequently, they lost the initiative to land a decisive blow on Shen Zechuan to take him down.

Shen Zechuan himself knew best what had played a key role in that fiasco, including the Imperial College uproar that Xue Xiuzhuo had later stirred up again. They had both gotten a firm grasp on the inclination of the public sentiments before herding them into moving in the direction they wanted. To do this, compelling rhetoric and articles that had the power to move men were the most indispensable. Yao Wenyu's meaning was clear—Gao Zhongxiong's writing had such power. He could stir up a storm, and it was precisely such literary prowess that Shen Zechuan was in need of right now.

"The Chazhou trip has made the Vice Commander a well-known name, but because of the taint that is Shen Wei, it's still far from enough if you want to lead and command the various heroes in an open and aboveboard manner." Yao Wenyu paused for a moment. "Even if the full story of the defeat from start to end is made public in the future, it'd still prove to be hard for Shen Wei to be absolved of blame."

An ill reputation lends no weight to one's words. This was a problem that Shen Zechuan could not circumvent.

King Yi of Fanzhou was currently drafting up documents to attack and vilify Cizhou, and he had made reference to the defeat multiple times. Shen Wei's withdrawal from battle without so much a fight was a fact, and there was no way to refute that even if Zhou Gui wanted to. Firstly, Shen Zechuan was indeed Shen Wei's eighth son of common birth; he was Shen Wei's son by blood, and the so-called "unfavored" treatment he had received held no water in quelling the anger of the public. That was a blood relation, one unlike Fei Sheng with a remote common birth connection, where a glib tongue was all that was needed to convince the people. Secondly, the defeat of the troops was a tragedy caused by Hua Siqian and the rest's attempts to fill up the void in the state treasury, but the evidence had all been destroyed. Shen Wei committed suicide by self-immolation, Hua Siqian died in prison, and Wei Huaigu succumbed to poison. Not a single trace was left of their collusion with the Biansha Cavalry to sell out Dazhou's military defense maps.

This was the dark cloud that was constantly hanging over Shen Zechuan's head. It was also his greatest pitfall. He had risen to power in Cizhou, but why was he faced with such a scarcity of talents? Because the talents of the world refused to come to him. They'd rather follow heroes like King Yi who had risen in rebellion among the common people than throw in their lots with Shen Zechuan.

"The Vice Commander executed an advisor of Cizhou today, and it's only by holding the trial publicly that the Vice Commander's name did not fall into further disrepute. But with the rise of Cizhou and the allegiance of Chazhou, the Vice Commander must first drop the title of 'Vice Commander' if the Vice Commander wishes to advance a step further." Noting Shen Zechuan's neutral expression as he fiddled with his folding fan, Yao Wenyu knew then that Shen Zechuan had already considered this, so he continued, "Cizhou has long freed itself from Qudu's control. Using the former title makes it all too easy to confound the status of master and subordinates. It's no longer apt to keep the address, 'Vice Commander'."

By the time Yao Wenyu had spoken to this point, both men had reached a tacit understanding.

Shen Zechuan could be addressed as "Vice Commander", or even "Judge"—those were his titles in the Imperial Bodyguards, although they were rendered void when he left Qudu. He was now in Cizhou, and Cizhou's prefectural prefect was Zhou Gui. If he had no new form of address, it would imply that he was still the guest and Zhou Gui was the host and the master. The offending advisors could still remain securely seated in place in the partitioned area despite what had happened at the yamen because they still treated Zhou Gui as the master of Cizhou. They did not see themselves as subordinate to Shen Zechuan. There was still a line between both parties.

Only Kong Ling had long since recognized the problem. He brought this to Zhou Gui's attention before he set off for Chazhou the last time, and he had reminded Zhou Gui again when he set off for Huaizhou this time. But Zhou Gui truly was not well-acquainted with the ins and outs of the matter, and that was why he had been slow to react.

Shen Zechuan could not proclaim himself king, at least, not now. King Yi of Fanzhou established himself so early that he was literally the prey standing right in front of Qidong. Qi Zhuyin already had the time to catch a breather and get back in the game. Once she filled in the gap at Bianjun

Commandery, she would have spare resources to deploy troops to Zhongbo, and the first one she was going to fight would be these random kings that had risen from among the common people.

“There are benefits to being nameless nobodies.” Shen Zechuan leaned back slightly. “At least if Qi Zhuyin dispatches troops without any justifiable cause, she would not be able to bypass the other five prefectures to come after Cizhou.”

Cizhou did not have bandits or self-proclaimed kings. Xiao Chiye, who commanded the Imperial Army, was the one the Eight Great Training Divisions were pursuing. Shen Zechuan was at most a “fugitive”, and Cizhou was at most “harboring a fugitive”. Zhou Gui had not openly and blatantly hung up the rebel flag, and he was still the “prefect” in the territory. His turning of a deaf ear to Qudu’s orders could be put down to the long distance between Cizhou and Qudu, and just based on this alone, Qi Zhuyin could not attack Cizhou—not unless she used the suppression of bandits as a pretext to route her troops to the western side of Cizhou, then enter Cizhou with the excuse that she was just transiting through. However, the deployment of troops like this meant that the military expenditure required would increase exponentially, and Qudu might not necessarily be able to spare the money. The best option was still for the Eight Great Training Divisions to deploy their troops. They had support for provisions from Dancheng and were located close enough, and they could also use the reason of tracking down Shen Zechuan to take him in for questioning to launch a war with Cizhou. But Han Jin was too impatient. Not only were his troops broken up by Xiao Chiye, he was also beaten silly by Xiao Chiye. This consequently led the Eight Great Training Divisions into cowering back.

But such a situation could not last for long.

Because the Eight Great Training Divisions were bound to stage a comeback. Once the three parties in Qudu entered a period of stability, the Ministry of War would re-elect a new chief commander. It was to guard against this situation that Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan purchased the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds from Zhou Gui for use as the Imperial Army’s camp. This way, a 20,000-strong Imperial Army would be the shield at the west of Cizhou, used for the specific purpose of resisting the Eight Great Training Divisions. But at the same time, the Imperial Army only had to return to Cizhou’s territory, and Qi Zhuyin would be able to head north and launch a direct assault on Cizhou on the grounds of eliminating the rebel forces.

Therefore, Shen Zechuan was in no hurry to get rid of King Yi of Fanzhou. He wanted King Yi to be the mountain that straddled between him and Qidong. However, he could not allow King Yi to expand unchecked either.

“I once made a proposal for the Vice Commander to take down Fanzhou swiftly, but it’s no longer a good time now.” The tea in Yao Wenyu’s palm had cooled. He continued, “If the Vice Commander wants to keep King Yi going, then you have to first hack off the hand he is reaching out to the north with.”

“A few months ago,” Shen Zechuan’s eyes were clear. “Lei Jingzhe was sent back to Mount Luo by Ce’an, where he became the target of public censure and could no longer command the bandits, resulting in chaos on Mount Luo as the various internal factions turned against one another. Now that King Yi wants to form an alliance with Mount Luo, Lei Jingzhe, who wholeheartedly wants to stage a comeback, will not miss this opportunity.”

Something stirred in Yao Wenyu’s eyes. He said, “Vice Commander means to...”

Shen Zechuan suddenly opened his folding fan and partially covered his face. With a smile in his eyes, he slowly said, “I’m going to give him a helping hand.”

The wind had picked up outside the window; it looked like it was about to rain again.

Han Jin gouged away at the walls until his ten fingers were scraped bare. He had been in the Cizhou prison for close to three months, and he had gotten so emaciated he was barely recognizable. What’s more, he still had to put up with verbal abuse and insults from the others. At first, he could not stand it, and he would even cry himself a river, but as time passed, he gradually grew numb.

“Mealtime.” Carrying a tub in hand, the warden knocked on the cell doors one at a time with a wooden spoon and hollered, “It’s mealtime!”

They were adept at this and could swiftly dish out the broth and rice, filling the bowl to the brim without missing a drop. On hearing his voice, Han Jin hurried over to the cell door and reached out for the bowl.

Unexpectedly, the warden passing by behind kicked the bowl over, sending the mixture of rice and broth spilling all over the ground.

Han Jin was so hungry he was having gastric pains. He kneeled and pinched up the rice on the ground with his fingers and desperately shoved them into his mouth. There were grains of sand and gravel among the rice, which made his teeth ache as he chomped down on them. He pressed his head against the cell door and reached into his mouth with his dirty hand to dig out the stones.

As he was doing so, he suddenly saw a pair of legs stopping at the other end of the cell door.

Han Jin carefully lifted his eyes and looked out evasively.

Gao Zhongxiong, who had initially meant to come and take a look at his former master, never expected Han Jin to be reduced to such a state.

Han Jin was Han Cheng's younger brother, and he could be said to have been a free-spirited young master in Qudu. He succeeded Xi Gu'an as the viceroy of the Eight Great Training Divisions, and he had also been there in person during the public ditches case and gone into the waters. At that time, he had great respect for Xiao Chiye.

Gao Zhongxiong felt a lump in his throat. There were several times he wanted to open his mouth and speak, but words failed him.

Han Jin looked blankly at Gao Zhongxiong, then abruptly pounced over to grab the bars and ask in a tearful voice, "Is my elder brother here? Tell me, has my elder brother come?"

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 160 : RUMOR

Translated with: Jia<3

Shocked by Han Jin, Gao Zhongxiong took a couple of steps back and bumped into the bars behind him.

Han Jin could not even stand the mosquito bites when he marched to war, much less endure the dirty conditions in prison; it was very much against his will to end up in such a plight. When he saw Gao Zhongxiong's expression, he could not help but burst out wailing, "You treacherous man! It's all your fault I'm in this state!"

Gao Zhongxiong dared not respond and stuck close to the bars as he headed for the entrance.

Feeling his hatred rise, Han Jin launched into a torrent of abuses. "You threw in your lot with traitor Shen. How shameless! You disloyal, turncoat slave who panders to a traitor!<sup>1</sup> Gao Zhongxiong, you're just a wretched soul with nobody to turn to! Don't go, come back, you..."

Gao Zhongxiong cut a sorry figure as he pushed the prison door open and shook off that relentless, haunting voice behind him. Outside, the chilly wind blew his entire back cold. The literati cherished their reputation. Who didn't want to go down in history as an honorable scholar untainted by political ills?<sup>2</sup> The words 'disloyal, turncoat slave' dealt such a hard blow to Gao Zhongxiong that he almost could not get back up on his feet. He had tens of thousands of grievances pent up in his chest with nowhere to vent, and they eventually amassed into a wave of nausea so overwhelming that he grabbed at the wall and threw up.

Gao Zhongxiong threw up everything he had consumed that day, puking until he had a case of acid reflux. He leaned against the wall, gradually sliding into a sitting position on the ground. As he gazed towards the vast sky, he thought of his elders back in Yuzhou. He wiped his mouth with a handkerchief, but the tears would not stop streaming down his cheeks, so he wiped them with his sleeve instead. Eventually, he hugged his arms, rolled over to curl up in a corner, and cried while trying to suppress it.

Who would be willing to give up his dignity and bow to power for a pittance?

Not Gao Zhongxiong. But without this pittance, he would die. In order to seek a way out for himself, he even cast aside his sensibilities. If someone were to tell him five years ago that he would bow obsequiously to a yamen runner for the sake of being a lesser functionary in the future, he would rather die. But he had not only done that now; he was even willing to learn to flatter others for petty gains.

An unspecified amount of time later, Gao Zhongxiong got up, tidied himself, and edged along the wall as he made his way outside. As he passed by the yamen, he had the sense that the whisperings around him were directed at him, but he did not seem to feel a thing. Like what Yao Wenyu had said, the past was but a dream. He had woken up too.

“This humble one is Gao Zhongxiong, and my humble courtesy name is Shenwei.” Gao Zhongxiong strode into the yamen and bowed as he said to the others. “It is on the personal recommendation of the Vice Commander that this humble one has come to offer my writing skills for the yamen’s use. In the future, this humble one shall be responsible for drafting up all the official proclamations and public notices the yamen needs.”

In the twinkling of an eye, it was already the end of the eighth month. Kong Ling and Yu Xiaozai had returned from their trip to Huaizhou. The discussion in Huaizhou had gone smoothly. The only odd thing was that when they passed by Luoxia Pass on the way back, they found the attitude of the Luoxia Pass’s Commandant loaded with subtleties; it was far more agreeable than it had been when they passed through on their way to Huaizhou.

“That Commandant from Luoxia Pass...” Yu Xiaozai said, “was trying to dig for information on our Vice Commander. He made several inquiries on the Vice Commander’s marriage.”

“He couldn’t be trying to play matchmaker for the Vice Commander, could he?” Zhou Gui thought of Xiao Chiye and hurriedly asked, “Then, how did you answer?”

“I initially wanted to answer that the Vice Commander already has a spouse.” Yu Xiaozai had darkened a lot on this trip. “But Chengfeng advised me not to, so I just replied that he was still unmarried.”

Both of them did not understand, but Kong Ling was a discerning and insightful man. He had heard that the Hereditary Prince’s Consort of Libei had come to Cizhou, so he paid special attention to Luoxia Pass’s attitude on their return trip. He knew very well the reason for the change in their attitude. No doubt Libei had reached out to them in advance, wanting to understand Shen Zechuan through them—he just did not know if it was the Prince or the Hereditary Prince.

Kong Ling picked up the tea and said, “The Vice Commander isn’t married to begin with. It’s better to say it as it is when it comes to this matter, lest it provides others with grounds for gossip and leads to misunderstandings.”

Zhou Gui was just about to speak to Kong Ling about the screening of the functionaries from the last time when Qiao Tianya lifted the curtains. They rose to greet in unison, “Vice Commander.”

It was raining outside, and Shen Zechuan had walked all the way over from his residence. Even if he had an umbrella, it was inevitable for him to get wet. On the contrary, Yao Wenyu was all securely bundled up as he was pushed in. The only thing was that he was too thin, and even when he sat in the wheelchair, he did not feel like a living being. Gao Zhongxiong came in last after them. He was dressed very simply, with a pile of books in his arms and half of his shoulder wet.

“Gentlemen, please take a seat.” Shen Zechuan settled into his seat and wiped away the water droplets on his hand with his handkerchief. “It has been hard on Mister Chengfeng and Youjing on this long trip. There’s no need to be in a hurry to return to duty these few days. Take a break.”

Kong Ling and Yu Xiaozai said their thanks in succession.

“Shenwei, do sit too. There’s no need to be formal.” Shen Zechuan lifted a palm to motion to Gao Zhongxiong. At the same time, he said to Kong Ling, “This is Shenwei, a new subordinate of mine who specializes in writing. He is presently gaining experience in the yamen, and there are still plenty of many matters on which he will need Mister Chengfeng’s guidance on.”

Kong Ling politely and humbly played down the accolade and sized up Gao Zhongxiong. Gao Zhongxiong had secured his hair up in a simple bun today. As he had to move around in the yamen for the whole day now, efficiency had taken precedence over everything else, and so he no longer looked so much like a scholar.

Gao Zhongxiong set down the books and bowed to Kong Ling in a greeting. “I’ve long heard much of Mister Chengfeng’s reputation. It’s an honor to meet you.”

Kong Ling rose to his feet and returned the greeting.

Shen Zechuan waited until they each took their respective seats before saying, "With things going smoothly in Huaizhou and Chazhou, everyone can have a good year this year. The functionaries to survey the fields have already been sent down. To ensure the accuracy of the acreage, there will be two more checks carried out after. By the time this is done, it will be the end of the year, but the good thing is that we can finish the surveyance in time for this year. Now that the recording of registrations is done, the moving of Cizhou's autumn harvest into the granaries is completed too. As soon as the snow falls, we should discuss the allocation of lands."

Yao Wenyu spoke up just then, "In the past, the land taxes and levies in Qudu were all paid in kind. After the grain was collected and put into storage at the granaries, it was manually audited and converted by people. The labor costs of the transport office also had to be apportioned among them, so it might not necessarily be accurate. We are now in Cizhou, and we can dispense with the escort and transportation of grains. But to increase the expenses for the upkeep of the granary, the most appropriate way to collect silver would be to combine the miscellaneous taxes."

"The trading of grains is not a long-term endeavor either." Kong Ling said, "Once Chazhou is done with the reorganization this year, they can start tilling their lands at the beginning of spring next year. If they can get through it, it will be a bumper harvest for them, and they will no longer need to do business with us."

"Wouldn't the other four prefectures need it?" Yu Xiaozai was not as familiar with the situation in Zhongbo as the rest of them. "Seems to me that King Yi won't be in the running for long. The two prefectures of Fanzhou and Dengzhou are so poor that the people are turning against each other, yet he's still bestowing awards and conferring titles on a motley crew of ministers for his court. If we aren't doing business with Chazhou, we can do it with them."

The others laughed.

Shen Zechuan said, "Youjing is truly from the Chief Surveillance Bureau."

Seeing as Yu Xiaozai did not comprehend, Kong Ling said, "When you see others conducting themselves with such behavior, you think about impeachment, forgetting that they're impoverished to the extent that they'd turn against one another. So how would they have the money to buy grains from us?"

"Human trafficking is rampant in Fanzhou, and traffickers are running amuck all around. If we have them purchase the grains, they might even use children to barter. These people are incorrigible!" It filled Zhou Gui with contempt just to bring up this subject.

"This is something that has to be combated, but the source is still at Mount Luo. As for King Yi, he can't die no matter what." Yao Wenyu relaxed a little and revealed a smile. "He is currently our barrier in the south. Without him, we will come face to face with Qi Zhuyin."

"Speaking of Qi Zhuyin." Yu Xiaozai rolled up his sleeves slightly. "This reminds me of Qi Shiyu. I heard some news. During the wedding ceremony when Third Missy Hua married over, the Old Commander saw what an unparalleled beauty his new wife was, and in a moment of happiness, he collapsed."

Zhou Gui was stunned. "Collapsed?"

Yu Xiaozai continued, "He had a stroke!"

Whether Qi Shiyu had a genuine stroke or a bogus one, this incident made it clear that he would not be sharing a room with Hua Xiangyi. The Empress Dowager got the in-laws relationship she wanted with Qidong, but she had no way to take it any further. If Hua Xiangyi did not beget an heir, Qi Zhuyin would retain her position as the commander-in-chief. With her stepmother in her hands, she had every reason to suppress and hold her other brothers in check.

"Man proposes, God disposes." Zhou Gui lamented. "It's fortunate that Qi Zhuyin is not a man."

They laughed and chatted about something else. Kong Ling and Yu Xiaozai had only just returned today, so Shen Zechuan could not really let them sit and chat the entire night. At around the hour of chou, he dismissed them.

Zhou Gui personally saw Kong Ling back to his courtyard and gave him a brief and concise account of the screening incident on their way over. Finally, he said. "We executed an advisor who took bribes and kept the peace in the yamen until now. But rumors keep popping up recently, saying that the Vice Commander came to Cizhou to coerce me. Can you believe this? Alas, I can't eat or sleep well these few days, worried that these words will make their way to the Vice Commander's ears and cause misunderstandings between us."

Kong Ling held the umbrella and said, "I reminded you a long time ago that the address of 'prefectural prefect' should be done away with. If this matter had played out before someone who is oversuspicious and distrustful by nature, you and I would have long lost the trust of the Vice Commander."

"But I," Zhou Gui said anxiously, "don't know what to change it to!"

"It doesn't matter what you change it to. What's important is the attitude." Kong Ling tilted the umbrella to allow Zhou Gui to raise up the lantern. "Cizhou has already established itself. Naturally, it can no longer leave this matter ambiguous. You may not intend it that way, but you won't be able to hold up against repeated rumors, so distinguish between master and subordinate clearly as soon as possible and make it clear to the others as well that Cizhou has already changed masters."

During their discussion, both men had already gone up the steps. The attendants followed behind them. Before Kong Ling stepped onto the walkway, he looked back and motioned for them to slow down and not to follow too close.

"It's not appropriate to call him the Provincial Administration Commissioner, and it's not appropriate to call him the Viceroy either. Think of one for me." Zhou Gui said after him. "And I can get it settled tomorrow morning."

"Those are all titles designated by Qudu; of course, they aren't appropriate." Kong Ling could not think of one at such short notice either. He stood for a moment, then said with a headache, "Shen Wei was the Prince of Jianxing, but he has been stripped of his noble rank and title. We mustn't allow this relationship to be associated with the Vice Commander anymore."

Both men stood side by side in the chilly night, with the wind rustling past their clothes. It was so freezing that both men shivered simultaneously. Kong Ling was tired and cold, and so he chased Zhou Gui off. "Go back and think of one yourself."

Two days later, Zhou Gui submitted a document with the request to change "Vice Commander" to "Prefectural Lord".<sup>3</sup> He initially meant to address him as "Lord Shen", but the word Shen was associated with Shen

Wei, so it was revised to the “prefectural” in “prefectural prefect”. The word ‘prefectural’ was flexible; it could progress in tiers according to their future expansion in the region, making it convenient to make changes again. This was the first time Cizhou explicitly recognized Shen Zechuan as the one who reigned supreme in Cizhou. Meanwhile, Zhou Gui demoted himself back into his original position and became a subordinate of Shen Zechuan.

Once this matter was made public, King Yi of Fanzhou was the first one to get anxious. He repeatedly issued several notices angrily denouncing Zhou Gui for defecting to the traitor. But Cizhou now had Gao Zhongxiong, an eloquent writer of quick wit and great speed who could twist the narrative in their favor. At the same time he condemned King Yi for his heartlessness in disregarding the lives and deaths of the commoners in Fanzhou by carrying out wasteful large scale construction of extravagant buildings for his enjoyment, he also composed a ballad for distribution to the four prefectures east of Zhongbo, singing the story of how Shen Zechuan had traveled thousands of li to deliver grains but had instead gotten injured, so much that it moved all the listeners to tears. The more that rumor spread, the more exaggerated it became. By the time it reached Xiao Fangxu’s ears, it had already become “seriously wounded” and “almost broke an arm”.

Xiao Fangxu got a fright and went to grab up a diligent Xiao Chiye in the middle of the night to ask, “He broke an arm?”

Xiao Chiye, who had been continuously running errands for half a month, had only just fallen asleep when his old man yanked him up. He was still half-asleep, so Xiao Fangxu shook him and asked his question again.

Annoyed by the shaking, Xiao Chiye asked in a hoarse voice, “Who, who broke an arm?”

Xiao Fangxu said, “Shen Zechuan!”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 三姓家奴 literally, a slave with three surnames. The term originates from the Romance of the Three Kingdoms 《三国演义》

and refers specifically to Lu Bu. It's used mockingly to refer to capricious, disloyal and unrighteous people who serve traitors (以身侍贼)

2. 清流 renowned and unsullied scholars who were concerned with politics but held themselves aloof from those in power, i.e., political outsiders (e.g., members of the Donglin Clique in the late Ming Dynasty)

3. 府君 literally magistrate of a prefecture, also used to refer to 太守 or 知府 so this term can also be translated as Prefectural Magistrate, Prefectural Governor, or Prefectural Prefect.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 161 : SUNSET GLOW

Translated with: Jia<3

Xiao Chiye felt as though he had been doused with a bucket of icy water that not only sober him up but also caused his hairs to stand on end. He sat up and stared at Xiao Fangxu for a moment, yet his mind was blank. It was as if he had been punched so hard by someone that even the insides of his chest cavity were a rotten mess. He abruptly pushed Xiao Fangxu aside and got off the couch to put on his boots. But he knocked against the corner of the table and almost couldn't get up. Where in the hell were those damn boots?

Chen Yang and Gu Jin were initially standing outside the tent to keep watch for the night when they heard the sound of the flap being lifted and saw Xiao Chiye stumbling out like a wandering soul with one foot stepping down on the back of a boot and the other stepping on the ground. He did not even have his outer robes on as he went over to undo Lang Tao Xue Jin's reins.

Gu Jin was the quickest to react. He strode a step out to tug at the reins and called out in an urgent voice, "Master!"

Chen Yang followed closely behind, intending to head inside to look for his robes and boots.

Xiao Fangxu bent over to step outside and asked in puzzlement, "You didn't know? Didn't this happen a long time ago? When he went to Chazhou."

Chen Yang observed Xiao Fangxu's expression, and realization suddenly dawned on him. He slapped his forehead and turned around to shout, "Chazhou! Master, it's Chazhou! Young Master is fine!"

These shouts were so strikingly loud that they shocked Xiao Chiye's startled soul back into his body. He turned around and made a beeline for Xiao Fangxu, so agitated that his eyes had gone red. When he came to Xiao Fangxu, he spun around on the spot once before he finally wiped at his face and said, "Good grief, father dearest!"

The scabs on Shen Zechuan's palm had fallen off, leaving only a scar behind.

As soon as the eighth month passed, the rain in Cizhou ceased. The frost intensified, and the weather grew even colder. Yao Wenyu, having caught a cold in recent days, remained indoors with the hand warmer in hand and rarely ventured outdoors. Shen Zechuan still had Fei Sheng following him around. Contrary to expectations, Li Xiong hardly mentioned Lei Jingzhe again.

"Is Han Jin still in prison?" Shen Zechuan drank his medicine and asked Fei Sheng as he stood by the window.

Fei Sheng answered, "He's still there. Master is benevolent not to kill him, yet he keeps raising a hue and cry the whole day without so much a sign of repentance."

Shen Zechuan gripped the porcelain bowl in his hand and looked at the pattern for a while before he said, "He's Han Cheng's younger brother."

Fei Sheng lowered his eyes for no reason and shivered.

Han Cheng executed Qi Huilian right there on the streets. Based on what Fei Sheng had figured out regarding Shen Zechuan's temper, the reason Shen Zechuan had kept Han Jin alive without killing him was not to coerce Qudu at all, but to retain him for a bigger purpose. Fei Sheng did not dare to guess. He had no wish to guess either. As a guard, he was Shen Zechuan's dagger. Shen Zechuan's wish was his command.

Shen Zechuan raised his eyes and looked out of the window at the cold rays of sunlight on the ground, which left trails of tear stains through the frost. He let out an inexplicable smile and said, "Release him."

Fei Sheng acknowledged the order.

Shen Zechuan added, "Get him a bath and a change of clothes, then give him a meal and a soft couch. There is no need for him to do anything. Just let him play to his heart's content."

Fei Sheng did not dare to object and merely uttered his acknowledgment again before taking his leave. The moment he left, Qiao Tianya lifted the curtain and entered.

"Letter from Libei." Qiao Tianya set the letter on Shen Zechuan's table. "It was sent posthaste. Must be something Master needs to be informed of."

"Is Yuanzhuo doing better?" Shen Zechuan asked as he opened the letter.

Before Qiao Tianya could answer, he saw Shen Zechuan's stunned expression as he reread the letter several times.

"It's about the frontier trade market in winter." Shen Zechuan paused for a moment. "I'm going to the battlegrounds in person to have a face-to-face discussion with the Prince of Libei."

The weather in Libei was capricious. The remaining clear, sunny weather of autumn was few and far between, but once it made its appearance, it would get so hot that it made one want to strip.

Xiao Chiye returned to the battleground again at the end of the eighth month and did not leave again for the time being. After that defeat, he had never taken a break. Whether it was to head north to transport military supplies, or going west to contact Dajing, he was the one who led his men to make the trips. It was as if his rough edges had been completely tempered down by Xiao Fangxu to the point that he was starting to willingly serve as a young general in charge of military supplies.

When Chen Yang went to fetch water, he saw Xiao Chiye standing on the withered and yellow grassland training a horse. The keyword was training, but in truth, Xiao Chiye was a lot more gentle. That horse, snow-white all over with a patch of black on its chest, was the horse Lu Yizhi wanted to keep for Xiao Chiye's wife. When Xiao Chiye had been running errands for the last month, he brought it out with him, wanting to tame it himself.

Xiao Fangxu rode his horse over from the other end, and Meng came swooping down in the wind and brushed past Xiao Fangxu with a "swoosh". Then it took off again along the grass and soared into the air, where it spun around once before flying away.

Xiao Fangxu dismounted and threw the reins to the deputy general behind him. He took off his helmet, spat out the dust in his mouth, and narrowed his eyes to look at Xiao Chiye. After a while, he removed his heavy armor and took off the saddle on the back of his horse. He then flipped atop it once more and beckoned to Xiao Chiye from a distance away.

Zuo Qianqiu leaned over the railing, his white hair fluttering in the wind as he watched father and son side by side. Wu Ziyu ran a few steps closer and stepped up the railing to straddle over it. Behind him, the Libei

Armored Cavalry and Imperial Army came up and crowded around them on this side of the railing so closely that they were all packed like sardines.

It was so squeezed that Tantai Hu could not free his hands, so he craned his neck and yelled, "What's this about?!"

Wu Ziyu held up a steamed bun and shouted at the top of his hoarse voice over the din, "If the Second Young Master wins today, the convoy squad will be the champions this month! They will even have to give us two more scoops for our meals!"

On seeing this, Zuo Qianqiu said with a laugh, "It will take a few years more before A-Ye will defeat his old man."

"The Second Young Master will not let us down!" Tantai Hu shouted defiantly as he wiped the sweat that had trickled down onto his cheek. It was so scorching hot that his face was tanned and flushed.

Zuo Qianqiu asked, "What if His Lordship wins?"

Chen Yang was just about to say something when he heard Tantai Hu say in a booming voice, "Then we will run along the grassland and bark as we run—"

Wu Ziyu and Gu Jin, who were behind him, promptly leaped up to shut his mouth up.

Zuo Qianqiu did not let the opportunity slip. "Fine! A-Ye, you heard that? If you lose to your father today, your whole squad will have to go woof woof!"

Xiao Chiye lifted his finger and whistled, and Lang Tao Xue Jin circled over to his side. He mounted the horse and asked Xiao Fangxu, "Where to?"

Xiao Fangxu seemed hesitant as he parroted, "Where to..."

Before the words had fully left his mouth, he had already spurred his horse on ahead.

The Imperial Army booed in unison. Tantai Hu struggled to free his mouth and exclaimed, "How can His Lordship cheat?!"

Lang Tao Xue Jin shot forward like a black arrow leaving the bowstring, and the wind started rustling in an instant. The sun in the clear skies on the horizon was blinding, and the back views of father and son as they rode their horse were almost identical. Meng suddenly broke through the clouds and went all out to chase after them, sticking closely right behind Xiao Chiye as it looked down upon that pair of arrows, one in front and one at the back. Blades of grass went flying all over as horses' hooves trampled over them, while the wind stirred up the endless expanse of luxuriant grass, sending them swaying in one direction. They rode amidst it, like a duo of big and small stars shooting into the waves of the ocean, leaving a long trail in their wake among the grasslands.

Xiao Chiye gazed at Xiao Fangxu's back as he listened to the souging of the wind.

Xiao Fangxu was not old yet. How could he be old? He looked so robust and strong, no different than he had been twenty years ago. As long as he raised both arms, he could lift both sons, laughing on the grasslands as he tossed them in turn until they cried.

Xiao Chiye gradually caught up to him. Lang Tao Xue Jin was far more sturdy and younger than that horse beneath Xiao Fangxu. It charged forth, full of vigor, its eyes staring fixedly ahead as if nothing could stop it.

Gradually, both men came to ride neck to neck with one another, both riding until they were drenched in sweat. The sun blazed overhead, searing their backs. This was perhaps the last sunny sky with a scorching sun in Libei this year.

There was a stone monument at the finishing point, with the names of the Libei Armored Cavalry who had died in battle the past year engraved on it, along with the falcons that had fallen with them and the battle steeds that had carried them. At the very last moment when father and son were about to reach, Meng beat them to it and darted over. It circled once before landing on the stone monument, thereby winning first place.

"The falcon is mine." Xiao Chiye slowed down and said, "So I win."

"The land is mine." Xiao Fangxu came to a stop and turned around to face Xiao Chiye while pointing at his feet. "I was here 800 years earlier than you."

Xiao Chiye apathetically ignored this statement.

They dismounted. The sun was already on its downward descent in the west. Xiao Fangxu headed up the stone steps and stood before the stone monument, then reached out to wipe away the dust on it. The wind was strong here. It sent his hair fluttering and tousled up the hair on his temples, revealing some streaks of white. He said, "Herein lie my brothers."

Xiao Chiye came up behind him and stood beside Xiao Fangxu.

"Ten years ago, I brought your eldest brother here." Xiao Fangxu pointed at a certain spot. "There was a lad here by the rather unique name of Suining. He was the same age as your brother."

Old names on this stone monument would be scrapped off every year and filled in with new ones. This signified that generation after generation of the Libei Armored Cavalry all existed here, and it also signified that generation after generation of the Libei Armored Cavalry had vanished here. It was here the stone monument, with its back to the Hongyan Mountains, lay in eternal rest. They were the wind of the Hongyan Mountains, and at the same time, the stars of the Hongyan Mountains.

“I want to be here.” Xiao Chiye pointed in the center. “The place is big, the location is good, and you can look far out into the distance.”

“That’s my spot.” Xiao Fangxu said pettily. “I want all the spots here.”

“What about my mother?” Xiao Chiye turned his head aside to scrutinize Xiao Fangxu. “You left her alone in Dajing.”

Xiao Fangxu didn’t respond. He gazed past the stone monument to look at the Hongyan Mountains. Then, as if dazzled by the setting sun, he turned around and looked in the direction of Dajing. He could barely open his eyes from the wind. “We can look at each other from afar, eyes to eyes—forever.”

Xiao Chiye followed his gaze and looked over.

“It is here we are born, and it is here we will die worthy deaths. People from Libei lie on the mountains and rivers with their faces to the blazing sun. Men or women, the bones on which the sun shines are all unyielding heroes.” Xiao Fangxu opened up his palm, and the wind burst past his palm so softly it felt like the long hair of his wife. This was the only indulgence he had allowed himself in the past decades. “One day, I will return to her embrace.”

Xiao Chiye looked at the waves of billowing grass at the other end; it was like a never-ending torrent. The so-called sorrow of parting and joy of reunions of every single person out there was merely a fleeting moment in the timelessness of the universe. In just the blink of an eye, it would disintegrate, and from then on, all would be silent, every vestige of it gone.

An encounter was truly a very precious thing.

Xiao Fangxu turned around and threw Xiao Chiye a punch, then lifted his arms to give Xiao Chiye a tight hug. But very quickly, he let go and said, “You still need a good several years before you can surpass me!”

“Who knows?” Xiao Chiye patted his own chest to hint at his height.

Xiao Fangxu took a few steps and made as if to pick something off the ground. Having horse dung flung at him had left a shadow over Xiao Chiye's heart, and so he promptly turned around and ran. The moment he ran, Xiao Fangxu burst out laughing.

The wind was still blowing as the father and son made their way back, bathed in the evening glow of the setting sun.

Dusk was not yet over. As Xiao Chiye was drenched in sweat all over, he stripped off his upper garments and stood in the river to bathe. The surface of the water shimmered. As he poured water using the wooden bucket, dancing ripples of golden light covered the muscles on his entire back.

Xiao Chiye bent over and rinsed his arm guard in the water. The quality iron had been smashed to the point it was no longer usable, but he still did not have it changed. When he took it out of the water, he ripped away the badly worn dogskin rope on it and turned around to say, "Hand me the—"

A travel-worn Shen Zechuan stood on the slope by the riverside, the sunset glow spilling over the hems of his robe with bits of grass on it.

Xiao Chiye missed him so much.

And here he stood before Xiao Chiye at the very moment the last rays of the setting sun faded away.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Credits: Many thanks to Tea for proofreading!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 162 : FRONTIER TRADE MARKET

Translated with: Jia<3

The dark blue dome of heaven lay out in a spread behind Shen Zechuan. He lifted his arms to remove his overcoat, exposing the earring on his right ear as he moved. His sleeves slid down to reveal the secured, snow-white sleeves of his inner garment underneath. He was just like a white bird stopping for a rest in this still and silent world, commanding all of Xiao Chiye's attention in just a matter of an instant.

Xiao Chiye did not blink. As he watched Shen Zechuan descend the slope in a few steps, he subconsciously opened his arms. The impact when Shen Zechuan rushed into him sent him half a step back, but at the same time, he took all of this white bird into his bosom, embracing him in a tight hug.

The swift, running waters of the river crashed into both of their legs, sending up sprays of water.

"You scared me," Recovering from his astonishment, Xiao Chiye abruptly lifted Shen Zechuan high and laughed as he looked up, "falling out of the sky the way you did!"

Shen Zechuan was a little short on breath as he said, "I'm here for an inspection."

Xiao Chiye lifted his palm to touch Shen Zechuan's cheek, then covered the back of Shen Zechuan's head with it and held him down for a kiss. Dusk closed in on them on all sides, their lips a scenic scene under the dimness. Shen Zechuan's palms slid up to cup both of Xiao Chiye's cheeks as he responded to him passionately.

The shimmer of water on the river surface disappeared, and the subsequent, pervading darkness of the night blurred the boundary between heaven and earth. They clung close together ever so intimately, unbosoming themselves of their fervent longing. Xiao Chiye kissed him so hard that Shen Zechuan could not help but suck in a breath when they parted and licked the spot that was nearly torn by his bites.

"Go ahead and inspect." Xiao Chiye laughed. "Come on. I've already stripped for you to inspect all you want."

Shen Zechuan put up his arms over Xiao Chiye's shoulders and tapped on Xiao Chiye's sturdy back with his dangling folding fan. "I disappeared without a trace the moment I got off the horse carriage. His Lordship has yet to meet me yet. I'll inspect you tonight."

"Ohhh." Xiao Chiye dragged out the word and said with displeasure as he continued to hug him in this posture, "So you're here to see my father."

Shen Zechuan swung the folding fan between his fingers and said, "That's something I have to do in passing while I'm at it. My heart is all here."

Xiao Chiye waded through the river and carried Shen Zechuan towards the riverbank. "I don't believe you."

Shen Zechuan felt that Xiao Chiye looked too dashing like this. When he landed on the ground, he leaned over to scrutinize him, so Xiao Chiye raised his arm and pressed against Shen Zechuan's forehead to put a little more distance between them.

"You should have seized the chance while you had it." Xiao Chiye picked up his clothes and said, "That's all I'm showing you."

Shen Zechuan teased him, "I'm leaving then?"

Xiao Chiye put on his robe and tilted his head up slightly to say, "Go ahead."

Shen Zechuan nodded in understanding and took a few steps backward. Seeing no movement from Xiao Chiye, he turned around for real. But who knew? Even before he had the chance to stride a step forward the moment he turned around, Xiao Chiye lifted him back and covered his head to kiss him until his waist went numb.

This wide robe that cloaked him was filled with Xiao Chiye's scent all over, the coolness and refreshingness of which engulfed Shen Zechuan whole. In that meager film of darkness, he revealed his avaricious nature, breathing hotly to seduce Xiao Chiye before he finally said into Xiao Chiye's ear, "Your. Father. Is. Coming."

The group of well-intentioned guards who had been squatting behind the slope started to cough violently in unison.

Xiao Chiye pulled back from the brink right in the nick of time and tore off the robe in a fit of pique.

Xiao Fangxu had long known that Shen Zechuan was here, but he did not communicate this to Xiao Chiye. At present, there were plenty of people in the military tent. The commanding generals from Changzhu camp, Sha'er camp, and the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang were all present and were in the midst of discussing the news from Dajing.

"If the Biansha troops don't withdraw, this battle will no doubt last until winter." The commanding general of the Sha'er camp was called Jiang Sheng, who had been wounded some days back; his shoulders were still bandaged with gauze. He said, "If we are still going to keep up with the fight like this in winter, then the few battalions in the frontline will need to consider deploying more military craftsmen. Otherwise, we won't be able to make it in time if we simply rely on the convoy squad to make the deliveries back and forth when the wear and tear of the equipment gets too severe."

"Deploying more military craftsmen is an option." Zuo Qianqiu warmed himself by the fire and said, "but the need for military provisions will increase as well. If we transfer all the people from Dajing to the frontline, there will be no one back at home to cultivate the fields at the beginning of spring next year."

Now that Libei had lost the granaries in Juexi, its military provisions in the future were cut by half. They all had to rely on the military fields in Libei to survive. This was a matter that pertained to their success or failure on the battlefields.

"As the Hereditary Prince suggested," Zhao Hui said, "Building a new supply camp behind Sha'er camp will allow us to mutually guard and assist the Bianbo camp to the south, as well as meet the needs of the battlefields even faster than before. In times of emergency during the war, the territory can scrimp and save to supply the frontline."

"Winter is right around the corner, and the coats have yet to be distributed." Jiang Sheng knew everyone was in a difficult position, so it would not do for him to go too far with his words. He frowned worriedly in silence for a moment. "The Hereditary Prince's Consort is leading the old and weak, women and children to hasten production for the winter coats back in Dajing, and even the cotton used to make them was given to us by Luoxia Pass. We are in for a tough time this year. If we can't survive this winter, we can forget about discussing anything for next year."

"You are a veteran general." Xiao Fangxu drank hot milk and said, "So why lose heart? The men on the frontline aren't totally wiped out yet. If it's rough-going for us, it'll be even tougher on the Twelve Tribes of Biansha."

Amu'er has still yet to make it as their Great Lord. There are only six tribes under him that can be truly said to have pledged allegiance to him. The remaining ones merely want to have a share of the spoils and take risks with him. But when it really comes down to the last critical juncture, they might not necessarily be willing to stake it all with him."

"Biansha is gaining so much momentum this year." Zhao Hui said. "They must have come prepared."

"No doubt they have been planning for it for a long time." Zuo Qianqiu turned both of his palms over and pondered it over for a moment before continuing, "In the third year of Xiande, he colluded with others from within and from without to break through the Zhongbo's defenses line. It went all too smoothly that time, giving him a taste of sweet victory. That's why it comes as a surprise now that he's concentrating his attacks on a tough nut like Libei. But from this, we can tell that he is indeed now harboring the intent to invade Dazhou, and he wants to first smash down this side of the wall that is Libei in order not to repeat the same mistake."

"Someone out there is supplying grains to Amu'er." Xiao Fangxu's eyes were sharp and cutting. "Jiming was out of commission after the military provisions case, and Amu'er instantly transferred Hasen north. I don't believe it if you tell me he did not know about it in advance. So we should thank our lucky stars that Qudu did not have Libei's military defense map considering that Amu'er's inside contact is still hiding in Dazhou. A-Ye rebelled at the start of spring this year. Was it a bad thing? No, he did good. If Libei was still under Qudu's control, this battle would no longer be just a matter of worrying over provisions. As the saying goes, it is easy to dodge a spear in the open but hard to ward off an arrow in the dark.<sup>1</sup> It's too dangerous."

"No more eunuchs coming over to inspect the military and breathe down our necks." Jiang Sheng finally smiled a little and said as he shook his head, "This battle is really a comfortable one to fight."

"There are ways to resolve the issue of provisions next year." Xiao Fangxu set down his bowl. "And it's for this specific purpose I've found someone who can offer us a way."

Zuo Qianqiu laughed and rose to his feet. "Alright then. I'll invite this little buddy in."

Wu Ziyu wanted to take a look at Shen Zechuan, but it was inappropriate for him to be too brazen. He followed behind Tantai Hu and asked, "... This's the one?"

Tantai Hu looked back and whispered, "Just address him as 'Young Master' later."

Wu Ziyu saw Shen Zechuan listening to Fei Sheng. He could not tell if Shen Zechuan was happy or not from his side profile, but his entire person was like a brilliantly colored painting just by sitting there alone. His skin was fair, yet his facial features were so ravishing it was enthralling, so much that one dared not shift their eyes away, even though looking at him for too long would inexplicably give one the chills. But this chill was not obvious; it merely ran up one's spine, so cold it gave no indications of its advance. By the time realization dawned, the person would have already subconsciously sensed danger and felt the urge to dodge his cutting brilliance.

Ding Tao shot his mouth off and popped out his head to whisper, "See that jade earring? Our Master polished it personally. Young Master wears it every day."

That jade earring adorned his right ear, and it was still debatable whether Shen Zechuan embellished it or it embellished Shen Zechuan. It was like a needless warning that concealed Xiao Chiye's undisguised possessiveness behind that smoothness, making it clear to all that no one else, other than Xiao Chiye, could touch Shen Zechuan.

Wu Ziyu had only just burrowed his way among them and had still yet to decide what demeanor he should adopt to greet and welcome Shen Zechuan. But seeing as everyone around him looked as they usually did, he did the same as well, his prying gaze warding off by that jade earring.

By the time Shen Zechuan was able to meet Xiao Fangxu, it was already nearly the hour of zi. Chen Yang lifted the flap for him to let him enter.

Xiao Fangxu was initially sitting with his leg propped up, but on seeing the white figure entering, he suddenly sat straight up. But then, he felt he was really being too unnatural, so he attempted to cover it up by propping his hand on his knee to appear more imposing, only to look all the more conspicuous as he looked at Shen Zechuan without so much a smile.

"Sorry to have kept you waiting in the tent for so long." Zuo Qianqiu guided Shen Zechuan. "It's been a tough journey here, hasn't it? Come have a meal with us first. We'll talk as we eat."

With that, he turned his head and signaled to Xiao Fangxu with his eyes.

Xiao Fangxu scrutinized Shen Zechuan. He still remembered this face, but his aura was completely poles apart from the person he had seen one year ago. He thought, well then.

He's truly too damn stunning.

"Sit." Xiao Fangxu said coolly.

Gu Jin served the tea, and Chen Yang brought out the dishes. The meal was simple, consisting of a large bowl of lamb stew, tea blended with fresh milk, piping hot flatbread, and commonly seen cabbages and green vegetables at the frontlines.

Shen Zechuan stared at the spread before him; they clearly overestimated him.

Zuo Qianqiu gestured for Shen Zechuan to dig in. He tore apart the flatbread and said, "There isn't much good stuff here. We wanted to welcome you with a meal, but there isn't much here, so this will have to do. If we can get a truce during the new year, we will surely not put you through such aggrievement when we are back in Dajing."

Shen Zechuan found the word "aggrievement" strange. He was here to discuss the frontier trade market and the use of paths with Xiao Fangxu. Xiao Fangxu was willing to meet him, so no matter how he looked at it, the word "aggrievement" should not be part of the picture at all.

"It's been half a year since we parted. When we met in Qudu the last time, you were not this thin." Zuo Qianqiu said, "Is your shifu well?"

Without putting down his chopsticks, Shen Zechuan nodded in reply. "Shifu has been in good health lately and leads a carefree life in Cizhou. He often misses you. Before I came, he specially instructed me to deliver a letter on his behalf." He then looked back and shouted, "Fei Sheng."

Fei Sheng handed the letter over to Chen Yang. As Zuo Qianqiu and Shen Zechuan exchanged pleasantries for a few moments, Xiao Fangxu sliced the lamb meat with a dagger and said, "Are you here to discuss the trade market with me?"

"That's right." Shen Zechuan replied, "And the matter of the bridle paths as well."

"Access to Libei's bridle paths will not be given for free," Xiao Fangxu placed the sliced lamb meat onto his plate, "It's all good as long as you can afford to pay. However, the mutual trade market is not for external loan.”

“If Your Lordship doesn’t permit external loan of the trade market, it will be left vacant this year.” Shen Zechuan sampled the flatbread before continuing, “The war this year is intense, and the grasslands of the Huiyan Tribe have been commandeered for use by the Hanshe Tribe; they’re now waiting to trade their remaining cattle and sheep for grain at the trade market to get through winter. If the trade market doesn’t open up, then thousands of people will starve to death in the heavy snow.”

“Libei’s willingness to vacate land for the Huiyan Tribe to get through winter is already a magnanimous show of benevolence. They are well aware that we are in a difficult predicament this year.” Xiao Fangxu wiped the dagger clean and looked towards Shen Zechuan. “Do you know what it means to let you have the trade market? It means that your people can shuttle in and out of Libei this winter. It’s currently wartime. What if bandits of Mount Luo who have defected to the Biansha people infiltrate their way in? Dare you bear the consequences then?”

“I dare not,” Shen Zechuan locked eyes with Xiao Fangxu. “That’s why I will eliminate all possibilities of this ‘what if’.”

Xiao Fangxu tossed the dagger into the tray at the side, “I don’t believe that.”

“Then how about I hand the authority to inspect over to Your Lordship?” Shen Zechuan grasped his handkerchief and slowly let out a smile. “Cizhou will provide the grains. As for how to send it over, Libei will have the final say.”

“What do you want in exchange?” Xiao Fangxu asked in a quiet voice. “This transaction is not at all a good deal for you.”

“I want a road in exchange.” Shen Zechuan stretched out his index finger and drew a line in the air. “A commercial trade road that can run through the entire northeastern territories of Dazhou, one that will give Libei and Cizhou the opportunity to establish a long-term relationship with one another.”

Xiao Fangxu did not respond. The flap of the tent on the other side lifted, and Xiao Chiye entered.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 明枪易躲，暗箭难防 it is easier to avoid open attacks but harder to guard against hidden ones.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 163 : BOAT ON RIVER

Translated with: Jia<3

Shen Zechuan's gaze roamed over Xiao Chiye's body, like an imperceptible tease. It lasted merely a split second, so fast that Xiao Chiye could only catch that last modicum of it.

"What benefits will Libei get out of it if I let you use the frontier trade market?" Xiao Fangxu wiped his hands clean. "Libei isn't dependent on the trade road for survival."

"In the past, the noble clans adopted the strategy of befriending distant states while attacking one nearby<sup>1</sup> in order to hold Libei in check. This rendered the southern side of Libei powerless and left Libei isolated and cut off from assistance. I'm now willing to be the link connecting Zhongbo and Libei again, as well as serve as a buffer zone between Libei and Qidong." Shen Zechuan said, "Libei has to fight a protracted war with Biansha, and it'll be too dangerous if it can't be allies with Zhongbo."

Xiao Chiye sat down next to Xiao Fangxu. After Chen Yang presented him with a new pair of chopsticks, he picked up a piece of lamb meat from the plate to eat.

Xiao Fangxu glanced at Xiao Chiye out of the corner of his eye, then looked at Shen Zechuan and said, "You are not the Prince of Jianxing, Shen Wei. Your words still don't carry enough weight to represent the Six Prefectures of Zhongbo. I know you wrestled away Zhou Gui's Cizhou using 'transiting through' as an excuse, and you also subdued Luo Mu's Chazhou into submission under the pretext of 'delivering grains'. But King Yi of the two prefectures of Fanzhou and Dengzhou and the bandits of Mount Luo of the two prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou aren't under your control."

Shen Zechuan already had a scheme in mind. "King Yi is a commoner forced into rebellion by the bandits. The two prefectures of Fanzhou and Dengzhou have less than 30,000 troops. He can't beat the Biansha Cavalry to the east, and he doesn't dare to face up against Qi Zhuyin directly to the south. He can only establish a small imperial court in Fanzhou and attempt to join forces with the bandits from Mount Luo. This person is just like a paper tiger, not significant enough to fear. The bandits of Mount Luo are presently mired in internal strife and torn apart by disunity; they are no longer a threat to Zhongbo. Besides, neither of them will negotiate with Libei. Only Cizhou comes with a sincere heart. Given that the trade route between Huaizhou, Cizhou, and Chazhou has already taken shape, Cizhou is able to bypass Qudu to conduct monetary transactions with Juexi. If Libei so needs, Cizhou can supply the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path.”

Filthy rich!

Xiao Fangxu and Zuo Qianqiu thought at the same time.

To supply the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path was to supply Libei with military provisions. Shen Zechuan’s greatest assets in Juexi lay in the Xi clan’s stores. He had long decided to continue using the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path when he left Qudu. The military provisions case brought the scalping of grains in Juexi to light, but it also allowed Shen Zechuan to lock on to a loophole. Xi Hongxuan was held back by the Hua clan of Dicheng to the north when he had to go through the Hezhou waterways while dealing in grains in the past. But now that Shen Zechuan had Huaizhou, he would be able to purchase grains from Juexi.

“But at the same time,” Shen Zechuan changed the subject. “I hope the newly established garrison troops of the six prefectures can receive guidance from the Libei Armored Cavalry and buy battle steeds from Hongyan Mountains in the future.”

This time, not only Xiao Fangxu turned his gaze to him; even Xiao Chiye did so.

“You want to establish a cavalry too?” Xiao Fangxu’s interest was piqued. “In Zhongbo, along Chashi River?”

Shen Zechuan drank the hot milk to warm himself a little. “Duanzhou needs a cavalry.”

Zhongbo had no grasslands, so the garrisons of the six prefectures of Zhongbo were mainly infantries. However, Zhongbo’s terrains did not enjoy the same natural geographical advantage as Qidong, which had the two checkpoints of Tianfei Watchtower and Suotian Pass for protection. The terrain along Chashi River was a vast, open expanse, and the line of defense Duanzhou set up there could not withstand the repeated assaults of the Biansha Cavalry. Zhongbo had long needed to rebuild the Chashi military defense.

“My elder brother’s name was Ji Mu. He was a Squad Commander in the Duanzhou garrison troops when the troops of Zhongbo suffered a defeat.” Shen Zechuan paused for a moment. “He was familiar with the area along the Chashi River. Like Libei, it’s a wide expanse of flatlands. The defense camps established at that time did not have the beacon towers of the Bianjun Commandery that stretched for tens of thousands of li, nor did they have the falcons reconnaissance of Libei. When they were breached one after another by the Biansha Cavalry, there was no time at all for them to pass on military intelligence.”

This was one of the reasons for the fall of Duanzhou. The public roads’ relay horses could not outrun the Biansha Cavalry, and they were all slaughtered en route to their destinations. With military information delayed in transit, the various cities in the rear could not receive any updates. What greeted them when the cities’ gates were broken down were the Biansha Cavalry’s scimitars right in their faces, and this was followed right after by the massacre of the cities.

Ji Mu had died with a grievance.

All the 40,000 garrison soldiers in the Chashi sinkhole died unjust deaths; they had the determination to die protecting their homes and country, but they never got the opportunity. Heavy snow blanketed the Chashi sinkhole, and from then on, the men of Zhongbo became the stray dogs of Dazhou.

“Duanzhou needs a light cavalry.” Shen Zechuan said firmly. “After the defeat of the troops, the area along Chashi River fell into the hands of the Biansha people, and whatever few were left of the Duanzhou’s defense camps all fell into disuse. To rebuild them, Duanzhou needs an army of light cavalry.”

Xiao Fangxu stroked his chin. “There are plenty of options if you only want a route to pass on military information efficiently. Re-establish a dense cluster of relay stations along Chashi River and repair the bridle paths as soon as possible, and you can be as swift as you want. But if you want an army of light cavalry that can rival the Biansha Cavalry, then Libei can’t help you.”

Zuo Qianqiu nodded and said to Shen Zechuan, “The Biansha Cavalry’s strength lies not only in their speed, but also in how far more adept they are on horseback than any of Dazhou’s soldiers; this is something that not even the Libei Armored Cavalry can compare to.”

“Furthermore, a Duanzhou that relinquishes its defenses is akin to an infant in swaddling clothes.” Through his peripheral vision, Xiao Fangxu watched Xiao Chiye stealthily push that plate of meat with his fingers towards Shen Zechuan. He shifted his foot and stomped on his son’s foot under the table.

Xiao Chiye sucked in a breath and said, “I think it’s... feasible!”

“The hell you know.” Xiao Fangxu reproved.

Xiao Chiye turned his thumb ring around twice. “I actually do know something.”

He looked towards Shen Zechuan again and felt a very subtle itch when their gazes met; Xiao Chiye knew exactly what Shen Zechuan was thinking.

“Why must this light cavalry compare to the Biansha Cavalry? Even if we remove the heavy armors of the Libei Armored Cavalry, we will not achieve the same results as the Biansha Cavalry.” Xiao Chiye felt a little lazy after eating his fill. “Lanzhou still has the Imperial Bodyguards in his command, and using them for information-gathering, data-tracking, and record-taking is too much of a waste. But, as long as you pair the Imperial Bodyguards with the best horses, they’ll have a chance to break through Biansha’s defenses along Chashi River.”

“How many men are there in the Imperial Bodyguards?” Xiao Fangxu scoffed. “Their addition to the battlefield is comparable to a strand of hair on an ox.”

“The Imperial Bodyguard can always be expanded according to their selection criteria if there aren’t enough men. Not only does Lanzhou have the fastest intelligence-gatherers in Dazhou, he also possesses assassins who are the most adept in the art of camouflage.” Xiao Chiye said, “Is having few men a shortcoming? Not always. As a light cavalry of assassins, being small in number is their advantage. Rather than calling them a strand of ox hair, why not call them a piece of steel needle.<sup>2</sup> Use this needle in the right place, and even a vulture will fall.”

Shen Zechuan was inspired by Xiao Jiming’s mode of warfare. If he were to establish camps along the Chashi River that could supply the frontline, then he still lacked a military force that could act as a heavy hammer like the Libei Armored Cavalry. But there was no way the Libei Armored Cavalry could be replicated, so Shen Zechuan swapped the hammer for a steel needle.

Think about it, a sufficiently fortified defense wall that could be built spanning from Dunzhou to Duanzhou. If Shen Zechuan had the infantry shifted behind this wall and transformed into bowmen equipped with additional defensive weapons, then had a troop of light cavalry with eccentric whereabouts placed along the Chashi River, he would possess a bird's eye panoramic view of everything within and beyond the wall. This cavalry – or perhaps it would be more appropriate to call them the assassination squad evolved from the Imperial Bodyguards – would be able to go under disguise; they would remain Shen Zechuan's eyes and ears on the ground.

Silent. And omnipresent.

As long as Shen Zechuan so desired, he would be able to hear everything.

Zuo Qianqiu inwardly sucked in a breath of cold air. Having been stationed in Tianfei Watchtower for so many years, he understood best the stealthiness of assassins such as this. This assumption was enough to give one the chills.

Silence descended upon the tent. Everyone was waiting for Xiao Fangxu to speak. Xiao Fangxu thought for a long time before he said to Shen Zechuan, "You may trade grains for horses, but if you were to succeed in establishing this light cavalry, don't ever let them take a single step into Libei." He pushed the plate away, propped up his arm on the table, and said to Shen Zechuan with a smile, "Or I'll kill them, and kill you."

An imposing aura that was all too substantive came bearing down on him, crushing him. Before Xiao Chiye could get to open his mouth, Shen Zechuan pressed down on his arm. He stood his own against the weight of the alpha wolf's gaze on him and, in that long, endless moment, slowly replied, "Deal."

Xiao Fangxu bent his finger and flicked it at the rim of the bowl, retracting his imposing aura just as freely as he had released it.

When everyone had dispersed, Xiao Fangxu sat by the fire and rotated the dagger to heat it.

"It's still not too late," Zuo Qianqiu sat down, "for regrets."

Light from the flame cast upon the side of Xiao Fangxu's face. He said, "This lad is too dangerous."

“You do know who his teacher is, don’t you?” Zuo Qianqiu soothed him. “What’s more, he’s Ji Gang’s disciple. He’s really not bad at heart.”

“Don’t try to fob me off with that. Even brothers born of the same parents differ from each other. Qi Huilian is not one to keep to his own devices either.” Xiao Fangxu caressed the blade with his thumb. “Cracks abound everywhere in the world. Men like this can’t fight battles, yet they can come out on top to stand upon a mountain of corpses amidst a sea of blood.”

After a long period of silence, Zuo Qianqiu asked, “Then why are you still willing to agree to it?”

Xiao Fangxu looked at that sliding glint of the blade as light from the flame bathed it in red. He examined his own reflection on the blade under the small crackling of the bonfire. Eventually, he said, “My son has himself made into a lock.”

Shen Zechuan undid the clasps on his coat as he faced the candle flame, looking a little weary.

He had not had this kind of feeling for a very long, long time—the sense of setback from being exposed for his bluff.

Shen Zechuan had never told anyone about Duanzhou’s light cavalry, not even Qi Huilian and Xiao Chiye. Many of what he did in the past had their roots in impure motives. As long as he got his hands on it, he would fully exploit it. He called all of those “hypocrisies”, and they were even more atrocious before Xiao Chiye had come into the picture. That was why he could not—dared not tell anyone.

Shen Zechuan loosened his collar, as if he would be able to breathe by doing so.

The sounds of footsteps rang out outside the military tent. Xiao Chiye spoke to the guards, and Shen Zechuan stopped what he was doing when he heard his voice. Just then, Xiao Chiye lifted the flap and entered.

“A-Ye.” Shen Zechuan did not turn around and merely inclined his head slightly to the side as he called out to him.

Xiao Chiye pressed his chest against him from behind.

Shen Zechuan melted under Xiao Chiye’s breathing, and the feeling earlier eased up some. As they nuzzled each other intimately, the temperature gradually rose, so hot was it that they were both sweating. Shen Zechuan breathed out hot air. It was as if Xiao Chiye’s kiss had scalded him. He put on an expression similar to pain, but the corners of his eyes brimmed with pleasure as he indulged and lost himself within.

He was fond of Xiao Chiye's kisses.

Xiao Chiye took hold of both of Shen Zechuan's hands and brought them behind the latter as though he was binding him up. He extinguished the candle, and amid the remaining wisps of white smoke, edged along the nape of that neck where he buried his own despondency.

"Lanzhou." Xiao Chiye savored the word in his mouth.

All of a sudden, the table was swept clean. Shen Zechuan wanted to reach for the edge of the table, but his hands were bound and grasped so tightly by Xiao Chiye. Shen Zechuan tilted his head up until he could see the side of Xiao Chiye's face.

Kiss me.

Shen Zechuan mouthed silently.

But Xiao Chiye did not. He remained where he was a small distance apart and did not move again.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Footnotes

1. 远交近攻 "Befriend a distant state; attack one nearby" from the Thirty-Six Stratagems (三十六计)
2. Strand of hair on an ox = a drop in the ocean; we are sticking to the literal translation to keep the imagery between one thin, soft hair and one stronk steel needle.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 164 : SUNRISE

Translated with: Jia<3

There was clearly only a little distance between them. Xiao Chiye watched Shen Zechuan attentively, his gaze sliding from his brow to his lips as he said in a hoarse voice, “Oh, how I love you so.”

Shen Zechuan felt a shiver rise through him—that was a tremble of defeat. He was like the captured night in the dim light, a pervading darkness that would still entwine Xiao Chiye. The grip on him was too tight, so much so that all that lay in his eyes was fully bared to Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye inched closer in a confrontation that was almost a kiss. He murmured, maliciously and wickedly, “I love you so much.”

Shen Zechuan felt like he was about to be driven astray by Xiao Chiye’s words; this line ended him over and over again. He could not keep up an ounce of pretense, and what remained of “Shen Zechuan” lay fully exposed before Xiao Chiye. This was a side of him that Shen Zechuan himself could not bring himself to face. All that had to do with hypocrisy, deceit, and hostility was swept up into the tidal waves of desire.

Shen Zechuan was panting.

The word ‘love’ signified holding nothing back.

Xiao Chiye made Shen Zechuan’s eyes wet. That feeling of being filled surged through Shen Zechuan’s body while he was pressed against the edge of the table, causing him to cry out softly as he clung on to Xiao Chiye’s warmth without reservations.

Xiao Chiye restrained both of Shen Zechuan’s wrists. Leading up from the curve of his waist was a crescent moon. He seized on the opportunity his height afforded him to press against this lustrous smoothness, thrusting in and out with overwhelming force. It was as though he wanted to nail the words “I love you so much” into Shen Zechuan’s body, and then brand it deep into his bones and blood.

The jade earring was polished until it gleamed with a watery shine.

There were still the sounds of the patrol squad on their rounds outside the military tent, of someone chatting a short distance away, and of the sighing of the wind as it roamed. But all of that belonged to another universe; none of them belonged to Shen Zechuan. He could only hear the table being bumped out of place, the climax of their union, and Xiao Chiye's heartbeat.

Every single thrust spelled "I love you so much."

This was too much to bear for Shen Zechuan; he was about to come undone, be it his voice or another part of him. He trembled, unable to stand firm on his feet, and as his cries unraveled, he extended a finger on his restrained hands to hook it on the hem of Xiao Chiye's clothes.

This one hook melted Xiao Chiye's heart into a puddle of mush.

Xiao Chiye kissed Shen Zechuan on his nape, as though he was holding him in his mouth. He was clearly so fierce, and yet he was also this tender. Shen Zechuan leaned back against Xiao Chiye, intimately joined in unison from the cavity of their chests to every single part of them.

A beautiful line extended from the small of his back, accentuating it.

Xiao Chiye undid the restraints, but Shen Zechuan gave up reaching for the edge of the table. Nothing in this world could be relied on, nothing except Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye murmured something into Shen Zechuan's ear; it was as if he was egging him on, and at the same time, showering him with praises.

Shen Zechuan was the jade.

Xiao Chiye kissed him.

Water droplets fell from the corners of Shen Zechuan's eyes; he closed his eyes, damp with tears, and with all the self-restraint he could muster, he called out in a soft, trembling voice, "A-Ye."

Xiao Chiye buried his face in the side of Shen Zechuan's neck; he was intoxicated, taunted all day by this evil man who called his name as he pleased, his every word an invitation. He dawdled, as if he had woken up from a nap, and naturally responded, "Hm?"

"Ce'an," Shen Zechuan turned his head to face Xiao Chiye, their breaths intertwining. In a show of near innocence, he called out, like a toddler learning to speak, "oh, how I, love, you, so."

Xiao Chiye lost his hold on Shen Zechuan's waist. His mouth was parched as he pulled out with difficulty. He quickly picked his Lanzhou off the ground and took a few steps to the edge of the couch, where he turned him over.

Xiao Chiye pulled up Shen Zechuan's hands and kissed him deeply. They had to do it face-to-face so that they could take in all the worst and the best of each other's expressions into their eyes. Xiao Chiye pushed aside

Shen Zechuan's damp hair. Even their imperfections were congruent with one another. All that was abominable, eccentric, and even ruthless of them could leave no chasm between them.

They entangled intimately in secret, indulging to their hearts' content.

Sweating in never-ending torrents amidst the howling winds on the battlefield.

At the third quarter of the hour of mao, Xiao Chiye carried Shen Zechuan on his back and made his way to the frost-covered grasslands.

"It's taking so long." Shen Zechuan gathered the fur collar around him and buried himself into Xiao Chiye's back. He said in a muffled voice, "Start running."

"Exhausting me to death?" Xiao Chiye jolted him once.

Shen Zechuan grasped the little braid concealed under Xiao Chiye's collar with his fingers and said, "I'm already exhausted to death."

The day was still early, and the eastern mountain ranges blocked some of the views in their field of visions. Both men were covered under the same cloak under the strong wind. Before the day broke, they had already walked out of Shayi camp. There was a small watchtower to the north that had already fallen into disuse, and it was here that Xiao Chiye was heading to.

Both men huddled under the cloak together and sat atop the old watchtower, facing the east as they waited for sunrise.

"I thought you came to propose marriage." Xiao Chiye moved Shen Zechuan's inclined head onto his own shoulder. "I'm getting old from all this waiting."

Shen Zechuan was sensitive to the cold, and the wind was strong. He stretched out half a finger to lift up the overcoat and burrowed his way inside, wanting so much to bury all of himself into Xiao Chiye's bosom to seek refuge from the wind.

"I'll come again when you're eighty." Shen Zechuan said. "By then, your father won't be able to hack me."

Xiao Chiye planted his chin on top of Shen Zechuan's head with the overcoat between them. "At the very least, you're the prefectural lord, so you still ought to possess the audacity to elope." He thought about it, then continued, "The old man does admire you so."

Was the reason Shen Zechuan wanted a light cavalry of assassins truly to place them along the Chashi River? A squad like that required inhuman self-restraint, because they were simply too good to utilize. How long of a preparation time would Shen Zechuan need to put together such a squad? If he went to all the efforts and succeeded, the problem would bring them back to square one—could this squad continue to be placed along the Chashi River? Did Shen Zechuan truly only want to deploy them along the Chashi River? This was a blade that would kill without restraint. It had a darkness that mirrored another side of Shen Zechuan.

If he did not have Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye pulled the cloak down a little to reveal Shen Zechuan and said, “Here it comes.”

With his eyes peeking out, Shen Zechuan looked towards the east. Xiao Chiye lifted him directly by the chin.

Thick clouds rolled on the horizon, while the wind ran rampant amidst the dim world. Shortly afterward, golden rays of light broke through the gaps, like countless arrows of light piercing through the layers of clouds. The sun, which seemed to bear the load of immense weight, launched out from the waves of clouds, pulverizing the floating clouds into foam as it rose magnificently in all its majesty. The vast expanse of grasslands was instantaneously illuminated, igniting the thin frost such that they sparkled as they paved the earth. Withered grass roared to life, its billowy surge in the wind clear and distinct to the ears.

“Xiao Ce’an.” Shen Zechuan inexplicably called out.

Xiao Chiye poked him in the cheek.

Shen Zechuan grabbed hold of his finger, revealing the redness between his wrists. He seemed to be considering something.

Golden waves of brilliant rays rippled out of the sky, and in no time, blue spread out like ink on a piece of rice paper<sup>1</sup> to paint the entire canvas of sky over their head. The vast white snow-capped peaks of Hongyan Mountains stood against the summit of the clouds, where falcons cried out as they hovered. A golden hue washed over Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye in the wind.

The deluge of wind was so swift that Shen Zechuan had the illusion he was about to be blown away.

But Xiao Chiye was like a steady rock shielding him from the back as he gradually moved to grasp his hands in return.

“You can do as your heart desires.” Xiao Chiye whispered into his ear.
“With me here, you will never fall.”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Credits: Many thanks to Tea for proofreading!

Footnotes

1. 宣纸 Xuan paper, or rice paper, is a kind of paper originating in ancient China used for writing and painting. It is renowned for being soft and fine-textured, suitable for conveying the artistic expression of both Chinese calligraphy and painting. Anyway, useless piece of trivia here don't mind me lol.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 165 : SHUANG YI

Translated with: Jia<3

Xiao Chiye gave the horse that Lu Yizhi left behind to Shen Zechuan and accompanied Shen Zechuan horse-riding on the grasslands of the war zone while he still had time to spare. This horse was snow-white all over, with only a small patch of black on its chest. It was both pretty and intelligent, and even more lively than Lang Tao Xue Jin.

There was no war going on today. Xiao Fangxu sat on top of the railing in his armor and watched as Shen Zechuan made rounds on his horse. He said to Zuo Qianqiu, “This habit...”

“This habit?” Zuo Qianqiu squinted his eyes against the sunlight to look at the prescription in his hand. “Complete your sentence, man.”

“Is like A-Ye’s mother.” Xiao Fangxu stretched out a finger and traced Shen Zechuan’s trajectory twice. “Can’t ride straight.”

“He stays in Qudu all year round and isn’t adept at horsemanship. Just let A-Ye take him out riding more often in the future.” Zuo Qianqiu raised his head. “Have you found Yideng?”

“The Venerable Master is an elusive one. His comings and goings are unpredictable. He’s not easy to track down.” Xiao Fangxu was still holding his helmet in his hand as he brushed the dust off it. “Why?”

Zuo Qianqiu said gravely, “We have to get Yideng to take a look at this child’s illness. I saw him in Qudu last year. Although he appeared weak and frail outwardly, there was no major, internal damage. But looking at him now, he’s already showing clear signs of deterioration.”

Xiao Fangxu sized Shen Zechuan up. “That serious?”

“You have to pay the price two-fold for consuming the medicine this long.” Zuo Qianqiu said, “He successively suffered misfortunes thrice in Qudu, and what happened with Qi Huilian was a heavy blow to him. The good thing is that A-Ye and Ji Gang are both paying attention.”

“Can he be treated?” Xiao Fangxu withdrew his gaze and looked at Zuo Qianqiu.

With a slight frown on his face, Zuo Qianqiu folded up the prescription and returned it to his bosom. "... I think it's tough. Let's get him nursed back to health first."

Shen Zechuan's table had an extra bowl of fresh milk during mealtime in the afternoon. He did not understand the distribution of supplies on the battleground, so he merely thought that it was on Xiao Chiye's instruction. But later, when Xiao Chiye entered, he brought with him another bowl of fresh milk for Shen Zechuan to drink his fill.

Xiao Chiye said nothing as he ate his meal, believing the milk to be from Zuo Qianqiu. Just as he was about to go thank his shifu, he bumped into Chen Yang, who had come to collect the bowl.

"Is it shifu's?" Xiao Chiye nimbly put on his outer robe. "I'll send it back to him."

Chen Yang set the bowl in the tray and said in a hushed tone, "It's our Lordship's."

Xiao Chiye's movements slowed.

"His Lordship instructed Wu Ziyu in the morning to give his own portion to the Young Master. He even got the Bianbo Camp to send milk-producing cows and sheep to Cizhou." Chen Yang picked up the tray. "Then he made a special point of telling us not to make it public or tell Master about it."

This old man.

Xiao Chiye nodded, "Give mine to my father tomorrow morning to make up for it." After a moment's hesitation, he called out to Chen Yang just before the latter was about to leave the tent, "... Forget it. I understand."

Shen Zechuan could not stay for long in the war zone. The weather in the Hongyan Mountains underwent an abrupt turn, and he had to return after staying for two days. Heavy fog descended on them on the day of departure, and the humid wind in the eastern mountain range blew so hard it sent the military banners flapping.

Xiao Chiye secured the cloak for Shen Zechuan and put the fur collar on him. Seeing as Xiao Chiye was still wearing a single piece of garment, Shen Zechuan asked in a quiet tone, "It's about to be winter here soon. Is there still no word on the winter coats for the military?"

“Eldest sister-in-law is thinking of a way.” Xiao Chiye shielded Shen Zechuan from the wind and propped himself against the carriage door. “After the new year this year, come to Dajing with Ji Gang-shifu.”

Shen Zechuan cast a glance behind Xiao Chiye and moved in to whisper, “Can I?”

Xiao Chiye answered in a whisper too, “Hurry up and come marry me to make things clear to my father. Otherwise, we’ll keep looking like we are having a clandestine love affair.”

How would Shen Zechuan know that Xiao Chiye had already laid out his cards on the table to Libei? He actually nodded on hearing him and said, “Eldest sister-in-law even gave me a set of bracelets the last time. I’ll send a gift in return during the new year.”

Xiao Chiye found Lanzhou adorable. He laughed and stroked Shen Zechuan’s cheek again. “The Armored Cavalry will follow along on your way back. Write me a letter when you reach Cizhou. I’ll return to Bianbo Camp in another three or four days. It’s closer.”

“I’ll write you a stack.” Shen Zechuan slowed down his speech, as if that would slow down time.

“The fan isn’t made yet. I was so busy I forgot all about it.” Xiao Chiye touched the jade earring lightly with his fingertip. “I’ll craft a new one for you after the new year.”

Shen Zechuan said, “Then, I’m leaving.”

Xiao Chiye lowered his head to enter, but before he could move closer, Shen Zechuan cupped his cheeks and kissed him. This kiss was brief, a touch lasting just a fleeting moment. Xiao Chiye rose to leave the carriage, then put the curtain down and took a few steps back.

Fei Sheng stood at the side, wanting to say a few words to ingratiate himself with him, but before he could say a word, Xiao Chiye pressed him over.

“Wherever Lanzhou is,” The expression in Xiao Chiye’s eyes was cold and detached. “You better be there.”<sup>1</sup>

Fei Sheng felt as if it was an iron vise gripping him by the nape, suffocating him until he could scarcely breathe. He nodded hastily, and Xiao Chiye let him go.

The horse carriage began to roll. Xiao Chiye stood where he was and watched as the carriage left. Shen Zechuan tugged the curtain open. Half of the Hongyan Mountains behind Xiao Chiye were partially concealed among the clouds and mist while the wind howled. At this very moment, Xiao Chiye's figure oddly overlapped with the Hongyan Mountains.

Shen Zechuan gazed at him.

Several falcons suddenly circled out of the wind, and the head of the cast of falcons, Meng, let loose a cry that reverberated through the camp. Military tents of all sizes instantly lifted their entrance flaps, while a long whistle sounded from the top of the watchtower.

When Xiao Fangxu stepped out of his tent, his battle steed was already in position. He held his blade and flipped atop the horse, where he said in a deep voice, "Squad Three to guard the camp. Vanguards to move first! Convoy squad, turn around immediately and retreat down to Sha'er camp to protect the military craftsmen!"

As Xiao Chiye stepped back, he put on his helmet and turned to mount Lang Tao Xue Jin, which had just trotted over. The wind was so strong Shen Zechuan could not open his eyes. He clung on to the carriage door, watching as Xiao Chiye receded further and further away amidst the strong wind.

The clouds dispersed, scattering into millions of snowflakes that danced in the skies of Libei.

The first snow of the battlefield had come.

At the third quarter of the hour of yin, Li Jianting opened her eyes right on time. She sat up, and the palace maid in attendance stepped up to pull up the heavy drapes. Fengquan, dressed in the official robes of eunuchs, nimbly and diligently helped Li Jianting to put on her shoes.

Mu Ru assassinated Li Jianheng, and Fengquan found a scapegoat. All this while, he had been hiding in the Xue's residence, and after Li Jianheng's burial, he became Li Jianting's personal eunuch. Now that Li Jianting was living in the palace, Fengquan returned with her. At first, Xue Xiuzhou did not plan to use him again, but Li Jianting insisted, so Fengquan changed his name and continued to stay at Li Jianting's side.

Li Jianting did not sleep well. She did not seem to have adapted to this massive bedchamber as yet. All the palace maids serving the heir apparent to the throne knew that Li Jianting only allowed Fengquan to remain serving in the hall at night. As they waited outside, they would occasionally hear the sound of her being trapped in the throes of a nightmare.

The people in the bedchamber moved lightly and softly as they soundlessly helped Li Jianting dress. When she was all properly presented, Fengquan stepped forth with a bow and lifted his sleeve to carefully affix the flower embellishment<sup>2</sup> on her forehead. The heir apparent to the throne did not suit fair colors; she was best decked out in scarlet red.

By the hour of mao, Li Jianting was already waiting under the eaves for the various officials participating in the classics colloquium to come over for lectures. It was windy today, and Fengquan covered her with a cloak before standing at the side to shield her from the wind. He was so freezing cold that his lips turned purple.

Li Jianting looked at Fengquan and said, "It's already autumn. Didn't the Caps and Kerchiefs Service issue new coats?"

Fengquan was not permitted to look at Li Jianting directly, so he turned slightly to her and answered, "To reply Your Highness, they did."

Li Jianting raised a finger to touch her own cloak, but it promptly dawned on her that every single move of hers as she stood here was being watched. It was indeed inappropriate for her to undress for an eunuch, and it would easily give others grounds for gossip. She looked towards the upturned eaves shrouded in gloom a short distance away and paused for a moment, but in the end, she did not say a word more.

She did not know if there had been a delay on the way here today, but the officials were late to arrive. Li Jianting stood until her legs went numb. She looked at Fengquan again, and this time, she saw Fengquan's ear in the dimness.

Fengquan thought Li Jianting was cold, so he said, "This slave shall send someone over to take a look..."

"You have an ear piercing." Li Jianting gazed fixedly at Fengquan's ear.

Fengquan looked abruptly at Li Jianting and subconsciously thought of blocking his ear. But very quickly, he lowered his eyes and nodded quietly as he cautiously slowed his breathing. He found this tiny hole in his ear a nightmare, one that made him gag indistinctly and amplified his panic under Li Jianting's silence.

After a long interval, Li Jianting saw an eunuch leading the officials over towards the eaves. She nodded her head respectfully and waited for them. As she lowered her head, she said softly, "Looks really nice."

At the same time the officials lifted the curtain, Fengquan threw a swift glance at Li Jianting. But Li Jianting did not look at him. It was as if she had not spoken at all as she bent over and followed the gentlemen in.

The fists that Fengquan had hidden under his sleeves broke out in sweat. He retreated to the side of the door, and after a long period of time, he stealthily looked askance through the gaps in the door curtain where he saw the hem of Li Jianting's skirt, feeling bewildered and uncertain of her words earlier.

Shen Zechuan's return journey was not considered quick; the roads were difficult to maneuver on a rainy and snowy day, and Fei Sheng dared not be careless for fear that Shen Zechuan would fall ill on the way. As such, he attended to everything personally. Even with the Libei Armored Cavalry's accompaniment, the inner sides of the horse carriage continued to be guarded by the Imperial Bodyguards. The daily brewing of medicine was also supervised by Fei Sheng himself.

The horse carriage came to a stop after passing the Bianbo camp. The bridle paths had been damaged by mudslides, and repairs would delay the journey by a day. Consequently, the troops opted to spend the night in the open.

Shen Zechuan stepped off the horse carriage and brought Ding Tao along to walk the horse further ahead.

"Has Young Master given this horse a name yet?" Walking backwards, Ding Tao pillowed his arms at the back of his head and asked.

"Feng Ta Shuang Yi." Leading the horse along, Shen Zechuan stroked its mane.

Ding Tao clenched his fist in understanding, "What a great name; it goes perfectly together with Master's Lang Tao Xue Jin!"<sup>3</sup>

Shen Zechuan looked towards the south, and Ding Tao turned to do the same. He said, "Riding in that direction for eight or nine days will bring you to Dunzhou."

"So close." Shen Zechuan had not expected that. "I don't see any of Libei's relay stations in the vicinity."

"They used to exist, but were deserted afterwards," Ding Tao said. "Now everyone has headed northeast to fight with the Biansha people."

Shen Zechuan let out a breath of hot air, turned his gaze away, and continued strolling for a while more with Ding Tao.

At night, Fei Sheng led his men on overnight duty. He sat alongside the Libei Armored Cavalry and warmed himself by the campfire. He shrank his neck back and said, "Libei is seriously cold; it isn't even winter yet and there is already snow on the battlefields. It's indeed not easy on my fellow brothers. Here, have some meat!"

The accompanying Libei Armored Cavalry was a brigade commander of the mobile corps. He did not stand on ceremony with Fei Sheng and sat around the fire with the rest of them as he gorged on meat. "The snow in Libei always comes early. In previous years, we would be going home around this time, leaving only a few battalions to guard the frontier."

"I don't think this war will stop." Fei Sheng accepted the proffered On Horseback and took a few mouthfuls. The resulting burn made him cheer with appreciative satisfaction. "If it wasn't for all of you holding the fort here, all the prefectures down south would have to suffer."

"It can't be helped." The brigade commander ate until he was all ruddy in the face. "We are the Libei Armored Cavalry."

Fei Sheng got emotional in an instant. "Everyone says that the Libei Armored Cavalry is the bastion of iron of the north; all of you are true warriors of iron. I was already in great awe back in Qudu. That old Han dog loved to get all jealous when he saw that Libei was in the emperor's favor and kept spouting bullshit. I couldn't take it lying down and contradicted him multiple times. Now that I've actually arrived in Libei, it turns out that I was right; all my fellow brothers here are men worthy of befriending! In the future, If anyone were to come to Cizhou for work, don't prepare a thing. Once you get off your horse, go to the yamen and give them my name, and I'll make the arrangements for everyone here!"

Thrilled, the brigade commander patted Fei Sheng and commended, "A worthy friend indeed!"

Everyone had a merry time chatting and feasting on quite the amount of meat. The fire was not extinguished at night to prevent wolves from being lured in by the aroma. The Libei Armored Cavalry had a night patrol squad which made a few rounds in the vicinity. When they returned, they leaned over and said a few words in the brigade commander's ear.

The brigade commander wiped his mouth and curbed his expression. "Put on your armors!"

Fei Sheng immediately stood up after him. The Imperial Bodyguards in the back were instantly wide awake too.

Shen Zechuan had yet to sleep. He sat in the horse carriage, reading the latest letters from Cizhou under the candlelight. On hearing footsteps, he asked without raising his head, “Someone’s nearby?”

Holding onto his blade, Fei Sheng stood by the carriage and spoke quickly, “Libei’s night patrol squad discovered traces of horse carriage tracks in the south. Master, this place is close to Bianbo Camp. When the Bianbo camp was attacked during the sixth month, it was also from the south that the stone catapult had come around.”

Although Fei Sheng was a chatterbox, his observation skills were impeccable, and his intelligence-gathering was first-rate. While he did not possess Ding Tao’s photographic memory, he could retain everything he had ever transcribed in his mind; he would not miss out on any traces.

“Let the Armored Cavalry lead the way.” Shen Zechuan donned his cloak and disembarked the horse carriage. “Send someone to follow after them first. Don’t alert the enemy.”

Fei Sheng responded with a sound of affirmation.

Shen Zechuan observed the canopy of heaven, then looked towards the south. “The southern side is adjacent to Dunzhou. If we really run into the Biansha Cavalry’s transportation escort squad, then it is very likely that they took a detour around Dunzhou.”

Fei Sheng dredged the mud by his feet and got up. “It just snowed a few days back. The bridle path here has fallen into disrepair, making the path hard to travel. The military supplies they carry are extremely heavy, so they must have arranged for quite the number of people to follow along as guarded escorts.”

“Send someone to follow them first.” Shen Zechuan thought for a moment. “The carriage shall follow after. We can make it in time to Dunzhou for a look.”

The Prince of Jianxing’s residence was in Dunzhou—it was Shen Wei’s former home grounds. Fei Sheng did not dare to make wild guesses. He turned around to instruct the men, then extinguished the campfire to wipe out all traces of them before keeping up pace with the others under the cover of the night.

Credits: Many thanks to Yu, Alex, and Yuffie for being our sounding board and Tea for proofreading!

Footnotes

1. aka. “he lives, you live.”

- 2.
3. 花钿 known as huadian, these are flower embellishments affixed or painted onto the forehead for cosmetic purposes. Flowers are common patterns, although there may be others.
4. 风踏霜衣 Feng Ta Shuang Yi, i.e., wind treading upon a plumage of frost (literal garment of frost)
5. 浪淘雪襟 Lang Tao Xue Jin, i.e., waves washing over a bosom of snow (literal clothing front/lapel of snow)

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 166 : LIU’ER

Translated with: Jia<3

Early in the morning, Shen Zechuan stared fixedly at those messy footprints and asked Fei Sheng, “Does it belong to a grain wagon?”

The tracks left by the wheels were very distinct, a clear sign that it had been carrying a heavy load.

“Heavier than a grain wagon.” Fei Sheng dropped to one knee and scrutinized it for a moment. “It looks like it was carrying some kind of heavy weaponry. Master, they went to the trouble of taking a detour to Libei. Could they be thinking of launching another raid?”

“The Shasan Camp is now well-equipped and well-trained. With Guo Weili stationed there and its location so close to Bianbo Camp, it would be difficult to get anything good out of a raid without a large number of troops to back them up.” Shen Zechuan faced the south. “Furthermore, they are coming from Dunzhou; it’s possible that they’re thinking of transporting supplies to the border along the Chashi River.”

But what was there in Dunzhou?

Dunzhou’s granaries had long been squandered clean by the bandits. Furthermore, there were no garrison troops in Dunzhou, so why bother taking an unnecessary detour?

Shen Zechuan thought carefully for a moment, running through everything he remembered about Dunzhou. He recalled that the Biansha Cavalry had used a stone catapult when they raided Bianbo Camp during the sixth month. Taking a few steps along the wheel tracks, he suddenly spoke, “Military supplies, provisions—armaments.” He turned back. “After the defeat of the Zhongbo troops, the Ministry of War didn’t reclaim the armories of the Six Prefectures, intending to leave it for the re-established garrison troops. However, Qudu was later negligent in their inspection rounds, and all of these armories were not mentioned again.

Not bothering with the mud on his knee, Fei Sheng stood up. “Among them are plenty of heavy weaponry meant for sieges. If they fall in the hands of Biansha, then Duanzhou will be in imminent danger.”

“Continue to follow them.” Shen Zechuan said.

The wheels got stuck in the mud, and the horses could not pull them out.

Liu'er, who was wrapped up in a coat and wearing a biangu hat,<sup>1</sup> wanted to huddle up into a bundle, but he did not manage to do so. That Biansha man disguised as a traveling merchant yanked him by the ankle and dragged him off the wagon, then lashed at him with the horsewhip to wake him up as he cursed, "Get up. Go push the wagon!"

Liu'er "ow-ed" a few times and hurriedly crawled to his feet before limping over to push the wagon. He was advanced in age, and his hands were shaky. Someone stomped on his feet and nearly made him kneel from the pain. There were many bandits escorting this wagon. All of their blades had been seized by the Biansha men, and they were now toiling as manual labor under the cracks of horsewhips.

The bandits of Mount Luo returned home crestfallen following their defeat in Cizhou, and news that Lei Jingzhe was a spy for the Imperial Army spread like wildfire. Subsequently, Mount Luo split up into over ten small mountain strongholds that fought tooth and nail with one another. Liu'er, Ding Niu, and the others each formed their own band of bandits, wanting to recreate Lei Changming's glory and become the chief of Mount Luo. But who knew that they would be disbanded in Duanzhou by bandits who had the help of the Biansha Cavalry? Not only did they lose their main forces, but they were also recaptured as the Biansha Cavalry's prisoners.

Ding Niu refused to transport grains for the Biansha Cavalry and was killed at the end of the seventh month. Liu'er, cherishing his life, did not dare to resist any further and was now transporting the grain wagons for the Biansha people.

Liu'er hunched over like a monkey, his long, drooping eyebrows quivering along with his movements. He blended in among the crowd, not daring to slack off right under the Biansha men's eyes. But even so, he did not escape a lashing. Liu'er grimaced in pain and tried his best to make himself smaller so that others would block the blows for him.

The road was hard to navigate, and ragged panting filled the chilly night. These bandits who were used to riding roughshod over others could not hold up against the lashings of the Biansha people, and there were quite a number of people who were whipped until their skin was flayed open and their flesh was torn. The horse wagon came to a stop only during the hour of yin. Several rows of cavalry roved around the surroundings, hollering at the bandits to assemble and stand properly.

Liu'er's coat had been shredded to ribbons by the whips, with wads of cotton spilling out. He held his arms around himself and waded in the muddy marsh with a build-up of a thin layer of ice on it. His robe was already in rags now, and both legs of his trouser fluttered to reveal a pair of legs that looked like hemp stalks. The old man was so freezing cold that he shivered.

The Biansha men wanted to eat, so the bandits could only stand at their sides to shield them from the wind.

Liu'er folded his arms up his sleeves. He was so hungry he was seeing stars. He licked his lips and quietly squatted down to take a rest.

"When will these shitty days come to an end?" A former subordinate before him muttered as he took off the cloth bag stuffed on his back and secured it on his waist. "Goddamnit, they are going to whip me to death this trip! These motherfuckers really don't hold back, whipping people like we are some livestock!"

Liu'er shifted his feet. He was so hungry he could taste bile in his mouth, and yet he was still thinking of taking a smoke. He fumbled in his sleeves for a long time before fishing out some tobacco, whereupon he brought it to his nose and sniffed hard. "They aren't educated; that's why they treated people as livestock, no? Those tattoos on their bodies are all of beasts and birds of prey. Heck, they even drink blood raw."

The former subordinate spat. "If I had known I'd end up this way, I'd have switched camps and joined the Imperial Army back in Cizhou. Damn it. At least it wouldn't have given the Biansha people an advantage."

"Bullocks." Liu'er stuffed the tobacco back and sneakily peeked at the Biansha men through other people's legs. "We are all bandits. What good ends can we come to by defecting over to the Imperial Army? We would still be traitors. These military weapons are being sent over to fight Libei and Zhongbo. Who knows? Maybe even the emperor in Qudu will be taken prisoner when the time comes. We might still even have to kneel to a Biansha emperor."

Liu'er had not even finished his words when his former subordinate suddenly pulled him up. With his legs trembling, Liu'er stuck close to the group and stood straight, not even daring to glance around arbitrarily.

The Biansha man was called Jida. His head was cleanly shaven, and the muscular arms he exposed had a poisonous scorpion tattooed on it. He passed by them while wiping his mouth, the expression in his eyes causing Liu'er's legs to tremble even harder, so much that he was about to pee his pants.

But Jida did not give them any trouble tonight and merely led his man to the front where the supply wagon carrying the mounted crossbow<sup>2</sup> was parked. The Biansha people were very interested in giant siege weapons such as the mounted crossbows.

The bandits remained where they were and rested. All their field rations were soaked and smelled musty. With his yellow tobacco-stained teeth, Liu'er ate the rations. The few of them huddled together to keep warm. Fortunately, it did not rain tonight, or the amount of people who froze to death would be more than just a few. They sat on the ground, not daring to fall asleep.

But Liu'er was old. It gradually became harder for him to hang in there, and he eventually dozed off against the wheel.

"Such a small number of troops following along?" Fei Sheng squatted down once again and examined the footprints. "Most of them are bandits pushing the wagon along. There aren't that many Biansha Cavalry."

The brigade commander put on his helmet and sat on his horse like a statue cast in iron. As he pulled the reins on his horse, he spoke in a deep, muffled voice, "They are in disguise because they don't want to alert others. I'm afraid they still have planted agents in Mount Luo. Otherwise, they wouldn't dare to penetrate this far with these few people. Prefectural Lord, if you want to get to the bottom of who is on the inside collaborating with them, then we have to intercept them before they enter Mount Luo's territory and interrogate them."

There were not that many men from the Libei Armored Cavalry following along, but they were all elites on the battlefields who had fought the Hanshe Tribe with Xiao Fangxu. With the Imperial Bodyguards' assistance in battle on such a dark night where the frost was heavy, intercepting this small batch of people would not be a problem.

Shen Zechuan took a look at the darkness of the night and ordered, "Ding Tao, stay where you are. Fei Sheng, go with the Libei Armored Cavalry."

Liu'er woke up from the freezing cold and rubbed both of his feet, feeling as if he was going to freeze to death. He raised his head and saw the Biansha Cavalry standing a distance ahead, crowding around the mounted crossbow. This crossbow was not something that could be drawn on one man's strength alone. Usually, it would be used to bring up the rear and hold the battle array or to defend cities. It was an absolute heavy-duty weapon in combat and common in the Libei camps. The Biansha Cavalry had suffered and taken quite the beating in its hands.

Liu'er did not call out to anyone. He propped his hands on the ground and used the wagon as a cover to make his way quietly to the back. He crawled under the bottom of the wagon, sticking close to the ground to hide from view. When he crawled to the end, he practically kicked out with his shoes and lunged forward, cutting a sorry figure as he broke into a run.

Jida was wiping an arrow when he caught a flash in his peripheral vision. He bellowed in the Biansha language, "Someone's fleeing!"

The Biansha Cavalry instantly mounted their horses and brandished their whips as they bellowed and chased after him.

How in the world would Liu'er expect Jida to be so sharp-eyed?! To think he could still catch sight of him from such a distance away and in such a dark night too. He thought of stopping and giving them the excuse that he was merely taking a piss, but when he looked back and saw all those scimitars drawn out of their scabbards, he knew he would die if he did not escape tonight!

Liu'er anxiously tightened his waist sash and kicked off his shoes in the mud. He fell, then climbed to his feet. All he could see before him was the way Ding Niu looked when he died.

They were able to rise to prominence on Mount Luo all because of the Biansha Cavalry, and now, it was also all because of the Biansha Cavalry that they had become prisoners on Mount Luo!

Liu'er muttered unintelligibly as he prayed for help and pleaded with all the deities and buddhas he knew of. Sores that had formed on this old man's soles made him scrunch up his face in pain. He was so fearful of death to the extent he even wanted to kneel now and beg for mercy.

But the bellows and cursings of the Biansha Cavalry made it clear that it would not be a simple matter of capturing Liu'er back. They had no lack of people; what they lacked were chickens they could slaughter in public. Liu'er shivered and fell into a mudhole.

The Biansha Cavalry surrounded him, and Liu'er promptly burst out crying. He raised both hands and felt himself peeing his pants in the icy cold, muddy water. The foul, turbid stench of urine soaked through the legs of his trousers. Liu'er could not understand the Biansha language and could only kowtow to the cavalry in terror.

"I'm at fault." Liu'er wailed hysterically. "Don't kill me!"

The Biansha Cavalry coughed a couple of times and spat thick phlegm on Liu'er's face. They smashed their scabbards down onto Liu'er's back, making him sprawl in the mudhole and drink filthy water. Both of Liu'er's long, drooping brows were lifted by the scimitars, and he drank that water in fear, crying and laughing as snot and tears soiled his face.

Jida stood where he was and watched as the cavalry amused themselves with Liu'er. He propped up a leg and kicked away the fabric cover of the mounted crossbow, then shouted for the men to drag Liu'er further away so that he could use Liu'er to test the crossbow.

Liu'er was scared out of his wits on hearing the sound of the mounted crossbow being shifted. He kneeled on the ground as they dragged him away, slapping himself with both hands while cursing.

Why the heck did he run?!

Liu'er slapped himself until his cheeks were red and swollen. They hoisted him up and hung him a distance away. Liu'er bent over at the waist and took in huge gasps of air as he watched the cavalry load the mounted crossbow with an arrow. That arrow was as thick as a child's arm, and its arrowhead was unusual, with a rounded end cast out of iron. When they rained down from the sky, the impact could send one's brain matter splattering all over. The wheel and axle started turning with a "click". As long as Jida pulled the trigger, Liu'er would be able to see that arrow springing up high in the sky before hurtling down on himself.

Liu'er voicelessly moved his mouth. In an unexpected burst of courage, he bared his yellow-stained teeth and burst out cursing, "Fuck your ancestors! Fuck all of your ancestors!"

Tears streamed down Liu'er's face as he choked with sobs so hard he looked as if he could breathe his last any time.

He used to be a bandit in the past too, but he was not alone. He had a son and daughters back at home, and his wonderful wife was his childhood sweetheart who had followed him out of the village. It was only when husband and wife were past their prime that they bore three children. Of them, two were daughters who had been matchmade in the third year of Xiande and would have been able to get married once winter that year passed. His son wanted to join the garrison troops, and Liu'er spent a long time buttering up to Lei Changming before he managed to send his son into the Duanzhou Garrison Troops.

But in the end, the entire Duanzhou Garrison Troops perished in the Chashi Sinkhole that year, the year the Biansha Cavalry came to massacre the city.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Credit to Tea for proofreading!

Footnotes

1. 边鼓帽 biangu hat, a round hat with a brim with origins from the Yuan dynasty, commonly used by street youths, commoners, and servants. It was most popular in the reign of Emperor Jiajing of Ming Dynasty and commonly seen in the Qing dynasty.

- 2.
3. Example of a mounted crossbow 床子弩. There are different kinds, like the triple-bowed mounted crossbows, etc.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 167 : GUEST

Translated with: Jia<3

Warning: Violence, Brutality

The sky was dark, and devoid of stars. Liu'er huffed white puffs of air in between gasps; he could no longer tell if he was dead or alive. He hung there, light as a feather, like a piece of cotton wadding in the wind.

Jida could not operate the mounted crossbow. He shoved aside the subordinates by his side to check on it and continued to inquire about it in the Biansha language. As they were unfamiliar with such heavy weaponry, the subordinates called for a few bandits to take a look. Jida unscrewed his canteen to have a drink of water as he stood bare-chested in the chilly night and waited.

Fearing that he would be implicated and face the same outcome as Liu'er, the former subordinate lay prone on the ground, not daring to move an inch. He stared at the trampled mud on the ground and saw the subtle tremors coursing through it. Thinking that it was caused by his own rapid breathing, he used both hands to cover his mouth and nose, but those tremors did not stop; instead, they became even more pronounced.

Jida was the first to sense something amiss. He stopped drinking and listened intently for a moment. Suddenly, he threw his canteen onto the ground and shouted, "The Armored Cavalry is here—!"

But it was too late. The Libei Armored Cavalry that had been creeping forth for half the night in the darkness was like a fierce tiger pouncing with force so great that the wagon by Jida's side overturned with a loud crash. The startled horses neighed as they were dragged to the ground by the wagon that weighed up to a hundred jin. That mounted crossbow sent mud splashing, and the wagons beside the former subordinate also shifted along with it. Several of the supply wagons haphazardly collided against one another without warning, and at that moment, chaos erupted as men and horses were thrown off their feet.

Jida retreated swiftly and kept calm as he shouted, "Mount your horses!"

The Libei Armored Cavalry's battle steeds wore a full body of armor, and the sound of their hooves as they drew nearer sounded like muffled thunder to the ear. The heavily armed armored cavalry held no fear of the scimitars. They were like a dark, swarthy wall that directly cut across and broke the formation of the Biansha's transportation squad. The battle steeds, donned in armors of iron gilded with long and thick spikes at the chest, were unstoppable when they charged straight-on. Unable to run fast enough, the Biansha Cavalry was thrown to the ground and successively trampled to a bloody pulp before they could get back up.

The helmeted brigade commander gestured with his hand to Fei Sheng at the side. Fei Sheng, lightly armored<sup>1</sup> on his horse, circled over into position and lowered his long sword<sup>2</sup> together with the brigade commander, and in one coordinated move, charged towards Jida to flank him in a pincer attack. Jida mounted his horse, as if he had not sensed Fei Sheng approaching. He leaned over, and the pony under his crotch broke into a run like the fearsome wind. Jida stared fixedly at the brigade commander as their horses crossed paths in the blink of an eye. The brigade commander abruptly swung his long sword, intending to hack off Jida's head, but his swing had missed the mark, for Jida seemed to have disappeared into thin air.

In the next instant, a blunt weapon slammed hard into the back of the brigade commander's head. The force of the impact instantaneously made him bleed from the mouth and nose and deafened him. That nearly sealed and airtight iron armor could stand up to blows from all sharp weapons, but had a fatal weakness—it could not withstand the impact of blunt weapons.

The brigade commander tumbled off the back of the horse and fell headlong to the ground. His ears were ringing like crazy, and he even felt sharp, stabbing pain. He tried to crawl to his feet, but his entire body was trembling too violently. Blood trickled out through the gap in his helmet. He could not hear his own voice clearly, but he continued to move his lips, "Take, take off the hel—"

The iron hammer smashed down onto the back of the brigade commander's head once again. Blow after blow rained down on him, crushing that helmet until it was all deformed. Blood plasma spilled all over the ground. The brigade commander went silent.

Jida squatted on the brigade commander's back and wiped off the blood on his scorpion tattoo, then stuck his fingers into his mouth. Contained in those sturdy muscles of his was a shocking amount of explosive strength. He lifted the iron hammer and locked his gaze on Fei Sheng.

Fei Sheng felt his hairs stand on end, while the horse under him tossed its head in fear. Fei Sheng swallowed with difficulty; he had served as an Imperial Bodyguard for so many years, and to think he would be daunted back into a retreat by the expression in the other party's eyes.

This was no ordinary Biansha Cavalryman; this was not even one of the Biansha's elite forces.

They were unlike Hasen's elite troops who carried scimitars and pike daggers; instead, they were equipped with scimitars and iron hammers with protruding spikes. This was a Biansha force that had never made an appearance before on the Libei battlefields.

Too terrifying.

A strangled gasp escaped from Fei Sheng's throat. If such an iron hammer were to be delivered to the battlegrounds, then the Libei Cavalry would become livestock at their mercy. All the advantages they derived from their armors would be rendered useless.

"Retreat." Fei Sheng yanked the reins and suddenly bellowed, "Retreat!"

They had to shake them off!

Fei Sheng turned the horse around and broke into a desperate run. But things did not go as planned. This peculiar, treacherous troop tailed him like shadows; it was clear that Jida had locked on to him as a target as he relentlessly followed hot on his trail. Both parties engaged in a cat-and-mouse chase in the darkness of the night. Fei Sheng had finally gotten his taste of the Biansha Cavalry that rumors were made of. The horse beneath him was a fine steed too, but it could not throw them off and widen the distance between them at all; Jida remained close on his heels.

Jida's iron hammer came swinging at the back of Fei Sheng's head, and Fei Sheng, on sensing it, dodged by the skin of his teeth. The horse was running too fast, and all those jolts and bumps nearly caused Fei Sheng to slip off. He was far from being as adept at horsemanship as the Biansha Cavalry. At this moment, both parties were hundreds of paces away from the convoy squad. Fei Sheng came to the realization that he would not be able to shake off the other party. Likewise, the other man did not give Fei Sheng another chance to retreat either—Jida had already caught up with him.

Fei Sheng was not one of the Libei Armored Cavalry. The iron hammer was not that much of a threat to him; thus, Jida swapped back to his scimitar. That crescent moon-like blade caught on to Fei Sheng's Xiuchun Blade.<sup>3</sup> The squads behind, having already converged together, began to fight at close quarters. Both men were still galloping on their horses as they barged headlong into the sparse forest.

Withered branches lashed hard against his face. Fei Sheng could not draw back his ensnared blade at all. Jida revealed a cruel smile as he said to Fei Sheng in the Dazhou language with perfect enunciation, "You are welcome to be our guest."

Fei Sheng wanted to retort back, but he was too preoccupied to speak. At the same time Jida leaned forward, he yanked his scimitar back, and Fei Sheng's Xiuchun Blade promptly slipped from his hand and went flying. Following right after, his horse was rammed from the side, which knocked Fei Sheng off it. In the instant he rolled to the ground, he reached for the short blade from the side of his waist and brought it up before his face to parry the blow.

Jida's scimitar slipped from his hand along with the Xiuchun blade. He relaxed his entire right arm and swung the hammer up into Fei Sheng's face. The blade Fei Sheng used to ward off the blow caved in from the impact, and his forearm went numb. He reacted swiftly and rolled away, then cast away the ruined blade. Unarmed, he maintained a certain distance away from Jida.

Stooping over at his waist, Fei Sheng continued his retreat. He adjusted his breathing, then made a "shoo" sound at Jida as if to drive him away.

Enraged now, Jida gripped his hammer tightly, but at the very moment he swung it up, he felt a sudden weight on his back. Ding Tao strangled Jida's burly neck with an arm from behind and strained to call out, "Daxiong—"

Before Ding Tao could finish his words, Jida grabbed him by the arm and yanked, intending to fling Ding Tao over the side of his shoulder to the ground, but a figure sprinted out from the side and lunged headlong at him, slamming his head into the side of Jida's waist.

The impact from Li Xiong caused Jida to stagger, and Ding Tao seized the opportunity to break free. Li Xiong had been hiding in the horse carriage these days, having the time of his life eating. He stretched out both arms at once to wrap them around Jida's waist, then assumed the horse stance<sup>4</sup> with the intent to lift Jida like he would a tree trunk.

Jida swung the hammer and slammed it into Li Xiong's back. Li Xiong cried out in pain and shouted, "Taozi, that hurts!"

Ding Tao rubbed his numbed arm and said quickly, "Hit him with the Ji clan's fist!"

Thus, Li Xiong loosened his grip and bellowed as he threw out a fist at Jida's chest. Surprisingly enough, the force knocked Jida back two steps. Happy, Li Xiong followed up with several consecutive punches, every blow of his striking flesh. He remembered all that Ji Gang had taught clearly. With the air of one unrivaled, he looked back and said, "He can't fight—"

Li Xiong had yet to finish his words when Jida backhandedly smashed him with the hammer and knocked him over to the ground. Even if this lad was a sturdy one, he could not withstand the blow. Fortunately, he reacted extremely swiftly and bent his arms to shield his head. But even so, the force of the blow knocked a tooth out. With blood in his mouth, he spat the tooth to the ground and felt the first spark of anger.

"Blockhead! Get up!" Ding Tao yelled anxiously.

Unable to get to his feet in time, Li Xiong could only roll out of the way for all he was worth. That hammer scraped past his cheek and slammed into the ground. Mud splashed Li Xiong full in the head. He repeatedly spat out the muddy water in his mouth. Ding Tao hit upon an idea in a display of quick thinking and stirred the mud with his brush. Treading on Li Xiong's shoulder, he said, "Go!"

With a sudden flick of the brush, muddy water splashed into Jida's eyes. Jida hastily wiped it away. Taking advantage of the opportunity Ding Tao accorded him, Li Xiong propped both hands against the ground and slid over in an attempt to slip through under Jida's crotch. But he was too sturdy, and he had only just slid halfway when he got stuck. This lad had a one-track mind. He just had to go this way, and as he lifted himself with brute force, he knocked Jida over instead of sliding his way out.

Ding Tao wanted to praise Li Xiong. Unexpectedly, Jida wiped away the muddy water and hauled Ding Tao by the ankle that Ding Tao had yet to retract. Ding Tao had come to grief many times in the past with this move, so he had long since learned to play it smart. The instant he felt the grip on his ankle, he promptly lifted both arms to protect the back of his head and closed his eyes as he plummeted to the ground. Immediately right after the fall, he shouted, "It doesn't hurt! I'm fine!"

Li Xiong climbed to his feet from the mud and tried to lunge over to hold Jida's neck in a chokehold, but he had only just pounced when Jida, who was already on guard, bent his elbow and slammed it into the bridge of Li Xiong's nose. Li Xiong instantly felt a stinging ache on the bridge of his nose. Jida followed up with another blow and sent Li Xiong flipping over into the mud, using so much force that blood spurted out of Li Xiong's mouth and nose.

Jida moved his shoulders and arms about, the "creak" of which indicated that the fight earlier was just a joke in which he had been merely fooling around. His arms were far more thick and burly than Li Xiong's. As Li Xiong lay in the mud covering his nose and mouth, he caught a vague glimpse of the poisonous scorpion on Jida's arm.

Ding Tao was lifted upside down, and the brush and notebook in his bosom slipped out along with the poisonous needles and secret weapons on him when Jida swung him up with all his might. Ding Tao reached out with both hands to grab them, failing which he yelled, "My candies!"

But before he could bat an eyelash, Ding Tao saw his oilpaper-wrapped candies fall into a hand. Wind swept past their ears, and in this very instant, Jida saw a flutter of white sleeves descend onto the muddy surface, like a piece of drifting snow that arrived with the wind and then took off into the air again. The cold glint of Yang Shan Xue was like the crystal clear ripples of autumn waters as it suddenly shot right towards Jida's chest.

Jida could not retreat, so he cast Ding Tao aside in an attempt to free a hand to grab hold of Yang Shan Xue's tip.

However, Yang Shan Xue was too fast. It took just an instant for the blade to make its way before his chest. Jida failed to grab hold of it, and Yang Shan Xue flicked up in tandem with the white sleeve to slash towards Jida's throat. This time, Jida swung his shoulder over to dodge it, using his shoulder to take the blow in the flesh instead.

An expert!

Jida's alarm bells went off.

But then, it instantly dawned on Jida. Even though Shen Zechuan was as swift as a thunderbolt, that one blow of his earlier had also exposed the frailty of his constitution. Jida let loose a sardonic smile and struck out towards the side of Shen Zechuan's neck with a lightning move of his hand. As the white robe withdrew and seamlessly dodged out of the way like clouds and mist, he closed in and balled his fists to counter Shen Zechuan's attacks, then grabbed hold of Yang Shan Xue with a turn of his hand.

With Yang Shan Xue held down, Shen Zechuan's arm also ended up being grabbed by Jida.

Jida knew the other man was not an easy one to capture. With the latter's leg movements coincidentally restricted, Jida seized this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity and turned around so that his back was pressed up against Shen Zechuan, then lowered his shoulder to fling Shen Zechuan over to the ground.

Shen Zechuan almost coughed out blood from the force of it. He did not manage to break free when he got up, and sharp cracks rang out as he traded two blows with Jida with his hands. Jida, however, warded off his blows with sheer brute force.

Jida was not that meticulous in his study of martial arts, and he did not want to waste too much effort on Shen Zechuan over this. As he parried the blows, he sensed Shen Zechuan abandoning the use of Yang Shan Xue, so when Shen Zechuan rose with a lift of his waist, he swung his hammer over.

This strike sent the hammer smashing into the tree trunk, and as he had expended too much force, Jida could not pull it out.

Shen Zechuan was relatively shorter, and as his pitch-black eyes locked onto Jida, Jida heard the crack of something snapping. While he could not figure out what this sound was at the moment, he could acutely sense the danger he was in. Almost immediately, he abandoned his hammer. But before Jida could make a move, Shen Zechuan had already struck out at him. He was much faster than before this time, as though he had been planning for this moment since the start, waiting and luring Jida in until the latter was accustomed to the rhythm of his movements. Jida even went as far as to suspect that Shen Zechuan was not injured at all, that his frailness from before was all an act.

But Jida did not have the chance anymore. Fresh blood spewed from his neck, spraying all over Shen Zechuan's face. His throat bobbed; he could not believe he would be defeated in this place. He shifted his gaze sluggishly and saw a pair of deep, unfathomable eyes.

Shen Zechuan seemed to finally remember to say his greetings. With his expressive eyes half-closed, he said amicably to Jida, "You are welcome to be our guest."

The moment the words left his mouth, Jida fell over on his back to the ground.

With half a brush sticking out of his neck.

Ding Tao was still badly shaken when Shen Zechuan let his fingers drop to toss the candies into his arms. Ding Tao caught it in a daze and saw the oilpaper red with blood—blood that had already seeped all the way in.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Credit to Tea for proofreading!

Footnotes

1. Heavy Cavalry: heavily armed and armored men on equally armored horses. Their primary role was to engage in direct combat with enemy forces, e.g., the Libei Armored Cavalry.
2. Light Cavalry: lightly armed and lightly armored men on horses. Their missions were primarily reconnaissance, skirmishing, and communications. Though it refers to Fei Sheng here, since he's not all decked out in heavy armor like the Libei Armored Cavalry in comparison.

- 3.
4. Specifically a changdao, or a two-handed, single-edged Chinese sword.

5.

6. 绣春刀 Xiuchun Blade is the blade of the Imperial Bodyguards during the Ming Dynasty.

7.

8. 马步 horse stance, a common posture in Chinese martial arts and takes its name from the position assumed when horse-riding.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 168 : SCORPION

Translated with: Jia<3

All at once, Fei Sheng calmed down. He promptly propped himself up and came over to pick up Yang Shan Xue for Shen Zechuan. But when he bent over, he noticed something odd about Shen Zechuan's right arm. As his gaze glided up from the opening of Shen Zechuan's sleeve, he realized Shen Zechuan's entire right arm was trembling.

Thick, sticky blood coated the tips of Shen Zechuan's fingers. Jida had almost broken off his fingers when they traded blows earlier, and this kind of trembling was not something he could control now that the combat had suddenly come to a halt. But he could not reveal the slightest hint of pain, given that the armored cavalry had just suffered heavy casualties. Jida had hammered the brigade commander until the latter's brain matter had splattered right before everyone's eyes. Shen Zechuan had to stabilize their morale so that it would not continue to plummet.

"M, Master..." Fei Sheng called out in apprehension.

"They are already assembling the bandits in the back to reorganize the convoy squad." Shen Zechuan always brought along the blue handkerchief on him, but he could not bear to use it to wipe the blood; this was something he had taken from Xiao Chiye. He continued, "Tell the Libei Armored Cavalry to take off their helmets. Don't panic. With the mounted crossbow bringing up the rear, the foes will be merely sitting ducks."

Both of Liu'er hands were shivering. He had already been released and lowered. The blowing wind was so cold it gave him a chill between the legs. The former subordinate took advantage of the chaos to drag him along, pushing and shoving as he urged, "Run! Run!"

Liu'er looked stiffly at the convoy squad that had been thrown into confusion and asked feebly, "Who, who came?"

"The Libei Armored Cavalry!" The former subordinate tore off the cloth bag on his waist and threw it away along with the chains he had been fitted with. "Let them fight. Let's go!" But the former subordinate failed to move Liu'er, so he pinched him and cried out in anxiety, "Old Man Liu, what are you doing?!"

Liu'er's feet scraped across the ground as he stooped over and refused to leave. With a savage expression, he said, "We'll leave. But we also have to give these bastards a stab before leaving!" He pushed the former subordinate away and staggered forward. "Son of a bitch aimed at me with the crossbow. Those bastards." He fell onto the ground, then got up again and muttered, "I want to smash them to death. Smash them all to death!"

The men in Shen Zechuan's retinue who had arrived after Shen Zechuan summoned the bandits together to work as one and pull up the overturned wagon. The mounted crossbow was stained with mud, and Liu'er hastily wiped it clean with his sleeve. He squeezed among the crowd, exerting force in regular bursts along with the shouts as they hoisted the long arrows up and pulled.

A hundred paces away, Fei Sheng scrambled out and blew a quick whistle at the Imperial Bodyguards still engaged in battle with the Biansha Cavalry. The Imperial Bodyguards promptly pulled back and retreated as they held up against the remaining Libei Armored Cavalry. The Biansha Cavalry who still remained in the clearing waited but never got Jida's commands, and by the time they realized it, it was already too late.

The very moment the "click" of the trigger sounded, Liu'er felt intense pain in both arms. He watched those long arrows shoot into the sky before plunging, their impact slamming the Biansha Cavalrymen who had nowhere to hide onto the ground along with their horses. It was almost instant death for the men.

Liu'er raised both arms and burst out laughing madly. He stood on tiptoe, finding this moment to be the most gratifying time in his life. Very quickly, the arrows were depleted, and the Biansha Cavalry who had been dealt severe blows were too powerless to resist. Their small numbers prevented them from getting into formation, and it just took a couple of rounds from the mounted crossbow for them to break up and scatter.

The former subordinate pulled Liu'er by the collar and shouted over the din, "Old Man Liu, we should run now!"

Although they were captives, they had escorted the transportation of military supplies for the Biansha people. What's more, they even led them towards Zhongbo. The Libei Armored Cavalry and the Biansha Cavalry were sworn enemies with a blood feud between them. So if they were to fall into the Libei Armored Cavalry's hands, they would still have to die!

Liu'er hurriedly leaped off the wagon and limped along. "Go, go, go! Move!"

As if in tacit agreement, the bandits wanted to take to their heels and flee the moment they saw the cavalry retreating. But the squad behind them was long prepared for this and drew their blades to surround them, blocking off their paths so that they had no choice but to return to their original spot. Thrown into disarray, the bandits crowded together within the ring of horses' hooves. They wanted to break through the encirclement, but they had no blades. Gradually, they all squatted down amid the shouts at them and held their heads, not daring to make a ruckus again.

Fei Sheng and a few of them sent Shen Zechuan back to the horse carriage. The moment the curtain fell, they heard the dull, muffled sound of coughing. Gripping his candies, Ding Tao's eyes reddened. He was at a loss as he tugged on Fei Sheng's sleeve and said in a teary tone, "My, my Young Master..."

Fei Sheng covered Ding Tao's mouth with his palm and gestured around him to have the Imperial Bodyguards surround the horse carriage, thus setting the carriage apart from the armored cavalry and bandits.

Shen Zechuan bent over the seat. On his open palm was blood that he had just coughed out. The index and middle fingers on his right hand were racked with hot searing pain, as if they were being ripped apart. He had not bent over to pick Yang Shan Xue up earlier because he could not lift it. He lowered his head, pressing against his forehead, and forcibly swallowed down the blood that still wanted to gush up his throat.

A long time passed.

Shen Zechuan's voice sounded particularly low and deep across the curtain. "Do a headcount of the bandits and get them to continue pushing the wagon. Send someone to rush posthaste to Bianbo Camp and convey the news about this squad to Ce'an. Then send someone to hurry to Cizhou and inform Yuanzhuo to reassure Zhou Gui before my return. As long as King Yi has not dispatched his troops, Cizhou must not make the first move, no matter what King Yi says."

"Then, the Biansha captives..." Fei Sheng moved close to the curtain and asked carefully, "Are we to keep them?"

“Remove their blades and hammers.” Shen Zechuan clenched his palm and shifted his gaze under the darkness. “Execute them on the spot.”

The sky cleared up the next day.

Li Xiong crouched beside Jida’s corpse, looking as if there was something he could not figure out. He kept fiddling with Jida’s arm and looking at that poisonous scorpion over and over again.

Fei Sheng came over to boot Li Xiong and said, “Master had the others clear away the bodies. Why aren’t you allowing them to?”

Li Xiong was still angry. He pulled Jida’s arm up and pointed to the scorpion. “Why does he have the scorpion too? He can’t have a scorpion.”

Fei Sheng initially wanted to make fun of this silly lad, but the gears started turning in his mind, and he crouched down as well to ask Li Xiong, “Why can’t he have a scorpion? Have you seen this before?”

Li Xiong pointed to the back of his neck and answered, “My big bro has one lying here.”

Fei Sheng felt a chill run down his spine. With his heart in his mouth and sweat trickling down, he said, “When did Lei Jingzhe have it tattooed? Why has there never been a word of it on Mount Luo?”

Li Xiong tried his best to think as he pulled at his hair. “I don’t remember either. He had it a long time back—he already had it when he raised me! Gedale has a lot of scorpions. My big bro took me there at that time and even wanted to have it tattooed on me.”

Gedale!

Fei Sheng stood up at once and turned around to hurry towards the horse carriage.

Shen Zechuan was still resting. He drained the medical decoction from the morning like it was water. Ding Tao, who was keeping guard outside the carriage, heard Shen Zechuan cough several times. The medicinal smell wafted out from within, but no one dared to lift the curtains.

Fei Sheng did not dare to either, but this was a matter of great importance, so he placed a hand on the carriage for support and called out in a soft voice, “Master, master.”

Shen Zechuan was sleeping lightly; in fact, he had been semi-conscious the entire time. He leaned on his side against the pillow. The delayed onset of pain of the injuries on his back was taking hold now, and he was in so much pain that he could not lie flat. He removed the jade earring and wiped it for a long time before it was clean. Only then did he open his eyes and make a sound of acknowledgement.

Fei Sheng, even more cautious now, reported what he had heard earlier.

There was only silence from the interior of the carriage for a long time before Fei Sheng heard the rustling sound of sliding sleeves. After another moment, the curtain was lifted by a folding fan. With the fan in his left hand, and earring on his right ear, the expression in Shen Zechuan's eyes was much more piercing than ever.

The situation last night had been so critical that no one had paid any attention. With Li Xiong now standing beside Jida, the one thing that they had overlooked had become all the more apparent. Physique-wise, Jida was essentially what Li Xiong would grow up to become as an adult. They were both powerfully built, far more than the average man; their shoulders and arms were broad, their muscles rippling with astonishing explosive power.

Shen Zechuan lowered his folding fan and moved Jida's arm over. "Is it exactly the same?"

Li Xiong squatted and nodded sullenly. "Big bro's scorpion is a little smaller."

Shen Zechuan said to Fei Sheng, "Strip these corpses of their clothes."

Not long after, the Biansha Cavalry who perished last night lay stark naked across the ground. Fei Sheng examined them one at a time and found that all of them had scorpion tattoos. It was just that the scorpions were all freely positioned and hidden at locations that were hard to discover, such as the nape, pit of the stomach, side of the waist, and even behind the ear, but they were all on the upper body.

Shen Zechuan asked the Libei Armored Cavalry, "Are there scorpions like this on the battlefields?"

The remaining squad commander of the armored cavalry looked carefully at the tattoos and solemnly shook his head. "Never seen them before... The Twelve Tribes of Biansha indeed have the habit of tattooing their bodies, but those are either tribal totems or symbols of meritorious service. There are no scorpions in the Twelve Tribes."

Shen Zechuan had an ill sense of foreboding.

This was a squad that could deal a heavy blow and inflict heavy casualties on the Libei Armored Cavalry. Once they became a prevalent force in the war, the standoff on the battlegrounds would take a sudden turn for the worse. It would catch the generals of Libei off-guard and put them at a disadvantage. If they were really establishing a squad based on standards that Li Xiong exemplified, then it would not matter even if they were to lose their battle steeds. As long as they could breach Libei, all of Dazhou would be in imminent danger, let alone Zhongbo.

“Scorpions are everywhere in Gedale. Big bro called them brothers; they are our friends!” As Li Xiong spoke, he looked at Shen Zechuan. “They have many small scorpions too. They are very young and never come out to play.”

“Fei Sheng.” Shen Zechuan said immediately. “Copy down this scorpion and bring it to Libei together. Not just Libei, but also Cizhou and Chazhou. Tell Zhou Gui and Luo Mu to start checking the commoners in the territories immediately.” He paused for a moment, then emphasized his words. “Especially the garrison troops.”

Lei Jingzhe was a native of Dazhou. In the years that Zhongbo was out of control, anyone could freely get in and out of Zhongbo as he did. They could let in the Scorpions, and even send the Scorpions deeper into Dazhou.

What Shen Zechuan had thought of at this moment was not just the war, but also of the decaying of government administration since the reign of Yongyi. From the Zhongbo troops’ defeat to Xiao Jiming’s poisoning, and Feng Yisheng’s death in battle to Lu Guangbai’s desertion. They used to focus their attention on Qudu and the noble clans, but it had all become rather odd starting from the military grain case onward.

Xue Xiuzhuo wanted to resurge Dazhou. Forcing Lu Guangbai into desertion would not do him any good. Why would Qudu make light of Qidong military provisions when they knew full well that there was ill will between them and Libei at the same time? Shen Zechuan’s memories swiftly went backward in time. Watching scene after scene of the past flash away felt like he was once again standing in the summer heat of Qudu.

Who exactly had delivered the relay report to Wei Huaigu’s desk and subsequently forced him to his death?

Shen Zechuan suddenly broke out coughing. He clutched the blue handkerchief and covered his mouth and nose. But this cough was so violent that it not only startled Ding Tao; even Fei Sheng’s face turned pale.

“Master!” Fei Sheng made to support Shen Zechuan by the arm.

“Escort the military supplies back to Cizhou.” Shen Zechuan said behind the handkerchief. “There’s no need for the armored cavalry to follow any further. Leaving a few men behind will suffice. We'll head for Dunzhou today in disguise."

Gedale had Bai Cha's portrait, while Dunzhou had Shen Wei's Prince of Jianxing's Manor. These were the two key locations where it all began, along with the two blood kin with inextricable ties to Shen Zechuan.

"I want Lei Jingzhe as well." Shen Zechuan's expression was cold and detached as he enunciated each word. "Alive."

Author's Notes:

I know all of you have no doubt forgotten about the scorpion tattoo. Please refer to chapter 114.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Credit: Thank you Tea for proofreading!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 169 : DUNZHOU

Translated with: Jia<3

The military supply wagons were placed under the guard of the Libei Armored Cavalry and manually transported back to Cizhou by the bandits. Shen Zechuan only brought a dozen or so Imperial Bodyguards and some goods with him as he disguised himself as a traveling merchant heading north. They did not head down to Dunzhou directly, but took a detour to the public route leading from Fanzhou to Dunzhou and entered through the west gate.

Liu'er, with his biangu hat, followed behind Fei Sheng with his butt sticking out. As long as his eyes started roving, the Imperial Bodyguards would sandwich him in the middle so that he felt suffocated and could not move. He used to be Lei Jingzhe's messenger, so he was well-informed and the most familiar with the ongoings in Dunzhou. They would save a lot of trouble by getting him to lead the way. But this old man was a very crafty one. At first, in order to escape, he had smeared his face until it was all dark and swarthy, causing Fei Sheng to nearly miss him when he blended in with the group of bandits.

Shen Zechuan's medicine never stopped coming, and after being on the road for five days, his cough gradually subsided. However, he was still unable to apply too much pressure on the two fingers on his right hand. Given that he could not even pen letters these days, the messages to Libei and Cizhou were all written by Ding Tao on his behalf.

"When we enter the city, we have to first go to a pawnshop to register the goods." Liu'er tugged on the side of his biangu hat to hide his face, then folded his arms under his sleeves and craned his neck to say, "It's very chaotic now in Dunzhou. Only merchants who are registered and listed at the pawnshop can enter the city and stay at the inns. All the parties are playing it cautious. This is an unspoken rule. Anyone who doesn't know the rules is most certainly fishy."

Shen Zechuan rested his folding fan on his knee. He remained concealed from view in the carriage, revealing only a vague silhouette. "Who owns this pawnshop?"

“The Yan clan of Hezhou.” Liu’er lowered his voice and moved closer to the side of the carriage curtain. “When Lei Changming still had the Yan Clan to fund him, this place was a terrible mess. While it was said that Lei Changming was the one in charge, he was, after all, not the Provincial Administration Commissioner. Bandits like us don’t have that many staff and runners either, so we turned a blind eye when it came to what’s happening down there. But there were too many merchants coming and going. Who knows if they are spies? So Young Master Yan suggested Lei Changming set up a pawnshop here and hang up the words, ‘Tongming’. Brothers who conduct business deals with the Mount Luo bandits naturally know how to answer upon entering the shop. The Yan Clan later fell out with us, but Lei Changming kept this pawnshop as a show of respect for Young Master Yan.”

The corner of Shen Zechuan’s lips shifted ever so slightly. “And with that, the Yan Clan has the comings and goings in Dunzhou firmly in their grasp, with records of every business transaction Lei Changming has ever made. This Young Master Yan must no doubt be better acquainted with these years’ accounts than Lei Changming himself, right?”

“He’s a child prodigy, yes?” Liu’er smacked his lips. “Not one business deal Yan Heru conducted himself has ever been unprofitable. This person may be young, but he’s a mercenary man who loves money very, very much! There is no business he doesn’t dare to dip his fingers into.”

“Lei Changming saved his life. There must be a reason that caused them to fall out with one another.” Shen Zechuan recalled the incident regarding the lawful grandson of the Shao clan and asked in passing.

Throughout the journey here, Liu’er had been going all out to ingratiate himself with Shen Zechuan for fear that Shen Zechuan would kill him off once he outlived his usefulness. He immediately weighed up the stakes and sold Lei Changming out. “Lei Changming had an addiction... and it grew progressively worse in recent years. The commoners in the two prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou were very much afraid and did not dare to keep their children at home around for fear that we would carry them off and give them to Lei Changming. At first, Lei Changming kept the Yan clan in the dark and did not dare to bring it up. But later, he asked the brothels in Fanzhou for some young ones, and the children the procuress came over to deliver were recorded in the pawnshop as rice flour. This was uncovered by the Yan Clan’s audits, and Young Master Yan flew into a terrible rage. Lei Changming promised Yan Heru that he would turn over a new leaf, but how could he change something like this? With Cai Yu fanning the flames on his end, it didn't take long for them to fall out for real. Yan Heru cut off the monthly funds to Mount Luo, and grains stopped heading our way."

Having said to this point, Liu'er faced the carriage curtain.

"It was because of this that we were starving so badly on Mount Luo. Lei Jingzhe had Lei Changming demand grains from Cizhou. Zhou Gui had no troops and power then, and he gave in time and time again. It just so happened that the emperor in Qudu passed away. When the marquis rebelled, the uncle and nephew pair plotted to use Han Jin to exchange for noble titles. In any case, no one's keeping Zhongbo under control. If it really worked out and they get conferred with the title of a prince or something, then we would transform into a regular local army!"

Shen Zechuan tapped with his fingertips and said, "Lei Jingzhe is truly a good child."

Lei Jingzhe was the brains behind Lei Changming. How could he have let Lei Changming take a tumble over such a simple matter like Fanzhou's delivery of children? It was because the Yan clan cut off Lei Changming's monthly funds that Lei Changming would turn his main forces on Cizhou. He marched his troops to Cizhou in such an ostentatious display and ended up being targeted and killed by Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan—he was indeed a target set up to be a scapegoat.

In all probability, Lei Jingzhe had long wanted to usurp and take over his position. They might have gone to Han Cheng in an attempt to exchange for noble titles, but Han Cheng might not necessarily be willing to acquiesce to both men's presumptuous demands. Throw in Lei Changming's insatiable greed into the mix, and it remained to be seen whether they could even reach an agreement. So, Lei Jingzhe took Lei Changming, his kin maternal uncle, out of the equation and let him die conveniently in the strife without ever tying himself directly to it.

This suggested two possibilities. The first was that Han Cheng was not a Scorpion, and the Scorpions were far less capable than Shen Zechuan feared. The second was that they were all pawns and did not need to mutually know each other; they just had to stay in their place and do what they ought to do to complete the mission.

Shen Zechuan had his own theory regarding both of these conjectures. He lost himself in his thoughts and did not speak again.

It was already the hour of hai when the horse carriage entered the city, and as its name suggested, Tongming Pawnshop was indeed brightly lit. Fei Sheng brought Liu'er along to register themselves and saw horse carriages of all styles and colors outside the pawnshop. There were the Longyou merchants that had come around from Juexi as well as human traffickers from Fanzhou. A hubbub of abacus beads being flicked and all sorts of shouts filled the place, where every imaginable ware was on sale. It was already such a late hour, and yet the place was still bustling with activity.

As the hub, Tongming Pawnshop sat in the center with large lanterns hung up on both sides of it. Wine taverns and stores operated all night, with the hustle and bustle keeping up until dawn. There were plenty of beggars, but they were all being bossed around. Prostitutes of all ages drew close to the coming and going wealthy men and pulled them to the inns so that they had a place to sleep for free for a night, relying on this to earn some money for food. Amidst the surge of crowd, Fei Sheng noticed a few Biansha faces.

This place did not seem to have been once defeated in war. The stench of wine and meat gone sour permeated the air along with the fragrance of perfumes and spices from Juexi and the Chashi River; they jostled against one another for prominence, subsequently turning into a fusion of smells that made one's knees weak. This street was like a milky way reflected from the vault of heavens that converged the remaining bright lights in Zhongbo together, making the surroundings look pitch-dark in comparison.

There were so many people around that Fei Sheng did not dare to be too conceited and careless. Armed with the tips Liu'er had given, he headed inside the pawnshop and looked around for someone to submit his registration. The goods were miscellaneous grains from Huaizhou. The store clerk busily and methodically checked them one at a time according to the sequence of the hanging tags. He moved quickly, and the younger assistant following behind him was even quicker in noting it all down.

When the shop clerk came before the horse carriage, he did not presumptuously reach out to lift the curtains, but bowed at it in all earnestness. "You sirs come from the west and are all-powerful connoisseurs of the trade, and since you have made your way to our Dunzhou, we dare not be poor hosts, so we will just lay it all out here first.

You must be fatigued from the journey, so treat it as some entertainment tidbits to relieve your boredom.”

Shen Zechuan did not answer.

This shop clerk had seen his fair share of traveling merchants, and he had prior dealings with both magnates and bandits before, so he knew that some of these customers had terrible tempers. He remained firmly on his feet with a neutral expression and said, “Once you have entered the city, it’s all entirely up to you whoever you decide to have business dealings with; no one can interfere, for it’s nobody else’s business. As fleeting as our encounters are, we are all fellow travelers whose paths have crossed. Our coming here for the same purpose makes us acquaintances who should mutually get along and help each other. Dunzhou is remote and out of the way, so let’s all look out for one another. If you require mediation for any issues, feel free to send someone to the shop to let us know. No matter where these people are from, the assistants will always be standing ready to assist without delay as long as you so command. However, there is one rule that must be made clear to you. Any goods that are meant for purchase and sales have to be recorded down on file in the shop, and every good on record in the shop has to be a genuine product. By having yourself registered for business in our shop, you can be considered as having received the nod from the Yan clan. In Dunzhou, we share prestige and wealth together.” After the shop clerk was done speaking, he bowed once more to the horse carriage, then turned aside and lifted his arm to guide them. “A courtyard has been especially prepared in the back for you. Please choose the attendants as you please. We have all kinds of fresh, seasonal fruits available for your enjoyment. As long as you stay in Dunzhou, you can ask for anything you would like to eat or enjoy. Our Yan Clan will take care of it all for you!”

Fei Sheng was secretly rendered speechless. The Xi Clan was wealthy, but they were nowhere as generous as this. This Yan Heru was truly incredible. Rumor had it that he loved money as much as he treasured his life, but he also spent money like water. He was an ostentatious man who loved gold. He invested all of his capital into Dunzhou and won over the hearts of all the traveling merchants. It was no wonder that the Xi Clan’s chain of shops could not make their foray into the market in the east at all!

The shop clerk did not waste any more time on superfluous talk and shouted, “The Sixteenth Courtyard of Tianji welcomes its distinguished guests!”

The horse carriage started moving with a rumble, guided into the courtyard by a specially deployed errand-runner.

With his face to the carriage window, Shen Zechuan heard the melody that drifted from the upper floors of the wine tavern in the darkness. The dazzling display of lanterns in a kaleidoscope of colors through the carriage drapes looked like multi-colored waves of shimmering water so gorgeous that one was left mesmerized and captivated.

The moment Liu'er entered the courtyard, he clicked his tongue in wonder. He took his shoes off before stepping on the porch and held them in his bosom as he followed behind Fei Sheng and cast glances all around. He thought out loud, “Hot damn... just how much silver would you need to spend on all these...”

Fei Sheng took a look at the hallway. “Not unless you have a million to splurge.”

Liu'er had never before seen this much money, and neither had Fei Sheng. It had to be known that during the reign of Xiande, the military budget allocated to Libei and Qidong totaled to merely two million, tops. The imperial court officials had to reduce their salaries and scrimp and save to provide for the Libei Armored Cavalry and Qidong Garrison Troops. The imperial court was so ridiculously poor it was driving all of them insane, and yet here Yan Heru was, splurging hundreds of thousands of taels at a mere wave of his hand, all just for the sake of entertaining his guests.

The journey had truly been difficult. Fei Sheng did not dare to make Shen Zechuan endure it for any longer and attended to him as he drank the medicine. He then called for a subordinate to prepare water and make the bed. He did not dare to urge Shen Zechuan to take a rest, and so he quietly instructed Ding Tao to do so.

Fei Sheng did not call for any of the attendants from the Yan Clan to serve in the yard. The courtyard was guarded by rank after rank of Imperial Bodyguards, with Fei Sheng staying in the innermost layer to stand guard under the eaves of Shen Zechuan's room. Not only were the Imperial Bodyguards on guard duty on the ground, but they were also stationed on the ridge of the upturned eaves. Ding Tao, having slept his fill in the carriage during the daytime, was now sitting up there writing and drawing with Li Xiong. The words that Xiao Chiye had said before they had set off would pop up from time to time in Fei Sheng's mind, so much so that Fei Sheng's heart would leap into his mouth if Shen Zechuan so much as let out a cough in the night.

Shen Zechuan was not familiar with Dunzhou, yet for some reason, the nightmares hit him hard that night. Chashi Sinkhole had disappeared, and the Prince of Jianxing's Manor had replaced it in its place.

The deaf and mute aunty sat under those dark and gloomy eaves, while Shen Zechuan stood in the dimly lit room, feeling thirsty. As the table was so very tall, he stood on tiptoe to reach for the teacup, but ended up brushing it onto the ground. Broken fragments of porcelain that had shattered by his foot went flying all over, cutting his finger.

Shen Zechuan started to sob.

He felt inexplicably upset, as if he had broken something precious.

But no matter how much Shen Zechuan sobbed, the aunty merely continued to focus on her embroidery with her back to him. She extended her arm and pressed it down, which subsequently elongated her shadow all the way to Shen Zechuan's foot and turned it into a grotesque, long-limbed creature. She repeated this one action over and over again, her surroundings shrouded in dead silence.

Shen Zechuan's finger was burning with searing pain. He clutched his robes in his anxiety and bandaged the wounded finger. Blood very quickly bloomed through his robe, like a camellia that had broken apart upon falling onto the snowfield—red and vivid.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Special thanks to Alex for sparing brain cells and to Tea for proofreading!

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 170 : CREATURE

Translated with: Jia<3

The two fingers on Shen Zechuan's right hands trembled violently, the blazing pain jolting him awake in a split second. He wearily raised his right arm and spread his palm open, only to realize that he could not move his two fingers freely. The window paper glowed indistinctly with light—to think he had slept until this hour.

Shen Zechuan set down his arm and let the sweat trickle down along his temples. After a moment, he rolled over and got up, his two fingers slightly curled as he put on his clothes.

On hearing the sound of movements, Fei Sheng turned back and beckoned to the subordinate bearing the medicine to come over and attend to Shen Zechuan. The door opened, and Fei Sheng lifted the hem of his robe and strode in. Shen Zechuan was standing and washing up by the copper basin.

“Master.” Fei Sheng went around to the side and said softly, “We called for a physician early in the morning. He’s waiting out there. Shall we summon him in to take a look?”

Shen Zechuan placed the handkerchief back into the basin and, in a rare moment in which he did not refute him, said, “Call him in.”

Delighted, Fei Sheng immediately shouted for the physician. In the interim, he said to Shen Zechuan, “We released the men last night. With Liu’er’s connections with his old acquaintances, the news came in pretty fast. Master, Lei Jingzhe is right here in the city!”

Shen Zechuan stood by the door and looked back pensively at Fei Sheng.

The fact that Lei Jingzhe reacted so quickly illustrated that they had committed the transportation route of the military supply firmly to mind, with even the possibility of a delay taken into account. Thus, Lei Jingzhe immediately headed down to Dunzhou when the squad did not arrive these couple of days. It was likely that he wanted to get to the bottom of who had robbed the Scorpions.

“The military supply wagons to Cizhou have the Libei Armored Cavalry keeping watch over them along the way. The news can’t have spread that fast. They should have entered Cizhou by now. Whether or not Lei Jingzhe can get to the bottom of the matter, the stuff and men are ours now.” Fei Sheng stepped aside and watched as Shen Zechuan drank his medicine. “But it’s too tough to catch Lei Jingzhe alive in the city. Master. There are still four hundred Scorpions watching over the bandits they took captive, and these men could also be considered as Lei Jingzhe’s soldiers. Our numbers are far too low.”

The medicine was so bitter it put a slight frown on Shen Zechuan’s face. “To date, Lei Jingzhe still has yet to put Mount Luo and Duanzhou in order. This indicates that he doesn’t have enough soldiers under his command to deploy. He likely smuggled the armaments to ingratiate himself with Biansha. So, the four hundred Scorpions in the city of Dunzhou might not necessarily be willing to listen to his orders. Besides, we came to Dunzhou to make money on amicable terms, not to seize what’s others by force. We can take our time.” He handed the empty bowl to Fei Sheng. “Cizhou has nothing of importance to attend to lately. I have all the time in the world to have my fun with him.”

When Fei Sheng took the bowl, he saw Shen Zechuan’s hand dangling from the opening of his sleeve. The color drained from his face, and he lifted the hem of his robe and kneeled. “That hand’s broken, isn’t it, Master?! We were in such a rush during our journey... I’m really blind. To think I never—”

“Time was of the essence then, and it’s not like we could find a decent physician midway into our journey.” Seeing how panicked Fei Sheng was, Shen Zechuan said, “It’s just two fingers that are broken, not severed. Let the physician set them with steel needles and have them bandaged later. They’ll be fine after half a year of healing.”

Shen Zechuan downplayed his injuries and responded in such a nonchalant manner, but listening to him filled Fei Sheng with fear and trepidation. In an act of either genuine sentiment or feigned sincerity, Fei Sheng’s eyes reddened as he braced himself against the ground with his hands and said in a trembling voice, “When the master is wounded, his subject deserves death for letting it happen. It doesn’t stand to reason for a guard to be right by his master’s side and still let his master get injured.” As he spoke, he raised a hand and slapped himself several times on the cheeks.

“It’s all because we are so useless that Master even has to come personally to our rescue! Master, I beseech Master to bestow our deserved punishments on us!”

Fei Sheng was now leading the Imperial Bodyguards, and by kneeling here to slap himself without the slightest trace of hesitation, he was also effectively slapping the faces of those men outside. He was lowering himself to let everyone in here and out there understand that this incident was a wake-up call. Such an oversight could not be made ever again; Shen Zechuan must never get hurt. From the moment they arrived in Zhongbo after being forsaken by Han Cheng and were rejected by Xiao Chiye, Shen Zechuan was the only candidate left to be their master.

Qiao Tianya had a knack for managing his subordinates too. In fact, he was even more well-liked by the subordinates than Fei Sheng was, but he was much too uninhibited. At times, he seemed to treat Shen Zechuan more like a friend than a master. Fei Sheng had already garnered much from Shen Zechuan’s act of deploying Qiao Tianya over to Yao Wenyu’s side.

Could Yao Wenyu’s body heal soon? If not, then Qiao Tianya would stay by Yao Wenyu’s side for as long as several years. The vacated position beside Shen Zechuan was given to Fei Sheng, which in Fei Sheng’s view was a hint that he had to accomplish what Qiao Tianya would not do while in the same position. He had to make it clear to the current Imperial Bodyguards that it was out of respect for Ji Gang that Shen Zechuan did not pursue their dereliction of duty. But they must never, ever repeat the same mistake again.

As long as Shen Zechuan had not given the nod, Fei Sheng would never take action. Likewise, as long as Shen Zechuan gave the command – good or bad – Fei Sheng would execute it and see it through to the very end. He was far more aware of his own place than Qiao Tianya was—he was Shen Zechuan’s guard, not Shen Zechuan’s friend. As such, he would not privately report Shen Zechuan’s injury to Xiao Chiye.

The Imperial Bodyguards followed suit and kneeled too, their faces burning with pain as they listened to the sounds of Fei Sheng’s slaps. Fei Sheng smacked himself until his cheeks turned red, and even so, he was still lifting his hand for another slap when a folding fan suddenly intercepted his hand.

“There can be no progress without pain. As long as you don’t repeat the same mistake, it’s alright.” Shen Zechuan shifted the fan in his left hand away. "All the people in the courtyard are good men. Punishments will come to those who have done wrong. I naturally have my own arrangements for when we return to Cizhou. You may rise now."

The fact that Shen Zechuan did not let Fei Sheng continue to slap himself meant that he had no intention to humiliate them. He gave scholars their due respects, but he did not treat the Imperial Bodyguards shabbily either. Their monthly salaries were issued in a timely manner and converted to ready silver based on Qudu's standard, and the Imperial Bodyguards' residences were all spacious, well-lit rooms. What's more, there was Ji Gang to give them martial arts pointers at all times. At first, they all thought Shen Zechuan to be a capricious man who was a tough one to serve, but over time, they realized that Shen Zechuan was pretty much set in his preferences. He duly meted out rewards and punishments as needed, and his commands were all decisive and straightforward; there had never been an incident in which he took out his anger on his subordinates.

Fei Sheng wiped his tears and kowtowed a few more times to Shen Zechuan before rising to his feet and taking his position at the side. Ding Tao stared blankly at the scene unfolding before him and felt a great wave of guilt wash over him. The physician outside happened to arrive just then, so Fei Sheng lifted the curtains and invited the physician in.

Both of Shen Zechuan's fingers had indeed been broken, but they were fortunately not severed. As he expected, the physician had them set and secured with steel needles. With half a year of recuperation, they should be more or less healed.

"My lord should not wield a blade or draw a bow these days." The physician was an old man. As the fee they paid him was generous, he made a special point of giving further instructions when he got up. "You've been putting off having this injury treated for quite a few days. Fortunately, you didn't delay it past today. Otherwise, it couldn't be set back into place even with the steel needles. My lord seems to me to be in poor health, and it's now coincidentally the eighth month where sudden fluctuations in weather temperature are a common occurrence. Pay more attention to your meals and attire. Don't fall ill again."

The physician lifted his sleeves to pack his medical case when he remembered something else.

"Is my lord always having trouble sleeping?" He said. "Business has to be conducted, but it's taxing on the mind and body. No human will be able to take it if they keep getting haunted by nightmares over a long period of time. I'll get you a brocade pouch later and fill it with some incense to help you sleep. You can put it under your pillow at night and see if it works."

Fei Sheng bent over to help the physician carry his medical case and saw him out.

Shen Zechuan sat on the chair and sized up his right hand in the momentary silence that followed. Two of his fingers were bound together so securely that it proved inconvenient for him to stretch them. He could forget about grasping his blade now. It was really by a stroke of good fortune that they were not severed.

But why would he dream of the Prince of Jianxing's residence?

Last night's dream played out on what seemed to be a yellowish worn-out rag, where only the back of the aunty was visible because Shen Zechuan no longer remembered how she looked. He cried so sadly for that cup of water—but had it been really for that cup of water?

Shen Zechuan rested his elbow on the chair handle and leaned back slowly. His gaze shifted along the half-lowered bamboo blinds to the eaves shrouded under the shadow of a tree. He slowed the dream in his mind in an attempt to lay every scene out for deeper scrutiny.

The deaf and mute aunty sat under the eaves.

The courtyard was tiny, and the direction in which the house was facing was terrible; once dusk fell, the interior would get dim rather quickly. Shen Zechuan was still short, so short that he did not have to bend over to look into the inner chamber. He wanted so much to drink that cup of water; his entire throat seemed to be on fire. But he could not reach it. Thus, he stood on tiptoe.

Shen Zechuan tilted his head up slightly.

He stood on tiptoe—this was not the first time this had happened. He knew it was possible that the teacup might fall onto the ground. So at the same time he stood on tiptoe, he looked inside. The inner chamber was too dark. The windows were all unopened, and that half-lowered beaded curtain was bereft of life. It remained still and unmoving, a tint of white in the darkness.

Shen Zechuan frowned and continued to pry further as if in a trance.

Why did he have to look in?

The young Shen Zechuan stood on tiptoe and leaned over the edge of the table to look at that mass of darkness. He blinked several times and did not withdraw his gaze, but he could not help but reach his fingers out to touch the rim of the teacup. Someone stirred in the darkness, and at the moment his attention was diverted, Shen Zechuan accidentally brushed the teacup aside and dropped it. The sound of the teacup shattering was so crystal clear it was as if it had been smashed right beside his ear. It startled the person in the inner chamber into turning around. The strange shadow of the aunty who kept lifting her arm soundlessly grabbed Shen Zechuan by the foot, and it was at this very moment Shen Zechuan saw a terror-stricken face.

Shen Zechuan suddenly sucked in a breath as he snapped back to his senses and found that he had subconsciously clenched his right hand into a fist. Intense pain throbbed in those two fingers. The weather was hot today, but Shen Zechuan's back was all drenched in a cold sweat.

He had seen Shen Wei.

Shen Wei's face that was all contorted with terror was so jarring on the eyes that it jolted Shen Zechuan to his feet. He irritably relaxed his right hand and faced the shadow of the tree under the eaves, but he could not recall exactly what Shen Wei had been doing.

Why was Shen Wei so panic-stricken?

The inner chamber was too dark; Shen Zechuan could not see a thing at all. Even Shen Wei's face seemed to be lodged in a thick black mass of shadows. He kept thinking back to it, but still made no progress. His memory seemed to have been stuck in time, frozen upon the frame of Shen Wei's face.

Damn.

Shen Zechuan knew how to restrain his irascibility firmly under an icy demeanor, but not this time. The abhorrence his expression exposed was a clear indicator that he was already standing on the brink of the precipice. He was just like a trapped beast as he shut his eyes in the sunlight, the sweat oozing from his temples.

Blood oozed out from his cut finger, staining his robe. Once again, pale white juxtaposed with vivid red. The beaded curtain was clearly dead, but it swung violently as it came back to life again in the scenes that flashed by. The strange shadow grabbed hold of Shen Zechuan, whose finger was still bleeding. Meanwhile, the aunty kept up with her never-ending embroidery as her arms stretched longer and longer until the expanding shadow mutated into a scorpion swinging its tail.

“Thud!”

Shen Zechuan abruptly shifted his gaze over.

Ding Tao’s legs gave way, and he fell onto his butt on the ground, looking as though he was looking at a stranger. All the hair on his body was standing on end. His candy tumbled out and rolled on the ground, where it bumped into Shen Zechuan’s snapped fan.

Shen Zechuan leaned over to pick up the candy off the ground and handed it to Ding Tao, but Ding Tao did not reach out for it. Instead, he shifted back a little in fear and trepidation to flee from Shen Zechuan’s shadow.

Shen Zechuan’s throat bobbed. It was as if he was a demonic creature stripped of its skin to be thoroughly exposed under the stinging sunlight. The pale sides of his neck revealed his vulnerability, and as the wind huffed at his sleeves, he let loose a laugh into the long, endless stillness and gently tossed the candy away.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 171 : TATTOO

Translated with: Jia<3

Ding Tao was petrified. In that instant when their eyes met, he thought that he would die like Jida had. He could still remember the expression in Shen Zechuan's eyes when the latter killed Jida, and the same expression had been in those eyes as they locked on him just a moment ago. He wanted nothing more than to run, and when Shen Zechuan handed him the candy, he lost the courage to raise his arm.

It was silent under the eaves. Shen Zechuan had already retreated back into the room. The harsh sunlight blazed upon Ding Tao's frame. He had yet to recover his wits. That kind of feeling was indescribable, but one thing was for sure—this was not the young master he was familiar with.

Ding Tao lifted both arms and wiped haphazardly at his eyes. He wanted to pick up the candy, but it had long melted from the heat of the sun. The delicate sweetness of osmanthus attracted a colony of ants. Ding Tao remained kneeling in place. He did not know why, but the tears had begun to pitter-patter down from his eyes.

Shen Zechuan's interrupted memories could no longer be strung together into a coherent whole. It had been too dark in the dream; he simply could not remember any more details. He stood behind the bamboo blinds and heard Ding Tao sobbing beneath the eaves.

Shen Zechuan told himself:

He must not dwell too deeply on this dream.

He had to sieve the truth from falsehood as soon as possible and decipher if the contents of this dream were real scenes he had genuinely seen before or if they had been a figment of his imagination. For six years, he had been subjected to the compulsion of nightmares; he knew best that such dreams were sometimes a mixed bag of reality and fiction. It was just like how he used to dream of the Chashi Sinkhole in the past, although the sight that greeted him in the sinkhole would change according to his state of mind.

After Shen Zechuan had gotten injured during his trip to Chazhou, he dreamed of himself lying in the sinkhole. That was the prelude to his mistrust of his own body and his realization that he had begun to fear death. Frequent nightmares could mess with memories, and in truth, Shen Zechuan could no longer be certain of the words that Ji Mu had said to him before his death.

How dangerous.

Shen Zechuan thought self-deprecatingly to himself.

It was just one Shen Wei.

Liu'er's network of connections came in very handy. They hid all over the city in every street and alley, and as long as they were paid enough, they could become "eyes" of varying sizes. By capitalizing on these informants, Fei Sheng could snoop into every nook and cranny of Dunzhou without even stepping foot outside. However, Lei Jingzhe's movements were intriguing, to say the least.

"Lei Jingzhe has been brazenly carrying out his search for three consecutive days. He's checked through all the goods entering and exiting." Fei Sheng said in a hushed tone behind Shen Zechuan. "Master, could it be that he already knows that we're in the city?"

Shen Zechuan was wearing a zheyang hat<sup>1</sup> that was common in Qudu. "If that's the case, he should be checking the wagons and carriages of the merchants coming and going rather than the goods themselves."

This batch of military supplies was very important to Lei Jingzhe; otherwise, he would not have promptly rushed over to Dunzhou to check on it personally. Based on Shen Zechuan's guess, Lei Jingzhe wanted to exchange this batch of supplies for something else of equivalent value from the Twelve Tribes of Biansha. Yet, he did not search to the west immediately when he arrived in Dunzhou; instead, he wandered around the city of Dunzhou.

Shen Zechuan lifted his arms to lean over the edge of the railing and surveyed the restaurant from top to bottom through the sheer fabric. He took his time organizing his thoughts, then said, "Checking the goods shows that Lei Jingzhe thinks those supply wagons will still return to Dunzhou."

How strange.

Shen Zechuan tapped his fingertips on the railing.

How could Lei Jingzhe be so sure that the supply wagons would return to Dunzhou? The numbers of powers in Zhongbo who could devour this batch of provisions were few and far between. Cizhou was one of the primary suspects. Shen Zechuan was even prepared to challenge Lei Jingzhe openly, but as it turned out, Lei Jingzhe had not suspected him at all.

“Master, even if Lei Jingzhe thought someone else robbed the supplies, who would resend them back to Dunzhou?” Fei Sheng could make neither head nor tail of it. “There are still Scorpions stationed here. Transporting the supplies back would be walking right into the trap.”

“You’re right.” Shen Zechuan, who had been having difficulty sleeping these days, wearily massaged the center of his brows. “Who in the world would rob the goods and send them back later...”

This made no sense at all.

“The informants we have successively planted in Dunzhou turned out to be of no use precisely because it’s too chaotic over here.” Fei Sheng plucked up his courage and said, “Could it be a bandit who is unwilling to defect to the Biansha people scheming against Lei Jingzhe?”

Shen Zechuan thought about it carefully and gave a slight shake of his head. “After the split of the Mount Luo bandits, there has never been a leader who could win over the masses. Ding Niu and Liu’er were taken captive because they never thought of joining forces to oppose Lei Jingzhe. It’s possible for them to be small-time bandits based on their current size, but they would never have the courage to lay their hands on such a big batch of supplies. “

Military armament was not like other things. They could not be taken apart and hidden like grains. Given that this batch of supply wagons required hundreds of bandits to push it, it was easy to imagine just how heavy it was. Those small-time bandits could not have swallowed it at all. Shen Zechuan’s ability to transfer them hinged on the fact that he did not kill off that batch of bandits, along with the fact there was also the Libei Armored Cavalry tagging along to hold the bandits in check. Otherwise, he would not have easily gotten his hands on this batch of stuff.

This matter was so bizarre it was a little ludicrous.

Fei Sheng did not dare to laugh. He thought about it for a moment. If only Mister Chengfeng or Yuanzhuo were here, he would not have needed to speak up. But there was no one beside Shen Zechuan at present, and Fei Sheng would look like a blockhead if he just stood there without moving, so he thought hard about it for a moment and said, “Could it be—”

A sudden stir of commotion downstairs cut off Fei Sheng's words. Shen Zechuan lifted the veil of his hat and squinted his eyes at the main hall. Being on the fifth floor, they had a full view of the situation in the main hall.

This restaurant belonged to the Yan clan. Shen Zechuan was here because Lei Jingzhe would be here tonight to entertain a certain someone. The identity of said person was unknown for the time being. His informants were not good enough to pull off that level of information, but Shen Zechuan more or less had a guess who it was.

"The scorpions." Fei Sheng lowered his voice. "Lei Jingzhe brought the scorpions."

Shen Zechuan looked down at Lei Jingzhe. The latter had just recovered from his injuries, and his hair had been cropped short. One could hardly distinguish him from the Biansha Scorpions crowding around him. Due to the distance, Shen Zechuan was unable to get a clear look at the tattoo on Lei Jingzhe's nape.

Lei Jingzhe apparently had matters to attend to. He stepped across the hall and hurried up the stairs.

"If he's here for the feast," Fei Sheng slowly furrowed his brow, "then that's quite the number of people he has brought along with him, isn't it?"

There were plenty of merchants in this building, but no one dared to stand in Lei Jingzhe's way. He had indeed brought a lot of men with him; there were at least thirty of them. A few of them followed him up the stairs while the rest took their seats in the main hall. The Imperial Bodyguards in their various disguises kept their composure and watched Lei Jingzhe as they drank, made merry, and even brushed past him.

Shen Zechuan picked his teacup up and watched Lei Jingzhe head up the fifth floor to the area across from him. He sipped his tea and said, "When you get back, give Liu'er some monetary reward for his accuracy in pinpointing the location."

Fei Sheng acknowledged the order.

The party on the opposite end lowered the bamboo blinds to keep out prying eyes. The few men Lei Jingzhe brought along stood guard outside. Fei Sheng, who had great eyesight, carefully searched for the scorpion tattoos on these men's bodies with the help of the lit lanterns.

A little less than an hour later, the lanterns in the building were all raised. The party on the other side called for their food to be served, and waiters weaved in and out of the area. Fei Sheng attempted to shift his position, but the screen at the other end had been so cleverly erected that he could not find the chance to snoop.

Lei Jingzhe's feast stretched on for a very long time from the hour of you to the hour of hai, and they still had yet to call it a day. Shen Zechuan had already finished an entire pot of tea and was leaning sleepily against his chair. Another two hours passed, and the vibrancy in the atmosphere in the building turned up a notch instead of evaporating.

"It's the Yan Clan's show now." Fei Sheng reminded Shen Zechuan in a whisper. "Master, this is a signal for the various merchants to have fun among themselves."

Shen Zechuan breathed an acknowledgement and tiredly opened his eyes to look downstairs for a while from his seemingly drab seat. "A free market it is. The Yan clan profits from playing the mediator between the various parties here. What they collect is privilege money. Tell them in a while to sell the grains we brought over as well."

"Human traffickers." Fei Sheng looked attentively at the people below. "That's the procuress from Fanzhou."

The procuress of Fanzhou was a rotund, heavily made-up woman ostentatiously decked out in loud, showy apparel. When she came here in the past, it was for the specific purpose of bringing children for Lei Changming; she had never carried out any transactions with the other merchants. But her business in Dunzhou was impeded when the Yan clan fell out with Lei Changming, so she reluctantly switched to selling women, whom she took in from the various prefectures in Zhongbo. In those few years where the starvation among the people was at its worst, a dou of grains could be exchanged for an entire family of young and old.

"Master." Fei Sheng half-bent over and began to introduce in detail. "This procuress's name is Cuiqing. We dug into her background in passing while we were monitoring the prices of commodities in Fanzhou. She and Lei Changming have a shared past. She was initially a native of Duanzhou, and before the defeat of the Zhongbo's troops, she worked as a procuress too. Later, she went to Fanzhou and continued to ply her old trade there. Lei Changming was the one who forked out the deposit. That was why she was willing to take the risk and deliver the children to Lei Changming."

Grasping her handkerchief in hand, Cuiqing twisted her body to squeeze through the group of merchants. No one dared to take advantage of her in this place. On the contrary, however, she would think of ways to get her hands on whoever she occasionally took a fancy to. As an old-timer in the three prefectures of Dunzhou, Duanzhou, and Fanzhou who had dabbled for a long time in the trade, she had some involvement with Lei Changming and Cai Yu, although she had yet to board a big ship like the Yan clan.

Cuiqing was so obese that she squeezed a few men out of the way when she sat down. She crossed her legs and reclined against the side of the table. The fair-faced man following behind her kneeled to light her pipe for her. She tilted her head to suck in a few mouthfuls, then blew out puffs of smoke.

“My eldest nephew hasn’t come down yet?” Cuiqing cast a few glances up. “They are taking such a long time. He should’ve been done by now even if he was messing under the sheets, let alone having a meal.”

The merchant sitting by her side said, “What good stuff has the madam brought along this time? Take them out while you can and show them to us. We’d be keen too if there’s one suitable!”

“Bah.” Cuiqing examined the gold and jade bracelets on her right hand. “Are you even worthy of the good stuff? The ones we brought along this time are not salacious goods worth a mere few dozens of silvers. Those are all young virgins in the prime of their youth! In Qudu, you can forget about taking them away without at least a few hundred taels.”

“How is a virgin worth this sum? Whores are all temptresses, so it’s only natural for them to be more expensive the more seasoned they are!”

“You guys are only worthy of fooling around in those lousy brothels.” Cuiqing stroked the fair-faced man’s cheeks with her manicured finger that had been painted with nail polish and cackled. “Back in the old days when Duanzhou was still the money-spinner of Dazhou, all the girls in my stable were unrivaled beauties. Which of the cheap sluts from other brothels has even been able to beat my girls in all the years the establishment has been ranking them?”

Cuiqing generally did not bring up the past given how pathetically she had fled during the defeat of the Zhongbo’s troops, but the atmosphere was great tonight, with flattery freely thrown around left and right. She smoked her pipe, looking very pleased with herself as the others clustered around her.

“Not to boast of my high standards, but if it had been in the past, the goods I brought along today would only be worthy enough to serve tea in my establishment.” The rouge on Cuiqing’s lips was bright red, and her thick make-up concealed much of her wrinkles. From the contours of her face, it was visibly apparent that this one had also been a great beauty several decades back.

“Come on, give us names!”

With a contemptuous smile, Cuiqing said, “The top three in the ranks were all girls from my establishment, and each one of them married well. Today, prostitutes and performers are inseparable from one another,<sup>2</sup> but back then, they were as different as the waters of the Jing and Wei Rivers.<sup>3</sup> All of you have to spend gold just to catch a glimpse of those who sell their arts, and they can simply refuse to see you when they were in business. They were even more precious than the young missies from rich, prominent families. My eldest nephew’s mother was also a girl of mine, the famous Xiaoyinlei<sup>4</sup> of the Chashi riverside who married into the Zhu clan in Duanzhou.”

As Cuiqing spoke, she pinched the man’s face and blew smoke into his face.

“These were all small potatoes. The one I doted on the most was the number one in the establishment. Ever heard of ‘pure as white jade, as if made of porcelain’? Back then, just putting up her name alone would have the whole city of Duanzhou turning up in full force. Even the emperor himself who was faraway in Qudu wanted a glimpse of her ravishing appearance!”

The surrounding merchants clapped their hands and said in delight. “That’s Bai Cha!”

Under the spiraling wisps of smoke, an entranced Cuiqing put up her hand, looking as if she was still reveling in her past as she snorted and murmured, “Bai Cha huh... do you people really think ‘pure as white jade’ is a fabrication? She was what it truly meant to be like jade and porcelain. If all of you were to see her, I’m sure all of you would no doubt kneel down to be her footrest if she so much as furrowed her brows. No one could bear to let her get sullied by the dust on the ground...”

The hall reeked of smoke so thick that several courtesans who were sitting with them coughed. But girls like them who earn a living by prostituting themselves did not dare to cover their noses and mouths for fear that the patrons beside them thought that they were being disdained, so every one of them held it in until their powdered cheeks flushed red as they remained squeezed in the middle, all drenched in sweat. Cuiqing got someone to set up the cards with the intention to play a couple of games that were all the rage in Qudu. The handsome man she brought along remained kneeling by the side to massage her legs.

Not a few moments later, one of the courtesans simply could not stand it anymore and knitted her brows as she covered her mouth with a handkerchief and let out a light cough. The smell seemed off to her, so she took a couple more sniffs, then jerked to her feet with a cry of surprise and exclaimed, "Fire!"

The merchants and courtesans in the hall instantly panicked. Everyone watched as billows of smoke rose. Those few attendants who had been serving them had long died. Cries of alarm echoed from all directions as everyone swept up the silvers in a fluster and tucked the money into their bosoms without even knowing if the money was even rightfully theirs. The cards had fallen and scattered all over the ground. Cuiqing, being too obese, tottered on her feet from being jostled against. Even the hairpiece by her temple had fallen out.

"Open the door!" Those who had made it to the door first pounded on it, shouting, "Why is the door locked?!"

Tables and chairs tipped over. Some people even attempted to climb out of the windows, but the windows were sealed too.

Lei Jingzhe abruptly popped his head out and looked down.

When Cuiqing saw him, she quickly waved a handkerchief at him and shouted, "My dear nephew! Hurry up and think of a way to open the door. The back hall is on fire!"

Fei Sheng's hand was already on the hilt of his blade. All it took was for Shen Zechuan to give the command, and the Imperial Bodyguards would immediately swarm the building. But Shen Zechuan continued to drink his tea without saying a word.

Fei Sheng could not help but call out, "Master—"

As Fei Sheng spoke, a hand suddenly grabbed onto the railing in front of Lei Jingzhe, and from there, a man heaved himself up and leaped over. Lei Jingzhe's countenance instantly changed. He moved backward to dodge the other party's incoming scimitar and ended up knocking the screen over with a loud crash, exposing the table and chairs in the middle. To their surprise, there was only Lei Jingzhe himself.

Fei Sheng blurted out in shock, “He didn’t invite anyone at all; this was a bait meant to lure a snake out of its hole!”<sup>5</sup>

Shen Zechuan felt for his folding fan, but belatedly remembered that he had broken it. He drained the tea and watched the men that Lei Jingzhe had left downstairs rush up the stairs. Oddly enough, other than the area Lei Jingzhe was in, the rest of the place was very quiet.

Fei Sheng, with his sharp eyes, suddenly stuck his head out and stared fixedly at the fight across them. He watched them carefully without missing a single of their moves and exclaimed in bewilderment, “Master, this man is also a ‘scorpion’!”

The man who came to assassinate Lei Jingzhe had, in the thick of the action, inadvertently exposed the side of his neck, where a tattoo of an impressive scorpion identical to Jida’s was inked!

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 遮阳帽 zheyang hat; a ‘sunshade’ hat typically worn by the literati or scholar-official.
2. 买艺 performer-courtesans who sell “arts” like music, dancing, and literary skills in painting and poems, etc as opposed to those who simply sold their bodies. Sometimes they did both, but there were also those who didn’t sell their bodies and only entertained patrons with their crafts.

3.

4. 泾渭分明 as different as the waters of the Jing River (clear) and the Wei River (muddy), i.e., distinctly poles apart from one another
5. Literally, Little Silver Bud
6. i.e. To lure someone into the open or into taking action openly.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 172 : HERU

Translated with: Jia<3

Internal strife!

Fei Sheng subconsciously thought. They were already fighting tooth and nail on the other side. Lei Jingzhe's old injuries had yet to heal, and he was presently having difficulty parrying the other man's savage attacks. All he could do was to keep dodging. In the midst of blows being traded by the two opposing teams of scorpions in the cramped private room, Shen Zechuan saw scimitars and piked daggers.

Fei Sheng was itching to take action. He wanted to make up for the humiliation suffered earlier today and reclaim the dignity of the Imperial Bodyguards who had been making mistakes after mistakes. Heaven did not fail him; it arranged such a dog-eat-dog scene to give him a helping hand. He drew out his Xiuchun blade and said, "Master, let's take this opportunity to take down Lei Jingzhe and put him on trial!"

"What's the hurry?" Shen Zechuan said at his own pace. "They're giving us a monkey show."

Fei Sheng originally did not understand, but he saw how nervous Lei Jingzhe looked, and the latter did not seem like the person who planned this. Both sides were equal in numbers, and the sound of things shattering during their fight persisted as glazed lamps and jade vases were smashed to pieces. He observed carefully and noticed that Lei Jingzhe was already showing signs of intention to retreat.

It was pandemonium downstairs, but after the thick smoke dispersed, all was still and quiet again. The lanterns were raised as usual, with huge, glazed palace lanterns of various dazzling patterns hanging in the center of the main hall. The dead maidservants and attendants were all disposed of, and even the bloodstains on the ground were wiped clean. With a lift of the curtain at the back, a new batch of maidservants came pouring in bearing trays in their hands. They picked up those overturned tables and chairs and pulled the various merchants back into position with smiles and chatters.

A bronze gong<sup>1</sup> suddenly sounded, and the attendant they had initially seen in the pawnshop stepped onto the stage in his new robe. He struck the gong he was carrying in his hand a few more times and announced in a loud, clear voice, “Mount Luo’s Chief of Bandits, Lei Jingzhe, versus, Dunzhou’s Little Scorpion, Hairigu. Tonight, when martial arts expert meets martial arts expert, who will live and who will die? Gentlemen, place your bets!”

Fei Sheng did not expect such a turn in the course of events. Even though he was used to seeing all kinds of unpredictable and tumultuous situations in Qudu, he still blurted out in shock, “They are betting on lives?”

The bamboo blinds in the fifth-floor rooms were promptly lifted to reveal the wealthy merchants relaxing in their seats, drinking their tea, waving their fans, and smoking their pipes. Lei Jingzhe wanted to leap out of the window to make his escape, only to realize that the window in particular had been nailed shut.

“I’ve long heard that the young master of the Yan clan doesn’t do anything that doesn’t profit him.” Shen Zechuan said, “To think he could do such roaring business too when it comes to such a trade.”

The screen in the private room was cleared aside, and the swift sounds of abacus beads being flicked rang out like the pelting of rain. The other man grinned. “Men flock together and part ways for the sake of their own interests;<sup>2</sup> even blood brothers still have to settle their accounts clearly. One ought to make the most of things at their disposal!” Having said that, he stopped what he was doing and hold on to the windows to poke his head over and give Fei Sheng the once-over. He winked at Shen Zechuan and said with a smile, “It’s not easy to find an Imperial Bodyguard. This gentleman seems to me to be dignified in appearance and of the right stature. I can take him to Madam Cuiqing later as an apology. My lordship, sell him to me, will you?”

On hearing him point out Shen Zechuan’s identity with just one sentence, Fei Sheng could not help but tighten his grip on his blade and stand before Shen Zechuan to shield him. This man was three or four years older than Ding Tao. He had a childish air about him, and he was fair-skinned and exquisite-looking, with eyes that seemed to be soaked in honey. He looked particularly likable.

Lei Jingzhe, who was on the opposite end, saw him and flew into a rage. Holding himself back with great difficulty, he said, “Why did the Young Master deceive me? You’d rather offend Gedale for the sake of a couple of scorpions?!”

“Gedale is far away on the eastern side of the Chashi River.” Yan Heru retracted his head and said, “Your maternal uncle owes me 580,000 taels of silver, while you owe me 340,000 taels of silver. Isn’t it only right and proper for you to pay off your debts?”

Lei Jingzhe snapped the chair’s leg broken and did his utmost to dodge the sudden glint from the blade. He suffered a setback in Xiao Chiye’s hands the last time and had to rely on Li Xiong to escape by the skin of his teeth, and now he found himself encircled once again, except this time he had played right into the hands of his own people!

Yan Heru leaned over the railings and swung his legs as he watched Lei Jingzhe fight for his life. He shouted towards those downstairs, “A battle between formidable foes of equal strength is a rare sight to behold, so put up your names to register yourselves and take your hands off after placing your bets. Double your profit if you win, and if you make a loss—heh, treat it as post-meal entertainment! As long as you’re in Dunzhou, I, Yan Heru, will not let anyone walk out of here a broke man without even a pair of pants to cover his ass.”

Lei Jingzhe was trapped in a deadly battle for his life. He had only brought along thirty men because he had been a fool to believe Yan Heru’s lies! Now that Lei Jingzhe had the support of the Biansha Cavalry along with four hundred Scorpions stationed in Dunzhou, Yan Heru would have to show him due respect as long as he still intended to run his business in the east. But for all his machinations, Lei Jingzhe had never expected Shen Zechuan to be the person who had seized the military supplies.

The iron cage in the hall was already up by now. Both Lei Jingzhe and the Scorpions in the other camp had suffered heavy casualties, with more than half of their men wounded and dead. Lei Jingzhe spoke to the man that had come to assassinate him in Biansha tongue, “Hairigu, we are all brothers from Gedale, so why fight each other to the death here? Join forces with me to get out of this predicament tonight, and I will not pursue what happened to that batch of military supplies!”

But the other man did not respond and swept his seaweed-like hair back before pulling out his piked dagger to pounce on Lei Jingzhe.

Yan Heru spoke as he poured the wine, “Is your lordship not curious how I knew you’d come?”

“Liu’er’s informants all come with their own prices.” Shen Zechuan peeled an orange and brought it to his mouth. “As long as the money is enough, any news can change hands and be resold.”

Yan Heru laughed again. “It sounds like I’m not smart enough when you put it this way, but I actually got an inkling right away. Huaizhou’s miscellaneous grains other than rice and wheat to the east have all gone into Cizhou’s granaries. There’s no one else capable of taking them out in such large quantities other than you, Shen Zechuan.”

“What a coincidence then,” Shen Zechuan said, “to be meeting you here.”

“Don’t be so modest,” Yan Heru spoke. “Your lordship is here to lie in wait for the opportunity to present itself, aren’t you? I truly find it strange. How did you know that the person Lei Jingzhe invited tonight was me?”

Shen Zechuan finished up the orange before continuing. “Lei Jingzhe’s trip to Dunzhou this time to search through the goods surely offended all the merchants, yet the Yan Clan didn’t step forth to obstruct him. This suggests that both parties have been keeping each other in the loop. In that case, he would have to invite you over for a drink, wouldn’t he? He can also seize the opportunity to mend his relationship with the Yan Clan; what’s not to like about that? For that purpose, he even went as far as to select a restaurant owned by the Yan Clan as a show of sincerity to you.”

Delighted, Yan Heru commended, “You’re so smart!”

Yan Heru placed his interests first and foremost in everything he did, yet he appeared to be especially innocent and naïve as he held that heavy golden abacus in his bosom, looking all like a child god of wealth. If it weren’t for him being adorned with gold and jade from head to toe, Fei Sheng would never have been able to guess that he was the current head of the Yan Clan had he been walking down a street.

On the other side, Lei Jingzhe was already fatigued from the fight when he saw yet another wave of men rushing up from below. They were vastly outnumbered and trapped in this private room. Lei Jingzhe was unwilling to yield, and the Scorpions in the back smashed the window panels with their elbows.

The night breeze immediately drifted in from the outside. Lei Jingzhe did not make the first move. He merely watched as the scorpion who had created the opening stuck his head out, only to meet with calamity right in the face. In the blink of an eye, his head had been decapitated.

Yan Heru grunted. “This is my restaurant. You leave when I tell you to leave, and you stay when I tell you to stay!”

It was teeming with people both inside and out!

The circle of men surrounding Lei Jingzhe shrunk as they closed in on him. All the merchants at the foot of the building were men who acted depending on the individual in question. So when they saw that Lei Jingzhe was no longer in the position to turn the tables, they hurried to follow in Yan Heru's footsteps and place their bets against Lei Jingzhe. All of them were waiting for him to die. The atmosphere started to heat up with restlessness. Cuiqing clutched at her handkerchief, not bashful in the slightest as she removed all the bracelets on her arms and bet it all on Hairigu. She had long forgotten about her eldest nephew, Lei Jingzhe.

Shen Zechuan abruptly asked. "Did you scheme to kill Lei Jingzhe because you knew I was in Dunzhou?"

A bored stiff Yan Heru answered, "That's right. I have to go where the wind blows. The trade route between Huaizhou, Cizhou, and Chazhou is kind of interesting. There's even the Libei Armored Cavalry for added security, and you can get a ride up to the frontier trade market if you head up. Imagine if we join forces; the three territories in the northeast of Dazhou will be as good as ours, yes? I can keep a chokehold on Qidong's military provisions for you, and you can take me along for the ride. Each with our own needs." As he spoke, he switched his posture. "The way I see it, you are gunning for Qudu. You have a bright future full of limitless possibilities ahead of you."

"So I see." Shen Zechuan rose to his feet and motioned for Fei Sheng to get his cloak.

"Aye." Yan Heru rocked his chair as he looked at the shadows and wondered in puzzlement. "The show isn't over yet, and the man has yet to be slaughtered, so why are you leaving already? Don't you want Lei Jingzhe's head?"

Shen Zechuan secured his cloak and looked back. "There's no one to mind those four hundred scorpions, is there?"

Yan Heru answered, "Your lordship is here. Get your Cizhou Garrison Troops to annihilate them."

"Then I'll have to apologize." Shen Zechuan said with a smile. "I brought only a dozen or so people with me."

The words had only just left Shen Zechuan's mouth when the doors to the main hall suddenly crashed open. Yan Heru craned his neck for a look.

Scorpions filled the area outside, and they had even taken out the last remaining head cart<sup>3</sup> in the armory.

Lei Jingzhe leaped onto the railing and let loose a short whistle to signal the scorpions to attack. The men outside the building were all martial pugilists Yan Heru bought over with money, but pitting them against the scorpions who were specifically trained to fight battles with the Libei Armored Cavalry was no different from throwing an egg against a rock. In no time, their broadswords and daggers were all flung away by the hammers.

A crash rang out from the private room as a chair overturned. Yan Heru bunched up his robe and climbed to his feet with the golden abacus in his arms, intending to flee. The moment he opened the door, he bumped into Fei Sheng. Fei Sheng lifted him up by the back of his collar, and as both of his legs left the ground, Yan Heru cried out, “What the hell?! We’re on the same side!”

Yan Heru’s guards tried to seize him back, but the Imperial Bodyguards had already risen with their blades drawn.

Shen Zechuan said, “Let’s leave together. We can get to know each other on the way.”

Unable to break free, Yan Heru could only let Fei Sheng carry him downstairs like a quail, although he did not forget to yell, “Hairigu, we’re leaving! Come on!”

Chaos descended upon the hall once again. The Biansha scorpions did not give a damn about anything else and simply swung their hammers to smash anyone they came across. Cuiqing watched as blood and brain matter spurted out of the head before her and splattered her all over. Rattled, she held onto the table for support and recalled the savagery of the Biansha Cavalry as they massacred the city several years ago. She could not help but shriek as she scrambled backward in an attempt to dodge. “Eldest nephew, save me!”

There was complete mayhem at the foot of the building, and the exit was completely blocked off. With Yan Heru in tow, Fei Sheng stopped on the third floor and kicked the window of the private room open before stuffing Yan Heru out.

Yan Heru shut his eyes and yelled in the wind, “Stop—! I’m your master—!”

The martial pugilists who were still standing guard outside the building hurriedly kept away their blades. The wind whistled past. Yan Heru opened his eyes with some difficulty and said resentfully, "What the heck did you come here for when you didn't bring your troops?!"

Fei Sheng said to Shen Zechuan, "Master, there is a shop down from this place, and our carriage lies across the street from it."

The moment Yan Heru heard it, he clung on to the window and shook his head hard. "I'm not going this way! I don't know martial arts—"

Shen Zechuan could not be bothered to waste his breath on him, and so with a lift of his leg, he kicked Yan Heru down.

Wind filled Yan Heru's wide-open mouth as he plummeted down with his arms and legs flailing and watched himself plunging right towards the ground. The fabric tarp at the top of the shop suddenly sank from the weight, but it did not rip apart. With one hand lifting Yan Heru, Fei Sheng climbed the ledges of the building with an arm and swung in the air for an instant before leaping off with Yan Heru and landing on his feet.

The Imperial Bodyguards were all lithe and dexterous men, and this move did not take them much effort to execute. The moment Fei Sheng landed, he tossed Yan Heru to his subordinate, took two swift steps back, and shouted, "Master!"

Shen Zechuan landed deftly on the eaves and stepped on Fei Sheng's shoulder with help from the fabric tarp before landing on the ground as well. All hell broke loose as the sound of slaughter in the building rose through the roof. Fei Sheng did not dare to confront the scorpions head-on, so the moment Shen Zechuan was sent into the carriage, he waved his hand in a signal to retreat.

The Imperial Bodyguards moved swiftly and drove into the busy streets in the blink of an eye.

Lei Jingzhe pushed the windows open, but there was already no trace of Yan Heru to be seen. He pounded his fist against the window in a fury and turned around to continue speaking in Biansha tongue, "Don't let these traitors go."

It was silent all around when the horse carriage came to a stop.

Yan Heru clung close to the wall of the carriage, covering his chest with his hands as he pleaded. "If nothing else, we can talk it over, and the prices are all negotiable. My lordship, don't get mad!"

Shen Zechuan took off his zheyang hat and tossed it aside, then said to Fei Sheng, who stood outside. "Lift the curtain."

Fei Sheng lifted the carriage's curtains, and a turbid smell immediately drifted out of the carriage. Fei Sheng thought there was something wrong with this scent, and Yan Heru followed up with a shy, embarrassed smile, "Whenever I get anxious, I'll feel like farting."

The Imperial Bodyguards outside immediately started coughing.

Shen Zechuan let loose a laugh, and Yan Heru promptly felt a chill run down his spine. He pedaled his legs to squeeze against the wall of the carriage, and heard Shen Zechuan say in a gentle tone, "Strip him."

"My mother was right!" Yan Heru was now anxious. "Good-looking men are all beasts! Don't, don't do this! I don't swing that way!"

Fei Sheng held down the back of Yan Heru's head and stripped him in no time, although he fortunately left his pair of pants untouched. The nights in the eighth month of Dunzhou were chilly, and Yan Heru, being such a delicate and fair-skinned lad, was so freezing cold that his teeth chattered and caused him to stutter.

Fei Sheng said, "Master, there's no scorpion on him."

Shen Zechuan slowly folded his arms and went straight to the point as he looked at Yan Heru. "What's your relationship to the scorpions?"

Yan Heru rubbed his arm and blinked his pair of doe eyes hard. "Why are you asking me this? Your lordship, that's not right. You should be asking what your relationship to the scorpions is."

Shen Zechuan's eyes were unfathomably deep as he asked, "What's my relationship to the scorpions?"

After a few moments of silence in the carriage, Yan Heru answered innocently, "I have no idea."

Shen Zechuan continued, "Fei Sheng."

Fei Sheng reached out to drag Yan Heru out. On seeing this, Yan Heru started to struggle to get up. "I really don't know! Hairigu, Hairigu! You tell him!"

A man tumbled out from behind the horse carriage and fell to the ground panting. It was the man who first attempted to assassinate Lei Jingzhe earlier. With his prominent nose and deep-set eyes, he had the distinct appearance of a Biansha native, but he had black hair and black eyes, and the contours of his face were much softer than Huhelu's and Hasen's. As he turned over, he revealed the scorpion tattoo at the side of his neck.

Hairigu was wounded. At the same time he covered his wound, he looked at Shen Zechuan behind the flashes of swords and answered in a low, deep voice, "Son of Gedale."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Special thanks to Tea for proofreading! <3

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

- 1.
2. 锣 The Chinese gong is a musical percussion instrument that takes the form of a flat, circular metal disc that is hit with a mallet. Also used to call for attention.
3. From 天下熙熙,皆为利来 ; 天下攘攘,皆为利往。 i.e.. people do things for their own interests

- 4.
5. 头车 literally head cart according to sources; a complex siege weapon used for mining which can also be used as a protective cover during a siege.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 173 : BLACK & WHITE

Translated with: Jia<3

This was the second time Shen Zechuan heard of “Gedale”.

Gedale was located to the east of Chashi River, and it fell under the jurisdiction of Biansha’s territory. It was initially the temporary site of residence for the Zhongbo bandits. Shen Zechuan was pretty sure he had never been there before. His understanding of Gedale was limited to the Bai Cha portrait that Li Xiong had once mentioned. Going by the way Hairigu meant it, Shen Zechuan could also call himself a “son of Zhongbo”.

“We are all sons of Gedale.” Hairigu stood up, his eyes alert as his gaze wandered among the Imperial Bodyguards. He lifted a hand gently and said, “We have a reason to sit down for a chat.”

“My brother died on the battlefield.” Shen Zechuan was unmoved. “Before you make yourself clear, we are enemies.”

“Your enemy is the Biansha Cavalry.” Hairigu tightened the bandage around his wound. “I’m the enemy of your enemy. We can be friends.”

“Sure, friend.” Shen Zechuan said. “What do you want to talk to me about?”

Hairigu pursed his pale lips and paused for a moment before saying, “We can join forces to kill Lei Jingzhe.”

Moonlight streaked across the shadow of the carriage. Shen Zechuan’s expression was cold and detached. He could not even be bothered to answer, but his meaning was clear. If Hairigu continued to beat about the bush without explaining himself clearly, then he would not deign to give him any response.

“I know that the emperor of Dazhou is dead and that it’s the emperor’s mother who is managing governmental affairs now. You were driven out of Qudu, and then you fled back to Zhongbo. You want to exact revenge, and you hope you can stage a comeback.” Hairigu looked at Shen Zechuan with a complicated expression. “You are swallowing up Zhongbo right now.”

With his elbows propped on his knees, Shen Zechuan stuck his face out from the shadows and looked down from above at Hairigu. “Your information is too detailed.”

Hairigu kept his hands raised as though he was pacifying some kind of beast and said, "This is information I have to dig out if I am to survive in Zhongbo. Please do not take offense. You have already erected your own city walls in the west, and now you want to head east and take back Dunzhou, Duanzhou, and even the Chashi Sinkhole. But Lei Jingzhe is standing in your way, and it will be very troublesome for you if you can't kill him. Brother, I want to kill him too, so we can join forces."

Shen Zechuan raised a finger and pointed to the side of his neck. "You both have the same tattoo."

"Because we are all sons of Gedale." Hairigu repeated this phrase. "Lei Jingzhe is a white scorpion. They are all men from Dazhou who have defected to Amu'er." As Hairigu spoke, he spread his upper garment open to reveal the scorpion tattoo on the side of his neck. "I'm a black scorpion."

Fei Sheng observed it carefully and said, "There's no difference at all between your tattoos."

"We don't tell each other apart by our tattoos." Hairigu explained. "The tattoos are just markers the Biansha people used to distinguish those from Gedale with the others."

"Gedale lies within Biansha's borders, and it falls under the control of the Liaoying Tribe in its early days." Shen Zechuan said. "So what's the difference between you people and the Biansha people?"

"If you understand the Liaoying Tribe in its former times, then it will occur to you why we are being differentiated from the others." Hairigu put on his clothes. "Before the Liaoying Tribe had Amu'er, they were eagle slaves from the various major tribes. The Gedale that was under their control was even more lowly. The bandits of Zhongbo did business in Gedale by selling women, and these women were very popular with the various major tribes—the noble Hanshe Tribe, in particular, was very fond of women from Dazhou."

"But they were besieged." Fei Sheng tossed a water canteen to Hairigu. "These bandits ran rampant along the Chashi River, and the women from decent families in Duanzhou suffered greatly. The Zhu clan, unable to deal with the disturbance, reported it to Shen Wei and requested for Dunzhou to deploy troops for assistance. The commander of the Dunzhou Garrison Troops, Tantai Long, promptly sent his troops to fight their way to Gedale and crush these bandits."

“But the respite was temporary.” Hairigu took the canteen. “Those bandits had the protection of the Liaoying Tribe. They threw in their lots with the Liaoying Tribe and became the Liaoying Tribe’s slaves, but they were never respected. They became the lowest class of people among the Twelve Tribes of Biansha and continued to round up women for the people of Biansha. These women were sent to the various tribes, where they became exchangeable commodities.”

Tantai Long failed to eradicate the bandits completely, and it did not take long for them to return to Gedale, where they established their base.

“The children born to the women from Dazhou were called ‘wumengyun’.” Hairigu tugged at his black hair. “That is, ‘bastard’ in Dazhou tongue. These bastards could not exist in the various major tribes; they would carve out a portion of the purebred cattle and sheep when they grew up. So, the various tribes drown them in the Chashi River, or throw them back to Gedale.”

Fei Sheng, having been born of the Fei clan, was unable to comprehend the rationale behind this move. “These children all carry the blood of the various tribes. Even if their mothers are not honorable enough, there’s no need to go to the extent of drowning them, is there?”

“Do you know Hasen? That’s the son Amu’er truly acknowledged. The Twelve Tribes are different from Dazhou. In the desert, women take charge of child-bearing in the tribe and even the distribution of cattle and sheep. They are an indispensable aid to tribal survival and are capable of standing on an equal footing with men. It takes an honorable mother to decide the future direction of a child. Amu’er has so many sons, and there are plenty of smart ones among them, but the moment they were born, they all lost the qualification to fight for power with Hasen, and this is precisely because Hasen’s mother is the most honored and respectable woman in the Hanshe Tribe. Her role in Amu’er’s formation of the elite forces in the north is indispensable.” Hairigu took a few sips of water. “Bastards are unworthy of taking on the surnames of the tribes, and so we were branded with a tattoo along with the bandits.”

Shen Zechuan made some inferences from the timeline and said, “Since you are distinguished between black and white, then you must each have your own uses.”

“You have to understand one thing first. The so-called scorpions is a form of address that came about after Amu’er’s rise to prominence. Before Amu'er's time, Gedale was a place where the bastards lived together. It was only after the rise of Amu'er that Gedale was really put to use. White scorpions, with their appearance resembling those of Dazhou, could infiltrate deep into Dazhou." Hairigu screwed the canteen shut and made a crawling motion with two fingers. "They can penetrate deep within, and they have played their roles to unimaginable effect in the last ten years or so. Meanwhile, the black scorpions are left behind in Gedale, where Amu'er gives us the best teachers to train us to be strong enough to stand up to the Libei Armored Cavalry."

"Mutual assistance between black and white—you were helping each other." Realization dawned on Shen Zechuan. "There are no iron mines in the desert. To equip yourselves with that kind of hammer, you'd have to steal it from Dazhou."

"That's right." Hairigu tossed the canteen back. "The white scorpions secured equipment and grains for us from within Dazhou. Other than those, there were military maps too."

The military map of the six prefectures of Zhongbo!

"Whose information did Amu'er act on six years ago when he attacked Zhongbo?"

Hairigu spread his hands apart and said, "I don't know. I wasn't involved. But I can tell you that Amu'er has countless inextricable links to Qudu. The defeat of the Zhongbo troops was merely a trial run to test the waters, and it proved to be remarkably effective—Libei was held in check, and the repercussions are still being felt a few years later with the subsequent disintegration of Dazhou."

Fei Sheng inwardly drew in a breath and looked at Shen Zechuan in shock.

"Why do you call me a son of Gedale?" The jade earring on Shen Zechuan's right ear glinted.

Hairigu inclined his head and said, "Because Bai Cha split—"

Hairigu had yet to finish his words when an arrow fired in secret pierced through the wind with a "swoosh" and stabbed into the carriage. Yan Heru, who had been too afraid to make a sound and who had been hanging in mid-air playing dead, promptly yelled, "They are here!"

Fei Sheng immediately yanked the curtains down and commanded, "Get on the horses!"

The carriage charged into the darkness of the night under the escort of the Imperial Bodyguards, while Yan Heru was thrown back into the carriage. The downtown streets of Dunzhou were wide and spacious. The Yan clan had expanded it to facilitate the smooth passage of the various merchants' carriages. At present, the streets were bustling with activity, with carriages coming and going in never-ending streams.

Yan Heru tripped all over the place as he put on his robe and said in a hurry, "Head for the Prince of Jianxing's manor! I tore down the former site of the Prince of Jianxing's manor and reconstructed a private residence in its place. There are a hundred or so compound guards in there!"

Fei Sheng promptly turned the horses around.

The glazed tiles of the Prince of Jianxing's manor had long been torn down. After Shen Wei's self-immolation, all that was left of this place was its dilapidated ruins. Yan Heru loved the place, so he had reconstructed it into a private residence modeled in the style of those in Qudu. A tall building with double-eaved roofs had been built within this residence, and if one were to stand on top of it, they would get a panoramic view of Dunzhou.

Fei Sheng carefully surveyed the manor before he entered. He found Yan Heru rather strange. The latter had actually built a wall of bricks on the outer layer and knocked down a hole in the wall to install bows and arrows, with the mechanism connected to the parapet. Looking at just how thick the wall was, it could even stand up to an assault from a stone catapult.

"As businessmen, we fear being targeted in the dark and stabbed in the back. There are plenty of unscrupulous people who would do these kind of asshole deeds. I cherish my life. It surely stands to reason for me to have a safe haven in Dunzhou, and I won't feel at ease if I don't construct an impregnable fortress." Yan Heru invited Shen Zechuan upstairs. "This place is known as 'Fuxian Peak'. Aye, it's a tall one. Your lordship, please come with me upstairs to have some drinks and enjoy ourselves. We'll see how that silly fool Lei Jingzhe gets all distraught with anxiety and frustration outside."

Fei Sheng could not hold back from asking, "Aren't you scared he'll fight his way in to hack your head off?"

Yan Heru turned his head back from atop the stairs and looked at Fei Sheng with a brilliant smile. "What do I have to fear? A real man isn't afraid of a big scar. At most, my head will roll, but I'd still be a hero again in eighteen years!"<sup>1</sup>

Yan Heru might have been exceedingly flippant with his words, but he was genuinely unafraid. He was pertinent to the businesses of the merchants from the two prefectures of Zhongbo. So many people depended on him for their livelihoods. Despite having suffered such a massive humiliation tonight, Lei Jingzhe would not dare to kill him for real, for Yan Heru still had Hezhou as his shield. In reality, Lei Jingzhe's relentless pursuit was directed at Hairigu.

This little brat was an extremely crafty one.

Shen Zechuan guessed that the reason Lei Jingzhe and Hairigu were embroiled in such a fierce fight with each other in Dunzhou was likely because Yan Heru had been adding fuel to the flame. His past support of Lei Changming failed to reap any results, and it was only due to Lei Changming's respect for him that he could retain the store in Dunzhou. If it had been anyone else, this piece of business would have been long gone. For this reason, he was apprehensive about the monopoly on power Lei Jingzhe's party possessed. As such, he secretly funded Hairigu's batch of scorpions to let them mutually hold each other in check until they both eventually had to rely on the Yan clan.

The maidservants entered in a single file and lit up the lights in successive order. Thick and heavy draperies were lifted, while pearl-white sheer fabrics were let down to take its place. There was even a small covered veranda hanging with climbing figs and devils' ivy, surrounded by a murmuring stream the width of an arm. An open-air pavilion was erected in the middle of it, adorned with a refined rock garden that sat at an angle. The entire sky of stars seemed to be within reach if one were to just gaze out into the distance from here, along with an unobstructed view of the lantern displays in Dunzhou.

"This building was built for the purpose of ascending high enough to appreciate the view. If you stand here and look far out into the east, you'll be able to marvel at the Chashi River, which mirrors a jade belt<sup>2</sup> in Heaven and on Earth. This is a magnificent view you cannot find anywhere else." Yan Heru leaned against the railings and said to Shen Zechuan, "It's impossible to leave Dunzhou for the time being. Your lordship can go ahead and stay here, and we can discuss business."

Shen Zechuan's cloak fluttered in the wind as he held onto the railing and looked down. He could see Lei Jingzhe's forces coming through the streets. "You sure are a dauntless one."

Yan Heru flicked the beads on the golden abacus. "Money is king. Lei Jingzhe himself has to call me granddaddy. I have nothing to fear. On the other hand, your lordship will be in danger if the Cizhou Garrison Troops are really not coming."

"I come and go silently." Shen Zechuan said. "It's easy for me to leave if I want to."

"Bai Cha is the reason you came to Dunzhou this time." Yan Heru said to Shen Zechuan with a smile. "Hairigu knows everything. You almost got a glimpse of the whole story, so you must be burning with anxiety now, right? Bai Cha's exact relationship to the scorpions is something Hairigu knows best. Your lordship, I'm sincere in discussing business with you. As long as you agree, Hairigu will be at your disposal. If we join forces to get rid of Lei Jingzhe, occupy the territories in the north and east, and develop the trade route, the silver will come flowing in like water, no? What happened in Chazhou will be written off immediately; I will not blame you for Cai Yu's death."

Shen Zechuan bent over to lean against the railing too and laughed.

Yan Heru's smile gradually vanished, and he asked unhappily, "What are you laughing at?"

"Lei Jingzhe came here today for Hairigu. If you don't hand Hairigu over, Lei Jingzhe will settle the score with you. You are now thinking of using a forfeited pawn to trick me into doing business with you. Such a good deal doesn't exist in this world." Shen Zechuan looked out at the far end of Dunzhou in the direction of Duanzhou. "The trade route between Huaizhou, Cizhou, and Chazhou belongs to me. If you want a share of the pie, you have to first convince me."

Yan Heru fell silent for a moment as he faced the wide expanse of the night, then laughed again. "Is your lordship still trying to deceive me at such a juncture? Without your troops now, you are merely a trapped beast. I won't hand over Hairigu, but I can hand you over."

"You plotted to butcher Lei Jingzhe tonight. Going by Lei Jingzhe's character, this feud is as good as already inked in blood. Even if he can tolerate you for a moment for the sake of money, he will never let you off in the future. Moreover, you've already shown your card that is Hairigu tonight.” Shen Zechuan tilted his chin up slightly to bathe in the breeze. “Even if Lei Jingzhe is willing to bury the hatchet with you, the same can’t be said of the Twelve Tribes of Biansha backing him.”

Hairigu was not one man. He had also brought along a bunch of scorpions who were similarly living a vagabond life in Zhongbo. These people hid themselves all over the place, and most of them had defected from Gedale. Yan Heru had provided them with financial assistance in order to keep Lei Jingzhe in check, and there was no doubt that the Twelve Tribes of Biansha would be settling this score as well.

“At least I won’t die tonight.” Yan Heru said softly.

“Then let us just perish together.” Shen Zechuan tapped his icy fingers on the railings. “Hand me over to Lei Jingzhe tonight. Once I die, I can wait for you down there in the underworld.”

“After tonight, I have plenty of ways to leave Dunzhou.” Yan Heru snorted childishly in a loud voice.

“Then let me tell you this.” Shen Zechuan looked at him out of the corner of his pitch-black eyes. “If I die, Dunzhou and Duanzhou will die with me. No one will remember Zhongbo’s lost territories. Qudu is too preoccupied with its own affairs, and Libei and Qidong can’t be in two places at once. This place is a wide-opened strategic gateway of Dazhou that can provide the Biansha Cavalry with direct access in. They did not launch an assault in the past six years because the granaries in Zhongbo had yet to be fattened up. The time is now ripe, and Dazhou is already torn asunder by disunity. Sooner or later, this place will become the territory of the Biansha people.”

“Xiao Fangxu will not sit and do nothing. This place has a bearing on Libei’s battlegrounds in the southeast.” Yan Heru said quickly. “Qi Zhuyin has a well-trained and powerful army too. You’re just trying to scare me! Shen Zechuan, without you, Zhongbo will have just a few more random self-proclaimed kings. The overall situation won’t change at all!”

“In that case,” Shen Zechuan raised his eyebrows slightly. “What makes you go to such lengths to discuss with me?”

Oh shit. Yan Heru bemoaned to himself. To think he had been led by Shen Zechuan’s words!

As they spoke, they heard a thunderous noise beneath them. Yan Heru shifted his gaze over to look and could not help but freeze, “Why are there so many people...”

“Ever since stepping foot into Dunzhou, I’ve been puzzled by a question. There is clearly a bridle path leading right to Duanzhou, so why did Lei Jingzhe still forgo what is close at hand and seek what is far afield instead? Then, there is his proficient way of searching the goods in the city. My guess is that this isn’t the first time he has been robbed. The people hiding here are the thorns in his side.” Shen Zechuan smiled slightly. “Even I could guess that you are the one funding Hairigu, so do you really think Lei Jingzhe won’t be able to make the same guess? He came prepared this time. That invitation was indeed to lure a snake out of its hole, but the one who took the bait was you.”

The lanterns on the streets were knocked over as the sounds of horses’ hooves flooded in from outside, while the cavalry with no end in sight resembled dark clouds that completely devoured the river of lights from view. The troops Lei Jingzhe had brought over had been hiding outside the city, all for the purpose of getting rid of the mortal malady that was Hairigu once and for all. Fei Sheng saw the saker falcons in the night sky. He briskly walked around the railing and realized that those dark clouds were presently steamrolling across the entire city of Dunzhou.

“He doesn’t dare to kill me.” Yan Heru involuntarily exposed his panic as he hugged his golden abacus to his bosom and took several steps back. “Hezhou...”

The head cart<sup>3</sup> Lei Jingzhe brought along crashed heavily into the front gates. Unable to withstand such a violent impact, the iron sheet-covered latch on the other end of the door let loose a shrill shriek in protest. Horses snorted and grunted urgently, while circling saker falcons stirred up the overcast clouds. The starry sky earlier had dimmed, leaving only the wind to continue howling in never-ending torrents.

There was no use for scheming in the face of a strong army.

These iron hooves had no qualms trampling over the heart of Zhongbo once before. What’s not to say they couldn’t do it again this time?

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Special thanks to Tea for proofreading! <3

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 十八年后还是(又是一)条好汉 i.e., reincarnate again as a hero after death.
2. 玉带 literally jade belt, or belts made of jade worn by high-level government officials in the course of duty. It's also a term in Fengshui where the road surrounds the building, much like how the jade belt embraces the waist of the wealthy in graceful semicircular arcs.

- 3.
4. 头车 literally head cart according to sources; a complex siege weapon used for mining which can also be used as a protective cover during a siege.

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 174 : MAD DOG

Translated with: Jia<3

With Lei Jingzhe having opened up the Dunzhou armory, no matter how solid Yan Heru built this mansion to be, it could not stand up to a single blow in the face of military weapons built specifically for sieges. Those arrows simply could not penetrate through the shield of the head cart,<sup>1</sup> and the door latch broke from the impact of the crash. Before the crossbow arrows could be reloaded, the Biansha Cavalry entered.

Fei Sheng stepped forward in a move to support Shen Zechuan and said in an urgent voice, “Master, let’s evacuate from the back and find a way to leave the city under cover of the night!”

“Lei Jingzhe wants to round up Hairigu and his people in one fell swoop.” Shen Zechuan stood against the wind. “He meticulously prepared for this, as evident in his use of a massive force to besiege the city; he won’t leave any openings. It’s already too late to be thinking of leaving the city now.”

Fei Sheng watched as the compound was surrounded. He knew escape was impossible tonight. But as he had made it clear before, he had to risk his life to ensure that Shen Zechuan remained safe and sound, so he clenched his blade and stood motionless at the side like a nail fixed in place beside Shen Zechuan. The Imperial Bodyguards behind him all looked as if they were about to come face to face with a formidable foe. For a moment, the atmosphere was particularly somber.

The crescent moon at present looked like a thread concealed away among the dark clouds. Heavy fog hung overhead in the sky, bearing down on them. There was already no stopping the destructive force in motion. Shen Zechuan was still leaning against the railing, letting his gaze roam to take in the lights in Dunzhou—this was the first time he got a clear look at Dunzhou.

Fei Sheng stood in silence. Together with the Imperial Bodyguards, he watched Shen Zechuan attentively amid the deafening sound of the melee below. Strangely enough, they were no longer nervous, even at such a critical juncture of life and death.

Fei Sheng had only wanted to follow under Xiao Chiye's command in the past because Xiao Chiye had the unprecedented spirit of a groundbreaking pioneer. On the day they rebelled and fled from Qudu, Fei Sheng had done so willingly and wholeheartedly. But Xiao Chiye refused to accept him, so he could only step back to work under Shen Zechuan instead.

Shen Zechuan wasn't likable.

His appearance made him a controversial figure who was the subject of condemnation in Qudu. Shen Wei was a threshold. Many people would rather stand on the outside to scrutinize him, as if the verdict of his life and death all lay in those sprays of spittle. When he left Zhao Zui Temple, everyone treated him as a noble clan blade that had replaced Shen Wei, an imperial dog under the empress dowager's command. However, the subsequent happenings deviated far from everyone's expectations. In that struggle for power, he quietly and steadily rose his way to the top. By the time everyone realized it, he was already standing in the heart of the political storm. He did not seem to possess that imposing air of vim and vigor, and yet his thin and frail back was the protective barrier in all the times he stood in front. Even if the storm raged and left a trail of destruction in its wake, it would be a rainless picture of calm and silence behind him for as long as he remained standing.

Fei Sheng closed his eyes to clear his mind of distracting thoughts. His heart felt calm and at ease at present—this was a kind of tranquility that had no need for words of encouragement. He had abandoned Ji Lei and forsaken Han Cheng; whoever he followed had always been based on the opportunity availed to him at that time. All along, he had never been able to understand the trust Chen Yang and Gu Jin had in Xiao Chiye, but at this very moment, as he stood in the wind and opened his eyes once again, he possessed that trust.

Everyone in this world wants to be Xiao Chiye.

But there can be no other Shen Lanzhou!

Horses' hooves broke through the doors beneath them, while dark clouds rolled overhead. Fei Sheng, who had been plotting to seek personal gains by currying favors all his life, grabbed his blade with one hand and kicked over the wooden chair beside him to send it crashing into the Biansha Cavalry at the stairway. He ripped his outer robe open and secured the blade in his palm, then lifted the wine on the table and said to the various Imperial Bodyguards, “Even if Heaven and Earth were to collapse today, we must ensure Master remains safe and unharmed. Here we are, chatting and drinking with a smile even as we are encircled by powerful troops—this is a sight and honor we have never had while serving the emperor.”

Fei Sheng raised his head back and gulped down the wine, letting it trickle down and soak through the front of his clothes. He smashed the bowl, then wiped his mouth and burst into wild laughter.

“This battle is going to make legends out of us men. Brothers, time to make a name for ourselves—!”

Xiuchun blades<sup>2</sup> all left their sheaths in unison, and booming laughter reverberated through the clouds. Blood splattered all over the stairway as more than a dozen Imperial Bodyguards climbed over the railings and brandished their blades to cut down the Biansha Cavalry who were swarming towards them with sweeping force. Heads rolled all over the narrow and cramped stairs. With every rise of his hand and fall of his blade, Fei Sheng decisively and efficiently hacked away at his opponents’ necks without the slightest hesitation.

Lei Jingzhe did not dare to set the building on fire. He wanted to catch Yan Heru alive, so he could only force his way up the stairs in an attack. The Imperial Bodyguards were all at the top of their game tonight. Those scorpions, who were unshakeable when they turned out in full force, were unable to swing their hammers freely after stepping onto the stairway, and this subsequently greatly reduced the strain on the Imperial Bodyguards. Unable to ascend the stairs, Lei Jingzhe sought out another way. Fuxian Peak towered over the double-eaved roofs like a crane standing head and shoulders among a flock of chickens, and so they used the cloud ladder.<sup>3</sup>

Yan Heru watched as the Biansha Cavalry swarmed up towards them en masse. Fuxian Peak seemed to be a relic pillar standing alone between Heaven and Earth. He retreated to Shen Zechuan’s side, shivering from the wind. “Since you dared to enter the tiger’s den,<sup>4</sup> then you must have prepared for it.”

Shen Zechuan did not answer. Yan Heru was about to say something further when a hand suddenly grasped the railing beside him, and a Biansha Cavalryman climbed his way up. Without even thinking, Yan Heru raised his golden abacus and slammed it down on the Biansha Cavalryman, knocking the latter out. But there were still several men following close behind the other man, and they made a sudden grab to hold up Yan Heru's abacus in place before flipping their way up.

Yan Heru lived by the maxim that "as valuable as the abacus may be, life is worth even more", so he promptly let go of his hand, abandoning the abacus. He took several steps back, but tripped over the small table and toppled over to the ground. That cavalryman was a tall, strapping man, and he looked just like a mountain when he stood before Yan Heru. On seeing him lift his blade, Yan Heru hastened to yell, "Your lordship, save me! My dear gege! The price is always negotiable!"

A saker falcon swooped past, and before the cavalryman could lift his blade, a figure suddenly leaped up from behind. Hairigu came pouncing from the air, taking out the cavalryman in one slash. After he landed, he rolled on the ground and grabbed hold of Yan Heru.

Yan Heru lifted his head, intending to gripe at Shen Zechuan for being such an unrighteous one. But before he could open his mouth, he saw a black shadow spring over the railing to land heavily on top of it. Hairigu pressed Yan Heru's head down and bent over backward to dodge the iron hammer sweeping towards them.

The man's bare upper body was just as muscularly sculpted as Jida, whom they had encountered a few days prior. The iron hammer swooshed past in mid-air, causing a break in the flow of the wind. When he stood up, Yan Heru had to raise his head to look at him. The scorpion tattoo took up his entire back. He rolled his shoulders as a warm-up, then proceeded to jump down the railing.

Hairigu pushed Yan Heru aside and fished out a piked dagger from the back of his waist. The two of them did not even bother with greetings as they immediately traded a flurry of blows with one another.

There was nowhere for Yan Heru to hide in this chaos. He was used to a life of lavish luxury, and the martial arts he used to learn were merely all show but no substance. In any case, he had already forgotten all of it. Afraid of being pecked with the saker falcons hovering overhead, Yan Heru crouched low and scrambled with both hands on the ground through any openings he could find amid the mayhem. He managed with great difficulty to make his way to the side, only to see a person squatting on the railing.

Yan Heru lifted his gaze, and his eyes promptly curved into crescents as he revealed a smile and called out warmly, "Eldest nephew!"

Lei Jingzhe sneered and reached his arm out to grab him.

Disregarding his dignity and image, Yan Heru rolled on the ground to one side like a slippery loach. He reached for the railing with the intention to climb up when he felt a grip on his collar. Thinking it to be Lei Jingzhe, he hurriedly turned his head to plead, “Lei-gege—”

But it turned out to be Shen Zechuan!

Shen Zechuan exerted force with his left hand and yanked Yan Heru off the railing before tossing him in front of him. Before Yan Heru had his chance to roll, Shen Zechuan pressed his foot against the back of his waist to make him kneel. Yan Heru was stuck between a rock and a hard place, with a wolf before him and a tiger behind him. He wanted to cry as he kneeled in the middle, but no tears came, so he put his palms together and said as though he was paying religious homage, “I was merely jesting around with my dear geges. Put the loss this time on my account. Let’s not brandish our weapons anymore! Say, the three of us should join forces and cooperate, then we’d be invincible in the world, agree?!”

Lei Jingzhe motioned for Yan Heru to shut up. He leaped off the railing and stared at Shen Zechuan as he moved over with unhurried steps. After a while, he said, “How have you been since we parted, Vice Commander?” Without even waiting for Shen Zechuan to answer, he continued after coming to a stop. “Guess I should call you Prefectural Lord now.”

Everyone was locked in battle near and far, and the sounds of tables and chairs being smashed resounded clearly in their ears. Thick gloomy clouds hung over their heads as both of them stood in the strong wind facing each other in a confrontation with Yan Heru between them. The raging wind in the distance surged and receded amid the backdrop of tens of thousands of lights in Dunzhou.

Lei Jingzhe raised his hand to slap his nape and said in a mocking tone, “I sure have excellent luck tonight. To think I could catch such a big fish from this sewer. What? There’s no Xiao Chiye to escort and protect you this time?”

Shen Zechuan raised a finger to remove the cloak on his shoulder and inclined his head to say with a smile, “My husband is up to his neck in military affairs. It’s inappropriate for him to go on a long journey these days. We can discuss it ourselves if there are any matters of concern.”

Lei Jingzhe’s eyes gradually darkened to conceal a sly glint within. “Did you come to Dunzhou—oh, wrong. Did you return to Dunzhou to hold a memorial service for Shen Wei?”

“I’m here on Young Master Yan’s invitation,” Shen Zechuan said without batting an eyelid, “to discuss a plan to kill you.”

Yan Heru’s face blanched. He wanted to explain and defend himself when he met Lei Jingzhe’s gaze, but on feeling the chill on his nape, he did not dare to speak up. Shen Zechuan is truly a ruthless one! He thought to himself. With just one word, the latter had severed his route of retreat. Whether or not he survived this night, Lei Jingzhe would no longer believe him!

“No wonder I could sense that the person who saved Yan Heru back in the restaurant was no ordinary talent.” The expression in Lei Jingzhe’s gaze was malevolent. “I initially meant to be magnanimous and not lower myself to the level of a child. But I never expected him to be so malicious to invite you over to work out a scheme to kill me.”

“He’s a child at heart.” Shen Zechuan shifted his foot away from Yan Heru. “He doesn’t know when to stop pushing it and inevitably ends up angering you. It’s rather embarrassing.”

“You have been colluding in secret for a long time.” As expected, Lei Jingzhe fell for the trap and contemplated it. “No wonder I couldn’t find the supply wagons this time.”

“But you one-upped him tonight.” Shen Zechuan said as if he conceded defeat. His eyes followed Lei Jingzhe. “I can switch allegiances, seeing how it’s a matter of life and death now.”

Lei Jingzhe feared Shen Zechuan. He knew Shen Zechuan was the most proficient in this kind of offensive and defensive warfare. The moment he fell for Shen Zechuan’s words, he would be irrevocably doomed. So Lei Jingzhe lowered his arms and sneered, “Xiao Chiye ruined my base on Mount Luo. This is a score that can’t be forgotten.”

“If you kill Yan Heru tonight, you will completely sever all your contacts and dealings with Hezhou. But occupying both the prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou means that you have to sustain the grains and military expenses alone in the future.” Shen Zechuan attempted to coax him. “Cizhou’s granaries are currently in abundance of grains. I can give you a helping hand.”

Lei Jingzhe threw his head back and roared with laughter. Suddenly, he spoke, “Since you have been colluding with Yan Heru for a long time, then you must have seen Hairigu. My guess is that you came to Cizhou this time to take in these traitors by capitalizing on Bai Cha's name and reputation, right?!"

"Looks like the game is as good as lost for me tonight. I can't hide it from you." Shen Zechuan sighed with a pang of regret. "That's right. I came here this time for precisely this matter. Lei Jingzhe, we are all sons of Gedale. When it really comes down to it, we are all fellow brothers too. So why draw our swords on each other?"

"As long as you can hack off Xiao Chiye's head, we can be brothers." Lei Jingzhe still bore a grudge against Xiao Chiye. He said in a frosty tone, "You are deceiving me with such words only because you saw how heavily besieged the city is now and you know you can't escape death."

"Are you really going to kill me?"

"Setting an enemy free is like letting a tiger return to its mountain—it will set the stage for future calamities." Lei Jingzhe said, "You took two months to devour Cizhou and Chazhou and take Zhou Gui and Luo Mu under your command. I was initially worried you would become the dominant power in Zhongbo in the future the longer you live, and by then, it would be hard to remove you. I didn't expect you to deliver yourself to my doorstep. No matter how you try to convince me with your glib tongue and honeyed words, my killing you is a foregone conclusion!"

The wind flooded into Shen Zechuan's sleeves, sending it billowing and revealing his wrist bone. The bandage on his right hand was visible as he gripped the blue handkerchief between his fingers. He covered his mouth and coughed as though he could not bear the cold on this tower. After the coughing stopped, he said, "Can't you give me a way out on account of the name Bai Cha?"

As soon as the words left his mouth, it clicked in Lei Jingzhe's mind, and he promptly bellowed, "You deceived me. You don't know the specifics of the scorpions at all!"

With that, his fist went sailing through the wind right towards Shen Zechuan's face. Shen Zechuan had long been on his guard, and he slid aside to dodge the punch. On missing his target, Lei Jingzhe did not retract his fist but made use of the momentum to grab Shen Zechuan by the arm. White robe fluttered gently in the wind as Shen Zechuan moved away with elegant grace, causing Lei Jingzhe to turn up empty-handed once again. Lei Jingzhe squatted next and swept his leg out in a circle, and Shen Zechuan sprang back against that wave of strong wind to land on the railing.

The sound of killing beneath them boiled over like a seething cauldron. Lei Jingzhe was determined to send Shen Zechuan to his death tonight. On seeing Shen Zechuan standing perilously on the edge, he grabbed his hammer and sent it swinging into the wind with the intent to force Shen Zechuan off the tower. Shen Zechuan balanced himself steadily on the railing. The strong wind roared behind him, sending his sleeves billowing like a swan goose<sup>5</sup> by the railing. His right hand remained still; he was already in a disadvantaged position.

Deciding that a psychological offensive was the best tactic, Lei Jingzhe said in between movements, “Well, then! Shen Zechuan, don’t you want to know Bai Cha’s relationship to the scorpions? I will tell you tonight!”

He soared into the air and somersaulted onto the railing, where he followed close in Shen Zechuan’s footsteps and attempted to force Shen Zechuan into the corner.

“Bai Cha was a whore in a brothel in Duanzhou who worked specifically for the Liaoying Tribe. She was a dog Amu’er planted beside Shen Wei. She was a needle Biansha hid in Zhongbo!”

Shen Zechuan seemed to lose his balance as he teetered at the edge for a bit. His sleeves suddenly danced backward. Fei Sheng, who was deep among the horde of people, could not help but panic when he saw this sight in his peripheral vision. “Master!”

However, in the next moment, Shen Zechuan braced himself against the wind and swung back to stabilize himself.

On seeing this, Lei Jingzhe struck out at him suddenly, forcing Shen Zechuan to retreat in order to evade the blow again. He continued speaking, “Don’t you think you’re really a wretched one? Being Shen Wei’s son caused you so much physical and mental suffering! I shall pull you out of this abyss of misery. Shen Zechuan, you’re a bastard child of Biansha. Bai Cha was a promiscuous woman of loose morals—”

Lei Jingzhe felt the impact at the side of his neck, and this blow nearly made him bite off his tongue. He hurriedly took a few steps back and held himself steady at this high altitude, then turned his head to the side and spat out the blood from the blow Shen Zechuan had dealt him with.

Shen Zechuan had his left hand lifted in a martial arts stance, his eyes freezing over with frostiness. His complexion looked particularly pale under this faint veil of moonlight, as if he was a piece of cold, bloodless jade. Slowly, he warned, “Watch your tongue.”

Lei Jingzhe threw his hammer aside and gradually put some distance between them. He said in a low voice, "Every word I say is the truth." He continued with a pitying gaze, "You're really the world's most pitiful child. Do you know how Bai Cha died? Shen Wei found out her real identity, then strangled her to death with his very own hands. You were born of abhorrence. Why did Shen Wei raise you? Did you think you were regaining lost grounds when you crawled your way out of the Chashi Sinkhole and returned to Zhongbo after experiencing all that hatred and sorrows?" He let out a dreary laugh and said cruelly, "You made it all out to be so incredibly touching, but you didn't expect it, did you? No one will accept you for how you are. If Libei were to find out who Bai Cha is, Xiao Chiye's blade would turn on you."

A jolt suddenly vibrated through the railing. At the same instant Shen Zechuan sprang, Lei Jingzhe crossed his arms before him to block the blow. The kick nearly made him lean over backward. With both of them locked in fierce combat, Yan Heru did not dare to remain close by and scrambled his way to the other end. Lei Jingzhe nearly could not hold his own against the blows, and as he retreated to evade the blows, he scraped against the wooden frame for vines, knocking it over along with the glazed lamps nearby. Flames pounced onto the woolen carpet, setting it ablaze in the blink of an eye.

Lei Jingzhe was sure that Shen Zechuan had already lost his measure of control. As both of them duke it out on the railing, the flames behind them intensified.

Fei Sheng was all bathed in blood from the killing. He flipped out of the stairway and shouted, "Master, it's on fire. It's inadvisable to remain here for long!"

Lei Jingzhe felt a gush of wind at his back, and he spared whatever remaining strength he had to dodge the Imperial Bodyguards. "Dunzhou is my territory tonight. You have no way out of here alive even if you fight to the death!"

In the midst of his proclamation, Lei Jingzhe saw white sleeves rushing right towards him with a move so sudden it caught him off-guard and caused him to stumble. Shen Zechuan grabbed Lei Jingzhe by his collar, and in this heart-stopping moment, Lei Jingzhe got a clear look at Shen Zechuan's face. Even before Fei Sheng could lend a hand, the sound of fabric tearing rang out, and in a flash, a feather-like white figure plunged down together with Lei Jingzhe!

Fei Sheng was seized with terror as he made a sudden grab for him with a lightning move of his hand, but his hand merely brushed past the corner of Lei Jingzhe's clothes. Panic-stricken, he cried out in a trembling voice, "Master!"

The instant Lei Jingzhe plummeted down, he came to the conclusion that Shen Zechuan was gambling on his life with him! During the drop, he swiftly stretched out his right hand. His back slammed into the upturned eaves on Fuxian Peak. At the same time the corner broke off from the impact, he grabbed hold of the eaves and hung on, his feet swinging in the empty air. The blazing flames looked as though they were engulfing the world, and in spite of himself, Lei Jingzhe broke out in a sweat. Lei Jingzhe did not dare to be negligent. His right hand was burning with pain as he attempted to climb up the damaged eaves onto the protruding tiles.

But Shen Zechuan had already climbed up from the other end. He stepped down on Lei Jingzhe's raised hand, and several tiles tumbled off all at once and smashed into smithereens below.

Shaken, Lei Jingzhe spat out the blood in his mouth in the wind. "Fuck!"

Shen Zechuan looked down at Lei Jingzhe, his badly torn sleeves revealing his right hand while towering flames blazed behind him. He removed the bandage and threw away the steel needle that had been secured with it, then clenched his five pale fingers into a fist to test his strength.

Lei Jingzhe's fingers were hurting from being stepped on. He had pulled the muscles on his arm earlier, and right now, he was hanging on for dear life with all his might, his feet stepping in empty air as he forced himself to cling on to the damaged eaves. He saw that steel needle fall before his very eyes.

"Even if you kill me, you won't survive this." Lei Jingzhe looked up and squeezed out a laugh. "You're too pitiful. You've been molded into a monster! After tonight, Zhongbo will be your nightmare. You will toss and turn night after night, and you will be on tenterhooks day after day. The land under your feet..."

Shen Zechuan squatted down. The light of the flames made a clean sweep of his gloominess and pallor, replacing it with an exotic allure and a bloodthirsty ruthlessness. He let out a quiet laugh. “How very naïve of you.”

Lei Jingzhe’s throat bobbed. He did not understand why—a strained gasp escaped as Shen Zechuan’s right hand clutched his throat tightly. Never had he imagined that the seemingly frail and sickly Shen Zechuan would have such great strength!

Shen Zechuan tightened his grip, using Lei Jingzhe’s momentum in climbing up to haul him up some. As he watched Lei Jingzhe’s face flush red, he said in a soft voice, “You are really a hilarious one, Lei Jingzhe. Why would you think that Bai Cha is enough to sway me?”

Unable to catch his breath, Lei Jingzhe’s eyes darted all over as fear engulfed him whole.

Shen Zechuan scrutinized him and said kindly, “I came to Dunzhou for the specific purpose of capturing you.”

Lei Jingzhe’s breathing hitched in his throat.

“You did me a great favor.” Shen Zechuan turned his eyes to look at Dunzhou. “I want to annex both the prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou, but I didn’t dare to make a move because of Qi Zhuyin. All I could do was to make use of King Yi of Fanzhou as a cover. You could have lived a little longer. If you hadn’t brought the Biansha people over this time, I might have had to wait a year or two, or even longer, to find an opportunity, but you brought the Biansha Cavalry.”

The sparks crackled and spluttered.

“Now I have enough reason to deploy troops to Dunzhou.” Shen Zechuan shifted his gaze back to Lei Jingzhe’s face. “Thanks to you for chatting with me for this long so that I could buy time for the Cizhou Garrison Troops.”

Lei Jingzhe could not believe it. How could Shen Zechuan have plotted his moves to such an extent and anticipated every step Lei Jingzhe himself would take?! He raised his head, the world before him was already a blur. With some difficulty, he gasped, “You, you s-scorpion...”

“Regardless of who my parents are,” Shen Zechuan turned his head to the side and whispered into his ear, “I am Shen Zechuan. Whether your word is the truth or a lie is of no significance to me at all. I am my own nightmare.”

The land under his feet?

Zhongbo could not tie down Shen Zechuan at all. He was not as attached to his native land as Xiao Chiye was. On the day he fell into the Chashi Sinkhole, he became a man without a hometown. Ever since then, he severed all attachment he held towards the land. He could never gallop in the grasslands; his wings were born out of the darkness of the night. If Xiao Chiye was Hongyan Mountains, then Shen Zechuan was the frigid wind coursing through the territories of Zhongbo.

Shen Wei, Bai Cha.

He did not care for them at all.

The two fingers on his right hand made a noise of protest, but Shen Zechuan could no longer feel the pain. He gripped Lei Jingzhe's throat just like how he had choked Ji Lei a year ago. This made it clear to all that he was no longer trapped under the control of others. Perhaps Lei Jingzhe was right. All these years of suffering and hatred had molded him into a monster. When Qi Huilian died as well in that heavy downpour, Shen Zechuan completely forsook all of those obsolete conventions. He would no longer be anyone's prisoner.

He loved Xiao Chiye, and he still had Ji Gang. He could not imagine a day when Xiao Chiye and Ji Gang would become a thing of the past, transformed into pain he had no remedy for. He had enough of enduring it in silence; he was fed up of being chained. He wanted to tear apart not just this world, but also all the shackles imposed on him in the past!

Lei Jingzhe could hardly hang on anymore. He was finally able to raise his hands to grab Shen Zechuan's arm, and it was at this moment he remembered the rumors in Qudu.

"Mad, mad..." Lei Jingzhe squeezed the words out.

The angry flames that stretched like a fiery dragon roared among the double-eaved roofs and pavilion, and the building let loose a series of dangerous-sounding noises amidst the burning. Broken wood went smashing with a thunderous crash, and the tiles under their feet followed suit and slid off. Fuxian Peak, which Yan Heru had spent big bucks to construct, was in the process of collapsing. The damaged eaves cracked apart again, as if it could not bear the weight of two people.

It was here Shen Zechuan stood, yet he remembered the abyss in his dream. He had always stood at the brink of the abyss without taking that one step forward, because he did not know what kind of change that one step would usher in. But then, he heard the sound of horses' hooves.

That was the wind that came from Libei.

Shen Zechuan released his hand. At that very instant the eaves collapsed, Shen Zechuan strode a step out. His white robe went fluttering in the wind as he plunged down like a bird with its wings folded. The wind swept past his ears. He felt as if he had experienced a dream.

Still, stagnant waters lay at the bottom of the abyss, and it was here Shen Zechuan fell and stirred up waves of ripples. But the breathing in his ear was so, so intense. A vibrant life force brimming with vitality dispelled the darkness as strong arms held Shen Zechuan tight. In that split second, the lifeless waters seemed to have brushed off its extraneous dust to metamorphose into Xiao Chiye's chest.

Xiao Chiye had caught hold of him.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Special thanks to Tea for proofreading! <3

 Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin
Footnotes

- 1.
2. 头车 literally head cart according to sources; a complex siege weapon used for mining which can also be used as a protective cover during a siege.

- 3.
4. 绣春刀 Xiuchun Blade is the blade of the Imperial Bodyguards during the Ming Dynasty.

- 5.
6. (攀)云梯 a hinged folding ladder known as the “cloud ladder” used for sieges
7. i.e. a dangerous place
8. Swan Goose is also the same 鸿雁 in Hongyan Mountains

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 175 : KITTEN

Translated with: Jia<3

Fuxian Peak was in the midst of collapsing, and Xiao Chiye's soul was about to take leave of his body at the exact moment he looked up. He grabbed onto the eaves with an arm and stepped on somebody's head to clamber up the double-eaved roof, then ran for what his life was worth. He caught Shen Zechuan in his arms as he leaped, and the impact careened him off-course. He immediately covered Shen Zechuan with his arms as his back struck heavily against the ridge of the roof, causing the tiles to topple off.

Chen Yang reined in his horse and brandished his whip to point towards the eaves as he shouted urgently, "Laohu, catch them!"

Xiao Chiye panted heavily as his sore arms braced his body. Sweat trickled along his neck. As the falling objects went crashing, he haphazardly brushed aside the hair on Shen Zechuan's cheek with his trembling fingers and confirmed that Shen Zechuan was still gasping for breath. He let loose a vague curse and held Shen Zechuan so tightly with such force that Shen Zechuan coughed intermittently amid the smoke and dust.

Tantai Hu had already chased all the way to the front of the building. He released Lang Tao Xue Jin's reins and shouted, "Master!"

Xiao Chiye stepped on the tiles and leaped down. Gu Jin wanted to give him a helping hand, but Xiao Chiye raised his arm to block the former, unwilling to hand Shen Zechuan over to anyone else. As he mounted his horse, Xiao Chiye took the cloak from Chen Yang and covered Shen Zechuan with it.

The contours of Xiao Chiye's side profile were cold and hard. He patted Tantai Hu on the back with his freed hand, making Tantai Hu stick out his chest, then said in a cold voice, "This place was your elder brother's battlefield."

Tantai Hu wiped away the blood on his cheek in silence.

With eyes grave and solemn, Xiao Chiye said. "Tantai Hu, time to go home."

Once again, the Prince of Jianxing's manor was burned and razed to the ground. Flames accompanied the sound of killing as the fire blazed until dawn. The dark red blood on the downtown streets of Dunzhou had converged into a trickling stream. Meanwhile, the commoners all hid themselves at home, not daring to even sneak a peek. At the third quarter of the hour of chen, the Cizhou Garrison Troops and Imperial Army started to clean up the battlefield. They dragged the corpses to an open, flat area to be disposed of at a later time.

Tantai Hu was presently having his meal. He had just returned from the battlefield, and without even washing his face, he squatted with the guards on the veranda to gobble down his food. Chen Yang called for the chef in the Yan clan's pleasure house to prepare meals for the soldiers of the garrison troops and Imperial Army, who were all famished after having marched through the night and fighting until the break of day.

"Street fights are still the most thrilling." Tantai Hu wiped his mouth. "Field operations are thrilling too, but not nearly as thrilling."

"Master has the foresight..." Gu Jin bit down on a steamed bun before continuing, "not to get the Imperial Army to put on armor. Otherwise, we would have suffered from those hammers last night."

The curtains of the main hall remained down all the time they rested up here. Chen Yang was a little worried. Clutching at the register of names, he questioned Ding Tao, "Why did you let Young Master go up that tower? You didn't even go with him."

Ding Tao hung his head down, not daring to say a word. Fei Sheng and several others who had been injured had hastily bandaged their wounds, and their upper garments were uncovered as they all kneeled in the courtyard and waited to be reprimanded. However, the Imperial Bodyguards put up a beautiful defense last night. They had not allowed Lei Jingzhe to force his way up from the stairs. Two of their own had died. As Fei Sheng had shouted, they had made a name for themselves with this one battle! No one could belittle them in the future. They had real capabilities to speak of, and they could hold their heads high even when they stood before the guards from Libei, for they were no less inferior.

Kong Ling stood in the hall and let his sleeves fall as he waited deferentially at the side. He knew Xiao Chiye was feeding Shen Zechuan medicine when he heard the clinks of the porcelain bowl in the inner chamber. After a while, the maidservant came out with the bowl and curtsied to Kong Ling before leaving the room.

Xiao Chiye lifted the curtain and stepped out. He wiped his hands with a handkerchief and said to Kong Ling, "It's nothing serious... he hurt his hand. Last time, it was his left hand, and now it's his right hand. In any case, he's taking turns to injure them. Sooner or later, he's going to be the death of me."

Kong Ling remained calm and unruffled as he lowered his head and listened; he knew the words were not meant for him. The inner chamber was not soundproof, and the way Xiao Chiye mentioned it so casually made the man lying within turn over soundlessly.

Xiao Chiye set the handkerchief to one side, then made way and gestured for Kong Ling to enter. Once Kong Ling lifted the curtains and went in, he strode out of the door to stand under the eaves and whistled to the guards.

"Let Gu Jin dispose of the corpses. Settle it by tonight at the latest. Get whatever cleansing agents needed like vinegar and water from the Yan clan." Xiao Chiye cast a glance at the weather. "While it's not that hot in autumn, I noticed last night that the public ditches in Dunzhou are all clogged as well. It's all too easy for an epidemic to start if they aren't unclogged. Keep an eye on it."

Dunzhou had no yamen to manage its affairs, and its network of public ditches was all in a mess. There were plenty of people who built their houses over the ditches, and the clogage was far worse than it had been in Qudu. It was the reason for the blood pooling into puddles this morning instead of flowing freely like a river.<sup>1</sup> Autumn was not as hot as summer, but it was too dry. The fire had raged for so long last night partially because the houses in the residential district were all clustered together, eaves to eaves.

As he stood at the doorway and gave his instructions, Shen Zechuan was also discussing affairs with Kong Ling in the inner chamber.

Kong Ling sat on the small chair by the side of the bed and said, "Once we received your lordship's letter in Cizhou, we immediately began to check the garrison troops. Yuanzhuo wanted the garrison troops to leave the city right at once and head east to wait for the Imperial Army at the southern border of the Bianbo Camp. He said if the Imperial Army came, they could head south as one. If not, they should remain there and wait." He smiled when he spoke to this point. “I initially objected to it, because your lordship instructed us in the letter not to act arbitrarily without orders. It’s a good thing Yuanzhuo insisted.”

Shen Zechuan leaned partially against the pillow and read the letter Kong Ling brought along. “Yuanzhuo understood the message behind that letter.”

Shen Zechuan, unable to write a letter then, had to orally dictate many points for inclusion in the letter. At that time, there were still captured bandits around the horse carriage, and many among them were former subordinates of Liu’er. What’s more, Liu’er was Lei Jingzhe’s messenger. Shen Zechuan could not trust all these people, so when he issued his command to Cizhou, he said “do not act arbitrarily without orders”. But then, he followed up right after with the order to head for Dunzhou. He was playing with words here, and Yao Wenyu got the hint right at once.

“Your lordship is circumspect and farsighted. A few days back when we were discussing Dunzhou, we still thought we would only be able to come after spring next year. Who would have expected your lordship to have already worked out the appropriate strategy?” Kong Ling said.

“It was a coincidence this time.” Shen Zechuan was clear-headed. “When I seized those supply wagons, I only knew that there were four hundred scorpions still in Dunzhou. I gave Cizhou a hint to deploy troops initially because I wanted to use this reason to let the Garrison Troops probe into just how deep the waters in Dunzhou run. It would have been enough to capture Lei Jingzhe alive. But who knew, he even brought along more than ten thousand cavalymen and delivered them right into my hands.”

During their discussion back in Cizhou, they had agreed to first keep King Yi’s small imperial court in Fanzhou under control before attempting to obtain Dunzhou. This was because King Yi could obstruct Qi Zhuyin of Qidong on Shen Zechuan’s behalf. Shen Zechuan now had the two Prefectures of Cizhou and Chazhou in his hands, and he relied on the trade route to rise to power. In Zhongbo, he could only be considered the master of a small plot of land. The various prefectures of Dunzhou, Duanzhou, Fanzhou, and Dengzhou to the east all had their own masters. If Shen Zechuan wanted to remove them from the equation, he needed a logical reason. Otherwise, Qi Zhuyin would have a reason to launch an assault on him the moment he deployed his troops.

In all probability, Lei Jingzhe did not expect himself to come for the sole reason of eliminating Hairigu, only to end up being the perfect reason for Shen Zechuan to attack Dunzhou. But this also illustrated one thing from the side, and that was, Lei Jingzhe had been around Duanzhou for so long that he had already forgotten that Zhongbo was still land that was part of Dazhou. It was brazen and dauntless of him to lead ten thousand cavalymen deep into Dunzhou. He thought nothing of King Yi of Fanzhou and Dengzhou at all, and even less of Shen Zechuan of Cizhou.

Kong Ling initially still had other matters to report, but then he heard the wind starting to rise outside the window. In no time at all, it started to drizzle. He hurriedly stood up and closed the windows for Shen Zechuan. "This has truly been a dangerous trip for your lordship. Some words ought to have been conveyed to you by Yuanzhuo himself, but it is inconvenient for him to travel long-distance, so I shall be so bold as to do it on his behalf."

Shen Zechuan seemed to know what Kong Ling was going to say. He set the letter on the blanket and looked at Kong Ling.

Kong Ling took two steps and said, "As the saying goes, a wise man does not put himself in harm's way;<sup>2</sup> for your lordship to repeatedly place yourself in dangerous situations is simply not appropriate. The development of Cizhou's foundation is still in its fledgling stage, and the system for the registration of Chazhou's citizens has yet to be perfected. Libei's mutual trade market has not started either. Your lordship is the head of the household. In doing this, you are hanging in the balance the loyalty of all those who stand behind you."

Kong Ling's meaning could not be any clearer. Now that Shen Zechuan was the 'Prefectural Lord', he had in his hands the lifeblood of the two prefectures of Cizhou and Chazhou, along with the tiger that was Libei crouching behind him. As the saying goes, embarking on a great undertaking is only the tip of the iceberg. There would be many affairs in the future where he would be the one holding the sole decision-making power. Nothing untoward must happen to him.

Shen Zechuan's countenance was pleasant as he bowed slightly towards Kong Ling. "Mister is right to lecture me. I will sincerely reflect on it and not take any unnecessary risks again."

After Kong Ling had taken his leave, Shen Zechuan folded up the letter and put it away on the small table at the head of the bed. His right hand had been bandaged again. His two fingers had been bent out of shape from the pressure he inflicted on them, and when the physician set his fingers right earlier, he had sweated profusely. Even now, he was still in pain.

Rain poured outside, as though it were cleansing the streets on behalf of Dunzhou. There were many matters that Shen Zechuan had yet to attend to, but he was presently leaning back against the pillow. He had no wish to see anyone except for Xiao Chiye, but Xiao Chiye did not come in even after he waited for a little over an hour. Eventually, he ended up drifting to sleep.

The next time Shen Zechuan woke up, he was woken by the heat. He had already been shifted further into the bed. The sky was murky and bleak, accompanied by the urgent howls of wind and rain. He cocked his head to see Xiao Chiye sitting by the outer edge of the bed, reading a letter by the faint candlelight.

The instant Shen Zechuan saw Xiao Chiye, he started to ache all over. He was too lazy to move, having just woken up, so he clung dazedly to the pillow for a while. His foot under the blanket slid over to make light contact with Xiao Chiye's calf.

Xiao Chiye ignored him.

Shen Zechuan propped himself up to look over at the letter, then explained in a hoarse voice, "It's from Yuanzhuo... I have to reply back to him later to get Gao Zhongxiong to write up a notice immediately. We have to make it clear to Qidong that Cizhou deployed its troops this time to fight the Biansha Cavalry."

Xiao Chiye looked at him out of the corner of his eyes, then folded the letter and tossed it to the side. He said nothing.

Shen Zechuan took his chance to lie on Xiao Chiye's arm and buried his head. "Ce'an."

"I'll return to Cizhou with you in a few days." Xiao Chiye lowered his eyes to stare at Shen Zechuan. "Let's see. You broke your fingers, and you jumped off a building. Ji Gang-shifu is going to have to lash me until the horsewhip breaks."

Shen Zechuan said in a muted voice, "Don't."

Xiao Chiye fell silent for a moment.

Shen Zechuan nuzzled his face against Xiao Chiye's arm and called out softly, "A-Ye."

Xiao Chiye felt that Shen Zechuan really deserved a spanking. He was determined not to fall for it this time, so he raised his other hand to grab the back of Shen Zechuan's collar and lifted him over to the side. "Who's A-Ye? No such person."

Shen Zechuan said, "Er—"

Xiao Chiye simply covered Shen Zechuan with the blanket, then blew out the candle flame. Without even embracing him, he turned his back and lay down, still fully clothed. He still remembered that feeling when he broke into a dash. He had really gone all out then, as if his life depended on it. He would not care to look even if there had been a mountain of swords and a sea of flames before him. He was about to die from all those stabs Shen Zechuan was dishing out to his heart.

Shen Zechuan peeled off the blanket and bumped against Xiao Chiye's back all the way up to his shoulder. He stuck to Xiao Chiye's temple and said, "I can't sleep if you aren't hugging me."

Xiao Chiye lay flat and grabbed Shen Zechuan around his waist to drag him onto his body. Shen Zechuan looked at him, and he looked at Shen Zechuan. However, he would not release his grip and instead secured Shen Zechuan in this position so that Shen Zechuan could not move.

"Go ahead and sleep." Xiao Chiye said.

"This position is rather cramped." Shen Zechuan motioned to his chest with his eyes. "It's still pounding."

"Isn't that nice?" Xiao Chiye said with a shadow of a smile. "Mine has been pounding all this time."

Shen Zechuan raised his palm over Xiao Chiye's chest and rubbed it.

Xiao Chiye lifted him up high and said, "No touching. I'm angry."<sup>3</sup>

Shen Zechuan was like a downtrodden cat that had fallen into the water<sup>4</sup> as Xiao Chiye held him in his hands while he brandished his paws to scratch at Xiao Chiye's chest. So light, yet so ticklish. So devilish, yet so pampered. The scratches made even Xiao Chiye's teeth itch. Look at those expressive, lazy eyes; he was clearly an emboldened one, brazenly acting as if nothing that happened was of his own doing.

Xiao Chiye was miffed, but those scratches wore his bad temper down into nothingness. The way Shen Zechuan looked and acted now could not be found anywhere else, for it was the outcome of being much too indulged and spoiled in Xiao Chiye's arms. Xiao Chiye knew this very well, but he did not intend to let Shen Zechuan get away with it unpunished.

"This a scrub you're giving me?" Xiao Chiye said mercilessly. "It's been two days since I last bathed."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Special thanks to Tea for proofreading! <3

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 血流成洼 based on 血流成河, literally blood flowing like a river (i.e., bloodbath)
2. A saying from Mencius. 君子不立危墙之下 literally, a gentleman would not stand under a shaky wall.

- 3.
4. 落水 literally fallen into water, although also used figuratively of someone gone astray, or down on their luck (as in 落水狗)

QIANG JIN JIU – CHAPTER 176 : BREAKING WAVES

Translated with: Jia<3

Xiao Chiye headed south from Bianbo camp to join up with the Cizhou garrison troops at the borders of Libei. But instead of continuing south, he chose the same route Shen Zechuan had taken and took a detour to the west of Dunzhou. The troops could only advance at night in order to not alarm King Yi of Fanzhou, but fortunately, he made it just in time.

Shen Zechuan leaned over to sniff Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye would not let him get his wish and lifted him high. In retaliation, Shen Zechuan clutched him by the front of his clothes. Xiao Chiye stayed conscious of Shen Zechuan's bandaged right hand, worried that he would worsen the injury if he so much as exerted force on it, so he had no choice but to lower Shen Zechuan and let the latter sniff all he wanted.

"It has been two days since I last bathed too." Shen Zechuan pressed his knee up against Xiao Chiye and sank into the bedding to snuggle up to him. "Let's bathe together."

Rain pitter-pattered on the eaves, sounding as if it was being scoured by countless amounts of tiny brushes. Xiao Chiye opened up his chest to Shen Zechuan, and Shen Zechuan lay on top of it. That loosened collar of his gave him a laid-back air. Every inch of his skin was seeking out Xiao Chiye. He was this relaxed, as if the sensuality oozing off him was unintentional, and all these expressions of his, innocent.

Shen Zechuan had the ability to turn his exhalations of breath into murmurs. In Xiao Chiye's eyes, Shen Zechuan was a natural beauty. The expression in those eyes tantalized Xiao Chiye's heart the same way his warm fingertips grazed against the surface of the lake in Xiao Chiye's soul, stirring up ripple after ripple. Shen Zechuan had moments where he would plead; every time he could not bear it anymore, he would tearfully call out all of Xiao Chiye's forms of address, yet he could even make the way he pleaded sound so intoxicating.

They had always been in sync with one another in bed, each with the ability to mutually read even the slightest moan and groan that passed between them. Such unparalleled ecstasy was derived from the way they fit so perfectly together. If Xiao Chiye wanted to hold his own against a lover like this, he had to be a wall, one that could stand firm against the incoming waves.

“Sure,” Xiao Chiye’s expression suddenly shifted as he said in a frivolous tone. “I’ll bathe with you.”

Shen Zechuan found the expression in those eyes ominous.

As Dunzhou was located far to the east, the days grew cold easily. The bathhouses set up within Tianji Courtyard were unlike the ones in Qudu with windows; instead, they were all sturdily built enclosed rooms. Inside, the bathing facilities were not only complete and comprehensive, but also varied and fanciful. Hot, humid water vapor would come assailing them in the faces the moment the door was opened and the bamboo blinds rolled up.

Even before Shen Zechuan had been completely stripped of his clothes, he was already soaking in the water. Under the pretense of keeping his wound from contact with water, both his wrists had been bound with a waist sash and conveniently hung up on a small rack near the pool by Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye had even selected a little golden bell from the wicker basket for Shen Zechuan, which he had suspended in the air. As long as Shen Zechuan moved, the bell would ring, crisp and clear.

Shen Zechuan’s clothes were soaked through. He could not withstand the heat in the bathhouse, but at that moment, he was too preoccupied to care about anything else. The tips of his ears had gone bright red, the stark contrast of which made the jade earring seem particularly fair and delicate in comparison. Xiao Chiye squatted before him and hoisted up Shen Zechuan’s legs.

“Since you can’t seem to remember a word I say,” A bare-chested Xiao Chiye wiped the small blade clean with a handkerchief. “I’ll have to teach you a lesson and drill it into you.”

Shen Zechuan’s toes curled slightly as he called out with his eyes shut. “Xiao Ce’an!”

“Hm,” Xiao Chiye’s attention was on his hands. “Who are you calling?”

The chill of the blade against Shen Zechuan jolted Shen Zechuan into opening his eyes. Shame burned in his eyes. "I hate you to death!"

Xiao Chiye spared him a glance. "I hate you to death too."

Feeling the friction of the small blade as it scraped against him, Shen Zechuan could only tremble slightly. The water was hot, while the blade was cool, and the sensation of the blade traversing every inch of him was especially distinct and clear. He could not bear it, and he could not bring himself to look down. All he could dare to do was stare at Xiao Chiye.

This gaze was truly too pitiful. It was the first time Xiao Chiye had ever seen it, and he simply had the urge to capture the moment by grabbing a brush and painting it down without delay. He was initially still miffed, but then he suddenly started to laugh. Xiao Chiye had never done something like this before. This was his first time, so he went at it very carefully and shaved all the areas that ought to be shaved completely clean.

Shen Zechuan's back was still pressing against the wall of the pool, and these vastly different sensations drained him of his entire life's composure. He was genuinely in Xiao Chiye's hands now, and he did not dare to move even an inch. But their surroundings were so brightly illuminated that he gasped lightly for breath in the damp mist. Condensation coated the jade earring with every rise and fall of his chest. Shen Zechuan seemed to have become Xiao Chiye's jade, one that was toyed with until no ounce of privacy and secrecy remained.

Xiao Chiye asked, "Are you still going to stab me in the heart next time?"

Shen Zechuan did not answer.

Xiao Chiye took another look after he was done shaving and discovered that Shen Zechuan's eyes were red through and through. He could not tell if he had teared up from the steam or frustration. Xiao Chiye's heart did not soften at all. He raised his hand to pinch Shen Zechuan's cheek and proclaim ruthlessly, "For each time you get injured, I'll shave you once."

Shen Zechuan felt cool and chilly down there. His eyes were brimming with tears, and the redness at the tip of his ears had already spread to his chest. Before he was done taking a breather, Xiao Chiye pinned him against the wall of the pool and kissed him until the bell went swinging wildly.

The rain was still falling the next day. Shen Zechuan had a rare good night's sleep.

When Xiao Chiye put on his clothes, Chen Yang was already waiting under the eaves. He slipped on the wooden clogs in the room and went out of the inner chamber. Instead of having Chen Yang discuss work in this room, Xiao Chiye headed out onto the walkway and made his way to another room.

Chen Yang followed behind him and raised the bamboo blinds to disperse some of the stuffiness inside. He turned to Xiao Chiye and presented the register of names. "The cavalymen taken prisoner this time numbered two thousand and three hundred men. They are now being held in the Dunzhou prison under the watch of the Cizhou's Garrison Troops."

Xiao Chiye flipped through the book without sitting down and asked with his back to the light, "Where's Lei Jingzhe?"

"Dead." Chen Yang paused for a moment. "He was already killed when we dug him out from the ruins. Based on his injuries, he died of strangulation."

Xiao Chiye set down the book. He recalled the injury on Shen Zechuan's right hand. After standing for a while, he said, "Don't wait until we return to Cizhou. It'd be too late. Write a letter now and have it sent to Qidong posthaste. Use my personal seal..." At this point, he paused again and turned around, "Or rather, affix Lanzhou's seal."

This matter concerned the situation in Zhongbo, and personal relationships must not be brought into the mix during the discussions with Qi Zhuyin. Qi Zhuyin was already doing her part as a friend by taking care of Lu Pingyan on Lu Guangbai's behalf. Xiao Chiye's personal seal represented Libei, and if they kept on asking favors of her, they would not be able to repay this debt. Moreover, Shen Zechuan was the one in charge of Cizhou now. As a commanding general of Libei, affixing his own seal would diminish Shen Zechuan's authority and prestige. Shen Zechuan still had to deal with Qi Zhuyin in the future, and it would be inconvenient for both parties to act if they had to show him consideration and take him into account.

"Lei Jingzhe is the main perpetrator behind the turmoil and unrest in the two prefectures of Dunzhou and Duanzhou. This time, he even led the Biansha Cavalry into Dunzhou. Libei and Cizhou joined forces to attack the enemy. We fought the Biansha people, for the sake of the Zhongbo's commoners." Chen Yang said smoothly. "We are not in the wrong, even if news of this incident were to spread to Qudu."

“We are not in the wrong only because Qudu has no soldiers.” Xiao Chiye said, “Otherwise, there would be tens of thousands of accusations and charges slapped on Lanzhou. But just as a cornered dog would jump over a wall, a desperate man would be driven to drastic measures. Dunzhou is already in our possession. Lanzhou now has three prefectures under his control. Even if Xue Xiuzhuo and the Empress Dowager have been too busy with their own affairs, they are going to start thinking of ways to bring Lanzhou under control. The best way is to set Qi Zhuyin loose to take down Fanzhou first so that Cizhou loses their barrier in the southeast.”

But this matter was not of utmost urgency. The Bianjun Commandery was presently unmanned, and Qi Zhuyin had already moved from Cangjun Commandery to Bianjun Commandery to hold the fort and patch up the gap in defenses on Lu Guangbai’s behalf. The Biansha people transferred Hasen from the southeast to the north, yet this did not give Qidong an unfair advantage over them. Amu’er was still deploying his elite troops and generals here.

That Xiao Chiye was able to make it to Cizhou this time was also due to Xiao Fangxu.

Duanzhou was left without soldiers after the defeat of the Zhongbo’s troops, and consequently, this place became a vulnerable weakness of Dazhou. But Amu’er did not invade a second time. Instead, he concentrated his troops in the north and southeast. It was as if he was specifically bypassing Zhongbo to chip away at the two tough nuts that were Libei and Qidong. Xiao Fangxu thought that Amu’er was using diversionary tactics, and the emergence of the scorpions squad made Xiao Fangxu all the more certain that Amu’er had not given up on Zhongbo at all. For this reason, he had to take Shen Zechuan’s proposal to rebuild Zhongbo’s line of defense seriously.

Xiao Chiye made a few inquiries about Dunzhou’s military affairs. They had only just discussed the armory when they saw Gu Jin enter.

“Master.” Gu Jin cast a glance at the courtyard and said, “Fei Sheng and the others are still kneeling on the veranda.”

Xiao Chiye turned his head aside to look at the overlapping shadows through the window lattice. He did not answer.

So Gu Jin did not dare to bring it up again and retreated to the side.

There were still bandits in Dunzhou whom they had yet to deal with. The 15,000 men Xiao Chiye brought with him were enough to keep them in check with their military presence. Liu'er could barely even walk properly when he saw Xiao Chiye. Seeing that even Lei Jingzhe was dead, he did not dare to start hatching all those plans of his again. But he was, after all, not a decent man, and Xiao Chiye had no intent to let him remain around him; thus, he sent Liu'er away to Kong Ling for him to make the necessary arrangements. Xiao Chiye did not lay a hand on the Dunzhou armory, as they still had plans to use this place after conquering it.

Xiao Chiye busied himself around until noon before he remembered that Shen Zechuan was still sleeping. He returned to the room for a look and saw that Shen Zechuan had already gotten out of bed and was presently standing under the eaves listening to Kong Ling discuss affairs.

When Shen Zechuan saw Xiao Chiye, he silently averted his gaze.

Xiao Chiye played it cool, knowing that he had gone too far in bullying Shen Zechuan yesterday, and Shen Zechuan had still yet to get over it. As he had gotten up too early this morning, he lifted the curtains to enter the inner chamber, where he took the chance while he had free time to take a nap.

When Xiao Chiye woke up, Shen Zechuan was sitting at the desk looking at Cizhou's case files.

Xiao Chiye wiped his face with a handkerchief and asked, "Have you taken your meal?"

Shen Zechuan answered in a muted voice, "No."

Xiao Chiye wanted to laugh, finding Lanzhou to be quite the pitiful one. No doubt he was unaccustomed to being smooth and bare down there, although the way he sat all prim and proper was unexpectedly a little seductive. Xiao Chiye sat down on the opposite side and propped up his leg before saying in a leisurely and carefree manner, "Then, let's call for them to serve up the food. We'll eat a little."

Shen Zechuan set his brush down. He was about to say something when someone entered the outer chamber.

Chen Yang did not head into the inner chamber. "Master, Laohu is here."

Only then, Xiao Chiye remembered that he had asked Chen Yang to summon Tantai Hu over before he took his nap. There was something he had to say in Shen Zechuan's presence. He straightened up a little and said, "Let Laohu in—"

Shen Zechuan suddenly mouthed to him: no entry.

Xiao Chiye gave him a questioning look, but Shen Zechuan ignored him. Outside, Tantai Hu had already strode across the threshold and was waiting for Xiao Chiye to summon him into the inner chamber. Xiao Chiye did not understand what Shen Zechuan meant by it, so he could only say, “I called you over for a matter. I didn’t mention it before in Libei, but the time is right now. Let me ask you, will you defend Dunzhou?”

Tantai Hu has been following Xiao Chiye around all this time, so he was taken aback to hear him ask. After blanking out for a moment, he asked, “Is Master remaining in Dunzhou too?”

Twisting his thumb ring, Xiao Chiye said, “You had no choice when you followed me in Qudu, and you were forced by circumstance when we later went to Libei. Times are different now. You can assume sole responsibility—”

Xiao Chiye saw Shen Zechuan making his way over from under the other side of the table. Realizing that it did not bode well, he attempted to press down on Shen Zechuan’s head, but Shen Zechuan bit down on him. He felt the stab of pain, but did not make a sound.

Outside, Tantai Hu had clued in on the key point and was getting all antsy, so he asked, “Does Master not want me to return to Libei anymore?”

The tip of Shen Zechuan’s nose edged along the curves of Xiao Chiye’s contours. Xiao Chiye wanted to draw his legs back, but Shen Zechuan was wedged in the middle, and Xiao Chiye could not flip over the table and scoop the latter up. They had not done anything last night. Xiao Chiye, keeping Shen Zechuan’s injury in mind, had simply fallen asleep after shaving Shen Zechuan clean. And now the hot puffs of air the latter was breathing into him were making him hard.

“You are a native of Zhongbo. The trusted aides under your command are also natives of Zhongbo. We spoke about it before—” Xiao Chiye composed himself and continued after a moment’s pause, “back in Qudu.”

His tongue was slippery.

Xiao Chiye tilted his head back slightly and carefully swallowed back that little sigh to keep it from escaping. He was inside Shen Zechuan’s mouth when he heard Tantai Hu fall to his knees with a “thud”.

The corners of Shen Zechuan’s upturned eyes misted over with water from having taken Xiao Chiye deep into his mouth. He raised his eyes to look at Xiao Chiye in this position; the viciousness in them all but turned into glistening waves of ripples that intensified Xiao Chiye's desire to bite him. Palms Xiao Chiye had nowhere to rest edged up along Shen Zechuan's chin before finally coming to a stop at the back of Shen Zechuan's head.

"Don't cry." Xiao Chiye said in a raspy voice. "Continue."

Tantai Hu choked back the tears that had just spilled over and said as he kneeled outside, "Mas... I followed the Viceroy for five or six years, and it was all due to the Viceroy's promotion that I could lead the troops. After we left Qudu, it was the Viceroy who trained and nurtured me throughout. When you told me to keep the camp defense layout in mind back then when we fought the Shasan Camp in Libei, I thought you wanted me to remain in Libei and guard the camps on your behalf. So why are you leaving me in Dunzhou now?!"

Too hot.

Xiao Chiye could not help but loosen his collar. The waves of pleasure crashed over him and sent tingling sensations up the small of his back. All he could think of was to make Shen Zechuan cry until Shen Zechuan could no longer stir up a storm.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Credits: thank you vibird for spotting typos and to Tea for proofreading! <3

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

CHAPTER 177: TORRENTIAL RAIN

Tantai Hu was still pouring his heart out. "I have no objections if the Viceroy wants me to defend Dunzhou. I just can't bear to part with my brothers from Libei, and even more so, the Viceroy. Dunzhou is the place my eldest brother was originally stationed. I'm really..."

Xiao Chiye's fingers sunk into Shen Zechuan's hair. He patiently caressed Shen Zechuan's earlobe with his thumb, rubbing it until that jade earring took on a faint hue of scarlet. The window was open, and occasionally, the muffled sound of thunder would rumble. Xiao Chiye paid it no heed.

Given that the inner and outer chambers were merely separated by a bamboo blind, Tantai Hu's voice was extremely clear. Shen Zechuan was hopelessly flushed in the face, and his words, inarticulate. He looked so tender that he seemed succulent and ripe for the taking. He had hit upon the idea on the spur of the moment. How was he to know it would be so hard to pull off? Not only was his mouth stuffed to the brim, he was also choked to the point his eyes were watering.

When all was said and done, Tantai Hu was a bona fide man, and he felt rather embarrassed and ashamed to kneel here and cry. He composed himself and reverted to addressing Xiao Chiye by his original form of address. "Dunzhou doesn't have a garrison troop at present. Since Master is willing to leave this place in my hands, I will have to prove myself worthy of this kindness."

Magnificent waves of pleasure assaulted Xiao Chiye closely one after another as he grasped Shen Zechuan's right hand while simultaneously pressing Shen Zechuan's head down with his hand in Shen Zechuan's hair. It was cramped and narrow under the table. Shen Zechuan was unable to endure the heat, and it did not take long for him to be sweating profusely.

"I'll leave you five thousand soldiers." Xiao Chiye's Adam's apple bobbed. "All the future accounts will go through Cizhou. You'll be under Lanzhou's management. If there are any matters of concern, let Lanzhou know as soon as possible."

Tantai Hu knew Shen Zechuan was in the inner chamber too. He thought for a moment and said in all seriousness, "Dunzhou has to recruit new soldiers and rebuild the city walls. I have to first discuss the exact figure for this portion of the expenditure with the Prefectural Lord."

Tantai Hu mentioned some other matters too, all of which were government affairs that required further in-depth discussions. If it had been some other time, Shen Zechuan would have summoned Kong Ling in to draft up a document with Tantai Hu. But he was in no position to be distracted at this moment, and even if he had an opinion, they would all vanish at the press of Xiao Chiye's hand. The waves in those eyes built up until they eventually consolidated into water droplets that fell off like beads tumbling off a broken string.

This was too stimulating a scene.

Xiao Chiye tightened his grip. The sound of the rain was loud at times, and soft at others. Shen Zechuan could not hold in his saliva. In this harried moment, he did not even know when Tantai Hu had taken his leave. Xiao Chiye lifted a leg and kicked the table away.

Muffled thunder suddenly crashed through the sky. The rain poured even harder, pelting at the windows noisily as broken beads of water splashed all over. Xiao Chiye did not go anywhere else. He remained here, leaning against the chair to teach Shen Zechuan a lesson. Both of Shen Zechuan's hands were bound behind his back as he straddled Xiao Chiye with his face to him, murmuring under the din of the rain.

Too smooth.

In just a couple of times, Shen Zechuan could not take it all in anymore. He shuddered amidst the jolts of pleasure, cutting a pitiful sight as he dirtied Xiao Chiye's clothes from grinding against him. Xiao Chiye did not play tricks this time. He bound those two wrists of Shen Zechuan's in place, letting him plead for mercy all he wanted with those "A-Ye" and "Ce'an" of his. He simply settled the account with Shen Zechuan, along with the interest.

The rain was still falling.

When the rain came to a stop, Xiao Chiye fell onto the bedding and scooped Shen Zechuan over. He was still grasping the latter's right wrist as he secured him where he was. Shen Zechuan drifted off and woke up again, his head resting on Xiao Chiye's chest as he mumbled something incoherent.

Xiao Chiye listened for a long time but could not get what he was saying. He was so tired and sleepy he could barely open his eyes. He gave him a vague reply, and both men grunted incongruously for a moment, with neither making sense of the other, before gradually sinking into a deep sleep.

He slept until noon the next day, and while he was still half asleep, he heard Shen Zechuan calling for him. He opened his eyes and dazedly said, "Hm, hm?"

Shen Zechuan, too sleepy to raise his head, grasped Xiao Chiye's little braid tightly.

Xiao Chiye slept for a while longer, but with military affairs still on his mind, it did not take him long to wake up. He had been going at it too hard last night, and now he rolled over to pin Shen Zechuan down. "Get up. Time to drink the medicine."

Shen Zechuan covered Xiao Chiye's forehead with his left hand and pretended not to hear.

Xiao Chiye sighed and buried his head into Shen Zechuan's chest to nuzzle against him until Shen Zechuan sank into the bedding. He said in a muffled voice, "Shen Lanzhou, help me out of bed."

The pressure on Shen Zechuan made it hard for him to breathe, and it did not work when he clutched and tugged Xiao Chiye's little braid either, so he could only open his eyes and say feebly, "My waist is sore, and my knees are hurting. I can't get up."

Xiao Chiye reached his hand under Shen Zechuan and helped him up with his hand supporting the latter's back, then hoisted him over himself before getting out of bed. Shen Zechuan was still in a daze when he was set down into the water. He leaned against Xiao Chiye, truly not wanting to even move his finger. Xiao Chiye did not want to move either, so both of them remained in this position as they soaked in the water.

Chen Yang had already been waiting the entire morning. He heard the door open, and saw Xiao Chiye dressed in a clean, loose-fitting robe with wooden clogs on his feet. He let the maidservants in first. After a moment, he saw Shen Zechuan, also dressed in a loose-fitting robe, step forth in his wooden clogs.

Both of them looked like they had not slept enough.

"Where's Laohu?" Xiao Chiye said. "Call him over again later. I forgot to instruct him on a number of issues yesterday."

"Summon Fei Sheng first." Shen Zechuan looked at the veranda. "Why is he still kneeling?"

Chen Yang acknowledged the orders and took his leave to get them.

Fei Sheng was kneeling at the foot of the veranda when he saw Kong Ling coming in with a straw raincloak draped over him. He bowed his head and greeted, "Mister Chengfeng."

Kong Ling removed his bamboo hat and took off the straw raincloak, which he hung up at the side. "Why are you still kneeling?"

Fei Sheng answered, "Master has not instructed otherwise."

Fei Sheng had been kneeling here for two days. Even while Xiao Chiye was giving him the cold shoulder, he did not harbor Xiao Chiye the slightest bit of resentment. Kong Ling's mind cleared in understanding, and he comforted, "The Marquis and the Prefectural Lord spend more time apart than together, so it's inevitable for the Marquis to fly into a rage when the Prefectural Lord is injured. Military affairs these few days are rather taxing. His anger should have more or less worn off by now."

Fei Sheng hurriedly said, "As guards, we ought to be punished for letting our master get injured. I have not seen Master for two days already, and I'm worried about his injuries."

Kong Ling nodded. "Your loyalty doesn't go unnoticed by the Marquis. Wait for a while longer, and it should be your turn to be summoned."

Fei Sheng knew that Kong Ling must have discerned something by saying this, so he said, "I, Fei the Tenth, am an unrefined man of little education. Please enlighten me."

Kong Ling smiled and looked up to see Chen Yang walking towards them. He merely said, "Don't panic. Good times will follow after the rough time you had kneeling these two days."

Fei Sheng was worried that Xiao Chiye was going to wait until the dust had settled before settling scores with him, but then Kong Ling's words did not seem to indicate that this would be the case. Kneeling these two days had all but dissipated the joy he had felt earlier. He could not be sure how Xiao Chiye was going to punish him given what he had seen of Xiao Chiye's expression. Hearing himself being summoned, he hurriedly got to his feet and followed after Chen Yang.

Shen Zechuan was sitting on the chair drinking his medicine, and Xiao Chiye was keeping a close watch on him to ensure that he drank up every last drop of it. This medicine was so bitter it made Shen Zechuan frown, but he did not dare to spit it out with Xiao Chiye's gaze on him, so he forced himself to swallow it.

He would not even drink strong tea because he hated the bitterness. Without Ji Gang by his side, he would pick and choose his medicines. Unless he was seriously injured, like he had been in the horse carriage this time, he would never give in.

Xiao Chiye looked at the military affairs and pushed the small plate of honeyed candies towards Shen Zechuan in passing.

Fei Sheng entered, paid his obeisances, and knelt in the hall.

It would not do for Shen Zechuan to stuff himself with candy in front of his subordinates, so he retracted his fingertips from the rim of the plate and put up with the bitterness. "Have the brothers' injuries been attended to?"

Fei Sheng answered truthfully. "Yes, they are all superficial injuries; not at all serious."

Shen Zechuan said with a solemn countenance, "They should recuperate if they are injured. Exempt them from shift duties these few days and leave the night watch to Chen Yang and the rest. Those two brothers have to be buried with full honors. If they have family in Cizhou, take out forty taels of silver from my account and see to the arrangements for them on my behalf."

Fei Sheng was delighted at hearing this, but he did not dare to let it show on his face. He hurriedly said, "I'll surely carry out Master's instruction down to the letter."

Not anyone could carry out jobs on Shen Zechuan's behalf. Tasks like this all used to be done by Qiao Tianya. To be able to draw money from Shen Zechuan's personal account meant that Shen Zechuan could trust him, and this trust was far more valuable than monetary rewards. Fei Sheng was beside himself with joy, but upon seeing an expressionless Xiao Chiye sitting at the side, he restrained himself and took his leave with his head lowered.

The Imperial Bodyguards had put up a wonderful defense this time, and they did not turn tail and flee from the battlefield in the face of danger. Shen Zechuan was sure to reward them. Xiao Chiye had Fei Sheng kneel because he wanted to knock it into Fei Sheng's head that as guards, they were at fault for every injury their master sustained, and that they should not forget who they were just because Shen Zechuan did not hold them accountable time and time again. At the same time, there was also another layer of meaning behind his action. If Xiao Chiye were to first punish Fei Sheng, then Shen Zechuan's reward later would appear all the more considerate, and Fei Sheng would then have to remember Shen Zechuan's kindness.

Shen Zechuan turned his head, wanting to say a word to Xiao Chiye during this interval. Xiao Chiye raised his hand and stuffed the candy into his mouth. Kong Ling entered.

Xiao Chiye said with his usual expression, "We have now taken down Dunzhou, but how to go about defending it is a problem. Cizhou has no commanding general at present, so I'm leaving Tantai Hu here, along with 5,000 men from the Imperial Army and Cizhou's Garrison Troop. We have to step up recruitment this winter. Fortifications of the city are also of pressing urgency."

Chen Yang handed the register to Kong Ling.

There were some words that were Shen Zechuan's place to say, but he still had the candy in his mouth, so Xiao Chiye continued, "Dunzhou's yamen needs to be rebuilt. The household registers have to be clean. Chengfeng, think about it and see if there is anyone from Cizhou's yamen screening process this year that you can assign over to give Tantai Hu a helping hand."

The screening of the lesser functionaries of Cizhou's yamen was conducted by Zhou Gui's advisors. Two men were executed over Gao Zhongxiong's incident the last time, and by handing this task to Kong Ling, Shen Zechuan was giving the advisors of Cizhou another chance.

Kong Ling rose to his feet and answered, "There are several decent ones. Once I get back, I'll draft up a list and present it to your lordship for perusal. When the time comes, I'd also like to ask for Yuanzhuo to give advice and counsel from the side."

By doing this, Kong Ling took the opportunity Shen Zechuan offered him, and in passing, gave Yao Wenyu a boost while lowering his own position. Although Chen Yang had seen advisors before while following Xiao Chiye around in the military tents, all of them did not possess the same kind of magnanimous bearing Kong Ling had. Surprised, he cast a glance at Kong Ling.

"For certain arrangements, just discuss it in detail with Tantai Hu." Xiao Chiye said. "You are originally the advisor of his eldest brother, Tantai Long, so just speak your mind. He respects you deep down and will not dare to give you the attitude."

They discussed some more about the governmental affairs in Dunzhou, all of which were plans that had to be drafted and worked out. There were still a bunch of merchants outside the courtyard waiting to see Shen Zechuan. Yan Heru and Hairigu had been placed under lock and key too, as there were still questions about the scorpions that had yet to be cleared up. On the other hand, Xiao Chiye had to maintain correspondences with Wu Ziyu, who had remained behind in Libei. Snow had already started to fall in Libei, and the various bridle paths were either obstructed or damaged. The convoy squad was handed the task of repairing the paths, but they only had so much money and manpower. The priority of paths to be repaired and the process of repairs were all questions that had to go through Xiao Chiye first before a decision could be made.

This tiny bit of respite seemed to be all the free time both of them could get. Shen Zechuan did not want to wake up in the morning precisely because there was too much to do. Once the merchants entered, they started to make such a din with everyone trying to get a word in that Xiao Chiye regretted it a little. They had been going at it to their heart's content the night before, and as a result, Shen Zechuan had to hang in there and drag his lackadaisical self to handle the day's affairs.

With that thought in mind, Xiao Chiye turned his head around to look at Shen Zechuan. But who would have known that Shen Zechuan would be leaning against his chair listening to the merchants make a ruckus with a deadpan expression, all the while holding a brush in his hand to draw a tortoise on the paper?

So Xiao Chiye laughed.

And saw Shen Zechuan write his name, Xiao Ce'an, on it.<sup>1</sup>

Credits: thank you Tea for proofreading! <3

CHAPTER 178: MERCHANTS

Worried about their respective businesses, the merchants were all anxious to meet with Shen Zechuan.

The hall was saturated with a cacophony of noises, with a blend of all sorts of accents engaged in conversations where everyone was talking without actually communicating and comprehending the other, much like a chicken trying to talk to a duck. Many people could not even speak bureaucratic jargon fluently without the Yan clan acting as the mediator. Yan Heru set up this “small mutual market” in Dunzhou, and they had prior dealings in trades like tea, salt, copper, and steel with the bandits as well as the various tribes of Biansha. Now that Yan Heru was in custody, they were afraid that Shen Zechuan would pursue the matter. Hence, they made plans to call on Shen Zechuan together, hoping to make enough of a commotion that the law would not be enforced given the large number of violators.<sup>2</sup>

Chen Yang notified the maidservants to prepare tea. Not only was the hall packed with seated people, the area at the foot of the veranda was also fully crammed with standing merchants who had come after getting wind of the news. These people, having arrived from all over the world, crowded boisterously together, making such a ruckus that the courtyard resembled a bustling downtown area.

It was here Shen Zechuan sat, answering, “that makes sense” regardless of what he heard. The din in the hall persisted until it was almost night, and still, they did not make any progress. Shen Zechuan had seemingly replied to every question, but he did not really answer any of them. He left them hanging until they were all starving and choked up with pent-up frustrations.

Xiao Chiye headed over next door to finish up his discussion of military affairs with Tantai Hu. He stepped out to see the dark sky and the lamps lit in the hall. The merchants outside were sitting and reclining in various poses on the mats on the ground, while Shen Zechuan was still inside playing the time game with the merchants.

Fei Sheng lifted the curtains and stepped out. He moved over to Xiao Chiye and said in a soft voice, “Master asks if you are done with discussion of military affairs. If so, we can serve up the meal.”

Xiao Chiye asked, “Have these people already been dismissed?”

Fei Sheng answered, "Master says not to dismiss them. Let them remain here. He even invited them to stay here for the night."

So Xiao Chiye nodded and said, "Then, let's have dinner in the courtyard next door."

The merchants had all made up their minds to get a definitive answer from Shen Zechuan. At the very least, they had to see Yan Heru. Their goods were all stored at a side courtyard belonging to the Yan clan. What was to become of these goods now that the Biansha Cavalry and the bandits had retreated? Yan Heru had given them his guarantee, so the question of whether they ought to stay or leave all had to be re-discussed.

But Shen Zechuan was too good at passing the buck and did not give them anything precise. Fearing the soldiers whose presence was everywhere in Dunzhou, the merchants did not dare to have a falling out with Shen Zechuan. All they could do was suppress their anger and continue to sit here with the sole intention of dragging it on and wearing Shen Zechuan down.

Shen Zechuan reckoned it was about time once he was done reading all the important affairs of Dunzhou. On seeing Fei Sheng return, he rose and said to the merchants with a smile, "Gentlemen, you have been sitting here all day. We can discuss the matters again later. I've gotten my men to prepare a banquet. Let's talk about it in detail during the feast later."

Without giving any explanation, he bent under the curtains Fei Sheng had lifted and left.

The merchants sitting inside waited for a long time, but Shen Zechuan did not return, and the maidservants did not enter to serve the dishes either. They lifted the curtains and stepped out for a look to find only familiar faces left in the courtyard. Not even a guard was in sight.

The man who had smoked a few pipes grew anxious and slapped his thigh. "He couldn't have run away, could he?"

Instantly alarmed, the merchants crowded together like a flock of sparrows and charged over to the entrance of the courtyard, where they discovered the doors were completely sealed.

Someone said in horror, "Don't tell me they are planning to silence us? That won't do! Your Lordship, Your Lordship! We are all decent businessmen with documents endorsed by the local authorities!"

Upon hearing the pounding on the door, Fei Sheng, who was outside, hoisted his blade over his shoulder and said, "What nonsense are you all spouting? His Lordship is inviting all of you gentlemen to have a rest in the courtyard. Weren't you people unwilling to leave? Then just sleep here!"

The merchants hollered, "We want to see His Lordship!"

Fei Sheng sneered and said, "Haven't you already seen him today? My master stayed inside with all of you gentlemen for half the day." As he spoke, he sent someone to move over a chair for him. He sat down facing the door. "We have checked all of your goods, and the copper and steel among them are all strictly prohibited by the government. It's not going to be that easy to retrieve them."

"It's a state of extreme unrest everywhere now!" The man who had been smoking earlier stood on tiptoe to lean over the crack of the door and quibbled, "It's all too easy to get our hands on a few batches of goods, but we only did the trade this one time. We are all honest people!"

Fei Sheng did not beat around the bush with them. He raised a hand to take the book and said as he flipped the pages, "Know what I'm holding in my hands now? It's the book of registrations from the Yan clan's pawnshop, with detailed records of the goods every one of you imports to Dunzhou every month. It is all down in black and white, so it can't be fake, can it?"

The merchants within whispered to one another, wiping their sweat and flicking their sleeves as they crowded together again. They made such a din that Fei Sheng could not make out what exactly they were saying. Eventually, that man craned his neck and shouted through the door, "Tea has long since ceased to be prohibited. Hey, I'm a tea trader! Open the door. Don't implicate the innocent!"

"Zhongbo has been in such a state of decline these two years. Who are you selling tea to in Dunzhou? The Yan clan themselves is the largest tea merchant in the south." As Fei Sheng spoke, he lifted his Xiuchun blade and rapped hard on the door panel with the sheath. "Stop making a ruckus! Hurry up and spit out the truth!"

"What truth do you want us to spit out?" The man stubbornly refused to admit it. "The goods are all recorded clearly in the book. Just match the goods with the records in the book, and it will all be clear."

Fei Sheng swung the book in his hand and said, "None of you will be able to escape if we send this to Qudu and hand it over to the yamen. Let me tell you this; my master is a benevolent man. He's giving you the opportunity to make amends. All you need to do is to list down truthfully on paper who you consulted with in Dunzhou and who you converted the silver for, and I'll immediately open the doors and let all of you out. All past accounts will be written off too."

Other than tea out of the quartet of tea, salt, copper and steel, the last three were all materials controlled by the imperial court. The Xi clan could set up a copper mine in Juexi because they had special permission, as decreed by the imperial edict. They had to audit the accounts with the Ministry of Revenues and the Ministry of Works on a monthly basis, as well as assign supervisors for the specific purpose of supervision. But this errand was a lucrative one with plenty of potential to harvest ill-gotten gains, and the supervisors – all of whom were picked by the Ministry of Revenue – were often in cahoots with the Xi Clan. They colluded to falsify accounts for submission to the imperial court, which in turn helped the Xi Clan to conceal the copper and steel. All the flow and movement of copper and steel outside the Xi clan could be seen as collusion between the local officials and merchants. These coppers and steels were just like the military provisions that were stolen from within Dazhou in exchange for huge profits.

Yan Heru's operation of the pawnshops and pleasure houses in Dunzhou was not just meant to provide the various merchants from all over with a place to trade, but also to dispose of stolen goods on behalf of the local officials. It was here he had the goods converted into silver. Liu'er had not given a complete account when he led Shen Zechuan's squad into Dunzhou; that was, the need for a specific secret signal to enter Dunzhou was not just for the purpose of "playing by the rules".

Once Fei Sheng was done speaking, an uproar broke out on the other side of the door. All kinds of accents could be heard among the din as the merchants crowded and jostled noisily at the door. Fei Sheng closed the book, lifted the recently brewed tea in his hand, and blew at it as he savored it.

Before dinnertime, Chen Yang had given the kitchen instruction to prepare fish, and as a result, Shen Zechuan ate an extra half a bowl of rice. The remaining half of the fish ended up in Xiao Chiye's tummy. As long as the Second Young Master did not have to pick out the fish bones himself, he was more than happy to consume fish to his heart's content.

After their meal, both men stood under the eaves and listened as the merchants in the courtyard next door cursed and swore. Xiao Chiye rinsed his mouth and said as he wiped it. “Isn’t there still a scorpion? Let’s call him over now. I have a question for him.”

Chen Yang left to summon him.

Xiao Chiye turned towards Shen Zechuan and asked, “You haven’t been calling for Ding Tao to stay by your side these days. Why is that?”

Shen Zechuan replied while looking at Xiao Chiye, “Lei Jingzhe is in Dunzhou. If there is no one keeping watch on Li Xiong, he might run out to look for Lei Jingzhe. Ding Tao is his playmate, so it’s only fitting for the two children to keep each other company.”

Xiao Chiye raised the teacup in his hand to take a sip. He appeared to have believed Shen Zechuan.

When Shen Zechuan tilted his head, he exposed part of his neck, which was decorated with faint traces of Xiao Chiye. Set against those marks, the jade earring appeared even whiter in contrast. Shen Zechuan did not continue the conversation on Ding Tao; instead, he said, “The arm guard was previously damaged. I’ll get another one made when we return to Cizhou this time.”

Thinking about the arm guard reminded Xiao Chiye of Hasen. He looked into the night and said, “It’s still usable after some repairs.”

Xiao Chiye had never mentioned Hasen to Shen Zechuan. That defeat had silenced him quickly, concealing away all those lofty sentiments and ambitions of his. Transporting supplies was truly exhausting, but everyone was exhausted in Libei. Even Lu Yizhi was patching up old coats all day to provide warm winter clothes for the battlegrounds. Xiao Fangxu had kept the blade that was Xiao Chiye back in its sheath, holding him back from putting all of his brilliance and talents on full display, but Xiao Chiye was glad to endure this hardship; he was willing to bide his time and wait for the right opportunity.

“I’ll get two made for you,” Shen Zechuan said seriously, “and engrave my name on them too.”

Xiao Chiye raised his arm and pinched Shen Zechuan’s chin. After a moment’s pause, he said, “Let’s not engrave any names on the arm guard.”

Blades and swords did not discriminate between friend or foe on the battlefield; injuries and deaths in war were inevitable. Xiao Chiye was unwilling to let Shen Zechuan risk his life out there with him, not even with his name. He wanted a good omen—he wanted Shen Zechuan to live to a ripe old age.

Hairigu was locked up together with Yan Heru. Both of them had already been starving for two days. He was still wounded, and his lips were parched when he was dragged to the veranda under the eaves. He braced himself, barely hanging in there.

Xiao Chiye squatted down and shrouded Hairigu under his shadow. Gu Jin immediately pressed Hairigu's head down and brushed aside his hair to reveal the scorpion tattoo on the side of his neck.

"Scorpion of Gedale." Xiao Chiye asked gravely, "What are you doing in Zhongbo?"

Hairigu's arms were tightly bound. He scuffed the ground, refusing to answer. Gu Jin gripped him by the throat and yanked his head up in Xiao Chiye's direction, then said coldly. "Answer the question."

Hairigu breathed heavily as he cast a swift glance at Shen Zechuan, who was standing by the door. But this one look infuriated Xiao Chiye, and Hairigu's head was almost instantaneously slammed down onto the ground. Sounds of him struggling rang out as he was pressed against the icy cold wooden floorboards.

"I'm not the enemy!" Hairigu could not break free. He felt as if he was being crushed by an iron arm. He did his utmost to look up, but all he could see was Xiao Chiye's boots. "Help me, Shen—"

Xiao Chiye was expressionless.

Gradually, Hairigu ran out of breath. His cheek scraped against the floor, and while he was on the verge of death, he shouted, "There is still a lot more I have to say!" He gasped hard for air. "Don't you all want to know about Bai Cha?!"

Xiao Chiye responded. "Before you learn to 'answer', we don't want to know a thing."

Hairigu felt the strength of the pressure being exerted on his nape. He strained to push his head back against that force. Sweat trickled down his temples as he choked out, "I, Zhongbo, cough, cough! To flee for my life!"

The two fingers on Shen Zechuan's right hand started to throb with faint pulses of pain. He strode a step closer and stopped next to Hairigu. "Three days ago, you told me that you called me a son of Gedale because Bai Cha split you people up."

Hairigu swallowed his saliva with difficulty and gasped heavily. "That's correct. It's because Bai Cha split us up... that's why you exist!"

Shen Zechuan frowned slightly.

Xiao Chiye let go abruptly, and Hairigu took in huge gulps of air. Gu Jin lifted him up; he was all covered in grime as he took a moment to take a breather before blurting out, “In the Biansha tongue, Gedale means ‘light’. This was the name Bai Cha gave it. Your mother’s story is a long one, so if you don’t mind, give me a drink of water first. I swear to you that every word I say is the truth.”

Credits: Tea for proofreading! <3

CHAPTER 179 : WOMAN

What Lei Jingzhe had said about Bai Cha being a promiscuous whore in Gedale was, in fact, a lie, because Bai Cha had never set foot in Gedale. She was in full bloom for a very brief period of time, with half of her life spent in Duanzhou.

Thirty years ago, when the King of Wolves, Xiao Fangxu, was still herding horses at Luoxia Pass with a stalk of grass in his mouth, and when Amu'er was still an eagle slave along the banks of the Chashi River, Bai Cha had already been sold to Duanzhou. The thought that they could later go on to be capable of making waves and stirring up a storm several years later had never crossed the boys' minds, but the girl was already well aware of the kind of path she was about to embark on.

Cuiqing was Bai Cha's madam. She was in the prime of her life then, with twin peaks voluptuous and as fair as snow when she bent over. Even just by leaning against the door, she could command all the attention of the men passing by. A woman with a sharp, discerning eye for discovering gems, she picked Bai Cha out from a bunch of girls and raised her.

Back then, there was no Libei, and the north was dominated by the Hanshe Tribe. Two sides of Duanzhou were surrounded by enemies, and it was very close to the various Biansha Tribes, which lay east of Chashi River. It was here the bandits found a way to make money. They snatched women from decent families and conspired with the yamen to forge household registrations, then sold a portion of them to the pleasure houses in Duanzhou. The rest were taken to the other side of the Chashi River, where they were sold to the various tribes of Biansha.

It was tough-going for Cuiqing's business, and being crowded out by the competitors in the same trade irked her. She used half of her life savings to feed and train these girls. She invited a teacher to teach them the four arts of music, chess, calligraphy, and painting in the hope that she could hold her head high when they were ready to serve patrons. Of the girls, she was the most exacting of Bai Cha, and true to her expectations, Bai Cha did not let her down a few years later when she went on to become number one in the establishment.

"Do you know what kind of people had the highest number of deaths on the banks of the Chashi River at that time?" Hairigu waited for a moment, but no one responded to him, so he answered his own question. "It's the women."

When the bandits were at their most rampant, their numbers could hit nearly ten thousand. They wandered on both ends of the Chashi River, exchanging women for money. Even if the abducted women managed to escape by sheer luck, there was no way they could ever return home again.

“Later, the various tribes threw us to Gedale.” Hairigu said, “At the same time, they also cast away a few women who were... no longer needed. Sometimes, these women would walk back on foot, but it was tough for them to be accepted back by their parents.”

These women had lost the proof of their household registrations, which made it difficult for them to return to Dazhou. Even if they managed to, their parents and siblings would refuse to open the door and welcome them back. They were better off dead than alive. If they were by any chance pregnant, then they were guilty of the most heinous crimes. Not only would they be beaten up upon returning to their hometowns, but they would also even be burned to death.

Hairigu pursed his parched lips and said, “My mother was a girl from Dengzhou. She was sold by the bandits to the Qingshu Tribe, and from then on, she became a captive of the Qingshu Tribe’s leader. He not only forced himself on her, but even gave her to his younger brother before his death. This buddy, in turn, gave her to another man during a banquet. She was passed on from tribe to tribe in Biansha... eventually, she fled with me. We went through untold hardships to make it to Duanzhou. Happily enough, her registration was still intact, and the yamen still had her missing person case open. She was leered at... and verbally abused, but we eventually returned to Dengzhou, where her younger brother took us in.”

The cussing of the merchants next door diminished. It was already late at night now.

Sitting under the eaves, Hairigu drank up that bowl of water and continued, “My mother was very happy, and she did much to supplement the family income. We stayed there for half a month. Then, one night, she was once again loaded into a carriage and sold to Duanzhou.”

Hairigu’s mother was wounded. It was a wound unseen, a wound called “woman”. She received training in the pleasure quarters in Duanzhou. There was no longer another way out for her. Being alive proved to be torture. Hairigu could swear on his life that his mother was a harmless and kind woman.

“She met Bai Cha in Duanzhou.” Hairigu wanted to look at Shen Zechuan, but having learned his lesson, he looked at Xiao Chiye instead. “You would never have guessed that Bai Cha was the guardian spirit of the banks of the Chashi River. Cuiqing’s continuous expansion of the establishment buildings was, in fact, Bai Cha’s idea. Having gained the power to supplant Cuiqing, she set up a sufficiently strong network in Duanzhou to take in these women and children.”

Bai Cha did not fight alone. She merely took the lead in lifting that veil of curtain. They hid among the debauched scenes of carnal pleasure, contending with the unending night. This war was a soundless one fought in the quiet, one in which Bai Cha realized that acceptance was but a drop in the bucket.

“It was not easy to get registered in Duanzhou, and there was no garrison stationed outside the city. The sanctuary Bai Cha provided could not surmount all those obstacles either. She was a bird trapped in a vessel. Heaven would not help, but some people ought to pay the price.” Hairigu lifted his eyes and said slowly, “And so Bai Cha set her sights on the bandits. She wanted the bandits to be the first in line to be punished.”

“The Zhu clan was deeply involved with the bandits back then. Their backing was actually the reason the bandits were so lawless in Duanzhou. Lei Jingzhe’s mother was called Xiaoyinlei, who married into the Zhu clan of Duanzhou. She once tactfully persuaded her husband Zhu to send troops to suppress the bandits, but to no avail. That year, Shen Wei left Qudu, and the Provincial Administration Commissioner of Zhongbo evacuated. Shen Wei was conferred as the Prince of Jianxing, and Bai Cha decided to marry him.”

For many years after Shen Wei met Bai Cha, he could not be sure if that encounter had been intentional or coincidental. But Shen Wei’s heart was already enraptured. He even splurged on thousands of gold before eventually winning the heart of the beauty and taking her home in his embrace.

“After Bai Cha married Shen Wei, Xiaoyinlei gave birth to Lei Jingzhe. During Lei Jingzhe’s full month celebration feast, Bai Cha went to have a talk with Xiaoyinlei, who subsequently put in another suggestion to her husband Zhu. This time, she told him that Shen Wei would soon start a thorough investigation in Zhongbo, and if her husband still wanted to remain an official, he had to cut off ties with the bandits immediately and make the first move against them. Not long afterward, Zhu submitted a document to Dunzhou and gave Shen Wei an account of every crime the bandits had committed in Dunzhou. He shoved all the blame onto the bandits and followed up with a request for Shen Wei to send troops over to wipe the bandits out.”

Shen Wei agreed. He needed to prove his usefulness to Qudu. So Tantai Long deployed his troops and joined forces with the Duanzhou garrison troops to fight their way across the Chashi River to destroy the bandits’ trading grounds with the various tribes of Biansha.

“But as I have mentioned earlier, the bandits had fallen in with the Liaoying tribe, and their remaining men temporarily retreated to the desert. The spies the bandits left behind in the Duanzhou yamen wanted to find out the reason behind Zhu’s betrayal, and after several attempts probing into it, they noticed Xiaoyinlei. Subsequently, she fell out of favor, and a mere few years later, she passed away from illness in the Zhu clan’s backyard. With that, Lei Jingzhe fell out of favor too.” At this point, Hairigu pointed at his neck. “That’s why I say that Lei Jingzhe is our brother. The first time he came to Gedale to look for us was to seek help. He probably knew what Xiaoyinlei had done, yet he still wished to become a bandit. He told me he hoped we could join forces to get back at Zhongbo. He wanted to establish a new military force here and proclaim ourselves kings in Dunzhou and Duanzhou. After I rejected him, I assumed he gave up on the thought, but instead, he threw in his lot with Amu’er.”

Shen Zechuan repeated the same question, “Why did you say Bai Cha split up Gedale?”

“After Amu’er rose to prominence, he sought to maximize his resources to the fullest. He asked us to join him as the iron hammer that would oppose the Libei Armored Cavalry. Because of this, Bai Cha changed her mind. She wanted to reclaim all of Gedale back into Dazhou. At her behest, we resisted the Hanshe tribe’s attempts to conscript us. We would no longer be their slaves. A group of us retreated to this side of the Chashi River to stand with Mother. Amu’er refused to give up, but back then, Gedale had already been torn in two.” Hairigu pointed at himself. “The Zhongbo faction led by me, and the Biansha faction led by Jida. Jida believed that there was no way to obtain land by relying solely on the strength of women, and we needed a place that could serve as a permanent residence. On the other hand, I did not think that the people of Biansha would be open to reason. We still had to serve as slaves by following Amu'er, and they would never give us bastards any cattle or sheep. In the end, we went our separate ways."

But Bai Cha died.

Shen Zechuan recalled that particular dream, where Shen Wei's terrified face lay hidden behind the swinging bead curtains. He clenched his right hand again. This was the hand that killed Jida and Lei Jingzhe. He swiftly weaved a web in his mind, connecting the dots he had yet to completely figure out.

"Once Bai Cha was killed, Gedale was as good as Amu'er's."

Shen Zechuan looked back upon all that had happened in Qudu in the beginning.

"And this, was the real prelude to the defeat of the Zhongbo troops."

Special thanks to Alex for sparing brain cells and Tea for proofreading!
<3

CHAPTER 180 SHEN WEI

It all dated back to the time during the reign of Emperor Guangcheng.

Shen Zechuan was of the opinion that the resurgence of Yongyi brought about by Emperor Guangcheng had been Dazhou's last hope. Although it had been short-lived, it had brought on an emerging wave of countless talents. The reign of Yongyi was an era of the rise of wise and virtuous men. It was a period that signaled the revival of Dazhou.

At that time, Qudu was ruled by a strong, decisive emperor who was at the peak of health. His civil officials included Qi Huilian and Hai Liangyi, and his military generals counted Qi Shiyu and Xiao Fangxu among the lot. These virtuous men of superior capabilities had all followed a sovereign. All of them possessed the same dream, and the resurgence during the reign of Yongyi was a ray of light, a glory, these people jointly created.

Amu'er, who was once an eagle slave, stood on the banks of the Chashi River and gazed across the turbulent river, where the Dazhou he saw was an impregnable behemoth. The Twelve Tribes of Biansha were helpless when faced against such a Dazhou. Their strongest Hanshe Tribe was repeatedly beaten back by Xiao Fangxu in the north. Once winter came around, cattle and sheep that had frozen to death were a common sight everywhere.

At first, Amu'er led the Liaoying Tribe to leave the banks of the Chashi River just to find a land where they could survive. His brothers all starved to death in the snowstorm. As the Liaoying Tribe was small and weak, Amu'er had no choice but to lead his tribe to live a vagrant life in the desert. In the process of roaming, he saw the mutually destructive infighting among the Twelve Tribes of Biansha. The Huiyan Tribe, a small and weak tribe just like the Liaoying Tribe, could not survive being trampled upon by the strong tribes, and so they left the desert and defected to Xiao Fangxu. But Amu'er had enough of shackles and fetters. He did not believe that the saker falcons the Heaven bestowed upon them were born to be slaves. He did not want the mercy of the strong at all. He only wanted to stand on his feet.

Amu'er rose to power in the desert. He was still an eagle slave when he defeated Sude of the Hanshe Tribe and married Sude's younger sister, Surina. The next time Amu'er faced up against Dazhou again, his opponent was Xiao Fangxu. Amu'er came to the realization that the Twelve Tribes of Biansha had to be united like Dazhou. He had to become the ruler of the desert and grow to be as powerful as Emperor Guangcheng, so he started to swallow up the other tribes.

But the Libei Armored Cavalry had military supplies and gears, and the construction of their iron wall proved to be an impregnable defense that prevented Amu'er from penetrating deeper into the territory. In all those times he crossed swords with Xiao Fangxu, he discovered that Emperor Guangcheng was already old, and Dazhou was no longer as vibrant and flourishing as it had been a few years ago. It dawned on him that there was more than this one way to defeat Dazhou. Gedale proved to be an opportunity when he set his eyes back on the banks of the Chashi River, and Amu'er decided to use the scorpions of Gedale to dismantle Dazhou's defenses.

Bai Cha was the immovable force that stood in Amu'er's way in Gedale.

But exactly what kind of method did Amu'er employ to kill Bai Cha?

"Why do you people still want to live in Gedale?" Xiao Chiye propped up his arm. "Given that Bai Cha had set up a safe haven in Duanzhou."

"Because of the implementation of the census registers."<sup>3</sup> Shen Zechuan thought of Qi Huilian. "This was a brick wall."

"That's right. The majority of the women didn't have a household registration. During the times when Zhu colluded with the bandits, they reported many deaths in the name lists they sent to Qudu in order to cancel these women's records. Even if a small number of the women's families were still around, they would end up being sold away by their brothers at home, just like my mother." Hairigu felt a little downcast. "The courtesans led by Bai Cha were limited in their power, and to resolve the issue of the household registration, the majority of them married the lesser functionaries of the Duanzhou yamen. Bai Cha partitioned an area in the pleasure quarter as our residence and raised the children there. But as the number of people increased, it became extremely tough to hide ourselves. The hardest part was children like me, whose appearances were so conspicuous that it was of no use even if we were to get the household registration papers. Unable to see the light in Duanzhou, we lived off the women's savings in the backyard of the courtesans' quarters. Later, the bandits were suppressed, and Gedale gained a period of peace. It was at that time we returned to Gedale. When Amu'er was rallying the scorpions together, he promised to give us land, as well as cattle and sheep. Jida believed him. I couldn't stand up to the pursuit of the Biansha Cavalry, so I could only return here once more. After Bai Cha's death, the courtesans continued to help us, but their strength was no longer what it had once been. I led my people to live on the outskirts of Duanzhou. A few years later, Amu'er launched a surprise attack at the Chashi River's line of defense, and Zhongbo no longer came under the jurisdiction of the yamen. That was the time I entered Zhongbo, where I lived until now."

Hairigu's mouth was parched from all that talking. Chen Yang poured him another bowl of water. Hairigu said his thanks in a small voice and held up the bowl with both hands to drink it all up.

"The timing is just right." Xiao Chiye looked at Shen Zechuan.

"Amu'er got his hands on the scorpions after Bai Cha's death and had them divided into black and white. The white scorpions passed him information from within Dazhou, and the military defense map was just one of them. During the reign of Xiande, Juexi was hit with a calamity, and Hai Liangyi traced the account books and called for Hua Siqian to account for it. To make up for the state treasury's deficit, Hua Siqian asked the officials from the noble clans who were in collusion with him for money."

"He didn't get it." Shen Zechuan said with certainty. "Hua Siqian resold the Hua clan's fields and houses to Xi Hongxuan during the third year of the reign of Xiande precisely because he did not get the money he wanted from the noble clan officials. But the deficit was too huge a sum, and the Hua clan had no way of making up for it."

"Then the Zhongbo troops' defeat happened." Xiao Chiye frowned.

The route taken by the Biansha Cavalry in carrying out their surprise assault was deeply ingrained in Xiao Chiye's memory. They once analyzed it back at the Plum Blossom Residence. The destination of the Biansha Cavalry back then had been Juexi. If there were white scorpions hiding among the noble clans, Amu'er should have known that Juexi was already out of food at that time.

Xiao Chiye silently drew a couple of strokes on the ground. After a moment's pause, he said, "Juexi isn't easy to defend. It was a risk for Amu'er's cavalry to invade deep into Dazhou. The strength of the Biansha Cavalry of that time was their use of resources obtained from the battles to sustain themselves in the war;<sup>4</sup> they were incapable of defending the cities. If their goal was still Juexi, then this route is a straight path to their own demise. They would end up facing a three-way siege in Juexi."

“What if the officials from the noble clans who were involved in the military defeat case wanted Amu’er dead?” Shen Zechuan covered up the military sketch Xiao Chiye drew and said out of the blue, “There was no one to hold them in check, and Amu’er couldn’t control them. They wanted to treat Amu’er like a dog the same way they did Shen Wei. They could have lured Amu’er deeper into the territory then taken him out with the combined power of three armies. This would have completely turned the case of military defeat into a case of Shen Wei’s collusion with the enemy.”

“That would mean that the noble clans were not aware of the existence of the white scorpions.” Enlightened, Xiao Chiye tossed away the branch, “They thought they could manipulate Amu’er.”

Both parties had their own ulterior motives, and each had their own goals in this game. Perhaps Amu’er had pretended to be a fool from Biansha; he did not reveal the card up his sleeve, and the noble clans did not even have a clue that there were white scorpions among them. Amu’er seized the opportunity and took advantage of the situation to ambush Zhongbo. It was as he had originally planned. What he desired was not one instance of victory, but to completely bring about Dazhou’s collapse from within.

He succeeded.

The Zhongbo troops’ defeat was a crucial node that signified the absolute end of the resurgence during the Yongyi reign. Due to the Zhongbo troops’ defeat, Dazhou underwent a radical change internally, starting from the fourth year of the reign of Xiande. Hai Liangyi thus embarked on the path of openly opposing the noble clans. Together with Xue Xiuzhuo and the others, he launched an investigation into Hua Siqian for as long as six years. Libei was forced to send in Xiao Chiye as a hostage, thereby sowing the seed for the insurgency that would later go on to occur. The Empress Dowager also cleared out the imperial court during the reign of Emperor Guangcheng. With everyone deeply enmired in internal strife, the Zhongbo troops’ defeat became the pebble Amu’er used to test the path ahead. Perhaps he had not expected Dazhou’s collapse to come about this soon, but this pebble hit right on target—it was the straw that broke the camel’s back.

“We thought Shen Wei killed Bai Cha.” Hairigu piped up again in the solemn atmosphere. “He was possibly influenced by the remaining bandits, who poisoned his mind until he saw Bai Cha as a spy from Biansha.”

Shen Zechuan lowered his gaze to stare at his right hand in contemplation.

“If that’s the case,” Xiao Chiye said, “Shen Wei didn’t collude with the enemy. Then, all his actions during the reign of Xiande make no sense.”

There was no scouring Shen Wei’s guilt clean, because he cowered back from battle and fled, then collaborated with his lawful son, Shen Zhouji, to hold a banquet to strangle Tantai Long, who advocated war, to death. He did not only retreat, but also asked the military officers and generals to do so along with him. The six prefectures had been handed over on a silver platter, and this was what Xiao Chiye despised most about Shen Wei.

Why did Xiao Chiye try every means possible to take the remaining soldiers from the Zhongbo garrison troops under his command when he later took over the Imperial Army? Precisely because it was too humiliating. These soldiers suffered the infamy of cowering away from battles. Forty thousand people died in the Chashi Sinkhole, yet they had no chance to fight back. It was with the thought of setting the Zhongbo soldiers led by Tantai Hu back into Zhongbo one day that Xiao Chiye took to heart what Tantai Hu had said that day—“the humiliation of our nation has yet to be redressed, and the feuds of our families have yet to be avenged”.

He who is owned the debt shall collect it himself.

“Think about it the other way around.” Shen Wei’s face repeatedly appeared in Shen Zechuan’s mind. He muttered, “It will make sense once it’s reversed.”

Hairigu did not understand what he meant.

The voices from the merchants next door had already quietened down. In the momentary silence under the cold, forbidding moonlight in the courtyard, Xiao Chiye raised his hands to drape the cloak over Shen Zechuan’s shoulders.

“Since the noble clans did not know of the existence of the white scorpions, then they could only rely on their own abilities to contact Amu’er.” Shen Zechuan gathered his cloak around him. “And there are only three places where they could reach Amu’er—Libei, the Bianjun Commandery, and Duanzhou. I once interrogated Ji Lei back in Qudu, and he said that Shen Wei was sent to Zhongbo because the noble clans wanted him to intercept and sever the connections between Libei and Qidong.

Perhaps he wasn't just sent there to play watchdog, but also to get in touch with the various tribes of Biansha on behalf of the noble clans."

Hairigu's blood ran cold as he said, "Then wouldn't that mean he married Bai Cha as a test?"

Shen Zechuan swiftly organized his line of thought and said in a clear, methodical manner, "Zhu gave the bandits free access in and out of Duanzhou as they pleased. Even the women of Dengzhou suffered greatly because of it, so it wouldn't stand to reason for there to be fewer victims in Dunzhou. Dunzhou and Duanzhou are so close to each other. It was impossible for Tantai Long to be in the dark about the bandits' selling of the women. Ever since I heard Hairigu mention Zhu's forging of the household registrations, I've been harboring a guess. Zhu was merely a minor prefect at the frontier; how could he have the ability to alter the census registers far away in Qudu? Zhu had backers, and these people were not men Tantai Long could lay his hands on. Shen Wei came to Zhongbo to conspire with Zhu, and he went to Duanzhou to investigate the network Bai Cha had concealed."

This was also the part that had baffled Shen Zechuan earlier. If Bai Cha had been able to pull the wool over Shen Wei's eyes, then it was implausible how the bandits in Dunzhou had been able to find out and trace it to her so easily. She married Shen Wei to put an end to the banditry, and Shen Wei's deployment of troops to eradicate the bandits had been to test Bai Cha.

Before his death, Ji Lei had mentioned one thing.

Shen Wei acted on the Empress Dowager's orders and colluded with Ji Lei to fabricate the Eastern Palace rebellion case. They killed the crown prince at Zhao Zui Temple. Not long afterward, Shen Wei noticed the presence of spies all around his residence, and there were always people moving around on the roof. He could not sleep at night because of this, thinking that Empress Dowager wanted to get rid of him after he had outlived his usefulness. So he bribed Pan Rugui with a huge sum of money and was subsequently sent to Zhongbo.

"Shen Wei was afraid of death. He was already suspecting that the noble clans had treated him as a useless pawn to be discarded. For this reason, he went to Zhongbo to seek a way out for himself in addition to helping the noble clans get in touch with the various tribes of Biansha. He wavered between the noble clans and Biansha, until Amu'er appeared. "

Shen Zechuan's eyes were dark.
"Shen Wei was the scorpion."

Credits: thank you Tea for proofreading! <3

CHAPTER 181: CE'AN

Shen Wei and Bai Cha were husband and wife for quite several years. They were strange bedfellows who shared the same bed but nursed different dreams and worked for different ends. At the same time, they were guessing who the other person really was. In those years, Shen Wei cautioned himself not to feel compassion. They had a son, and Bai Cha decided on “Zechuan” from among the exquisite gems of names. They did as customs dictated and held a banquet, where not the slightest trace of killing intent could be found in their eyes when they looked at each other. It was as if they were really in love.

Shen Wei was a child of common birth born to a concubine. He endured plenty in the past, but he eventually walked out of it to become the noble clans' blade. He thought he was sharp enough, and to prove his loyalty, he even dared to kill the crown prince. But he soon discovered the futility of it, for he was destined to be cast aside once again. The noble clans' officials who were in power scorned him. He was just a nobody struggling on the other end of the natural chasm between them.

Shen Wei sometimes sat in the courtyard and watched Bai Cha play with their son under the eaves, and he would mistakenly think of themselves as a perfect match made in heaven living in conjugal bliss. There was a brief period when Shen Wei lost himself in the thought, because the expression in Bai Cha's eyes was too sincere. So sincere, he thought he was the man Bai Cha admired and adored the most when she fixed that gaze upon him.

But these were all shadows of the past, fleeting and ephemeral.

Shen Wei would always acknowledge the fact that he was a scum. Shen Wei did not want to be a dog for the rest of his life, and Bai Cha was one of the chains. When Shen Wei was once again faced with the choices presented to him as he stood before the fork in the road in front of him, he hesitated for only a moment before ending her.

He was a blade.

Who eventually stabbed himself bloody.

Shen Zechuan resembled Bai Cha so much that Shen Wei only wanted to kill him. They were not father and son; they were a testimony of an insignificant relationship. The incriminating handle against Shen Wei was in Shen Zechuan's eyes, and this made Shen Zechuan's gaze on him too much for Shen Wei to bear. But Shen Wei did not kill off Shen Zechuan, even though the thought of throwing Shen Zechuan to the pack of wolves had crossed his mind countless times.

Shen Zechuan was the son of Shen Wei and Bai Cha. He had two strains of cold, detached blood coursing through his veins. For this, Shen Wei drank to his heart's content. He kept this son, then tossed this son out. He taught Shen Zechuan nothing. This was his revenge.

Revenge against Bai Cha, and against Shen Wei himself.

"But..." Chen Yang broke the silence and asked carefully, "If Shen Wei became a scorpion before the military defeat, then why would he set himself on fire? He had already accomplished his mission when the Biansha Cavalry set foot in Dunzhou. His only chance of survival was to continue to follow Amu'er east."

Shen Zechuan could not figure out why. This was also why he did not believe Ji Lei at first. He did not have the slightest bit of a clue as he did not understand Shen Wei. He could only say, "I can't figure it out. If the Prince of Jianxing's manor was still standing, we could perhaps find some clues from it."

"How many people do you have?" Xiao Chiye asked Hairigu.

"I can't tell..." On seeing the expression in Xiao Chiye's eyes, Hairigu deflated and said, "Eight hundred. Only eight hundred. There were initially over a thousand those few years, but it isn't easy to spend life in hiding all over. Many of them left one after another."

"You hijacked Lei Jingzhe's military supplies and gears before." Shen Zechuan said, "But you sent them back."

With the attention of the guards on him, Hairigu slowly raised his hands and said innocently, "I have no land. I live in a small alley in Dunzhou. These military gears are too heavy for me to hide them. We only have eight hundred people."

But this wasn't what the eight hundred of you thought when you hijacked the military supplies, Gu Jin thought.

"My mother said before," Hairigu said in all seriousness, "that things must always be returned to their rightful owner. These military gears didn't belong to me to begin with."

Showing no mercy, Xiao Chiye casually exposed Hairigu. "Might as well say that things you have no idea how to use must be returned to their rightful owner."

Hairigu put on an “that’s exactly it” expression.

“What did Yan Heru give you to make you go all out for him like this?” As soon as Shen Zechuan tilted his head, Xiao Chiye knew he was going to start negotiations.

Hairigu said in all sincerity, “He’s good-looking.”

Shen Zechuan found that this Biansha scorpion was actually pretty good at putting on a mask. He appeared to be rather gullible and easily deceived, but in truth, he was a sly one.

Shen Zechuan asked, “What do you want by throwing in your lot with me?”

“Some promises.” Hairigu said. “Having been on the receiving end of Bai Cha’s kindness, I’m willing to trust you. For this reason...”

“I’ll give you one more chance.” Shen Zechuan held up his index finger and spoke in what could be said to be a gentle manner.

After a moment of silence, Hairigu honestly answered, “I want land, a piece of land that people like me can call ours.”

“What are you going to give me in exchange?” Shen Zechuan drawled. “I’m not lacking these eight hundred people of yours.”

“We are all people your mother left behind.” Hairigu said, “You can regard us as elite soldiers.”

“Bai Cha is Bai Cha.” Shen Zechuan said, “I’ve never shown you and your people any kindness.”

“Feelings can always be fostered.” Having said that, Hairigu raised his hands again and said solemnly to Xiao Chiye. “I’m talking about feelings of gratitude. You’re Bai Cha’s son. For this reason alone, I’m willing to put myself at your disposal.”

“If I were Yan Heru,” Shen Zechuan said with biting sarcasm, “I’d believe it.”

Hairigu contended with Lei Jingzhe in Dunzhou using the financial assistance Yan Heru rendered him. The reason he could remain alive was because he was smart enough, and smart people rarely brought old ties into the equation; they had their priorities all clearly worked out. If Dunzhou had not fallen into Shen Zechuan’s hands this time, Hairigu would never have remembered Bai Cha—the person he had wanted to save on Fuxian Peak was Yan Heru.

Xiao Chiye said with heartfelt sincerity, “My wife is so intelligent.”

Hairigu could only switch tactics. “You killed Lei Jingzhe and foiled Amu’er’s deployment in Zhongbo. He will not give up on Zhongbo easily. Soon, the cavalry will converge outside the city of Duanzhou. You have to quickly build up the city walls here. But Dunzhou has no garrison troops, so you can only deploy a portion from the Cizhou garrison troops here. However, Cizhou is also under threat from Qudu. Therefore, you lack people—you lack troops.”

“I do lack troops, but I have no lack of money.” Shen Zechuan said, “My men will be stationed in Dunzhou. They will establish a new order here and swiftly reorganize the garrison troops.”

“Can regular troops resist the elite forces of Biansha?” Hairigu asked, “Perhaps your... husband has a better understanding.”

A dark light suddenly flashed in Xiao Chiye’s eyes, but he very naturally continued the conversation, “Hasen is leading the elite forces of Biansha on the battlefield in the north, and the forces in the south have to take on Qi Zhuyin. Amu’er doesn’t have any remaining elite forces to deploy to Zhongbo.”

“That is merely a diversionary tactic.” Hairigu responded with certainty. “It’s not an easy fight on the southern front. Tianfei Watchtower and Suotian Pass have Qidong securely surrounded. Qi Zhuyin can deploy 120,000 troops from the Bianjun Commandery to fight the Biansha Cavalry. As long as Qi Zhuyin herself doesn’t set foot out of Bianjun, there is no way the cavalry will be able to break through her defenses. Amu’er’s stretching of the battle line this far is simply a ploy to confuse the Libei Cavalry. His goal is Zhongbo.”

That was right; this was Xiao Chiye’s guess too.

Amu’er established a unit of scorpions, yet he hid them here without immediately putting them to use on the northern battlefield; this was his scheme to catch his foes off guard. Lei Jingzhe’s infiltration into Dunzhou was a ploy to occupy the area without any noise, as well as to allow the Biansha Cavalry to swiftly ambush the Libei camps down south.

Hasen would be swapped over.

Xiao Chiye guessed.

Hasen’s departure from the battlegrounds in Libei would imply that the scorpion unit had taken over his position. The Libei Cavalry must think of a way to resist the iron hammers before this happened. Simultaneously, Shen

Zechuan had to establish Zhongbo's defenses before then, or they would all fall prey to the onslaught of attacks by Biansha.

"Before I leave Dunzhou, I want to meet your eight hundred men."
Shen Zechuan ended the night's discussion. "Then we'll discuss the other matters."

Shen Zechuan rested his head against Xiao Chiye's chest amidst the cool night breeze. The medicine on his right hand had been changed. Xiao Chiye had bandaged it very carefully, and before they retired to bed, he had taken Shen Zechuan's wrist into his grasp.

Neither of them spoke; it was as though they had both fallen asleep.

Xiao Chiye stroked the back of Shen Zechuan's head, staring at the ceiling as he mulled over matters.

Shen Zechuan opened his eyes. "The profits Yan Heru earned from grains in Zhongbo are money made off the misery of others. We can get him to make reparations with the warm winter clothes that Libei is lacking this time."

"Are you planning to squeeze him dry?" Xiao Chiye released his hand to cup Shen Zechuan's cheeks. He whispered, "Lanzhou."

"The merchant's goods this batch can be transported over to the mutual market in the winter to be traded with the Huiyan tribe." Shen Zechuan gazed at Xiao Chiye, who was close within his reach. "Once winter comes, the trade route will be fully opened up."

"Then it looks like I'll have to wait until next year to get married to you." Xiao Chiye laughed.

"That's too long," Shen Zechuan replied softly. "I'll ask the Prince of Libei for your hand in marriage during the spring festival<sup>5</sup> this year."

They silently shared a kiss. Shen Zechuan sank into the crook of Xiao Chiye's arms, and Xiao Chiye turned over and lowered his head to press against him. Enveloped by that gaze of his, Shen Zechuan reached out with his fingers to caress Xiao Chiye's cheek.

With the case of the Zhongbo troops' defeat unraveled, the primary issue Shen Zechuan faced was not only the threat of the cavalry from the east, but also how he should naturally progress to stand on his own feet under the stain of Shen Wei's name. As long as it was Shen Zechuan's banner they were flying under, the Zhongbo troops' defeat would remain a shackle.

“During my time in Duanzhou, I thought that if there ever came a day when I grew up, I would change my family name and take on shifu’s family name to become a Ji. Then I’d be a squad commander in Duanzhou, just like my big brother.” Shen Zechuan glided his fingers along gently; he was like the imprisoned moonlight as he lay here in Xiao Chiye’s arms. “But then, while at Zhao Zui Temple, I came to the realization that I would still be Shen Wei’s son even if I were to change my family name.”

With a face that bore a striking resemblance to Bai Cha, all traces of Shen Wei seemed to have been erased by his mother. But those traces lay concealed deep within him, manifesting into a different kind of insanity. If Shen Zechuan had not met Qi Huilian after crawling out of Chashi Sinkhole, perhaps he would be even more deranged. What his teacher had imparted to him was not only the Confucian classics; he had also bestowed upon him “Lanzhou”. Lanzhou had stepped out of Shen Wei’s shadow—this was a part of him that genuinely belonged to Shen Zechuan alone. This part allowed him to retain his sanity, preventing him from being destroyed and incinerated in all his battles with the nightmares of the Chashi Sinkhole. It was precisely because of this that Xiao Chiye could succeed in keeping Shen Zechuan under lock and become Shen Zechuan’s sheath.

“All I wanted to do as a child was to fly.” Xiao Chiye flicked a finger at Shen Zechuan’s forehead. “I wondered why Xiao Fangxu was my old man. He kept lifting us and tossing us into the air all day long, and he was so tall and so strong to boot.”

Shen Zechuan started to laugh.

“They all say that I resemble my old man.” Xiao Chiye looked at Shen Zechuan, “When I was sent to Qudu, I thought it was a punishment, because I had once been complacent over it. There in Qudu, I wanted to strip off the part of me that belonged to Libei. I didn’t tell anyone this, but I hated the courtesy name ‘Ce’an’ then, for it linked with ‘Chiye’ to fetter my talons and fangs. I drank the best of wines with Li Jianheng, yet I couldn’t sleep at night. Even with my eyes open, thoughts of the Hongyan Mountains would still haunt me.”

That was a sort of restless torture. Xiao Chiye did not even know who he should hate during that period of time. He knew that his father and brother were not at fault—he could only hate himself. When Shen Zechuan looked at Xiao Chiye, he saw the latter as an untouchable reflection far beyond his reach. Yet when Xiao Chiye looked at Shen Zechuan, he felt him to be an obtainable mirage of the moon in the water that lay right at his fingertips. Only Shen Zechuan understood his pain. Those eyes of his alleviated the frustration that taunted him day in and day out. He had already been wanting to possess Shen Zechuan back then.

“You may be Shen Wei’s son,” Xiao Chiye whispered, “but you’re mine.”

Credits: thank you Tea for proofreading! <3

CHAPTER 182: QUAIL

The merchants were locked up in the courtyard for two days. It was one thing to go without food and water, but it was the lack of latrines and chamber pots that proved to be the most intolerable. They could not hold it in any longer and thought of climbing over the wall to get out. As it turned out, Fei Sheng was prepared for this and had his men stand guard at the top of the wall to douse them in the face with several buckets of cold water, subsequently causing an uproar to break out in the courtyard.

“The fuck is this?! What’s wrong with you?! You nearly made me piss my pants!”

Fei Sheng had been sitting until his buttocks were aching. He stood up and took several steps before saying, “Piss, huh. You people are the one reeking of it, anyway. Not my problem.”

The merchants all held up their pants, their legs shaking from the urgency of their needs. The man who took the lead earlier clung to the crack in the door and put aside his pride to plead, “My good sir, all men surely have to answer the call of nature! Aren’t you extorting a confession by doing this?!”

Fei Sheng exclaimed in astonishment and moved closer to the side of the door, “What nonsense are you spouting? I didn’t even touch a single finger of yours!”

This man pressed his legs together and bent over at the waist. “Yes, yes, yes. But you still have to let us use the latrine somehow!”

Fei Sheng said with a hypocritical smile, “I’ve already made it clear to you people. You want to come out, sure, but first write down the names of the officials who supplied you with the goods.”

The merchants were not natives of Zhongbo, and they still had to return to their hometowns after conducting the business, so how would they be willing to offend the local officials? When they refused to write, Fei Sheng continued to keep the door sealed. Out of options, they could only put up with the shame and pull down their pants to relieve themselves. It was still fine at the start, but it became unbearable later as the foul stench of urine permeated the courtyard. It was so overwhelming that they all covered their noses, and after two days, they finally caved in and confessed it all.

Proud of his success, Fei Sheng handed the name list to Shen Zechuan, who wanted this list to investigate if there were any white scorpions among these local officials. With the transportation of such a large batch of goods east, they would have inevitably left a trail behind.

Yan Heru, having been starved into obedience, was now sitting cross-legged looking all well-behaved as he stood trial. He waited, but seeing as Shen Zechuan was still maintaining his silence, he asked, “Your lordship, aren’t you going to interrogate me?”

Shen Zechuan set the list before Yan Heru and said, “All the names in here are your acquaintances, right?”

“I’m a businessman, and businessmen like me have nothing whatsoever to do with the yamen.” Yan Heru tilted his head and finished looking through the name list. “They are just some drinking buddies.”

“Hezhou is the most convenient for you to do business if you so wish, but you set up a small mutual trade market in Dunzhou and brought the merchants from all over the world here together.” Having slept well last night, Shen Zechuan was feeling so refreshed this morning that he did not even lose patience beating around the bush with Yan Heru. “That’s quite something you’re up to.”

Yan Heru blinked his eyes and said, “Even if I am up to something, they are all small tricks employed in the business world. Your lordship is truly the one who is circumspect and farsighted. Let’s not even bring up Huaizhou, Cizhou, and Chazhou, because it makes me green-eyed with envy just to mention them. Now that Dunzhou is under your control, I shall make my livelihood under you. I’m willing and happy to be your younger brother.”

“Why don’t you make it clear first before talking about becoming sworn brothers?” Shen Zechuan said. “These local officials embezzled official goods and handed them to the merchants to be transported here, where they then sold the goods to the various Biansha Tribes through you and used this as an opportunity to have the goods converted into money. You’re truly a righteous one to be leading a bunch of people into making their fortune off state wealth.”

“You are so smart.” Yan Heru actually started to account for his actions with his hands behind his back. “That’s right; that’s exactly the case. It’s through the tea trade that my Yan clan made its fortune. We had to spend mountains of silvers on bribing the local officials in order to find a means of subsistence under the Xi clan, but we could never have enough to fill this bottomless pit. These rats in charge of the local copper and iron mines had lucrative jobs where they could line their pockets to the brim. They only had to hold out their hands, and they would be able to fish up tens of thousands of silver. Anyone else would be tempted by this, so I decided I might as well join them in this endeavor.”

Yan Heru showed no sign of fear as he spoke to this point. All the business he had successively engaged in was all capital crimes punishable by execution if he had been reported to the authorities, but he had still gone ahead with them, and he had even become rather seasoned at it.

“But I’m not the one who is providing Amu’er with copper and iron,” Yan Heru bared his canine tooth and smiled at Shen Zechuan. “Your Lordship’s interrogation of me today is because you’ve found out that these are all but small batches of goods that are completely incapable of meeting the requirements for the scorpions’ equipment, right?”

Shen Zechuan did not respond.

“All the transactions that pass through my hands are recorded in black and white. Your Lordship, having conducted your investigation to this date, should have already known that I’m telling the truth.” Tired from sitting cross-legged, Yan Heru shifted a couple of times. “I’ll have you know that the person who went to Zhongbo at the very start to deal in grain was Xi Hongxuan.”

After Xi Hongxuan’s death, all the Xi clan’s shops fell into Shen Zechuan’s hands. The reason why he ordered Ge Qingqing to stay still in Juexi was to keep a tight watch on Xi Dan. He understood the Xi clan’s current accounts like the back of his hand, and he was aware that Xi Hongxuan was the one dealing in grains in Zhongbo after the fourth year of Xiande, although it was directly resold to the Yan clan by the fifth year of Xiande. But despite turning over the Xi clan’s accounts, Shen Zechuan could not find any traces of copper and iron trading between Xi Hongxuan and the various tribes of Biansha.

“Whether it was before or after the troops’ defeat, Zhongbo is the only place where you can transport goods to Amu’er.” Yan Heru said, “Even though Zhongbo lost the ability to defend itself after the fourth year of Xiande, Amu’er never made another move to invade again. By now, it should have already dawned on Your Lordship why this was the case, right?”

To transport goods.

After the fourth year of Xiande, not a single one of the provincial administration commissioners deployed to Zhongbo from Qudu lasted for long. Replacements were a frequent occurrence. Initially, Shen Zechuan had thought that it was due to the severity of the banditry, but upon arrival in Zhongbo, he quickly learned that this was not the case. At the very least, Lei Jingzhe had not been that influential at the beginning of the fourth year of Xiande. Afterward, he thought about how thorough Hai Liangyi had been in transferring Jiang Qingshan over to Qudu after he became the Grand Secretary. He had Jiang Qingshan reside temporarily in Qudu while waiting for the confirmation of his appointment then, and he had done it all so that he could send Jiang Qingshan down to Zhongbo to change and turn the situation there around.

“I truly want to fraternize with Your Lordship.” Yan Heru said, “Come on, let’s do this together.”

“Hezhou was still transporting grains to Qudu last year.” Shen Zechuan was in no hurry to answer. He looked at Yan Heru. “You have money and grain. Why aren’t you throwing in your lot with Xue Xiuzhuo? He is working in collaboration with an equally powerful ally in Juexi—Jiang Qingshan. No reason for him to let you do as you please.”

Yan Heru curbed his smile and said, “I want to too, but this man only wants my head.”

Shen Zechuan asked, “Xue Xiuzhuo is checking your accounts?”

“Not just mine, he’s also looking into the Xi clan’s accounts.” Yan Heru said. “This man is a fearsome one. He can’t tolerate corruption, and he particularly doesn’t care about sentimental ties at all.”

Yan Heru was loath to deal with people like Xue Xiuzhou for a very simple reason—he was afraid of Xue Xiuzhuo. Back in the reign of Xiande when Xue Xiuzhuo was still serving as the Chief Supervising Secretary in the Ministry of Revenue, Yan Heru had attempted to bribe Xue Xiuzhuo. However, it proved futile. Not only did it not work, Xue Xiuzhou also almost traced it back to Yan Heru’s shops at that time.

The way in which Yan Heru formed his alliances was very simple, and that was, everyone transgressed together, giving the others a hold over himself at the same time he had a hold over the others.

Shen Zechuan did not continue Yan Heru’s thread of conversation.

On seeing this, Yan Heru hurriedly craned his neck and said, “Do we have a deal? Let us draft up the rules and regulations, alright? Our respective shares in the mutual trade market's business in Huaizhou, Cizhou, Chazhou, and Libei in the future, along with the finer details of the business operations are all open to negotiations. I can also deliver grains to Libei."

"The business aspect is easy to work out. As long as you can make up for the remaining winter clothes for the Libei Armored Cavalry before the tenth month," Shen Zechuan set the lid over the teacup. "Hezhou has to assume the responsibility of supplying the granaries in Chazhou and Dunzhou at the start of spring next year."

"Can you establish yourself as king by the beginning of spring next year? You can't. In that case, my grains in Hezhou are still subject to requisition by Qudu, and I'll have to transport them to Qidong as military provisions." The internal abacus in Yan Heru's mind was clicking away at high speed as he made his calculations. "Qi Zhuyin is the commander-in-chief of the Qidong Five Commanderies, and she's just over the banks of Hezhou. I don't have the troops to obstruct her. When the time comes and she doesn't receive the provisions as scheduled, she will come after me first and foremost. Never mind if it's just me, but if it implicates Your Lordship, then Cizhou will be beset with a crisis. "

Shen Zechuan was well-aware that Yan Heru had his own schemes in mind, and so he asked, "So, your point is?"

Yan Heru's eyes lit up. "How about this? When spring comes next year, the supply to the granaries of Chazhou and Dunzhou will be jointly borne by Hezhou and Cizhou. I'll take the lion's share. Isn't that honorable enough of me? As for the portion of provisions owed to Qidong, I'll personally head to Baimazhou via the water routes on the west side to purchase them. I have old acquaintances there. But the consumption of money to bribe my way through the checkpoints is too high. I have to figure out a way to make up for it over the winter. How about Your Lordship waive the tariffs for the merchants who have registered at the Yan clan's pawnshop and let them trade what they've amassed on hand at the mutual market in Libei? The Huiyan tribe has tea, which I can make a killing with if I buy and resell it at Yongyi Harbor."

Having drunk his fill of tea, Shen Zechuan rose to his feet and made to leave without so much another word.

"Aye." Yan Heru followed suit and said, "This won't do either? Your Lordship, you're really a little stingy! Even if you want to shear my wool, you still have to let me fill up my tummy first.”

Shen Zechuan strode out of the door. It just so happened that Xiao Chiye was entering from the moon gate.<sup>6</sup>

Yan Heru simply fell to the ground and shamelessly created a scene. He hollered, “Don’t go, Shen-gege! You’re my dear kin brother! We can always discuss it over again, man!”

Shen Zechuan turned his head back to look askance at him. “It’s all thanks to you the bandits are running rampant in Chazhou, Dunzhou, Fanzhou, and Dengzhou. Ever since the fifth year of Xiande, the Yan Clan has earned quite the fortune in Zhongbo. I’m already giving you due respect by not closing down the Yan clan’s shops for good. If anyone in the two prefectures of Chazhou and Dunzhou die of starvation at the start of spring next year, I’ll have your head for it.”

Feeling timid and apprehensive, Yan Heru cowered and shrunk his neck back like a little quail. As he lay on the ground, he saw Xiao Chiye’s boots through the curtain Fei Sheng had lifted. He suddenly had a brainwave and shouted, “I still have a treasure!”

Xiao Chiye rapped his umbrella on the step and said, “What treasure? Show this eye-opener to your Second Young Master too.”

Yan Heru promptly put on a smiling face and said ingratiatingly, “What Second Young Master? It’s Second Master! The Second Master liked pearls and jades back in Qudu, right? I just so happened to newly acquire some good stuff at the start of autumn. As the saying goes, a precious sword ought to be gifted to a hero;<sup>7</sup> in the same vein, precious gems are befitting of the Second Master. I’ve long wanted to pay a tribute of respect to the Second Master!”

Xiao Chiye had been wanting to make Shen Zechuan a few more earrings, so his interest was piqued on hearing him. He had Fei Sheng continue holding up the curtain as he asked, “What kinds of goods?”

Yan Heru knew that the relationship between Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan was an intimate one. Shen Zechuan had said “my husband” on Fuxian Peak. He could not convince Shen Zechuan, but he could coax Xiao Chiye and make him happy, so he said, “When I get out, I’ll get my men to deliver them to your residence for your amusement.”

Xiao Chiye was in quite the good mood. “A sensible one, you are.”

Yan Heru nodded his head as though he were pounding garlic. “The Second Master came with the Prefectural Lord on official business and has been staying on my property for quite a few days, and I still have yet to play the good host and entertain you. That makes me feel so ashamed.”

Xiao Chiye stood on the stairs, and Yan Heru secretly smacked his lips as he marveled just how tall this Xiao the Second was. Those shoulders were so broad one could simply roll around on them.

“What did you call the Prefectural Lord earlier?” Xiao Chiye inquired.

Yan Heru answered, “Shen-gege.”

“Toss him out,” Xiao Chiye’s tone abruptly went cold. “Let him clear his mind in the pond. To think he even forgot who his parents and siblings are.”

Fei Sheng leaned over to pick up Yan Heru and headed out.

How was Yan Heru to know that Xiao Chiye was displeased again? He kicked his legs and said in a panic, “I remember, I remember! Second Master, don’t toss me away!” The wind was extremely cold out there. Yan Heru continued, “There’s something I still have yet to tell the Second Master. You—”

Fei Sheng had already dunked him into the water.

Five days later, Shen Zechuan departed for Cizhou, while Tantai Hu remained in Dunzhou. His letter was delivered right at this time to the Bianjun Commandery, where it was sent into the campground.

Qi Zhuyin stepped out of the tent. Upon seeing Qi Wei dismount from his horse, she asked, “Where did that letter come from?”

Qi Wei presented the letter and answered, “From Zhongbo. It’s affixed with his private seal.”

“Looks like Shen Zechuan is doing rather well for himself in Zhongbo.” Qi Zhuyin opened up the letter. “To think he could still remain alive long enough to send a letter my way.”

Although Qi Wei had not looked at the letter without permission, he knew what its contents entailed. As Qi Zhuyin was reading it, he said, “It has not even been half a year since the establishment of the Cizhou garrison troops, and yet they were able to defeat the Biansha Cavalry in Dunzhou. Their ability can’t be underestimated.”

“We have Xiao the Second to thank for this.” Qi Zhuyin handed the letter back to Qi Wei and looked at the overcast sky. “The longer that the Prince of Libei keeps him in check and holds him back, the more zealous he will be when he steps onto the frontlines in the future.”

Qi Wei said, “After the new year, Qudu will be urging you to head up north to suppress King Yi of Fanzhou.”

Qi Zhuyin did not respond. She whistled towards the soldiers at the back and grabbed her overcoat. As she put it on, she changed the subject. “Is my father well?”

Qi Wei followed Qi Zhuyin and answered. “As per your instructions, five men have been tasked to take turns to attend to him. His concubines<sup>8</sup> in the residence are not allowed to go near. They’re not happy about this and have been making a racket over at the madam’s residence day in and day out.”

Qi Zhuyin had initially been about to get on her horse, but stopped on hearing what he said. “Hua the Third didn’t give them a lashing?”

Qi Wei scratched his head. “She was raised as a princess and isn’t like the rest of us. She’s all soft-spoken when she talks to those concubines. She’s truly a gentle one.”

“Then she’s got a good temper.” Just thinking about those women in the courtyard at the rear gave Qi Zhuyin a headache. She continued, “The old man’s got a stroke and they’re treating it like he’s about to breathe his last. They kept clamoring all day long about splitting the family properties, even harping over that golden chamber pot of his.”

Qi Wei said, “They’re scared of you.”

Qi Zhuyin was irate. “Did I not feed them?”

Qi Wei replied awkwardly, “Well, you’ve been watching their accounts and deducting their rouge allowance.”

Qi Zhuyin had nothing to say to that. This was a rotten debt. For the past few years, Qi Zhuyin had drained her personal funds empty in order to make up for the shortfall in the military salaries and provisions of the Qidong’s garrison troops. The remaining four camps could rely on their garrison troops to cultivate the lands<sup>9</sup> to mitigate this burden, and the granaries were in abundance in all the years there was no war. But the Bianjun Commandery could not do the same. Lu Guangbai had emptied out his family assets for the troops in Bianjun, as had Qi Zhuyin with her dowry. When the military provisions for the Bianjun Commandery were discovered to be rotten half a year ago, Qi Zhuyin had borrowed money from merchants to make up for the difference. She had initially saved enough to pay off the debt, but then, the wedding between Hua and Qi took place soon after, and to marry Hua Xiangyi into the family, the Qi clan's finances had been utterly exhausted.

The amount of money these concubines spent every month was alarming. Just the amount spent on rouges and powders amounted to a couple tens of thousands of taels. By making the decision to deduct this amount, Qi Zhuyin might as well have stirred the hornet's nest. She had riled her father's concubines into a sobbing mess in the rear courtyard then, all baying to complain to Qi Shiyu.

Qi Wei knew of Qi Zhuyin's troubles, and spoke up. "What if we discussed it with the madam? Her dowry..."

Qi Zhuyin cast a swift glance over, and Qi Wei, aware that he had spoken out of turn, immediately sank to his knees.

Without looking at Qi Wei again, Qi Zhuyin got onto the horse. "Deploy Hongying back, say it's on my order. If anyone dares to get rough with Hua the Third, tell Hongying not to stand on ceremony with them and just have them tied up and sent over directly to me. She did not marry far away to Qidong to help me make up for the deficit or to become the punching bag of my father's concubines. She has Qi Shiyu's name plastered all over her, and she is the rightful madam of Qidong that I traversed eight hundred li to welcome. Bullying her is akin to bullying my old man, and bullying my old man equates to bullying me. So on that note, don't you dare have any designs on the little maiden, you hear me?"

CHAPTER 183: INSEPARABLE (FISH & WATER)

Ji Gang was feeling lonely at home with Shen Zechuan faraway on his trip and Ding Tao and Li Xiong both absent. All he could do every day was to brew some tea and take a stroll with his bird. His culinary skills were exemplary, so he took care of Yao Wenyu for Shen Zechuan. He was nothing if not meticulous, and in half a month, the color began to return to Yao Wenyu's complexion.

When the weather was fine, Qiao Tianya would accompany Yao Wenyu out to bask in the sunlight. He had collected quite the number of old books, which Yao Wenyu read in the courtyard.

As Yao Wenyu's mobility was limited, Qiao Tianya helped him wash up before bed every night. But there was one occasion where Qiao Tianya noticed the reddened tips of Yao Wenyu's ears while wiping him down and came to the realization that the latter had never looked him in the eyes in the bathhouse. It was only during such a time that Qiao Tianya could find back that Unpolished Jade Yuanzhuo from the fourth month in spring.

They did not actually converse much.

Besides voicing his thoughts during the discussions, Yao Wenyu spent his usual time sitting in idleness. He kept vigil by the chessboard, contemplating his moves every day. It was not uncommon for him to hold on to a book for an entire day, with the page he was on in the morning still the same page when he closed the book at night. Sleep did not come easy for him. Both his legs were not wholly numb; instead, they hurt every single moment. It was only when Qiao Tianya was playing the zither that he would feel a tad better.

Sleeping to the murmurings of the zither felt to Yao Wenyu as though he were sitting in the drizzle with his eyes closed.

Qiao Tianya cut back a lot on his drinking nowadays, and he had shaved his stubble clean. He was spending even more time lying outstretched in his chair with his arms behind his head, staring out of the window in a daze. From his occasional observations of him, Yao Wenyu found that the way Qiao Tianya was set against the snowy mountains and dense fog beyond the window made him appear so very tranquil. It was as if all the tempestuous vicissitudes of the martial fraternity had been banished from his memory, turning him from a vagabond wanderer into the pine beneath the moon.

Yao Wenyu had never addressed him by the name of Qiao Tianya; “Qiao Tianya” was someone who needed a refuge where he could brush the wanderlust off himself. He laughed and cursed in his state of intoxication, executing his swordplay as he pleased and to his heart’s content, and when he sobered up, he was a solitary shadow from which an aura of frost emanated. They seemed to be like two broken pieces of jade that had encountered each other to mutually make up for what the other lacked, and, in doing so, pieced back together those bygone days of free-spiritedness.

“Fanzhou has been a lot quieter lately.” Gao Zhongxiong sat by the fire and warmed his hands. “King Yi should have already gotten the news about Dunzhou. He must be terribly on edge now.”

“The army has to pass by the north of Fanzhou on their return journey. It’s only natural for King Yi to be afraid given how close the army is.” Zhou Gui said as he sipped his hot tea.

“I can’t understand.” Gao Zhongxiong said. “Fanzhou is surrounded by enemies on all sides. King Yi’s haste to rebel and establish himself under his own banner seems more like he’s in a rush to court death.”

“King Yi claimed himself to be the ‘Great Progeny’ of Fanzhou. He not only renovated the original yamen of Fanzhou but also brazenly scoured for beauties in Fanzhou in the name of choosing his consorts.” Zhou Gui lamented. “Rather than say he wants to join in the fight for the imperial throne, you might as well say he just wanted to make merry while he can.”

When King Yi first established himself, he had not expected Shen Zechuan to move that quickly. Huaizhou, Cizhou, and Chazhou severed all possibilities of him expanding his territory northwest. He was not as tough as Shen Zechuan, and he did not have that many talents under his command as Shen Zechuan did. He initially rose in rebellion because he could no longer put up with the bandits. The people he had led were all his neighbors. At present, the military commander he had appointed in Fanzhou was a butcher, and his civil officials were all elderly gentlemen. All they petitioned about during the daily court sessions were stuff like who snatched whose donkey and who committed adultery with whose husband.

“Going by what the prefectural lord said,” Gao Zhongxiong piped up. “King Yi cannot fall for the time being. We have to keep him alive until next year. King Yi knows he is too powerless to resist; that's why he attempted to seek Lei Jingzhe's help. But now that Lei Jingzhe is already dead, he is left high and dry. He ought to be scared to death now."

"King Yi is not an iron shield after all." Zhou Gui said. "We have to think of another way to deal with Qi Zhuyin. Yuanzhuo, what are your views on this?"

Yao Wenyu snapped back to his senses. With the hot tea still in hand, he said, "My guess is that Qi Zhuyin's delay in deploying troops to crush the rebels in Zhongbo is not merely because of Lu Guangbai's desertion."

Zhou Gui blurted out a sound of surprise and asked, "Do you mean to say that there's another reason for it?"

"During the wedding between Hua and Qi, the Hereditary Prince's Consort personally made a trip to Qidong to deliver gifts for the purpose of taking her father back. Qi Zhuyin's willingness to risk the wrath of Qudu to protect Lu Pingyan was not just for personal reasons, but also to show Libei her stance." Warmth returned to Yao Wenyu's fingers. "If Qi Zhuyin obeys Qudu's command and heads north to quell the rebels in Zhongbo, then she will have to face two battlefronts alone going by the current territories. Should Qudu forcibly order her to attack Libei once she recovers Zhongbo, then the battleground in the north will be precipitated into crisis. The moment the Armored Cavalry of Libei falls apart, she will become the last line of defense in the east. All her troops on hand will have to be deployed into battle, and her geographical advantage in Qidong will vanish. When the time comes, all she can do is to grit her teeth and push on."

Realization struck Gao Zhongxiong then, and he said, "If it comes to that, then even if Qi Zhuyin is able to defeat Amu'er in the end, she would not have the strength and resources left to act as a counterweight to Qudu."

Yao Wenyu nodded. "The Qidong Garrison Troops is what Qi Zhuyin is counting on. Without these troops, Qudu will be able to replace her easily."

For a long time, Zhou Gui could not snap out of his shock. In the end, he could only say, "The commander-in-chief is indeed far-sighted. Yuanzhuo, how did you come to that conjecture? Before the eighth month when the prefectural lord was still here, we all thought that Qi Zhuyin would come."

"It was only after the wedding between Hua and Qi that I made that inference." Yao Wenyu said. "Before the wedding, the commander-in-chief did not immediately head north under the pretext that there was no one to guard the Bianjun Commandery, which in turn allowed the marquis to return to Libei. The empress dowager's sending of Han Cheng to escort the bride to the groom's residence was, in part, also meant to press Qi Zhuyin into action. But after the wedding, the commander-in-chief remained stationed in Bianjun without making so much as a move."

The empress dowager wanted to convince Qi Zhuyin to deploy her troops, but she did not have enough bargaining chips in her hands. Her last trump card was Hua Xiangyi, and she had already shown her hand, but as things played out, Qi Shiyu had a stroke, and this card of hers was as good as forfeited. Everyone under the empress dowager's command was going to be secretly gnashing their teeth in resentment over the fact that Qi Zhuyin was not a man.

They were still chatting around the fire when Qiao Tianya suddenly lifted the curtain and announced, "The prefectural lord is back."

Zhou Gui and Gao Zhongxiong promptly rose to their feet. Gao Zhongxiong wanted to push the wheelchair for Yao Wenyu, but he was a step too slow. Qiao Tianya beat him to it and took over the wheelchair with natural ease to push Yao Wenyu out through the curtain that had been lifted for them.

Fei Sheng took extreme care on the road, but the ninth month was just right around the corner, and Shen Zechuan could not avoid the ambush of the cold even when he was huddled up against Xiao Chiye. He fell ill again, this time with a fever so high it seemed to burn away whatever bit of composure he had possessed back in Dunzhou.

The recruitment for the Dunzhou garrison troops was of utmost importance, and the advisors had all been waiting in the study for a day. Even while lying in bed, Shen Zechuan was still mulling over the matter.

"Hand the accounts from Dunzhou over to Yuanzhuo," With his cheeks slightly flushed and palm over his eyes, Shen Zechuan said in the dim light. "Have Chengfeng assist. Come up with an estimate of the military expenses for Dunzhou tonight and send it over to Tantai Hu in two days at the latest."

Blocking him, Xiao Chiye combed his fingers through Shen Zechuan's slightly damp hair to brush it aside. He said in a hushed tone, "I've got it all in mind."

Shen Zechuan did not wish for Xiao Chiye to leave, but the matter on hand was pressing, and the Biansha Cavalry would remain a menace to them with the situation in Duanzhou still unclear. It was imperative that there would be no delays to the establishment of Dunzhou's defenses. He glanced at Xiao Chiye with half-lidded eyes and said. "Tell Qiao Tianya about the arm guard; he'll know what to do."

Xiao Chiye hummed an acknowledgment in reply and watched as Shen Zechuan closed his eyes. He waited a moment for the latter's breathing to become steady before getting up to change his clothes and leave. When he walked down the stairs, he said to Fei Sheng, "Wake the Prefectural Lord up when the medicine is ready. Make sure he finishes it."

Even after returning to their residence, Shen Zechuan's medicine was still decocted under Fei Sheng's watchful eyes. Fei Sheng strode a few steps with Xiao Chiye and nodded his head in acknowledgement.

"If the Prefectural Lord is awake when shifu comes, invite him in. If not, then ask him to head back first." Chen Yang came over to drape the cloak over Xiao Chiye. While Xiao Chiye was putting it on, he said, "If shifu asks about what happened in Dunzhou, omit the part about Fuxian peak. I'll tell shifu about it myself afterward."

Xiao Chiye stood still and looked at the sky.

"I'll be back before the hour of hai." He was still speaking even as he was striding out. "Remember to prepare candies when the medicine is ready. It's also fine to swap it for honeyed water..."

He had already walked off even before the words had fully left his mouth.

Xiao Chiye arrived at the study, and everyone stood to pay their obeisances, but he had already taken his seat, skipping all the formalities. As Yao Wenyu looked over the account books of the Yan clan and Dunzhou, Kong Ling updated him with a detailed account of the situation.

Not a single one of the advisors dared to smoke their pipes today as they sat, all prim and proper. The marquis' oppressive aura overwhelmed them, keeping them from lifting their heads, and their reports were all concise and comprehensive. They did not even dare to overdo the flattery.

The situation in Dunzhou was complicated; the key issue lay in its distance from Cizhou, along with the fact that Fanzhou was between them. As a result, many matters had to be discussed in detail. Zhou Gui initially assumed that Xiao Chiye would not be as familiar with the topography of Zhongbo as Shen Zechuan was and had someone present a map. Unexpectedly, Xiao Chiye had Zhongbo's map clearly imprinted in his mind from all those times he had been making the rounds transporting military supplies in Libei, and he did not make a single mistake during the conversation that anyone could find fault with.

They lit lamps in the study to discuss official business, while Shen Zechuan alternated between consciousness and sleep within the room.

Shen Zechuan woke up when he heard Fei Sheng bringing in the medicine. He drank the medicine without even popping a candy this time and fell back asleep. Fei Sheng closed the door and had the people serving in the courtyard change their shoes. The maidservants, having also taken off their pendants and hairpins, made no sound as they walked.

Perhaps it was because of the quiet; Shen Zechuan surprisingly slept for a long time. When he woke up again, he heard movement outside the door and thought Xiao Chiye had returned. But Xiao Chiye never came in, and Shen Zechuan fell asleep again. In the middle of night, he was woken up by the scalding heat, only to find Xiao Chiye sleeping soundly on him. Unable to move, Shen Zechuan remained pinned under him until he was all drenched in sweat. It was only near daybreak when he felt a little more rejuvenated.

Shen Zechuan feebly put his hand on Xiao Chiye's back, only to come into contact with a section of gauze. All traces of sleep promptly deserted him. Wide awake now, he wanted to get up to take a look, but Xiao Chiye pressed him back into place.

"Hm?" Xiao Chiye buried his face and said in a heavy voice, "Getting water?"

Shen Zechuan felt along the bandage for a while, his alarm intensifying the more he touched.

Xiao Chiye caught Shen Zechuan's hand to stop him from groping blindly, "Watch where you are pressing. It hurts."

Both men looked at each other for a moment, and Xiao Chiye suddenly clasped his arms around Shen Zechuan, preventing the latter from moving.

Shen Zechuan stared at Xiao Chiye and drawled, "Didn't I say not to ask for a lashing?"

His illness had rendered him all thin and sallow, and his voice was hoarse. He looked as if his eyes were going to redden the next instant as he looked at Xiao Chiye in this way.

After the incident in Chazhou the last time, Xiao Chiye had told Ji Gang to whip him once for each time Shen Zechuan got hurt. Shen Zechuan had coaxed him back in Dunzhou, and he had gotten severely “punished” for it. He thought Xiao Chiye would let it drop. But who would have known that Xiao Chiye would act so quickly upon returning? In the short amount of time that Shen Zechuan had taken a nap, Xiao Chiye had already received his whipping.

Xiao Chiye bumped his forehead against Shen Zechuan’s and stuck close to him. Sensing that his fever had receded, he lazily uttered a “hm”. He remained in this way with his shoulder and arm bare, his back bandaged with several layers of gauze. Xiao Chiye had injured his right arm when he faced up against Hasen at the Tudalong Banner, and the wounds had left scars behind, and now, new scars criss-crossed with the old, making them tingle with numbness and pain.

The lashings pained Shen Zechuan. Just touching that gauze alone hurt him so much that his fingers curled. Xiao Chiye remained close to him, making him breathless for air. He hated Xiao Chiye to death. But as he lay here, he only wanted to repeat over and over again,

He regretted it now.

Ding Tao sat in low spirits under the eaves playing cat’s cradle<sup>10</sup> with Li Xiong. Seeing as Ji Gang had been standing under the eaves for an hour, he tugged at the corner of Ji Gang’s clothes and asked, “Grandpa, why don’t you sit?”

Ji Gang’s mind was still wandering. He asked Ding Tao, “Did I hit too hard?”

Ding Tao comforted him. “Master was the one who made the request and forced you into it. You could do nothing about it either.”

Ji Gang felt ill at ease as he sat down. After a while, he stood up and said, “I’d best go get some ointment.”

Fei Sheng was originally waiting on the veranda. On seeing Ji Gang’s approach, he hurried over to greet him.

Ji Gang gazed at the principal room, looking as though he wanted to say something only to swallow his words back down. He handed the ointment to Fei Sheng, and after thinking for a moment, asked, “Was the Marquis also staying together with Lanzhou when they were on official business in Dunzhou?”

Remembering Xiao Chiye’s instructions, Fei Sheng maintained his composure and said, “Yes. The Marquis and Master are living examples of what the stories described as confidants. They are like fish and water—inseparable from one another.”

Seeing how frank and unperturbed Fei Sheng was, Ji Gang felt that it was he who had read too much into it. As they said, bosom friends were hard to find. What’s more, Lanzhou and Xiao’er had gone through life and death together. For them to be far closer than the norm was only to be... he could not go on thinking any further. Somehow, he still felt that something was not quite right. But Ji Gang was reluctant to veer his thoughts into another direction, unwilling as he was to make conjectures about Shen Zechuan on these. They had gone to propose marriage for Ji Mu when Ji Mu was still around, and back then, Shen Zechuan had said that he also wanted to marry a wife in the future. Consequently, Hua Pingting went scouting for quite a number of maidens. They were all poor, humble families in the neighborhood who stayed close by. Shen Zechuan only had to like one of them, and they would have gone to call on the family for a visit.

“Shifu?” Fei Sheng called out tentatively.

Ji Gang placed his hands behind his back and said, ‘Continue to keep watch. I’ll come again later.’”

Ji Gang wanted to have a talk with Xiao Chiye again, but Xiao Chiye was too busy. The latter seemed to be in a never-ending rush as he went back and forth between the residence and Zhou’s residence. The dust in Dunzhou had only just settled when the letter from Libei came. Once Shen Zechuan recovered from his illness, Xiao Chiye would have to depart for Bianbo Camp.

“The winter coats will arrive in Libei in the ninth month. You can just dispatch someone to assist at the Bianbo Camp.” Shen Zechuan secured the arm guard for Xiao Chiye and asked, “Is it snowing heavily in Libei?”

“Intermittently, I guess.” Xiao Chiye answered. “It’s often sleet at present. The maintenance of the bridle paths is of utmost importance. We have to ensure that the paths run smoothly unobstructed by the time heavy snow descends in the eleventh month.”

“Tell His Lordship that we have already secured the military provisions for the beginning of spring next year.” Shen Zechuan’s hand slid from the arm guard to Xiao Chiye’s palm. He looked up at the latter and said, “The construction of the bridle path from Dunzhou to Bianbo Camp will also start next year.”

They wanted to connect Zhongbo and Libei together so that Bianbo Camp had direct access to Cizhou and Dunzhou. The information coming from Dunzhou had to be fast and up to date.

Xiao Chiye might not be able to return these two months. He had to keep an eye on Libei's territory at all times. In addition, he also had to be precise in his calculations of the reserves of supplies on the battleground, lest heavy snow unexpectedly collapsed the paths and cut off access, and the lack of supplies ended up causing those on the battlefield to be caught up in an arduous battle.

"If Ding Tao gets too mischievous, send him back to Dajing. Eldest sister-in-law can deal with him."

As Xiao Chiye spoke, he lowered his head and led Shen Zechuan with both hands to step on both of his own feet. Then he clasped him by the back of his head and stood with him to exchange a kiss.

The fabric of their clothes chafed against one another. Shen Zechuan propped himself against Xiao Chiye's arms and melted away into his scent.

Xiao Chiye liked the way Shen Zechuan tilted his head up like this. This was him seeking him out, and all that pervaded the air when they touched was desire borne out of love. He bore all of Shen Zechuan's weight; he was capable of picking up Shen Zechuan with ease. It was only a kiss to begin with, but he did not let go as they entwined together intimately amidst the interweaving of their breaths.

"I've already asked Eldest Sister-in-law to make preparations." Xiao Chiye said, "Chen Yang will be sent over before the new year to take you and shifu to Dajing."

Shen Zechuan's breathing had grown ragged from the kiss. "I'll prepare a gift..."

Silly Lanzhou.

Xiao Chiye cupped Shen Zechuan and kissed him with even more intensity.

Xiao Chiye came in a hurry and left in a hurry too. On this overcast day shrouded in fog in Cizhou, he braved the rain and headed north even as he bore those wounds he had received from the lashings. All was calm and peaceful for the time being in the three prefectures of Zhongbo. Xiao Chiye planted Tantai Hu in Dunzhou, leaving the latter as a bulwark for Shen Zechuan.

Cizhou entered a brief period of respite, and Shen Zechuan seemed to have reined in his brilliance and gone into a state of dormancy. But very quickly, Xue Xiuzhuo, who was faraway in Qudu, came to learn just how formidable this round of hibernation was.

During the Hanyi Festival<sup>11</sup> in the tenth month, Chazhou hosted a banquet with funding from the Yan clan and invited all the talents in the world over regardless of whether the person was a distinguished man from the countryside or a reclusive statesman in a bustling city. As long as they were academically accomplished, they would all receive the invitation to participate in the intellectual discourse<sup>12</sup> between the literati.

If it had been a nobody, he naturally would not have stirred up a storm. But this time, it took less than three days for the ox carts and boats to set out in full force as all the virtuous and wise talents flocked to their destination.

For the one who had sent the invitation was a man named Yao Wenyu.

CHAPTER 184: DISCOURSE

Chazhou was hit by an unbroken spell of wet weather in the tenth month, and the sound of rain drumming rhythmically against the banana leaves outside the windows was audible even with the curtains down. Luo Mu was not in his official garb but his common robe<sup>13</sup> as he sat in the seat to the right of the guest of honor. He surveyed his surroundings and discovered that the interior of this teahouse was already filled to the brim with people. Guests hailed from all corners of the land, and a sizable number of them were wearing sandals and rain cloaks made of straw.

The incense by the window burned out just after midday. Luo Mu heard movements and straightened up to look at the door, where he saw that oil-paper umbrella swaying slightly aside to reveal that figure in darkish blue<sup>14</sup> scholar attire<sup>15</sup> beneath. The latter's large, meandering sleeves rested on his knees, with a cat lounging between them. Delicate wrist bones peeked out under those sleeves, accentuating those fingers of his and making them appear all the more long, slender, and strong.

Yao Wenyu bent over in his wheelchair and said with sincerity, "My apologies for having kept the various elders waiting."

The little wheels rolled over the wooden floorboards as Qiao Tianya pushed Yao Wenyu in. Murmurs of whispers promptly rose in the room. Those who had not removed their woven hats earlier took them off now one after another. Countless gazes fell upon Yao Wenyu, watching him attentively.

Yao Wenyu came to a stop before the round window.

"We have all gathered here today to attend the discourse our young friend Yuanzhuo here has invited us to." Elder Mei of Qinzhou, who was smoking his pipe, tapped it and looked at Yao Wenyu. "It has been a year since we last met, and my young friend's poise has far surpassed that of before."

Tea had already been served, and that particular incense was lit up yet again.

A so-called discourse was simply an oral conversation. Host and guests sat facing each other, and they would absolutely not touch upon political affairs or civil issues, only on profound and esoteric subjects. This was why Luo Mu was not wearing his official attire today. They had to go back and forth with one another as they engaged in verbal discussions while seated in the venue, and this required the participants to be not only erudite and insightful but also poetically eloquent.

Yao Wenyu, having traversed all over the world in his search for knowledge, was adept at the art of it, which was why his one invitation could garner hundreds of responses, allowing him to organize a dialogue in Chazhou. He was an articulate conversationalist in the past, and his ideas were original and distinctive. As he did not enter civil service despite being born in a noble clan, he was far more popular than Hai Liangyi among the recluses who were averse to politics.

Elder Mei had already been waiting for an hour, so he cut to the chase after the exchange of customary greetings. "I see that my young friend has changed."

Yao Wenyu answered, "This body is not my own; this change does not reflect my own."

Elder Mei ceased smoking his pipe. "I can see it with my own eyes. If you have not changed, why aren't you standing up?"

Yao Wenyu put down the horsetail whisk he had just been holding on to. "Was I standing a year ago when I conversed with you in Qinzhou?"

"Of course you were," Elder Mei said.

Yao Wenyu thus replied. "Then, I'm still standing right now."

Luo Mu had once participated in such a discourse when he had been pursuing his studies in Dengzhou, but that had been merely an informal discussion among fellow students of the academy. Kong Ling was also talented at sophistry, but for some reason, he had not shown up today. The conversation continued, as did the drizzle outside. Everyone in attendance was listening with bated breath and rapt attention.

With his back leaning against the door, Qiao Tianya watched the raindrops splash on the sides of the eaves and cast a hazy veil over the mountains in the distance. Yao Wenyu's voice was crystal clear, and his calm and collected answers seemed to fall like chess pieces he let drop in the courtyard, one at a time, pitter-pattering in this rain.

Li Jianting sat in her seat and asked Xue Xiuzhuo, "Since a discourse can convene the wise and virtuous together, why isn't the imperial college organizing one?"

Xue Xiuzhuo closed the book and answered her with a question, "What kind of people can participate in it?"

“All the learned men in the world,” Li Jianting replied.

“That’s not right.” Xue Xiuzhuo looked Li Jianting in the eyes. “It’s those who have nothing to worry about in the world.”

Xue Xiuzhuo participated in such discourses before, although not that many times. To court officials like him, Jiang Qingshan, and the others, these so-called intellectual and philosophical conversations were mere rhetoric, since the participants discussed neither state affairs nor civil and agricultural matters. These discussions were all the rage in the thirteen cities of Juexi, followed by the eight cities of Qudu. Pan Lin and the other young masters of the noble clans held Yao Wenyu in such high esteem because Yao Wenyu rarely touched on political affairs, which was kind of unconventional. But such unconventionality had to be built on the premise that he did not have to worry about the basic necessities like food and clothes. Such conversations went extinct in Zhongbo after the reign of Xiande. Was it because of the lack of learned scholars in Zhongbo? No, the real reason was that there was no longer a person who wasn’t starving in Zhongbo.

Li Jianting pondered it over for a moment. “In that case, what use is there for Yao Wenyu to invite all of these people without a care in the world?”

After a moment’s silence, Xue Xiuzhuo turned his gaze to look at the swaying banana leaves in front of the window. The rain poured with urgency, as though this was the same day he had played chess with Yao Wenyu.

The sky had already darkened outside the teahouse, but the dialogue had yet to end. Elder Mei, being advanced in age, was tired from all the sitting. He was debating with Yao Wenyu over the nature of “the changed and the unchanged”, and he had already drunk several cups of tea to moisten his throat.

Elder Mei cleared his throat. “The change I’m talking about is the physical changes before our eyes, and it’s not just that. You have changed, and so have the times and the world. You’re no longer the same ‘you’ as you have been earlier, even more so the ‘you’ from one year ago.”

All eyes fell upon Yao Wenyu, waiting for his answer. But Yao Wenyu slowly lowered his sleeves and bowed to Elder Mei from his wheelchair. “You are absolutely right.”

His words sparked an uproar the moment they left his mouth. This debate was clearly not over. They came all the way here from afar just to hear them duke it out until a clear victor emerged. Who would have expected Yao Wenyu to simply concede defeat of his own accord?

“Gone is the glory of the Yongyi reign. Dazhou is already on the wane. With the invasion by our foreign enemies in the northeast and the collusion of officials and merchants in the southwest, just how many places are there left for us in this world to converse freely about the mysteries of the universe?”

A commotion broke out in the room at these words. An enraged Elder Mei tossed his pipe aside and covered his nose and mouth with his sleeve. “Foul! Foul! FOUL! What an unbearable stench! How intolerably vulgar! Why has Yao Wenyu become Hai Renshi?!”

The tea tables clattered noisily as several people rose to their feet. Luo Mu hurriedly got up too and attempted to dissuade the others, but then he heard Yao Wenyu, who was before the window, laughed. The more he laughed, the louder his laughter was. “Look at how severe the misappropriations of the commoners’ fields in the eight cities are. The vision of the starved dead dotting the streets everywhere is no longer just empty talk—I’ve changed, and so has the world. You are right smacked in the middle of it. How long can you remain unchanged for?”

Elder Mei originally wanted to leave, but on hearing Yao Wenyu, he could not refrain from rebutting, “Without what keeps them alive, all living creatures will perish.<sup>16</sup> To change or not to change is the natural order of the world. You strayed from the Way<sup>17</sup> and fell into the trappings of this secular world. Are you trying to emulate Qi Huilian and Hai Liangyi by being a virtuous gentleman?!”<sup>18</sup>

Yao Wenyu said, “The one who forced this change on me today is none other than you and this very society.”

Elder Mei could barely catch his breath as he held onto the table and said, “Letting nature take its course is the natural order of things!<sup>19</sup> What has Qi Huilian changed? And what has Hai Liangyi changed? You are following in their footsteps. Yuanzhuo, oh, Yuanzhuo! This is but a futile attempt!”

Yao Wenyu schooled his expression and said, “Since you speak of the natural order of things, then this empire shall change as it ought to, and this world will descend into anarchy as it must. You may very well continue to stand by and do nothing if you so wish. I have already abandoned my Way; I'm going to step into this turbulent world."

Elder Mei stomped his feet in anxiety and yelled like a child, "No, come back! Get back here!"

Xue Xiuzhuo subscribed to the philosophy that "one must live or die with his principles".<sup>20</sup> This was the creed Grand Mentor Qi believed in, as did Secretariat Elder Hai. Yao Wenyu was the only one among them who didn't. But Yao Wenyu's move today was a clear break from his past belief in letting nature run its course. This was a declaration to all that he had forsaken his original self to become a man of the secular world.

Pelts of raindrops fell right before Qiao Tianya's eyes into the water puddles, where they burst into tiny sprays of water and stirred up ripples. A small fish with fine scales leaped out of a ripple, and Kong Ling, who was near the pond, caught it and tossed it back.

Fei Sheng was holding up the umbrella while Kong Ling and Shen Zechuan, both wearing bamboo hats, fished by the pond.

Kong Ling cast out the hook again and said, "After today, men with lofty aspirations ought to be flocking to Cizhou."

Shen Zechuan said as he held onto the fishing rod, "If men with lofty aspirations were this easy to obtain, how would I have kept missing Mister each time?"

Kong Ling laughed. He avoided answering and merely lamented, "This move of Yuanzhuo is both a 'change of path' and an 'undertaking of path'. He did it to tell the world that Secretariat Elder Hai's legacy still lives on in Cizhou. He's no longer the same man he was before."

"Shenwei's brush and ink are already in place." Shen Zechuan said. "Whether Yuanzhuo can redeem his reputation in the hearts of the scholars in the world depends on this lyrical expression of his."

Yao Wenyu was attacked by the students during the initial imperial college crisis because of his birth origins, but now, he had taken on a different path from that of Elder Mei and the others. With the help of Gao Zhongxiong's highly effective and emotive penmanship, those two legs of his could become a definitive statement of will and ambition. In addition, the questions that were to follow would no doubt include the reason he came to Cizhou. If he was guilty of a crime, then why didn't the imperial court send anyone to arrest him? By thinking down the line of this question, one would be able to see a Zhongbo that had already been fractured.

“Due to the passing of Emperor Tianchen, the imperial examinations held in spring were done away with. Following right after, Secretariat Elder Hai remonstrated with his death, and the imperial college students attacked the officials of humble origins from all sides. Many people handed in their resignations during this period, and Qudu still has to maintain the stability of the three parties this winter.” Shen Zechuan swung his fishing rod. “Xue Xiuzhuo already has half a foot in the Grand Secretariat by virtue of the heir apparent to the throne. For this reason, the empress dowager must suppress the practical doers faction led by him; she can’t let him become a minister with genuine regent powers in his hands. In that case, when will he be able to fulfill his promise to the imperial college? He and Yuanzhuo are both old acquaintances and fellow students under the same teacher; so there must be more than meets the eye now that Yuanzhuo has switched to my camp. Moreover, the transgressions of the Li clan are already a fact long known to all, and copycats are popping up one after another seeing that King Yi of Fanzhou has yet to be taken down. Even if Xue Xiuzhuo wants to retaliate and fight back now, his hands are tied. No matter how you look at it, all he can do this winter is to get beaten.”

“The mess created by the noble clans is way too great.” Kong Ling shook his head as he grasped his fishing rod. “The empress dowager refuses to release her grip on power, and everyone in the Grand Secretariat has lost heart. Meanwhile, Xue Xiuzhuo is still in the fledgling stage of his authority. As long as the three parties remain locked in a stalemate, the eight cities’ misappropriation of commoners’ fields will remain unresolved. The longer this drags on, the more advantageous it will be for the prefectural lord.”

Just as they had discussed here, Gao Zhongxiong’s essays went into circulation a few days later. The tailwind Hai Liangyi left behind had not fizzled out at all. As long as their message was sincere, it could evoke a collective, emotional sigh. The contents of Yao Wenyu’s discourse in Chazhou had long ceased to be important; what was crucial was that even the ignorant students who could not tell one grain from another had to face up to the fact now.

And that was, in just six months, Qudu had completely lost the ability to maintain stability in its empire. The man Yao Wenyu had aligned himself with was called Shen Zechuan, a felonious subject who rebelled and fled Qudu half a year ago with Xiao Chiye. However, they had not only escaped execution, but were even on the up and coming now.

The empress dowager could not command the Qidong Garrison Troops into moving, so Han Cheng came out of obscurity once more to ask the Eight Great Training Divisions to dispatch troops to exterminate Shen Zechuan, who was far away in Cizhou. But the Ministry of War declined on the grounds that Qudu had no generals. The conference was a very unpleasant one, and with the end of the year closing in on them, the relationship between the three sides grew increasingly tense.

Once the snow started falling, the number of refugees who sought asylum in Cizhou and Chazhou ballooned. At the same time that Tantai Hu was recruiting soldiers for the garrison troops in Dunzhou, the Imperial Bodyguards were also enlisting new members. Shen Zechuan planned to put Hairigu together with the Imperial Bodyguards. By the time Shen Zechuan realized it, the twelfth month had come, and just as he was getting his new year gifts ready, a bout of unprecedented heavy snow came calling at Libei.

CHAPTER 185: HONGYAN

Heaven and earth were a vast expanse of white where the frigid wind swept past and sent the salt-like snow rustling. Owing to the severe collapse of the bridle paths, it was practically impossible for the grain wagons to enter the war zone. Xiao Chiye left Lang Tao Xue Jin at Bianbo camp and led his men to dig the snow for two days.

Wu Ziyu tightened his collar in the chilly wind and covered up his mouth and nose. He rubbed his frozen hands together, his voice muffled as he spoke. "Damn it, I just took a nap, and the path gets all blocked up again with snow. When will this end?"

Chen Yang never touched wine when he was on duty, but even he could not stand it any longer and kept chugging down On Horseback until his stomach burned. "The closer we get to the northeast, the colder it becomes. Fortunately, the prefectural lord sent the winter coats over before the tenth month; otherwise, who knows how many brothers would have succumbed to the cold?"

"It's such a cold day," Gu Jin squatted on the ground and shook his head, "and the armor weighs a ton. The battle steeds won't be able to stand it."

The battle steeds of Libei were not as tolerant of the cold as Biansha's ponies. It was an uphill task preparing fodder for the stables each time winter came around. The horses had it harder than the humans.

"Keep digging." Xiao Chiye said, "We have to make it to the battlegrounds by tonight."

It was simply impossible to see the white puff of air Xiao Chiye exhaled. The wind was so strong that it sent his cloak flapping noisily. There was no end in sight ahead, and the blocked bridle path north of the Shasan Camp was a dead end, so he could only lead his convoy squad to take a long detour from the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang. The supplies in Sha'er Camp had run out, and they could only rely on Shayi Camp to replenish stocks. As these two camps jointly undertook the operational combat missions on the battlefields, their equipment was expended rather swiftly. They had gathered together a batch of military craftsmen after the eleventh month, and with more than 50,000 men in total, a staggeringly large amount of materials was needed. Xiao Chiye had to keep up with the uninterrupted flow of supply to both fronts.

But the one in the most challenging position was Zhao Hui, who was to the west of the Tudalong Banner. The heavy snow had persisted for several days, and a path that had caved in once before was no longer usable. The path Xiao Chiye had repaired with wooden planks could not withstand the load of such heavy snowfall. Coupled with the heavy weight of the grain wagons, Xiao Chiye did not dare pass through without careful consideration. He could only let Zhao Hui wait for a few more days as he set off from the battlegrounds with the grain wagons in tow and detoured around the Tudalong Banner.

Gu Jin blew hard on his palms and stood up to yell, "Keep digging!"

The convoy squad had not had a day's rest in the past three months, but none of the soldiers groused, because Xiao Chiye did not have a break either. They were practically running in circles all over Libei's territory. Even with his eyes closed now, Xiao Chiye could point out which path was the quickest shortcut to take. Xiao Chiye had astonishing stamina and energy; even as he was transporting supplies, he did not delay recovering the use of his right arm. Just a few days in Bianbo Camp before setting off, he was still drawing the Conqueror's Bow, and that ear-piercing twang of the bowstring had left the Libei Armored Cavalry dumbstruck.

Xiao Chiye arrived at the site of the battle at the hour of chou, which was also when Xiao Fangxu had just withdrawn from the battlefield. Father and son both cut sorry figures before the dimly illuminated tent.

Xiao Fangxu took off his helmet. It was such a cold day, and yet he had run until he was all drenched in sweat. He took a hot handkerchief to wipe his face, then nodded in a signal to Xiao Chiye before bending over to enter the military tent. Both of the great commanding generals, Zuo Qianqiu and Jiang Sheng, were present in the tent, along with the deputy generals and brigade commanders from the two camps. All of them looked utterly exhausted.

"This is really damn bizarre." Xiao Fangxu tossed the handkerchief on the table. "Their ponies' asses are almost trailing on the ground. How can they still run so fast in the heavy snow?"

"No matter what, we cannot retreat again." Zuo Qianqiu stood before the map and pointed to the southeastern corner of the Tudalong Banner. "If we retreat any further, this place will fall into the enemy's hands too. When that happens, Zhao Hui's remaining route for supplies will be cut off. In just one winter, Hasen can drag out the battle and wear him down to his death at the Tudalong Banner.”

Spring came late in Libei. This bout of snow would last until the third month next year at the very least. Even if Zhao Hui had stockpiled food in Changzhu Camp, the entire army could not afford to deplete their equipment supplies. There were no batches of military craftsmen over at the Changzhu Camp.

“According to the military reports,” Jiang Sheng kicked off his boots and poured out the melted snow within. “Hasen has been giving Zhao Hui’s troops the slip lately. He saw that the supplies can’t be restocked for the time being and so wants to wear Zhao Hui down first.”

Xiao Chiye sat in the corner and ate his flatbread with milk tea. Despite wolfing down his food, he did not miss any of the words they had spoken about at length.

After a moment of silence, Xiao Fangxu said while staring at the map, “This is a warning sign of an impending surprise attack by Hasen.”

Xiao Chiye thought so too.

Hasen was wearing Zhao Hui down to exhaust him. The Libei Armored Cavalry consumed too much equipment, and their battle steeds were no match for the ponies at all during winter. The amount of assistance Shayi Camp could render Zhao Hui now that the bridle paths had collapsed was too minimal, and the Changzhu camp still had no reinforcements to back them. When Guo Weili had been stationed here, the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang led by Zhao Hui served as his reinforcements. But now that Zhao Hui had stepped to the fore, all he had to back him up was the remaining troops who were guarding the Northeast Provisions Bridle Path. Moreover, those troops had no direct access to him due to the heavy snow.

“The supplies have already made it here,” Xiao Fangxu looked back at Xiao Chiye. “Hasen’s ambush will surely take place these two days.”

If they continued waiting it out, Xiao Chiye would have to move up north, and Hasen would have missed his opportunity.

“Early tomorrow morning, I will lead Squad Three to lie in wait over here.” Xiao Fangxu shifted his fingers. “Qianqiu will guard the camp, and Old Jiang will head over from around the back. We’ll form a net here. At the very least, we have to knock Hasen off his momentum. This lad is not only good at field operations but also in going on the offensive and defensive; we can't let him find a place that can provide him with cover. All we can do is to box him in on the snowfield."

The Armored Cavalry was a wall in motion. If they flanked him from both sides, Hasen would have no choice but to collide into a wall. Restricting the pace of the Biansha Cavalry's advancement was equivalent to chopping off their legs. Even after they fell to the ground, the Libei Armored Cavalry would still remain a wall that would prove tough for the Biansha's scimitars and piked daggers to break out of.

Xiao Chiye did not leave after the meeting ended.

Zuo Qianqiu came over and patted Xiao Chiye on his right arm. "Have your wounds healed?"

Xiao Chiye lifted up his arm and moved it around. "No problem there with holding a blade or pulling a bow."

"We have to thank Lanzhou during the spring festival." Zuo Qianqiu said with a laugh. "The winter coats this time are all real cotton. For the last few years, the clothes that were delivered by Qudu were all padded with paper scraps. Your Eldest Sister-in-law wrote to say that she would personally cook a meal to thank Lanzhou when he comes."

Xiao Chiye glanced at Xiao Fangxu, then replied humbly. "This is what he ought to do; it's nothing deserving of thanks from Eldest Sister-in-law. A couple of days ago, he even sent a letter to announce that the new year gifts had been prepared; all that's left is for the new year to come around."

Xiao Fangxu sprinkled fine salt into his own bowl, as though he had not heard their conversation.

So Zuo Qianqiu said, "Your father praised him for quite a number of days. During the spring festival, let's—"

Xiao Fangxu said with certainty. "Nope, I've never praised him before."

"Right." Zuo Qianqiu threw Xiao Chiye a meaningful glance, "I was the one showering him with praise!"

"Why aren't you retiring to your tent for the night?" Xiao Fangxu asked Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye watched him drink up his milk tea before responding. "Will you be donning heavy armor when you head out to lay an ambush tomorrow?"

"How am I supposed to intercept Hasen without wearing it?" Xiao Fangxu set his bowl aside. "He's even better at warfare than Amu'er."

“Then take off your helmet,” Xiao Chiye said, “There could be scorpions hidden among Hasen’s troops.”

“Without our helmets, how can we be considered an iron wall? If we want to obstruct them in the snowfields, this is our only option.” Xiao Fangxu warmed up his fingers together and contemplated for a while. “According to your report, there are very few scorpions, and it would be too much of a strain for them to fend against the present Libei Armored Cavalry. Even if there are scorpions among Hasen’s troops, there could only be a scattering of them.”

“The Armored Cavalry is too heavy.” Xiao Chiye looked at Xiao Fangxu. “It’s imperative for the Armored Cavalry to make changes after the beginning of spring next year. If we want to force the Biansha Cavalry back to the east, we have to be prepared for all possibilities.”

“You want to strip off layers of the Armored Cavalry’s armor to lighten its weight,” Xiao Fangxu finally turned his head, “Yet you still can’t match their speed.”

Xiao Chiye did not utter a word as he locked eyes with Xiao Fangxu.

“The troops you trained in Qudu were all infantrymen, and your experience with battling on horseback comes from Lu Guangbai. But Libei doesn’t have the natural geographical advantage that the Bianjun Commandery has. If we want to possess a wall, we can only rely on heavy armor.” Xiao Fangxu tossed a few pieces of coal into the brazier. “Your eldest brother shed the weight of the Libei Armored Cavalry, but we’re still unable to break through that line in the east.”

Xiao Fangxu looked at the brazier.

“Amu’er’s transformations are simply too fast. He has gotten a clear handle on the Libei Armored Cavalry in the past few decades. There is no way simple additions and subtractions can stand up to such a Biansha Cavalry. The Armored Cavalry must make changes like never before.”

This was the predicament of the Libei Armored Cavalry. Amu’er succeeded in his training of the scorpion unit, and looking at the result of their last confrontation, the hammers of this squad were the Libei Armored Cavalry’s nemesis. But would simply removing the helmet be enough of a countermeasure? This would mean that cracks had already begun to show in the Libei Armored Cavalry’s heavy armor, and this put Xiao Fangxu at a loss what to do. Still, he had no choice but to continue taking the risk, because this was the only advantage the Libei Armored Cavalry had left. If they discarded this advantage, they would not be able to hold their own even against the ordinary Biansha Cavalry.

Amu'er was truly a genius, and Hasen was pretty remarkable too. Biansha was now exhibiting certain signs of rejuvenation. It even occurred to Xiao Fangxu that Amu'er would be able to completely merge the Twelve Tribes by winter next year at the latest. When the time comes, the entire frontline on the eastern side of Dazhou would become a war zone.

This was the key reason Qi Zhuyin refused to head up north and fall foul of Libei. She had also seen this monstrous beast from where she stood in Qidong. This was why she could not intimidate Libei because of the strife in Qudu, for they would inevitably stand on the same battlefield in the future; the enemy had already gotten powerful to the point that it was terrifying.

What should they do?

Xiao Chiye pillowed his head upon his arms as he lay in bed and contemplated this question over and over in the dark of night.

They possessed the best military craftsmen in the world, and they had a staggering number of them, yet they had no recourse against Amu'er. This was almost about to be a kind of humiliation.

There was no way Amu'er was invulnerable.

The Biansha Cavalry had their weaknesses too, except that these weaknesses were obscured by their unbelievable speed. They had to remove these from the equation and find a new breakthrough. But it was at this moment that Xiao Chiye was hit with the realization of his own unfamiliarity. He had crossed swords with the Biansha Cavalry far too few times, and all his countermeasures against the Biansha Cavalry were merely armchair strategies. He could not continue to conceive tactics by seeing his foes through a hazy mist.

Xiao Chiye could not fall asleep. He turned over and got up to put on his coat. He stepped out of his tent, where he saw Xiao Fangxu conversing with the soldiers in the camp. When Xiao Fangxu noticed his presence, he patted the space next to him and handed him a bowl of milk tea after he sat down.

"It's taboo not to sleep when you have to leave for war tomorrow morning." Xiao Chiye sipped the warm milk tea.

"When I was the same age as you, I was still bursting with energy even after staying up for three days." Xiao Fangxu's coat was old and worn, and its edges were extremely frayed. It had been mended over and over by Lu Yizhi, but even so, he refused to switch to a new one, because this had been sewn by his wife.

Xiao Chiye gulped down the tea, frowning as he replied. "That was donkey's years ago."

As the fire crackled, father and son sat shoulder to shoulder for a long while.

Xiao Fangxu asked, "Realized how exhausting this is yet?"

Xiao Chiye did not respond.

Xiao Fangxu thus looked at his youngest son. After a moment, he spoke up, "You used to want to fly, so you fought to the death to succeed with Meng, and you're still doing the same now that you want to win."

Xiao Chiye heaved a sigh. "And whose bad habit is this?"

Xiao Fangxu let loose a laugh. "Not mine. Your mother's."

Xiao Chiye rubbed his fingers along the rim of the bowl and paused for a moment. "You lost to Amu'er at twenty-three; I lost to Hasen at twenty-three."

"It took me seven years to collect my dues for this debt." Firelight that enveloped Xiao Fangxu's facial features accentuated them, making him appear all the more handsome, and more dignified and awe-inspiring than Xiao Chiye. "You understand how that feels. When I lost to him, I couldn't find my way forward. I even thought for a while that I didn't have the talent to be commander-in-chief. I've seen many outstanding commanding generals at Luoxia Pass, many of whom are real geniuses. I suppose you've no idea about this, but," The corner of Xiao Fangxu's mouth curled up in a smile. "Qi Shiyu was the one in the limelight at that time. He turned Qidong into a force to behold. The chief commander of the five commanderies was truly too strong. I looked at him and at them, and I thought I had no talent. There was no way I could stand on the same battlefields as them."

The firelight flickered, and a warring scene of glinting spears and armored horses manifested in the shadows. The military banner flapped so hard it looked as if it was going to be torn apart, but it was very peaceful here, as if this was the most stable, tranquil corner of this world.

Xiao Fangxu spread out his right hand and said with downcast eyes, "I lost my first battle steed in that battle. However, the Biansha Cavalry left me too little time—they made me extract myself out of that slump swiftly. I could no longer wait for the others, nor feel sorry for myself. When I stood at the very front, I realized that I did not want to lose at all. I only wanted to win.”

Win.

Such a wild ambition sustained Xiao Fangxu and kept him going. It brought him countless motivation and ultimate glory. In those seven years, he never dared to stop for a moment. Every single day, he was looking out in the distance at Hongyan Mountains. He had seen through himself. That had been a swift and resolute transformation. He overcame all difficulties, even at the expense of offending his former commanding general to build a stable at Luoxia Pass. This alone took him three whole years. By the time he truly accomplished it, he was already twenty-eight years old.

Xiao Fangxu scrutinized the lines in his palm and said, “You returned to Libei and focused your attention on both the ‘Armored Cavalry’ and ‘Imperial Army’, but you never thought to look at the commanding generals. Guo Weili hurt Gu Jin, and a feud was thus formed between both of you, but Guo Weili’s meritorious services are legitimate. He is your elder brother’s vanguard at Changzhu Camp, and his defense of the Tudalong Banner is impregnable. Jiang Sheng is a veteran. He has hardly been in the limelight, but the Sha’er Camp, which he is at, is the pivot that holds the lines between boundaries together. He is the foundation that supports us all, whether up north or down south. A-Ye, what you possess is not just that bit of soldiers, but also the experience that countless soldiers and officers have amassed. You went to Zhongbo back then and met Lu Guangbai, but now that you’re back in Libei, you aren’t willing to learn anything new. Men who are the most familiar with the battlefields of Libei are already standing before you. You’ve wasted too much time.”

Xiao Chiye tightened his grip on the teacup.

“You want this position.” Xiao Fangxu slowly clenched his fist. It was as if he was asking both Xiao Chiye and himself at the same time. “But are you truly qualified enough?”

Before Xiao Chiye returned to Libei, he had already been rejected by its commanding generals. It was hard for him to describe that feeling; he had indeed felt hurt. He no longer got into any disputes with these people afterward, but it was also from then on that they went their separate ways. Xiao Chiye had been back for so long, and the Imperial Army was still the Imperial Army. When he stood within the military tent, he was just so glaringly different from the rest of the commanding generals. He did not need these people to apply ointment for him when he got injured. They gave off the appearance of unity, but they were divided at heart; they could not become one.

The tea on the fire started boiling and bubbling over. Xiao Chiye felt that he was like the wolf straying at the edge of the pack. He seemed to have returned, but in truth, he was still standing in the same spot. He watched these people fight with all their might, but there was no place for him among them.

"You don't need seven years to defeat Hasen." Xiao Fangxu gazed at Xiao Chiye and said, "But you must learn to be tolerant."

Xiao Fangxu left the camp at the hour of chen. The snow fell even more heavily today, which made it easier to get blinded without the helmet acting as a shield. Before he put on his helmet, he whistled at Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye came to stand beside the horse, and he tousled Xiao Chiye's hair.

"It's too dangerous to advance your troops on snowy nights. Wait for the hour of mao tomorrow before you set off for the north." As Xiao Fangxu spoke, he put on his helmet. His voice sounded muffled inside of it. "We'll discuss the detailed route when I return."

"The hour of chou at the latest." Xiao Chiye said. "The snow is too heavy. Any later, and you'll lose your way."

"That will depend on the situation." Xiao Fangxu pulled the reins. "I'm leaving."

Xiao Chiye watched as Xiao Fangxu led his troops out of the camp. Those armored hooves heading north resembled a wandering dragon that was swallowed up by the snow and fog in the blink of an eye. He stood for a while longer, then turned and went into the tent to catch up on his sleep.

Xiao Chiye fell into a deep sleep this time around and awoke to the sound of horse hooves. He was not in good spirits, and it took him a few moments of coming around to realize that it was already dark. He sat up and put his clothes on. When he stepped out, he saw soldiers all over the camp. Chen Yang and Gu Jin, who were meant to be on duty at the entrance, were both missing.

Xiao Chiye turned around and grabbed hold of someone to ask. "What's going on?"

"Sha'er camp met with an ambush!" The junior soldier put on his armor swiftly and bowed in a hurry to Xiao Chiye. "We are going to mobilize troops south now to provide reinforcements!"

Xiao Chiye quickly made his way to the front of the military tent. When he lifted the flap, he was met with the sight of a fully dressed Zuo Qianqiu. The latter was just about to step out. Xiao Chiye asked, "Jiang Sheng hasn't returned yet?"

Zuo Qianqiu took large strides forward with a grave expression. "No, it's likely he was stalled. This was a plan to lure us away from the base. Unfortunately, Hasen's presence at Tudalong Banner was but a farce; his real objective is to ambush Sha'er camp."

The bridle paths connecting Sha'er camp and Shasan camp had been blocked off. Jiang Sheng had made a detour to lay in ambush together with Xiao Fangxu, resulting in a sharp decrease in the number of troops left to defend the camp. Shayi camp was all they could count on to make up for this shortage.

"A-Ye," Zuo Qianqiu said before mounting his horse. "You have to hold down the fort here; there are still provisions in the camp."

Xiao Chiye said, "I don't have the authority to mobilize troops."

"You can't lead the convoy squad north." Zuo Qianqiu steered the horse around. "Stay here and wait for your father to come back!"

His horse had already galloped off at the last drop of his words.

Xiao Chiye took a couple of steps back to make way for the cavalry behind him. He scanned the vicinity and spotted Chen Yang amidst the chaos before him.

"Gu Jin has gone up north to inform his lordship of the situation," Chen Yang hurried over to Xiao Chiye's side. "The snow is too heavy; even Meng can't fly in this weather. Gu Jin is the only one who is able to find his way through the snow at night."

Xiao Chiye asked. "What time did he leave?"

"An hour ago," Chen Yang estimated the time. "He will only be back by the hour of mao."

Xiao Chiye froze for a second, then continued to ask, "The hour of chou has already passed?"

"It's currently three quarters past the hour of chou," Chen Yang glanced worriedly at Xiao Chiye, "... any traces of their tracks have all been covered up by the snow. Squad Three is probably still in the snowfields, but Jiang Sheng is there too. Master, his lordship's military strength far exceeds that of Hasen; he'll definitely be able to make it back by the hour of mao."

Anxiety began to eat away at Xiao Chiye; this was an emotion that proved tough to vent. He did not have the authority to mobilize troops, and the manpower left in Shayi camp was not sufficient to sustain a trip up north. All he could do was wait.

This was a plan to lure them away from their base, but what did Hasen intend to achieve by launching a sneak attack on Sha'er camp?

Xiao Chiye stared at the map and lifted his finger to trace along the line that Xiao Fangxu had drawn. That sense of unease started to pervade his entire being, gnawing at him. He seemed to be still standing in Tudalong Banner that rainy night, standing in confrontation with Hasen across the curtain of rain.

Sha'er camp's food supplies were still in Shayi camp. As Xiao Chiye had only arrived last night, Jiang Sheng did not manage to transfer the provisions in time. Sha'er camp's route down to the south had been obstructed by the heavy snow, so raiding Sha'er camp would neither garner them any food supplies, nor pose a threat to the Shasan camp.

So why?

Xiao Chiye asked himself in the face of these intricate and complicated routes.

The hour of yin passed too slowly. Xiao Chiye kept asking for the time in the military tent. He paced back and forth in the same place and rubbed away those haphazardly drawn lines. He gradually stopped tracing Xiao Fangxu's path and put himself in Hasen's position.

Hasen was an accomplished hunter who was familiar with the bridle paths of Libei—this was already evident back then at the Tudalong Banner. He wore Zhao Hui down, and the blizzard became his cover, allowing him to move in and out of the snowfields with ease.

Xiao Chiye stopped in his tracks and repeated those words earlier. A chill ran down his spine, so cutting was it that his fingers stiffened.

Exceptional hunters would not reveal their targets easily. They were patient, and any weaknesses they exposed were all pretenses to lure in the enemies. Hasen could move freely on the snowfields, which meant that he must know the routes in the north like the back of his hand. He knew which section of the road was suitable for an ambush. For the six months Hasen had been on the battlefield in the north, he had spent every day dealing with the Libei Armored Cavalry. He was practicing all this time; he already had a clear handle on Xiao Fangxu's rhythm.

This was a trap. Hasen trapped Xiao Fangxu the same way he had trapped Xiao Chiye. He never thought to launch a sneak attack on Changzhu Camp in the snowstorm, and he had no interest in the Sha'er camp. He went around in such a big circle, and this was all for the sake of a target called Xiao Fangxu.

Xiao Chiye abruptly pulled the tent flap open and bumped into Chen Yang's head-on.

Chen Yang staggered back and blurted out in a hurry before he got the chance to pay his obeisances, "Gu Jin is back!"

Xiao Chiye looked out. Not only was Gu Jin back, but even Jiang Sheng had also returned. Xiao Chiye approached them briskly and pushed aside the Armored Cavalry, who was standing in his way. He kept searching, but no, Xiao Fangxu was not among them.

Jiang Sheng, who was badly injured, was carried back on a stretcher. The color drained from Xiao Chiye's face when he saw that smashed helmet, and he hissed, "Fuck!"

"It's the scorpions." Gu Jin wiped his face vigorously with the corner of his clothes and said in a hoarse voice, "Master, they hid behind the armors. They had our tokens on them. They disguised themselves as the Libei Armored Cavalry at the old relay station in Tudalong Banner, and they deceived every one of us!"

"Where is my father?" Xiao Chiye grabbed the front of Gu Jin's clothes and enunciated each word of his question.

"... Ambushed." Half of Jian Sheng's face was covered in blood. The ringing in his ears was pretty bad. With fingers bent, he gripped the edge of the stretcher and mumbled somewhat incoherently, "It happened right under our nose. They are too fast..."

Gu Jin bit down so hard on his lips they blanched. It was with difficulty that he said under Xiao Chiye's gaze, "I didn't find him, Master..."

Xiao Chiye shoved Gu Jin aside. He whistled before he remembered that he had not brought Lang Tao Xue Jin over. He strode a few steps over to the stable and led a horse out before mounting it.

Wu Ziyu tried to stop Xiao Chiye's horse. "Viceroy, you don't have authority to mobilize troops. You'll be dismissed and investigated for arbitrarily heading up north without permission! We have to first send a message to Sha'er Camp and report—"

Without looking at Wu Ziyu, Xiao Chiye cracked the horsewhip and shot forth like a sharp arrow.

“Damn it!” Wu Ziyu flung down his helmet where he stood and shouted to his left and right, “Quick, report it to Sha’er camp!”

Xiao Chiye galloped among the boundless expanse of heavy snow. The wind tore at his sleeves as he charged along the hoofprints towards the northwest. The cold was penetrating, and very quickly, his freezing hands that were gripping the reins turned purplish red. The horse could not keep up with galloping at such speed, so he could only trudge through the heavy snow on foot. With his keen sense of smell, he tracked his way deep into the snowstorm through the devastated battlefield, where he found Xiao Fangxu in the dark.

Xiao Chiye covered his eyes with his frozen fingers and wiped away at them hastily, but a sound he could not contain escaped from his throat. The wind of the Hongyan Mountains tousled Xiao Chiye’s hair. It was here he stood helplessly, until he eventually burst into gut-wrenching sobs.

“Give it back...” Xiao Chiye slid to his knees, torn asunder with grief and anguish as he choked with sobs at the deserted battlefield, “Give him back to me!”

Hasen had taken away his father’s head.

CHAPTER 186: BLIZZARD

The boundary between heaven and earth was blurred as a blizzard assaulted the battlegrounds and completely engulfed the eastern mountain range of the Hongyan Mountains. No matter where the eyes roamed, it was a boundless expanse of white snow.

Hasen had initially left, but the snowstorm tonight was too strong. Worried about losing his bearings in the snowfields, he could only head back to the abandoned relay station. The scorpions that Hasen was leading this time all possessed faces that bore a striking resemblance to the Dazhou natives. They had already taken off the layer of armor they had worn as their disguise and were currently sitting around together drinking tea.

“Zhou...” One of the scorpions wiped at the token and struggled to discern the text on it under the glow of the fire. “This one’s surnamed Zhou, huh.”

“Mine’s surnamed Fu,” Another person raised a token. “It’s a man from Dajing.”

“Wolves all hail from Dajing.” A bearded man with a scar looked around at these younger generations jesting around before his gaze finally landed on Hasen, who had been silent throughout. “You slew the King of Wolves tonight. Hasen, from now on, you reign supreme on the battlefields in the north.”

The northern battlegrounds had always belonged to the King of Wolves. Having occupied the highest peak of Hongyan Mountains with his valiance and prowess, Xiao Fangxu had, for the last twenty years, struck fear in the hearts of the Twelve Tribes of Biansha at the mere mention of his name. Everyone present was acutely familiar with the legends surrounding him. Tonight, they had returned victorious, and the person they had slain was no ordinary mortal, but the god of Libei.

Hasen, who was drinking his tea, smiled shyly at Wulihan after hearing what the latter had said.

Hasen had always possessed an understated intelligence, but after tonight, no one would dare to belittle him. Wulihan could already predict just how fast Biansha would raze through Libei in the next few years. They understood the present Libei all too well. Xiao Jiming had yet to recover from his serious injuries, and Xiao Chiye was still a fledgling wet behind his ears. In addition, there was a severe dearth of commanding generals, and Libei was facing an insurmountable winter. Hasen had been waiting for this moment for a very long time.

“But you don’t look very happy,” Wulihan said.

“Not quite what I expected.” Hasen held up the bowl with both hands and remembered his war trophy. “I grew up listening to legends of him. He’s invincible, coming from my father’s mouth.”

“The Hero will be proud of you.” Wulihan thought for a moment. “What you have hacked off tonight is also the head of the Libei Armored Cavalry.”<sup>21</sup>

Hasen drank his tea and did not answer.

But Wulihan was right. It was also the Libei Armored Cavalry’s head that Hasen had severed this night. All along, this iron wall standing in the north had seemed to be so indestructible. But when Hasen was truly standing here, he found a fatal vulnerability in the chink of the Libei Armored Cavalry’s armor.

This troop was far too centralized. Although their faith was born of the land they stood on, they were overly reliant on their commander-in-chief. The amount of time since their establishment had been too short, and as a result every single soldier had their eyes locked on Xiao Fangxu. It was as though as long as Xiao Fangxu was there, the Libei Armored Cavalry would be invincible and triumphant in every battle.

Amu’er understood this principle, as did Hasen. The reign of Tianchen was the turning point in which the Libei Armored Cavalry was no longer in the position to hold the initiative. Xiao Jiming’s retreat symbolized the beginning of its collapse, and Xiao Fangxu’s comeback made Hasen certain that this was where the crux of the Libei Armored Cavalry lay. Hasen’s transfer to the battlefield in the north was meant for him to familiarize himself with Xiao Fangxu. He had been following Amu’er on his battles all over the land ever since he was eight years old, and the name he had heard the most in the commander tent had been Xiao Fangxu. At a time when Xiao Fangxu still knew nothing of him, he already knew of Xiao Fangxu’s military habits.

Hasen did not want to win just one battle. He wanted all fronts of Libei to topple. As to who would be grief-stricken over this, it was not something he should consider, just like how Libei had never been considerate of Biansha’s sufferings. Hasen wanted to crush his opponent with all he got. He wanted to pierce through his opponent’s heart, so that his opponent could never recover from the setback. The time for Biansha to turn the tables was now. They contended and tussled, sharpening their respective fangs in that accumulating debt of blood. To both parties, excessive compassion was tantamount to suicide.

The scorpions scattered when the fire was about to go out and looked for a corner in which to rest. With Wulihan taking the night watch, Hasen leaned against the old cabinet and closed his eyes.

The frigid wind outside howled against the eaves, sending the wind chimes hanging at the entrance of the relay station clinking and clanking violently. All that was left in the world was black and white as the night and snow tore into each other. Snowflakes that resembled tattered wads of cotton piled up to form snow dunes, and footprints left in the snow were soon swallowed up.

The scorpion standing outside the relay station taking a piss had yet to untie his pants when he was clutched by the throat. An imperceptible “crack” followed right after, and the scorpion’s body was slowly lowered to the ground.

Wulihan, who had an acute sense of hearing, almost immediately lifted his hand to reach for his iron hammer. He stared menacingly at the door panel and whispered, “Here comes the wolf.”

The scorpion closest to the door shifted silently to lean over the crack between the door with the intent to peek, but in the very moment he bent over, a long blade suddenly plunged through the gap and pierced through his head.

No one inside the house spoke. Hasen watched calmly as that blade retracted, painting the door with a splash of crimson. The smell of blood began to pervade the air. Right after the door was shoved open, a gush of wind extinguished the fire and plunged the house into darkness. A figure that bore a striking resemblance to Xiao Fangxu stood in the doorway, nearly causing Wulihan to break out in cold sweat.

In that long, endless silence, the scorpions within the house burst into action. They had lost nearly half of their own men when they encircled Xiao Fangxu to kill him, and the remaining scorpions were already beyond exhausted. The fear of being stabbed through and through by the King of Wolf reasserted itself again. The scorpions prayed the wolf pup did not have the same arm strength as his father, but when they came into contact with him, they were all nailed to the floor.

That bit of light peeking in from the entrance was blocked out too. Thick, viscous blood splattered onto their faces. Wulihan did not wipe it off. He swung his hammer towards Xiao Chiye right in the face—the same way he smashed it towards Xiao Fangxu.

But Xiao Chiye stopped Wulihan's forearm in tracks. Closely encircled on all sides with little space left, he did not turn around the blade he had just pulled out from the corpse but smashed the demonhead on the hilt<sup>22</sup> into Wulihan's face. Wulihan staggered, wanting to draw back, but Xiao Chiye did not release his grip, and the scorpion behind him hung on to his blade, so he immediately let go of Langli Blade and punched Wulihan over with his bare fist.

Wulihan's muscular body crashed into the pile of burning firewood, knocking it over. His face was drenched in blood, and he could feel that the bridge of his nose was broken. He shook his head. The impact of that heavy blow made him temporarily deaf in both ears, and for a time, he could not even see before him clearly. He spat out the tooth that had been punched off and said somewhat unintelligibly, "Kill him!"

Hasen sensed a pair of eyes locked on him. From the moment the door opened, this was a line of sight that would not permit him to ignore. Hasen knew what Xiao Chiye had come for, but he would not return it to Xiao Chiye, for that was the medal he was determined to hold on to.

Hasen gripped his piked dagger, but Xiao Chiye did not give Hasen the opportunity. He lifted a scorpion and held him up before the dagger, making use of that sturdy human body to slam Hasen against the cabinet. Xiao Chiye's fist missed its target, and the cabinet door promptly burst apart. The cabinet behind Hasen collapsed with a loud crash, which gave Hasen some leeway to catch his breath. The sudden assault of his piked dagger was swift and fierce, but this time, Xiao Chiye did not dodge it. Instead, he grasped it and wrenched it towards himself.

Hasen had experienced for himself Xiao Chiye's strength back at the Tudalong Banner. He was unable to seize his dagger back, and at the exact moment he let go, he crouched over at the waist to dodge Xiao Chiye's blow.

Xiao Chiye did not throw away the dagger. He was now pinned down by Wulihan, who had pounced on him from the side. That hillock-like body slammed Xiao Chiye against the wall, and Wulihan returned him a heavy punch. The fist smashed into him like a slab of brick, causing him to bleed from his mouth. At the same time he took the punch, Xiao Chiye grabbed hold of Wulihan's collar, deflected his head to the side to dodge the blow, and followed up with a head slam to the injured bridge of Wulihan's nose.

Wulihan hastily covered his nose and mouth, and Xiao Chiye turned the dagger around with his fingers. Grasping that sharp, protruding tip, he jammed the dagger between the gap of his fingers and slammed a fist into Wulihan's face, which failed to move out of the way in time.

Wulihan let loose a howl of fury. The dagger was embedded in his entire right eye, and the pain made his entire body convulse with tremors. Blood poured profusely as he bent over and cursed in the Biansha tongue.

Xiao Chiye did not let Wulihan off. He yanked Wulihan by the hair and took a few quick steps to slam Wulihan's head hard against the wall. The chilling sounds of the impact persisted a few more times until the wall was awash in blood. The scorpion behind Xiao Chiye pounced and hung on to Xiao Chiye's back as he prepared to flip him over, but Xiao Chiye did not move. He backhandedly felt for the scimitar on the scorpion's waist and released his grip on Wulihan.

Wulihan cried out in pain and stumbled back. He had only taken two steps when he felt a cool sensation on his neck. Before he could even react, his blood spurt out like a fountain, and his head went tumbling.

Xiao Chiye lifted his hand to wipe at the metallic stench of blood, revealing in the darkness a pair of extremely bright eyes—eyes that brimmed over with frenzied insanity and hatred. This gave him the appearance of a ravenous wolf, one whose sense of reason had all been devoured whole by this bout of heavy snow. He stared at Hasen and said, one word at a time, “Give my father back to me.”

Hasen brushed back the red hair that was hanging over his eyes and looked at Xiao Chiye as he said in a cold, detached voice, “Then, when will your father give my brother back to me?”

Xiao Chiye had already sprung closer. He had no wish to hear Hasen speak at all. As both men wrestled with one another, they crashed through the window and rolled into the snowstorm.

Hasen struck back with all his might and knocked Xiao Chiye down into the snow, then nimbly straightened up and stepped back as he gasped for breath. In a cold voice, he said, “Your father's armored hooves trampled his head into a pulp. Right in the midst of a blizzard. He left his corpse out there in the wilderness.”

Xiao Chiye propped himself up into a standing position and spat out the froth of blood in his mouth.

Hasen twirled out a new piked dagger between his fingers. He slid those fingers along the cold gleam of the blade and said expressionlessly, "I'm merely returning the favor tit for tat."

Both men collided together again once more. The snow blew so hard amidst the roaring wind that it stung the eyes, and the gasps of their breath sounded so very guttural. Even heaven and earth were howling. Xiao Chiye locked Hasen's throat in a viselike grip and lifted Hasen to smash Hasen's back against the damaged wall of the relay station. The force of the impact jolted the flakes of snow off the wall. Hasen grabbed Xiao Chiye's right arm and twisted it with all his might, nearly breaking it.

Xiao Chiye's right hand went numb, and his old injury caused him to lose his grip, allowing Hasen to break free once again. The next instant, the remaining scorpions wrapped their arms around both of Xiao Chiye's legs, causing his entire person to tumble into the snow. Hasen grabbed the opportunity and thrust the piked dagger towards Xiao Chiye's nape from the back. Xiao Chiye braced his elbow against the ground and took the stab to the back of his left shoulder, avoiding his vital spots.

Hasen tried to pull out the piked dagger, but Xiao Chiye backhandedly covered the back of Hasen's head with his hand and slammed Hasen's head down towards the ground with terrifying force, where he then held it firmly in place in the snow. Blood swiftly stained his shoulder. The dagger that had yet to be pulled out rose and fell along with each of his gasps for breath.

Hasen pressed both palms against the snowy ground, and a hoarse sound escaped from his throat, but he could not lift his head. There was no way he could make Xiao Chiye's palm budge at all.

Xiao Chiye yanked Hasen's red hair hard, his eyes red as he bellowed in a raspy voice, "GIVE. HIM. BACK. TO. ME!"

CHAPTER 187: APPROACH

Hasen was panting heavily. His cheek stung from being scraped by the ice on the snowfield, and the nape of his neck had turned red from exertion. The howl of the wind behind Xiao Chiye's back intensified, and the sudden swing of an iron hammer knocked him over. Seizing his opportunity, Hasen climbed to his feet and spat out the ice in his mouth.

The scorpions had suffered heavy losses this time. Of the remaining ten or so men who had crossed paths with Xiao Chiye, there were only a few still alive now. A scorpion on night patrol in the far distance blew the horn. Hasen backed off, knowing from the wind that the pack of wolves was currently charging this way.

Hasen flipped onto his horse, albeit unwillingly. His hand fell to the hilt of his scimitar, but before he could do anything, the gyrfalcon in the sky swooped down, its cry erupting in his ears. Following right after, a long arrow burst through the snowstorm under the billowy darkness of the night and hurtled straight for his head.

Xiao Chiye braced himself against the ground. His back was soaked through, but he could not tell if it was blood or sweat. With sticky fingers, he grabbed a handful of snow and stuffed it into his mouth, swallowing down the blood between his teeth. At the same time he climbed to his feet, he lunged for Hasen.

Hasen was almost dragged down by this force. He struck back with his elbow, but Xiao Chiye lifted his palm to grab hold of it. Then, Hasen's world turned topsy-turvy as Xiao Chiye flung him over. Before Hasen could return a strike, a punch from Xiao Chiye made him choke out bile. Hasen hissed as he felt the ache in his mouth. He kicked Xiao Chiye hard in the chest and immediately rose swiftly with aid from his elbows.

But Xiao Chiye was too tough of a nut to deal with! There was no way he could escape without taking Xiao Chiye out.

Hasen understood this feeling. He broke into a run with the horse and braced himself with his arms to flip onto it before Xiao Chiye made his next attack. He blew his whistle, then ripped off the sack hanging at the side of the horse and held it up high at Xiao Chiye. Hasen's fingers clenched tightly at that sack—never had he felt unable to take it lying down so intensely. But the very next moment, he flung the sack out. His voice cut through the wind as he said with detest at the same time he turned his horse around, "After tonight, my name will overshadow the Libei Armored Cavalry. I'll make you people pay back double for what you owed me since the battles on the eastern mountain ranges." His red hair flared ostentatiously, like the manifestation of his hatred. "Take your father and scram!"

Xiao Chiye instantly understood what that sack was. The bitter wind raged. He staggered over the snow and dashed over with all he had. As he fell and rolled over, he caught hold of the sack firmly.

Hasen instantly cracked his horsewhip and galloped away into the vast expanse of heavy snow.

Xiao Chiye lay on the ground, hugging that sack as he stared at the dome of heaven. He clenched his teeth even as his chest heaved heavily, unwilling as he was to shed another tear. But he could not control the sobs.

He could not.

He could not look at Xiao Fangxu in his arms.

The Armored Cavalry swarmed over, and Zuo Qianqiu took the lead in tumbling down his horse. Countless helmets were removed in the ensuing silence.

Heavy snow buried Xiao Chiye. He heard the wails of the Hongyan Mountains. He no longer had the strength to stand up, for his limbs were already numb. He stared fixedly at the sky, feeling as though he had died.

The Libei Armored Cavalry suffered their first fatal blow in twenty years, having been stabbed through and through. Hasen was right. After tonight, the Libei Armored Cavalry would live in his shadow. He had used tens of scorpions to sever the dignity of the Libei Armored Cavalry.

This was too endless a night.

The iron wall of Libei collapsed with a crash, leaving countless men exposed on the outside. Armor was no longer their advantage. There were like wandering souls who had been expelled here, unable to find refuge.

Xiao Jiming waited to receive his father in Dajing. The entire city was silent when the horse carriage rolled in. Suppressed sounds of crying rose and fell.

Xiao Jiming did not cry. He was neatly dressed and properly crowned as he walked down the stairs, one step at a time, to stand before the carriage. A never-ending silence followed. His body, wrecked with severe injuries, seemed to have shrunk some. In that heavy snow, his face was pale.

A veil of gloom was cast over the firmament. The news spread throughout Dazhou a few days later. Qudu removed the banners of the Eight Great Training Divisions. But as Xiao Chiye still had the charge of regicide hanging over his head, Qudu did not issue a eulogy to Libei, instead, they merely took down the colored lanterns on the streets and hung up white flowers.

Qi Zhuyin, sans armor and hairpin, led a unit of guards hurriedly through the snow towards Libei.

Xiao Fangxu was a legend. A junior soldier of the Luoxia Pass who conquered the eastern mountain ranges of the Hongyan Mountains, he was the last person out of the Four Generals of that generation to make a name for himself. Yet, he was the one and only person out of the four to be conferred with the title of a prince. At the present time, Lu Pingyan was in ill health, Qi Shiyu was retired, and Feng Yisheng and Xiao Fangxu had both successively perished in the war. The four generals from the early days of the Yongyi reign had all fallen into obscurity. Thirty years had gone by in a rush, and those high-spirited youths with boundless enthusiasm had all returned to the lands they belonged.

Xiao Chiye was a picture of calm after Xiao Fangxu's burial. His howls and cries seemed to have been buried in that bout of heavy snow, vanished without a trace after he seized his father back. He ate and changed his dressing as usual, but at night, Shen Zechuan could not hear Xiao Chiye's breathing.

He seemed to have fallen into a certain kind of deep slumber, languishing as he greeted each new day.

"I'll now give you an account of the ambush that snowy night." Jiang Sheng stood bandaged in the hall and said to the commanding generals. "On day eight of the twelfth month, while His Lordship was in the Shayi Camp, he decided to lay an ambush. He then personally led Squad Three of Shayi Camp up north. I was to go around from the back to provide support. The aim was to intercept Hasen in the east of the Tudalong Banner. The snowstorm was especially heavy that day. We waited until the hour of you before we encountered Hasen's elite forces. Both troops engaged in a battle, and we launched a head-on assault to Hasen's elite force, injuring nearly half of them in the process."

“While taking inventory of the remnants of the Biansha soldiers, we found that Hasen was not among them. At that time, it was already the hour of hai. We drew up a plan in the snowfield to branch out and search westward. As such, His Lordship and I split up into two. Then I came across the Biansha Cavalry to the east of the Tudalong Banner and was depleted of my remaining troops. By then, I had already sensed something amiss. Instead of continuing on westward, I took the decision into my own hands and turned back to join up with His Lordship.”

“His Lordship’s military strength had been similarly worn down, as the Biansha Cavalry kept engaging in guerrilla tactics in small groups. We stopped heading further in and decided to head back to the camp. Midway through, we arrived at the abandoned relay station of Changzhu Camp, where we met the scorpions disguised as the Libei Armored Cavalry.”

“Every one of them had the token of the Armored Cavalry at the side of their waists. They not only spoke the Dazhou language, but also with the Libei accent. They were able to answer readily and fluently. These people claimed to be subordinates of Zhao Hui’s Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang, and having sustained severe losses from Hasen’s harassment and lost their way in the snowstorm, they were forced to stop over at the relay station.”

“How many of them?” With hands on his knees, Zhao Hui asked with a solemn expression.

“Sixty.” Jiang Sheng set the book in his hands on the table and looked towards Xiao Chiye, who was sitting at the very end. After a few moments of silence, he spoke up. “We compiled a register of names based on the tokens Second Young Master brought back. You can cross-reference it.”

Zhao Hui quickly read through the register. “These are all brothers who have died in battle.”

Guo Weili, whose voice had gone hoarse from crying too many times these few days, said, “Fuck his ancestors. They even took away the armor and tokens! We have to inform all the major camps as soon as possible to clean up the battlefields personally from now on.”

“It’s futile.”

Guo Weili immediately retorted. “How can it be fu...” His voice trailed to a stop when he saw Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye had brought back Xiao Fangxu, which made it impossible for Guo Weili to shoot his mouth off as he previously did. His expression underwent several changes, but still, he could not hold it back, "... We have to deal with it, eventually. We can't give them any more opportunities."

"If Biansha can even equip themselves with iron hammers now, they are naturally able to counterfeit tokens as well." Zuo Qianqiu understood what Xiao Chiye meant. "The hardest part lies in how we can differentiate the scorpions from the rest."

With his cloak draped around him, Xiao Jiming contemplated it for a moment. "Recall back the tokens. We'll no longer use them. Continue with what you were saying."

Jiang Sheng continued. "Deceived by the scorpions, we lay down our blades, and that was when it all happened." At this point, he exposed half of his face. "That sort of iron hammer was custom made to go up against the Armored Cavalry. A sudden smash to the helmet will cause blurred vision, ringing ears, and blackout if you are lucky, or you'll die on the spot bleeding from the nose and mouth. My troops couldn't react in time at all, and I was knocked unconscious to the ground. I don't know what happened after."

This time, no one made a sound. They had learned about the scorpions via the private letter sent from Zhongbo, but no one could have imagined the severity of the threat that the scorpions posed.

Gu Jin bowed in greetings all around and took over from Jiang Sheng. "After an examination of the battlefield, my conjecture is as follows: Hasen failed to besiege his lordship, so he changed his tactics to outflank his lordship from both sides on the snowfield with his elusive elite troops and had his lordship trapped in the heavy snow. This consequently led to the total annihilation of Squad Three."

"Damn you. I don't believe it. His Lordship is invincible in the fields." Guo Weili stood up and irritably paced up and down. Eventually, he said with reddened eyes, "What is Hasen?! He was still sucking on milk when His Lordship was already the implicit king of the northern battlegrounds. We've been fighting in the field with Biansha for almost twenty years; there's no way the Armored Cavalry led by His Lordship can lose!"

Guo Weili was promoted by Xiao Jiming himself, but he had enlisted in the army alongside Xiao Fangxu. He could not accept this. The tactics he used to fight against Huhelu in the field when he was stationed in Changzhu camp had been learned from Xiao Jiming, and while Xiao Fangxu had never taught him before, Guo Weili's style of combat was obviously picked up on the sly through his observations of Xiao Fangxu.

The sound of discussion in the hall increased, and the noise gradually grew to a crescendo.

They were presently like a node on the brink of collapse. Every person's nerves were stretched taut with tension as they struggled to preserve the current stability of the Libei Armored Cavalry, but the sense that they were inching towards a complete breakdown still pervaded the atmosphere.

The Prince of Libei was dead.

This phrase was like a nightmare weighing down on everyone's mind, crushing them. They were helpless against Hasen. It was as if it was only at this moment that they came to the harsh realization that the Libei Armored Cavalry had already fallen a long way behind Amu'er.

Xiao Chiye found it noisy, but he did not utter another word other than that "futile" comment of his. It was here he sat, with a splitting headache. The injuries on his shoulder and arm simultaneously assaulted his consciousness on both sides. He heard Hasen, Hasen—this name being shouted everywhere.

This word was a shadow haunting him relentlessly.

At night, Shen Zechuan could not sleep well. He had to wake up every now and then to make sure Xiao Chiye was still there, but when he awoke this night, Xiao Chiye was not inside. Shen Zechuan got up and hurried over to the doorway, where he found Xiao Chiye standing in the courtyard, dressed only in a single layer of garment.

It was snowing again.

Xiao Chiye's shoulders were blanketed with a thin layer of snow. On hearing movements, he looked back and smiled faintly at Shen Zechuan with an expression meant to reassure.

Shen Zechuan gazed at him.

Xiao Chiye's eyes gradually reddened under that gaze of his. Shen Zechuan watched Xiao Chiye's tears slide down slowly. He understood everything; to this day, Xiao Chiye was still lost in his memory of that blizzard. The wolf pup that had run alone for dozens of li had not returned at all.

Shen Zechuan pushed open the door without even putting his shoes on.

Xiao Chiye had already begun to choke with sobs. It was as if he finally found release from all that he had suppressed within him as he watched Shen Zechuan approach. Tears streamed down his cheeks as he called out, “Lanzhou...”

Shen Zechuan embraced Xiao Chiye hard and stood on tiptoe to cover the back of Xiao Chiye’s head, as if he was a barrier, taking the physically and emotionally battered Xiao Chiye completely into the protective shelter of his arms.

NOTICE:

New updated Character Chart from the QJJ Simplified CN Physical Copy! Check out the Character Glossary!

萧策安

2. 王八 refers to a tortise or pimp, but can also refer to bastard or son of a bitch (as in 王八蛋)
3. 法不责众 i.e., when the law cannot be enforced because everyone is an offender.
4. 黄册 Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household's classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman.
5. 以战养战 using the manpower, food provisions, weaponry/armory, money, one obtained from an invaded and occupied city to fund the next battle.
6. 过年 celebration of the lunar new year.

- 7.
8. 洞门 An opening in a wall separating different courtyards within a residence or palace. It's also known as a moon gate (月亮门).
9. A play on 宝剑赠英雄, 红粉赠(送)佳人 give a precious sword to a hero, gift rouge powder to the fairer sex; i.e., give gift according to the recipient
10. 姨娘 yiniang, which means maternal aunt, is also a term of address for the concubines of one's father.
11. 军屯 military troops (mostly in border regions) who carry out garrison duties and farm crops to supply the border garrisons with grains.

- 12.
13. Cat's cradle, a game which involves making string figures with the hands.
14. 寒衣节 Hanyi Festival, or literally winter clothing festival, which is also called the ancestor worship festival, falls on the first day of the tenth lunar month, where winter clothes made of paper or cloth are burned in memory of the deceased ancestors. It also marks the arrival of the severe cold winter.
15. 清谈 Qingtān is a Chinese philosophical movement and social practice among political and intellectual elites where the literati engaged in highly sophisticated intellectual and philosophical discussions on lofty and non-mundane matters.

16.

17. 道袍 Daopao; not to be confused with a Daoist priest robe. This was a common robe typically worn by men in the Ming Dynasty.

18.

- 19.
20. 襦衫 Lanshan, a Chinese traditional hanfu made especially for scholars
21. 万物不(无)以生将恐灭 from Daodejing (道德经) by Laozi (Lao-tzu, 老子), also known as the founder of philosophical Daoism.
22. 道 “the Way”, or the path, is a conceptual term used by the school of thoughts, although it has different connotations for Confucianism, Daoism, and Buddhism. Daoism embraces nature. The Way, or Dao, according to Laozi and Daoists, is the natural order of the universe, and Daoism emphasizes doing what is natural and “going with the flow” in accordance with the Way, with the aim of becoming one, or in harmony, with nature.
23. The concept of “gentleman” or “man of honor” (junzi, 君子) in Confucianism (a different philosophical stance from Daoism), is a virtuous man who is noble in character and an exemplar for his conducts, morals, principles, etc.
24. 无为而治, 道法自然 Specifically, “govern not by interfering in all that goes against nature, for the Way models itself on what is natural.” i.e., man should observe the law of nature and go with the flow. From Daodejing (道德经) by Laozi (老子).

25. Full line 天下有道，以道殉身；天下无道，以身殉道。(未闻以道殉乎人者也。) Specifically, “when the Way prevails in the empire, it goes where one’s person goes; when the Way is eclipsed, one’s person goes where the Way has gone. (I have not heard of one’s Way being dependent on their manifestation in other men).” i.e., One must live or die with his principles, acting for himself, not with regard to other men. The Way here refers to one’s principles.

Contrary to Laozi, Mencius (or Mengzi, 孟子) subscribed to the Confucius school of thoughts, which regards the Way, or dao, as the way human beings ought to behave with principles and propriety in society and government. (To put it simply :V)

26. 斩首 the word here used is decapitated or beheaded, although it also implied the slaying of the Xiao Fangxu in this context, leaving the Libei Armored Cavalry headless, or without a leader.

27.

28. 鬼头 kind of carving on the hilt of the blade. See examples here or here

CHAPTER 188: OFFENSE & DEFENSE

Libei was still deep in grief when Biansha attacked again.

After this battle, Hasen had become the indisputable and irreplaceable “esuheri”- or Hero – of the Hanshe tribe. His reputation was almost comparable to that of Amu’er’s, but he did not have time to turn around and listen to compliments. He had to seize the opportunity to strike Libei where it hurt and shift the battleground to the west of the Tudalong Banner, so that he could have the Biansha Cavalry take over the fertile pastures along the eastern mountain range of the Hongyan Mountains before the start of spring.

Shayi and Sha’er camps suffered their most brutal attack of the year. With Jiang Sheng severely injured and unable to partake, Xiao Jiming deployed Zhao Hui and Guo Weili to hold the fort, but the appearance of the scorpions caused both of them to suffer heavy casualties one after the other.

The Libei Armored Cavalry was trapped in a predicament. Stripped of their heavy armor, they would have to face a swift and furious onslaught of slaughter from the elite forces of Biansha, and the inability of the battle steeds of Libei to catch up to the Biansha Cavalry at the same time also meant that they would be unable to escape the moment they were caught in a trap. But put back on their heavy armor, and that elite unit of scorpions would pursue them relentlessly.

Guo Weili lost the three battles he fought, each time surviving by the skin of his teeth.

In the month that followed, all the frontlines of Libei came under attack. It was as though Hasen wielded a scimitar in his left hand and an iron hammer in his right, with every strike he dished out capable of landing a blow right at Libei’s most vital point. And that was not just the most terrifying part about him; Hasen was also very clear about who his opponent was every time they crossed swords on the battleground. He was extraordinarily familiar with the battlefield and had committed all the commanding generals of Libei to memory, and so he could proactively adapt and deal with anyone that came his way.

Amu’er had taught all of his “changes” to Hasen without reservation, and Hasen executed them with great skill and fun on the northern battlegrounds.

Zhao Hui practically rolled off the back of his horse. The deputy general took off his helmet for him. Refusing to let anyone support him, Zhao Hui propped himself up on the ground and threw up everything in his stomach. Both of his hands were still trembling even now. He rolled over and lay on his back in the snow, panting hard.

“Shayi Camp’s commanding general, Zhao Hui, submits his military report.” He said from this position. “We came across the scorpions in the north. Their numbers far exceeded five thousand. Squad Seven, which acts as the left flank, was completely wiped out. The center was forced to retreat. We lost, again.”

This was swiftly recorded down by the personnel-in-charge. Urgent correspondences had to be immediately sent out of the camp with great haste and delivered to Dajing before tomorrow night. Xiao Jiming was unable to get on his horse and wield his blade, so all the military affairs could only be dealt with remotely like this. To guard against surprise attacks, he gave the commanding generals of the various battlegrounds the authority and power to self-mobilize troops in the face of danger. But this also meant that commanding generals like Guo Weili would have lost the chain holding them in check. Should they fall for a trap, they would probably never come back ever again.

Guo Weili came out from the tent and bent over with his hand extended. Zhao Hui waved his hand to indicate his inability to get up now. That sense of nausea caused by being smashed senseless would not recede, and lying in the snow felt a little more comfortable.

“Wu Ziyu is now guarding the Shasan Camp, and the Second Young Master has yet to recover from his injuries, so who is handling the task of transporting military supplies now?” Guo Weili fished out tobacco from his bosom and popped it right into his mouth to chew. He squatted beside Zhao Hui and asked.

“Chen Yang.” Zhao Hui spread out his arms and answered feebly. He seemed to know what Guo Weili was concerned about; thus, he continued, “Chen Yang has been by the Second Young Master’s side since six years ago taking care of the logistics, from the Imperial Army on a larger scale, to the residence’s backyard on a smaller scale. There’s nothing that can escape his calculations and planning. Chen Yang is currently in Bianbo Camp making a survey of the entire territory so that he can anticipate all the major and minor supplies in advance. As long as the bridle paths stay unobstructed, he will be able to ensure that the various camps will have no lack of supplies.”

Looking at the fragments of snowflakes in the sky, Guo Weili said, “We are short of battle steeds.”

They had already been starting to lack battle steeds at the beginning of autumn. The depletion of the horses back then was not this serious, and the stables in Dajing could still cope with the demand. But now, the armor-wearing battle steeds could no longer withstand the heavy hammers, and their injuries were often far more severe than the soldiers. Then there was the bitter cold weather and environment; their horses could not endure the cold as well as the ponies.

The sky gradually darkened. Zhao Hui regained some of his energy and sat up. He reached out to wipe away a handful of blood, then said to Guo Weili, “That one smash from the hammer made my nose bleed. I couldn’t wipe it away in time and swallowed it all back down.”

“Gross.” Guo Weili, with his headful of messy hair, did not want to stand up either, having squatted until his legs went numb. He paused for a moment, then said in a low and hoarse voice, “In the past, I considered Huhelu as one of Biansha’s elites. But now that I’ve encountered Hasen, I realize Huhelu is a good-for-nothing.”

Zhao Hui brushed off the fragments of snow on his knees and said, “Hasen is bold in his deployment of people, and he has infinite tricks up his sleeves. He knows us inside out.” He let loose a sigh. “And this is where the difficulty lies.”

But they all tacitly knew that what was most formidable about Hasen had not even been put on display yet. Hasen had fought offensive and defensive battles with the Bianjun Commandery – the hardest of all to attack – in the south for several years. Compared to field battles, he was even better at attacking cities. Now that Libei had completely switched from offensive to defensive, the battleground camps had become rudimentary cities. It would not be long before they got a personal taste of Hasen’s barrage of attacks coming down on them like the torrential rain.

Guo Weili hated Hasen with every fiber of his being, but even he had to concede that Hasen was absolutely a genius born for the battlefields. To date, Guo Weili had never met a general who could hold and control the initiative so firmly in hand like this. He was just as unpredictable as a gale; he did not give Libei another chance to fight back at all.

“Whoever takes the initiative controls the rhythm.” Guo Weili spat out the chewed tobacco. “We have to disrupt his pace even if we lose. Otherwise, we won’t have to wait until the beginning of spring. In less than half a month, the battle zones will fall into their hands.”

The light from the flame in the distance flickered. Both men looked at it from afar in silence before suddenly scrambling to their feet.

“Fuck!” Braving the wind, Guo Weili pointed at the watchtower and bellowed, “Are you fucking blind? Who’s in the southeast?!”

The Armored Cavalry on the watchtower raised a palm to shield himself from the wind and heard the sound of horses’ hooves downwind. But a bridle path connecting to Sha’er Camp lay in the southeast, and he could not immediately determine in this short of a time who exactly was coming.

“The cavalry.” Zhao Hui took several steps back to pick up his helmet from the ground, then shouted with all his might, “It’s the Biansha Cavalry!”

“Sha’er Camp has fallen.” Guo Weili hissed through gritted teeth. “Hasen, that son of a bitch!”

In the chaos that ensued, they watched as that flame came charging right towards them. The night patrol squad did not sound the alarm, so it was highly possible that the southeast had already been cut off. Other than the sound of hooves, there were clearly other sounds mixed in too.

“The stone catapults...” The helmet in Zhao Hui’s palm slipped to the ground. He said in a daze, “We’re done for.”

“Dogshit!” Guo Weili hauled Zhao Hui up and shouted all around him as he strode briskly, “Extinguish the flames in the watchtower!”

Guo Weili suddenly shoved Zhao Hui and followed up with a punch that made Zhao Hui’s nose bleed again.

“What are you, a dog?!” Zhao Hui covered his nose and spat out the froth of blood.

“We are wolves.” Guo Weili turned back and stared viciously towards the southeast. “The hardest iron wall to fight in this world is not the Bianjun Commandery, but the Libei Armored Cavalry.” He pounded his own chest with a clenched fist and hollered all around him, “The battleground in the north belongs to Xiao Fangxu, and the Libei Armored Cavalry rule this expanse of battlefield! Whoever the fuck is a dog can jolly well eat shit! I will never retreat! We are wolves!” His eyes were both red as he shouted in a hoarse voice, “Bite these motherfuckers to death!”

Zhao Hui wiped his nosebleed and kicked Guo Weili from behind.

Guo Weili, with stubble on his face, locked eyes with Zhao Hui and asked, “Isn’t Hasen the most adept at attacking cities?”

Zhao Hui picked up his helmet again and sniffled. “He won’t be adept at it soon.”

There was a “click” as the mechanism trigger kicked into action, and the baffles swiftly sealed off the crenels in all four sides of the camp walls, instantly turning Shayi Camp into an impregnable fort shaped like an iron drum. The Biansha Cavalry stopped a short distance away. Through the darkness of the night, Hasen saw the heavy crossbow mechanisms protruding from those city walls.

A few years before, Xiao Jiming had transformed Shayi, Sha’er, and Shasan Camps into heavy-duty ramparts. Just like how Xiao Chiye had felt when he faced the Shasan Camp, Hasen very quickly came to the understanding that this was the real impenetrable defense, one which did not leave a single opportunity for their foes to take advantage of.

The watchtower torches were extinguished, making it totally impossible for one standing outside to get a glimpse into what was happening within the walls or even try to figure out the layout within.

There were also two mounted crossbows forged by Qidong hidden away in Shayi camp. Xiao Jiming had gone to painstaking lengths back then to keep them from the prying eyes of Qudu. The Libei Armored Cavalry pushed out the mounted crossbows, and while the heavy arrows were in the process of being loaded, Biansha’s stone catapults had already kicked into action. Boulders as heavy as a hundred jin came hurtling through the air, smashing into the walls of the camp.

The crenels<sup>22</sup> in the walls of Shayi Camp were reserved as stations for archers; in order to seal these up during special circumstances, a more mobile parapet had been selected. But parapets were made from wood and could not withstand the force of bombardment.

Hasen clearly had his eyes on this weakness.

“Release the arrows, release the arrows!” Guo Weili took large strides, slapping the backs of the cavalry as he passed by them.

A storm of short arrows shot forth. Zhao Hui saw through an opening<sup>23</sup> of the battlement that the cavalry had long retreated, and the infantry had replaced them in front. They erected a dense array of iron shields in the face of the hail of arrows. The arrows rained down on the surface of the shields, but could not inflict any damage on anyone at all.

“That’s the iron shield of the Qidong Garrison Troops.” Zhao Hui said. “He swallowed up the advantages of the battlefields in the north and south whole.”

“Is he a jackal or what?” Guo Weili said at the top of his voice as he supported himself against the wall and listened to the intensifying sound of smashing rocks. “That’s no longer a cavalry!”

He was right.

Having expanded their infantry with iron shields, they were no longer purely a cavalry. The commanding generals were not wrong in predicting that Biansha had, in the past six years, acquired resources they could not even begin to imagine. This was the source of the changes Hasen was able to make.

The loading of the mounted crossbows was time-consuming. Dozens of men simultaneously exerted their strength, but for some reason, this crossbow simply would not move just before it was fired.

“Is it spoiled?” Guo Weili lifted the man away, stomped on the crossbow, and pounded on it irritably a few times. “Bloody hell, Qidong’s contraption—”

Before Guo Weili could finish his words, that crossbow trigger “clicked” into action, and the heavy arrows shot forth. Guo Weili’s outfit got caught on to an arrow, and in that instant it went flying, it dragged Guo Weili over, causing him to fall flat on his face.

The jarring sound of those iron-headed heavy arrows slicing through the wind followed close on the arrows’ trail as they hurtled through the air. The iron shields of Biansha were erected once again, but it was a futile attempt as the force of impact caved the shields in. And as the soldiers were standing too close together, the resulting shock wave caused the two rows of people in the rear to topple over to the ground in unison.

Zhao Hui wanted to report the good news, but before he could open his mouth, the baffle beside his head exploded. Reacting quickly, he crouched down with his hands covering his head and was nearly stabbed in the eye by a flying wooden splinter.

The baffle was destroyed!

“Damn it.” Zhao Hui muttered to himself with his head and face covered in dust. “I’ll have to tell the Hereditary Prince to get them changed to iron ones.”

The whistle outside sounded all of a sudden, and the saker falcons swooped down through the thick clouds.

Guo Weili followed suit and blew the whistle. The falcon cage beside the stable drew open with a swoosh. Each of the falcons that had been preserving their strength these few days was brimming with energy. Meng flapped its wings as the ropes on its claws rattled.

The soldiers taking care of the falcons untied the ropes. Meng, who would not listen to the whistled command of others at all, soared into the sky, circling among the dancing snow to break through the layers of clouds. The next instant, it began to dive. Iron claws clutched at a saker falcon’s flesh and feathers, tearing it into pieces in the air.

At this critical juncture, Guo Weili heard the sound of the back gates opening. He immediately turned his head back, but he did not get to shout out, for a column of light cavalry was entering swiftly. The cloak of the person in the lead flapped in the wind as she got off her horse before Guo Weili.

“Yo.” Qi Zhuyin greeted Guo Weili in her usual tone. “Busy fighting?”

Zhao Hui turned over to jump down and trade looks with Guo Weili in between breaths. Not knowing Qi Zhuyin’s intent for coming, he said, “Commander-in-chief...”

“Don’t call me that.” Qi Zhuyin took off her cloak and drew out the executioner blade<sup>24</sup> at the side of her waist. She stabbed it into the ground by her feet with a “thud” and said with a laugh, “I shall have to inconvenience you guys to hook up with me tonight.”

Guo Weili promptly covered his chest and stared at Qi Zhuyin as she surveyed the surroundings.

“Let’s see,” She said calmly, “who is tougher—your Libei Armored Cavalry, or our Qidong Garrison Troops.”

Note: a few parts in this chapter (mainly description of the fortifications of the wall) have been cross-referenced against the simplified Chinese physical copy. I’ll do a final check/edit again based on the uncensored, traditional Chinese physical copy once it’s released. Meanwhile, thank you for bearing with us!

CHAPTER 189: SNOWTROOPER

Zhao Hui originally thought Qi Zhuyin had brought along reinforcements from Qidong, but he only saw a few dozen personal guards behind Qi Zhuyin and could not help but ask in bafflement, “Commander-in-chief, this...”

“I’m not here to fight the battle for you,” Qi Zhuyin started wrapping a strip of cloth around her right hand so that the hilt of her blade would not easily slip off when it was soaked with blood, “but to use you people to fight. From now on, you and this buddy of yours will be demoted in place. I’ll take over the post of Shayi Camp Commanding General for the time being.”

Not only was Zhao Hui stunned the moment this statement was made, but even Guo Weili also froze for a moment before rebutting, “That won’t do!”

Qidong and Libei had always maintained friendly relations, and they had joined forces during the fourth year of Xiande to intercept the advance of the Biansha Cavalry and recover the Six Prefectures of Zhongbo, but even so, they were as different as chalk and cheese. Never before had they overstepped their authority in each other’s jurisdiction. They could address Qi Zhuyin as commander-in-chief, but that did not mean they would be willing to heed Qi Zhuyin’s deployment orders.

On hearing that, Qi Wei took out an authority token from the cloth bag at the side of his waist and tossed it to Guo Weili. Guo Weili caught it and turned it over for a look—it was Xiao Jiming’s authority token.

The smashing rocks had already destroyed all the baffles facing the southeast. Single-branch cannons<sup>25</sup> took over their place on the crenels. Although these were called “cannons”, they were actually catapults, with a leather nest for loading rocks set up on a long pole to be launched by manual manpower. They were less powerful compared to the catapults Hasen had brought. The infantry Hasen had positioned in front hoisted up their iron shields. In order to move forward at the risk of being smashed by the falling rocks, they had no choice but to slow down.

On seeing that Qi Zhuyin had already pulled out her executioner blade, Zhao Hui quickly followed after her and said, “Shayi Camp only has 8,000 men left, while the range estimate of Hasen’s force puts it at 10,000 cavalymen. Is the commander-in-chief going to lead us to put up a defense until reinforcements arrive? With the fall of Sha'er Camp, however, we will have to wait until the day after tomorrow at the latest before there will be reinforcements. During this period..."

"What are you worried about? The walls of this camp are as thick as four zhang.<sup>26</sup> Even if all the baffles were to go down, they would not be able to breach and take down the camp. You have sufficient kerosene, and even two..." Qi Zhuyin saw the mounted crossbow and said with delight, "... mounted crossbows forged by our Qidong."

"We don't have enough heavy arrows." Seeing as Qi Zhuyin meant to get on her horse and head out of the city, Zhao Hui hurriedly piped up, "We can't get back arrows we have already shot, and the reserves in the camp will not last until tomorrow. Commander-in-chief, what are you lifting Zhujiu for?! Head up the city wall and give us the instructions. We can fight."

Qi Zhuyin's blade was called Zhujiu. With Zhao Hui blocking her way, she said, "Hasen's 10,000-man army has to shoulder the load of military weapons they never had before. To maintain the speed of their advance, it would be necessary for him to cut down on the rations they take along with them. So, he can't fight a protracted war right now. As long as you can keep your patience in the city, you can wait until he retreats."

Qi Zhuyin took a few steps back as she spoke and raised her voice, "But miss the opportunity tonight, and you will no longer find another opportunity like this again. Hasen regards you people as a stepping stone to temper his new recruits by trampling over the military prestige of the Libei's iron wall. Stop being silly, gentlemen. The so-called iron wall is merely a fig leaf. You can't call yourselves the Armored Cavalry if you stick your butts up like this to take a beating."

Guo Weili clenched the token tightly, and Zhao Hui felt the foreboding tension in the atmosphere.

Qi Zhuyin raised her hand to point at the southeastern camp gate and turned to stare at Guo Weili with eyes brimming over with unbridled madness. "Don't you want to go out there and have some fun with me?"

The opponent Hasen faced up against in the southern battlefield was Lu Guangbai. The Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops were just like a stubborn rock stuck at that opening which would not budge the slightest no matter how the Biansha Cavalry rained a torrent of attacks on them. But Hasen understood the name “Qi Zhuyin” better, for he had long traded blows with Qi Zhuyin during that “Wind Guiding the Scorching Plains” surprise attack battle.

Hasen was of the mind that Qi Zhuyin was two people.

Qi Zhuyin’s styles when she assumed personal command in the commander’s tent and when she straddled her horse with her blade in hand were completely different. She could switch with ease between “commander-in-chief” and “commanding general”. She differed from the calm and steady Lu Guangbai; she could act according to changing circumstances as well as bring down her opponents with the external factors at her disposal. Otherwise, she would not have achieved the feat of burning down the thirteen camps of Biansha.

She was the “adaptable” type.

The city gate was tightly shut, and as the amount of rocks being thrown reduced, the iron shields of Biansha pressed in to within 500 paces. Not only could their iron shields protect the human body, but also the battering ram. This kind of wagon was equipped with huge wheels, and once they reached the front, the soldiers could join forces to ram down the camp gate; it was a powerful weapon for attacking cities.

Hasen’s cavalry was ready and raring to go. They were split into the scorpions unit with the iron hammers and the elite squad with the scimitars. When the need arises, the scorpions could even switch over to scimitars. Hasen was very patient. He would not give Shayi Camp any more time to delay. He wanted to ram the camp gate open, then slaughter the remaining soldiers Libei had left here with these cavalries of his.

The iron shields worked well, and the Biansha infantry gradually quickened their pace with their shields hoisted, keeping the battering ram intact under their shelter. When they reached the camp gate, dozens of them exerted themselves in unison to slam the huge wheel against the gate, sending dust raining down on them.

Hasen raised his hand, all ready to charge.

The camp gate made a muffled noise as cracks appeared on the area which bore the force of impact from the battering ram. In order to allow the soldiers in the center to better exert their strength, the infantrymen of both sides shifted down their iron shields. They shouted out as they stepped back, then rammed into the gate again in unison. The camp gate finally burst open with a “BANG”, looking visibly on the verge of collapse.

Zhao Hui stepped on the ruined battlement and poked his head out against the wind to look down. He shouted, "Release!"

Earthen jars suddenly came crashing down from the top of the wall. Amidst the sounds of shattering, kerosene poured down along the walls, spilling all over the Biansha infantry from head to toe. Flames lit up with a "whoosh" and leaped onto the Biansha Cavalrymen's bodies like a nest of venomous snakes. Their iron shields could not ward off fire, and in no time, blood-curdling screams rose all around, and the smell of burning flesh permeated the air.

The camp gate suddenly moved as it was hoisted up with a dull, heavy rumble to reveal the battle steeds waiting behind, along with the Libei Armored Cavalry clad in their armors. Qi Zhuyin, heading into battle lightly armored, had Zhujia in hand as she charged forth like a meteor in tandem with the hot puffs of air of her battle steed.

The next moment, the thunderous hooves of the Armored Cavalry reverberated through the snow. They followed Qi Zhuyin and stepped over the iron shields before the gates. It was as if they had risen from the ashes as they stormed in an assault towards the Biansha Cavalry, who had stopped behind the infantry.

The scimitar-wielding elites promptly retreated, while the scorpions sat firmly on their battle steeds and moved their shoulders at the sound of Hasen's whistle to meet them face on with the iron hammers. They had used these hammers to teach the Libei Armored Cavalry their harshest lesson yet, and they could still smash the helmets of the Armored Cavalry into pulps tonight.

Zhao Hui stood at the top of the wall overlooking the battlefield with his chest heaving rapidly. Even his breathing had grown ragged.

A scorpion lifted his hammer and swung it at the head of the Armored Cavalry in the wind—but then, the tip of a blade thrust right in from the side, intercepting it. With both hands on the hilt, Qi Zhuyin made use of the forward momentum of her battle steed to lift away the hammer with her blade and knock the scorpion straight off his horse.

At the same time this scorpion tumbled off the back of his horse, the heavily armored Armored Cavalry reined in their horses and retreated in unison. They were both deft and methodical in their withdrawal. Hasen heard the sound of horses' hooves behind those heavy armors before he saw the gaps between the scattering cavalry filled up with a blade-brandishing light cavalry—no, not light cavalry; they were the Libei Armored Cavalry, sans heavy armors.

Guo Weili had never been this light before. He concentrated all his pent-up frustrations these days into both hands and let loose a bellow along that deserted path until he was hoarse. His long sword<sup>27</sup> cleaved down on the scorpion head-on. Blood spattered. Meanwhile, he had already charged to the very front. The familiar heat returned to his palms once again. Guo Weili was so overcome with emotion that his hands were trembling.

“Damn...” Guo Weili gasped heavily. He was almost on the verge of tears as he shouted with all his might, “Commander-in-chief—this is exhilarating!”

Even Zhao Hui was about to shed tears at this shout.

Qi Zhuyin burst into hearty laughter. At the same time her battle steed raised its hooves, she lifted Zhujiu high and stabbed it into the scorpion’s body as the battle steed landed back on the ground.

Was the Libei Armored Cavalry no longer the Libei Armored Cavalry when they took off their armors? Perhaps so. But that was the Xiao clan’s Libei Armored Cavalry, not Qi Zhuyin’s Libei Armored Cavalry. The Libei Armored Cavalry kept retreating again and again in defeat on the snowy plains in the north, and one of the reasons was that they could not catch up with the ponies. But now, Hasen’s cavalry would have to run into the blades of the Libei Armored Cavalry themselves if they wanted to attack Libei’s fort.

Guo Weili pierced through the scorpion; he was no longer afraid of the iron hammers. Having removed his heavy armor, the scorpions’ swinging of their hammers here appeared particularly sluggish. What’s more, the scorpions also had a weakness, and that was, they had not donned armors in order to maintain their speed. As long as they lost their advantage of the iron hammers, their blood would still splatter over the battlefield in the face of the long swords.

Qi Zhuyin let out a breath of warm air as she stared down Hasen. Even at such a far distance away from him across the blood-spattered battlefield, the glare she had locked on Hasen was particularly malevolent.

As the scorpions were valuable assets, it was imperative for Hasen to react. He wanted the scorpions to retreat, but as long as he gave the command, Qi Zhuyin would follow suit and have Guo Weili stand down and change into heavy armor. Although she appeared to be passive and reactive, she was, in fact, the active and proactive player who had the upper hand firmly within her grasp this one night. There was no need for her to give chase; she only needed to stand on a certain boundary line on this battlefield and wait. If Hasen wanted to continue, he would have to hand up their heads on silver platters. Before Qi Zhuyin, all that was invincible about them amounted to nothing.

Bring it on.

This was how provocative the expression in Qi Zhuyin's eyes was; she even threw a taunting smile in his direction, and while she was at it, casually shook off the beads of blood on the surface of her blade.

"Retreat." Hasen promptly decided not to persist in fighting.

But Hasen had brought military weapons with him, and these were all things that he had gone to painstaking lengths to acquire and transport out of Zhongbo. It would be a loss for him to leave these here when he retreated. Should he delegate part of his troops to transport the weapons, a portion of the cavalry would be forced to slow down, encumbered by the supplies.

Qi Zhuyin leveled her blade and patted her horse onward, leading Guo Weili to give chase amidst the flying snow. She knew that Hasen's elite troops would surely be the first to withdraw; this gesture was more like coaxing a child as she led the Libei Armored Cavalry who had been ousted all day by the Biansha Cavalry to give chase close behind the Biansha Cavalry's asses to oust them. From time to time, they would even intimidate the other party.

Guo Weili finally got his chance to vent his frustration. With his adrenaline pumping, he wanted to continue giving chase, but Qi Zhuyin yanked him back by the back of his collar.

"Go home." Qi Zhuyin looked at that snowfield and curbed her smile. "Leave the camp, and you will fall again into the same predicament as before. Hasen is not someone who will run away with his tail between his legs. Don't give him the opportunity to rally his forces."

Guo Weili, having been won over, naturally heeded Qi Zhuyin's advice. At the same time he turned his horse around, he said excitedly, "Commander-in-chief, let's fight like this too on the snowfields in the future. Hasen doesn't count for shit!"

"Hasen has no need to attack cities during battles on the fields, so he won't charge forward but encircle you people instead." Qi Zhuyin pondered it over. "... But from the way it played out tonight, it seems that the changes he has made need to be refined too."

Hasen was upping the amount of leverage the Biansha Cavalry had, but he was too greedy, as evident from the iron shields this night. This batch of infantry did not give the Biansha Cavalry an advantage. On the contrary, they could be considered a liability. They could not outrun the battle steeds on the snowfields at all. The moment they fell behind, all that awaited them was death. They could only be used to attack cities.

Guo Weili still had something to say, but then Qi Wei suddenly blew the whistle and spurred his horse over from the scouts to Qi Zhuyin's side. "Commander-in-chief, there are still soldiers approaching!"

The snow intensified in the wind, brushing past against fur collars as the infantry trudged unevenly across the snowdrift. Their hair had gone all white from the snow, courtesy of the wind, and they had been walking with their heads lowered for an unknown amount of time. They seemed exhausted, yet they were highly cohesive and could quickly prostrate themselves as soon as they heard the sound of horses' hooves. They were infantrymen most skilled in the art of ambush in this world. Before traversing the desert, they had been called the Bianjun Garrison Troops.

Qi Zhuyin dismounted and stood facing the man at the head of the group through the heavy snow. She was so familiar with this army that she could recognize who he was just from Qi Wei's detailed report.

The man with stubble took down the strip of cloth covering his face and stood there gasping for breath. He had left for so long it felt like a different lifetime. He smiled a little and said wearily, "... Commander-in-chief, I am the reinforcement."

It was the deserter, Lu Guangbai.<sup>28</sup>

NOTICE:

New updated Character Chart from the QJJ Simplified CN Physical Copy!
Check out the Character Glossary!

1. 法不责众 i.e., when the law cannot be enforced

CHAPTER 190: NIGHT TALK

The Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops stopped to rest at Shayi Camp. They gathered around the bonfire, stripped off the cloth they had used as protection from the snowstorm, and started to wolf down their food. While Qi Zhuyin was removing Zhujiu, she noticed their spears were not the same as before. She took her seat before passing the hot tea over to Lu Guangbai.

For a long time, Lu Guangbai held his silence while holding on to the hot tea. "His Lordship..."

Sipping the tea, Qi Zhuyin hummed in affirmation.

Lu Guangbai asked, "How are Jiming and Ce'an doing?"

"Not too good." Qi Zhuyin deftly sliced the roast meat with a dagger and popped it into her mouth. "Jiming can no longer ride on horseback ever since he fell from his horse. All he can do now is to sit still in Dajing and oversee battle operations on the ground, which is a tremendous disadvantage when facing up against Hasen. Ce'an received a heavy blow when he gave chase to recover His Lordship, and his injuries are rather serious. The battlefield in the north is now desperately short of a commander-in-chief. Libei is on the brink of an imminent crisis."

"I want to head back to Dajing with the Commander-in-chief," Lu Guangbai looked at Qi Zhuyin. "I discovered the Biansha Cavalry's weakness while traversing the desert. There are several things that can only be discussed in the Commander-in-chief's and Jiming's presences."

"Who knows if you are a spy?" Qi Zhuyin wiped her fingers. "This is Libei, not Qidong."

"I'll hand over the troops to Zhao Hui and have them remain in Shayi camp as part of the garrison troops." Lu Guangbai gently placed his own spear by his feet. "I can offload myself of my troops and armor and let the Commander-in-chief escort me back to Dajing."

Qi Zhuyin jabbed the dagger back in place. As she stared at that blazing flame, she said, "I'll be heading back tomorrow. You can come along."

When the day broke the following day, Qi Zhuyin brought along Lu Guangbai on her journey back. By the time they had made it back to Dajing, it was in the dead of night two days later. Without alerting anyone else, Xiao Jiming stood in front of the steps to receive them.

Light snow was falling when Lu Guangbai dismounted his horse. He regarded Xiao Jiming with a gaze that was both familiar yet foreign. Qi Zhuyin tossed the reins over to Qi Wei and patted him on the shoulder when she walked up the stairs as a signal for him to follow. They stood ahead of him, silently urging him on.

River of Ice Armored Cavalry, Xiao Jiming. Wind Guiding the Scorching Plains, Qi Zhuyin. Fire Beacon Amidst Blowing Sand, Lu Guangbai.

They chased one another in those years of their youth, all too shy to bring up their ambitions. It was as though no matter how much time passed, they would always remain shrouded under the radiance of their fathers. But the churning waves toppled over those walls that had previously kept them sheltered from the elements, and now, they finally reunited again amidst the heavy snow.

Lu Guangbai met their gazes and took a step towards his journey home.

Lu Guangbai first paid his respects to Xiao Fangxu, then followed them into the courtyard. The heated, sectioned-off room was located in a remote area that was connected to a ground heating system<sup>25</sup> within, which ramped up the temperature until it was hot inside. Qi Zhuyin shed off her coat when she entered and crossed her legs to sit down. The opened side door faced a small pond, and the scattered rocks in between were all blanketed with a layer of fresh snow. A few branches of green plum edged along the snow-white paper of the door at an oblique angle across the night sky—the only embellishment in this secluded quietness.

After a moment of silence, Lu Guangbai spoke up, “Half a year ago, I left the Bianjun Commandery and headed east to the desert. I wanted to wipe out the Qingshu Tribe and take over their pastures so that the Bianjun Commandery and I could mutually watch out for each other. But I failed, and so, I was forced to continue going deeper into the desert. In the fifth month, I reached the eastern side of Gedale, where I saw Amu’er’s granaries.”

“As expected, Amu’er’s supply lines are really in Zhongbo.” With chopsticks in hand, Qi Zhuyin absent-mindedly took a few bites. “Having the granaries placed in the middle is the most suitable if the intent is to supply the northern and southern battlefields.”

“Amu’er’s fields are there too.” Lu Guangbai held the teacup with his fingers and looked at both of them. “He reclaimed the wastelands there, and had the Liaoying Tribe farm the land the way we do at the same time that they send out the falcons to hunt. The Qingshu Tribe down south is merely a ploy to mislead Qidong. Amu'er has partitioned the land east of Gedale into an undisturbed region. He carried out a new experiment there, imitating our garrison reclamation system.<sup>26</sup> He is presently working on establishing a new city."

Xiao Jiming and Qi Zhuyin were both taken aback.

"We must unify the lines of battle in the north and the south." Lu Guangbai said slowly. "We even have to tell Qudu to cease the infighting. Amu'er has already grown into a behemoth. He wants to become the great ruler on both sides of the Chashi River."

"There are three objectives for my trip up north this time." Qi Zhuyin set down her chopsticks and paused for a moment before continuing. "The first is to see what exactly the scorpions are all about, the second is to evaluate whether the Libei Armored Cavalry can still be salvaged, and the third is to persuade Jiming to call a truce and make peace with Qudu."

"That's impossible," Xiao Jiming retorted in a mild tone. "Libei has its own supply line now. Considering that we have formed an alliance with Zhongbo to the south, making peace with Qudu would mean handing over the advantages we have in hand now."

"If Libei refuses to give up being antagonistic to Qudu, then Qudu will not render any assistance to Libei," Qi Zhuyin said. "As you know, the empress dowager is a stubborn old mule."

"I will never..." Xiao Jiming stared at Qi Zhuyin and said, decisively and resolutely, "ever hand my younger brother over to them again, as well as my wife and my son. No one can ever take them away from me again. Libei does not need Qudu's help. The empress dowager should first get the Eight Great Training Divisions to ensure her own safety."

Xiao Jiming was rarely this blunt. His overly scholarly and refined appearance often made people forget that he was the one who established the Libei camps. Half a year before, he was also the commander-in-chief of the northern battlefields.

Lu Guangbai was worried that they might get into an argument, so he said in an attempt to appease, "We can..."

"It's pointless to discuss it again," Qi Zhuyin raised herself up a little to look at Xiao Jiming, "I know Xiao Jiming will not agree."

Lu Guangbai sighed and called out in resignation, “Commander-in-chief.”

“I just want to remind you that, before the unification of the battle lines happens, we are no longer in the same camp. If both armies form an alliance, then whose commands do we all heed?” Qi Zhuyin waved her fingertip between herself and Xiao Jiming. “Libei still has to be wary of the regards Qudu sent. If, and I mean if,” Qi Zhuyin said cruelly, “the Libei Armored Cavalry were to lose their commander-in-chief again, then who is going to assume responsibility for the battlegrounds in the north?”

Qi Zhuyin had long warned Libei of how dangerous it was to pin the faith of the entire army on one person. Libei was a rigid iron wall with impenetrable defense that padlocked its commanding generals to its camps. Zhao Hui had to bring along his Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang when he headed up north, and Guo Weili had to take along his Changzhu Camp when he headed down south. The swapping of battle lines was both time-consuming and labor-intensive. If the commanding general died in battle, then the probability of launching a counterattack was akin to zero.

As a matter of fact, all the military camps had this problem in the earliest days when Dazhou set up defenses at the frontier. Due to geographical constraints and varying recruitment stipulations at the various areas, the specifics of the military camps all turned out differently. The commanding general was the heart of the soldiers, and the soldiers were the limbs of the commanding general. If both parties wanted to have a flawless tacit understanding with one another, then they needed years or even decades of learning to get along with one another. For this reason, it was a major taboo to change generals just before the battle.

Qidong was the first to realize this problem. They were not like Libei, who had to face the open grasslands and the complicated swamps. They had the Tianfei Watchtower and Suotian Pass on both sides to shield them. As long as they could keep up with the defenses of their one and only opening that was Bianjun, they would be able to rest easy. Thus, during the reign of Yongyi, Qi Shiyu set the recruitment standard for the entire territory of Qidong. Their soldiers did not need a specific commanding general; everyone was familiar with the same battlefield. When Qi Zhuyin took office, she set up the Generals’ Barrack in the Cangjun Commandery. More than ten of the commanding generals under her command went whenever they were deployed, which made it fairly easy to swap across battle lines.

Even if anyone was unfortunate enough to become a casualty, it would not affect the overall war situation.

But with gain comes loss. Qidong did not have generals with such distinctive personalities as those from Libei. Their monotonous selection criteria already determined that generals with such individual styles would remain a rarity in the years to come.

Xiao Jiming said, "There is still Zhongbo between the northern and southern battlefields. It's not possible for us to merge as one, and there's no need for anyone to decide whose command to heed. Qudu is now intercepted by Huaizhou, Cizhou, and Chazhou to the northeast. Before they can send their regards to Libei, they would have to first talk to Shen Zechuan. As for being the commander-in-chief, Zhuyin, I have long since lost my qualification to be Libei's commander-in-chief."

Xiao Jiming held up the teapot with his long, slender fingers as he brewed tea with deft movements. There were no signs of self-pity or self-reproach to be found in his expression under that thick steam.

"When Hasen took away my father's head, he told A-Ye that he was returning the favor tit for tat." Xiao Jiming's hand paused. His expression was indifferent as he looked at Qi Zhuyin, "I know you think that the way we control the Libei Armored Cavalry is too centralized, but at this point in time, I have to stick to the old path. We will still use the most direct method to fight back, and that is, an eye for an eye. Our faith does not lie in my father. If that's what Hasen really thinks, then he's grossly mistaken, for our faith lies beneath our feet. Hasen defeated my father, but he can never defeat Libei. Thirty years ago, my father gained the strength from the land beneath his feet to march forward courageously, and it was with this strength that Libei has come this far today. We will never concede defeat at this point. The new alpha wolf is young, strong, and competitive with the desire to win. He can stand at the very front and take my father's place. When we start to fight back, he can swiftly rally together the hearts and minds of those who have lost morale. I am not that man, but I have taken over the heavy responsibility of tempering him. I want him to shine in all his glory and brilliance when he emerges from his sheath."

Qi Zhuyin went on to say, "But as far as I know, he has not truly engaged with the various major camps. Your chief commander of Libei isn't the obedient puppy of Qidong. He hasn't won over Libei at all."

“But he is familiar with the whole Libei territory,” Xiao Jiming said, “He has run through all these roads in these six months; he knows the swiftest paths to delivery supplies, the most direct routes to mobilize reinforcements and the consumption status of the various camps at the sites of battles. These are all gifts my father gave him. Zhuyin, all he lacks is a little time.”

“And here’s where... I come in.” Lu Guangbai timely picked up the thread of conversation. “How to go about unifying the battle lines is for you both to deal with, but how to deal with Hasen ahead and buy time for Libei is the other matter I want to talk about.”

“You modified the spears of the Bianjun Garrison Troops.” Qi Zhuyin remembered those spears.

“That’s right. After my defeat to the Qingshu Tribe, I encountered the other tribes one after another.” With hands on his knees, Lu Guangbai paused for a moment before continuing with a heavy expression, “I lost all the battles.”

“Oh,” Qi Zhuyin racked her brain to console him, “That sure isn’t easy.”

“What’s more, I was fighting on a hungry stomach. I could only scurry between them for the sake of our daily meals. We kept trading blows, and it was from these exchanges of blows that I discovered the cavalry’s weakness.” As Lu Guangbai spoke, he turned back and brought the spear on his back to his knees. He undid the strip of cloth to reveal the body of the spear within.

“You increased the length of the spearhead.” Xiao Jiming measured with his finger. “... but isn’t this a tad too long.”

“You even added barbs.” Qi Zhuyin examined it. “How did you secure them on?”

Lu Guangbai smacked their hands away and fondly caressed the spear like a prized possession. “I’m an infantryman. Back at the Bianjun Commandery, when we fought battles with the Biansha Cavalry, we relied on the terrains for our ambushes. But in the desert, there are only sand dunes. With all the previous advantages we possessed gone, I was forced to go head to head with the cavalry. At first, I wanted to create some distance between us and the cavalry to give us time to make our escape, and so I lengthened the spear. But as it turned out, the spears were too long, which made it hard to hold our direction when brandishing it, and being unable to turn around in time to meet the cavalry's onslaught of attack would mean being cut down to the ground."

Lu Guangbai realized during this process that the cavalry were circling them, since they had no way to attack from the front as they had to avoid the spearheads.

"So I changed the pole of the spear back, but increased the length of the spearhead." Lu Guangbai looked at both of them and smiled, "As long as the battle formation is fixed so that the spearheads face outwards on all four sides, it is a mobile 'battering ram'. If they charge over at high speed, they will be stabbed off their horses by my soldiers. The excessively long head of the spear also made it impossible for them to wrest it away from the other end. Once they get hit, it'd be hard for them to survive."

Xiao Jiming and Qi Zhuyin fell deep in thought.

Lu Guangbai continued, "But the cavalry was quick to react. They no longer launched linear assaults but encircled me to hem me in. This feels to me like fishing, so I proceeded to secure the picked daggers I had grabbed from them to the side of the spearheads with hemp rope. Even if we didn't get to stab them when both sides engaged, we could still make use of the barb to drag the cavalry off their horses. However, hemp ropes wear out easily, and that is why I will have to borrow money from you guys to add barbs to this batch of spears."

"I don't have money." Bringing up this matter was all it took to get Qi Zhuyin mad. "I'm a commander-in-chief, but I own a buttload of debts. I even threw the rouge expenses of my father's concubines in to pay them off. I will lose my shit with whoever talks to me about money now."

Lu Guangbai looked at Xiao Jiming.

Xiao Jiming said, "Our Libei... Shen Zechuan is presently at home too. How about you discuss it with him?"

Lu Guangbai wrapped up the spear. He made as if to speak, but then hesitated. Eventually, he only asked, "Why is he here? Didn't he used to tread on a path different from us in the past?"

"The world is in a state of chaos," Qi Zhuyin said. "Shen Zechuan is now the Tiger<sup>27</sup> of Zhongbo who has a close and mutually dependent relationship with Libei up north and who steers the Yan clan of Hezhou's ship down south. He has erected a wall around himself northeast of Qudu. Basically, he can be summed up in one word."

Lu Guangbai said, "Which is?"

Xiao Jiming answered demurely, "Rich."

"Zhongbo lies between the north and the south, and the issues we have to discuss now all come back to Shen Zechuan—we can't skirt them around him." Qi Zhuyin said, "Besides, the so-called unification of the north and south also requires effort on Zhongbo's end. Now is a good time to cut off that supply line of Amu'er."

"He will bring his advisor," Xiao Jiming sipped his tea, "during the in-depth discussion tonight."

"I only have one question." Qi Zhuyin held up her teacup with both hands. "What exactly did you Libei used to convince him with?"

This question stumped Xiao Jiming. After a moment of silence, the Hereditary Prince replied, "... Looks, I guess."

Silence momentarily descended upon them.

"Back to the topic. This spear can go up against the cavalry, but it's not suitable for the Libei Armored Cavalry." Qi Zhuyin steered the subject back to the matter at hand. "During my time in Shayi camp this time, I discovered the scorpions were not as strong as I had expected. The iron hammers are only effective against your Libei Armored Cavalry. Put them on the battlefields in the south, and they become a liability. They don't pose a threat to our Qidong Garrison Troops, so, in my opinion, Amu'er will not remove these scorpions from the northern battlefield. But if they remain here, the Armored Cavalry can only cower back into the campgrounds and fight defensive battles. They won't be able to continue fighting battles in the fields."

"Before we find a way to deal with the iron hammers," Xiao Jiming said, "defensive battles can buy us time."

"Hasen is aware of what you're planning to do." Qi Zhuyin recalled the details of the defensive battle at Shayi Camp. "He added iron shields to the cavalry, and equipped them with military weapons meant for sieges from Dazhou. Perhaps he is still adapting to them, but he will soon find his own direction from actual battle experiences. In half a year at most, Hasen will be able to make use of them proficiently. By then, not even defensive battles will be enough to protect Libei."

"Which is why we need the aid of the Qidong Garrison Troops." Xiao Jiming knocked on the teapot. "I'm guessing that Amu'er's crop fields on the eastern side of Gedale have not reached the point where it is enough to supply the four tribes. He remains dependent on the grains from Dazhou."

Shen Zechuan will completely choke off Amu'er's supply lines in Zhongbo. The Qidong Garrison Troops only need to head out of the Bianjun Commandery and go on the offensive against the Qingshu Tribe. Increasing the pressure on Amu'er in the south will suffice."

Qi Zhuyin's head started to hurt. She had to obtain approval from the Ministry of War in Qudu to deploy troops eastward. This was not the same situation as not handing over Lu Pingyan; if Qudu broke off their supply of military provisions as a result of this, she would have to deal with the aftermath on her own. But she did not mention this and merely nodded as an indication that she had heard what he said.

The next day, Xiao Chiye received Meng in the courtyard.

After remaining at the site of the battle for multiple days, Meng was covered all over with snow, and its claws were filthy beyond recognition. Xiao Chiye let it perch on him and cleaned up its feathers and talons. Gu Jin entered the courtyard and softly reported a few words. Xiao Chiye looked back and saw Lu Guangbai standing in the light snow.

Lu Guangbai had just kowtowed to Lu Pingyan. Instead of entering the building after coming in, he sat beneath the eaves and watched as Xiao Chiye approached. He could not help but sigh with emotion, "You brat... Did you grow taller again this past six months?"

"At this age," Xiao Chiye released Meng and sat by Lu Guangbai's side to undo his arm guard. "I won't be growing any taller."

Lu Guangbai, who was drenched in snow, looked at him. "You will become stronger still."

Xiao Chiye stroked the arm guard and said nothing.

"Ce'an, let me tell you a few things, okay?" Lu Guangbai addressed Xiao Chiye by his courtesy name. He no longer called him A-Ye, which implied that Xiao Chiye was not a wolf pup anymore; he could sit as equals at the same table with Lu Guangbai, not just as his little brother.

Lu Guangbai looked towards the courtyard. "You know of your brother's past, but definitely not the Commander-in-chief's. During the earliest years, when we were in Qidong, the Qi clan didn't have an heir of lawful birth. Qi Shiyu decided to find a capable person among his sons of common birth, but to no avail. It was at that time the Commander-in-chief said she wanted to be a general. Qi Shiyu took it as a joke, as did I. I thought there was no way a woman could become a general; it was good enough that she could hold an embroidery needle. But she was so insistent that Qi Shiyu put her under the Cangjun Commandery Garrison Troops, right under his nose.”

Qi Zhuyin threw herself into it with great enthusiasm, but she quickly realized that it was pointless. She did not fit in; there was no one here who was willing to accept her, much less be willing to listen to her orders. They were polite with her, but that was only on account of Qi Shiyu.

“She then insisted on being transferred to the Bianjun Commandery.” Lu Guangbai continued, “Qi Shiyu entrusted her to my father, but she was a very disobedient one. At that time, my brothers were still at home, and I had no wish to become a general at all. After she came, I assumed I would finally no longer come in last, but who would’ve known that she was so tough she left us all trailing behind her in the dust.”

Qi Zhuyin treated herself with the patience she used on embroidery. She got used to hearing the ridicule and even knew what they said about her behind her back, but she never seemed to get angry and continued to remain in the Bianjun Commandery.

Lu Guangbai brushed off the snowflakes on his knees. “Qi Shiyu seemed to let her be, and so she was left in the Bianjun Commandery. Many people wanted to take advantage of her when we were in the desert. Those people yanked her by her ankles and told her to scram back home, but all she would say was ‘no’. She crawled out of the yellow sands with her hands and feet, and even her teeth, falling until she was badly bruised and battered all over. She really looked like she was about to eat up those people then.”

But when Qi Zhuyin stood on the sand dunes, she burst into tears. She was on the verge of a breakdown as she shouted, “you pieces of shit!”. She grabbed Lu Guangbai by the collar and questioned him over and over again in anguish, “Which part of me isn’t good enough?!”

The trepidation from the past still lingered as Lu Guangbai continued. “I almost died of fright then.”

Xiao Chiye asked, “What happened after that? Did Qi Shiyu take her back?”

“And then she wiped her snot and tears clean and dragged her blade back to the camp.” Having said to this point, Lu Guangbai laughed together with Xiao Chiye, but he followed up closely with a sigh. “Afterwards, she made a small meritorious service. According to the rules, she should have been promoted to squad commander. My father agreed, but no one was willing to go under her command. She sat there from dawn to dusk. Finally, she asked one of the soldiers why he was unwilling to follow her. The latter answered it was 'because you can't even lift the executioner blade.'"

The Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops did not use executioner blades. Such blades were heavy and bulky, and there weren't many people who could truly carry it onto the battlefields. However, Qi Zhuyin seemed to believe it. From then on, she abandoned the slim blade<sup>28</sup> she had previously been using and switched over to the executioner blade.

"It was too ludicrous. Back then, I thought she was stupid. It was as if she could never understand that the reason why everyone rejected her was not that she was not capable enough, but because she was a woman."

The words this world had uttered the most number of times to Qi Zhuyin were "a pity you're a girl", but she herself had never possessed such a sentiment. She thought that there was nothing bad about being Qi Shiyu's daughter, the same way she thought that there was nothing surprising about how some people enjoyed embroidery and others, being on the battlefield.

Lu Guangbai looked at Xiao Chiye again and said, "Qi Shiyu eventually took her back. She didn't give up when she returned to the Cangjun Commandery and tagged along with Qi Shiyu's commanding generals to learn the ropes. Her spectacular talent had already been put on display a long time back, but there was no one willing to appreciate it until that battle that year, when her brothers had all abandoned Qi Shiyu, and there was no one in the Cangjun Commandery willing to step forth and face up to the enemy head-on."

"That night, Qi Zhuyin rode over to countless homes on horseback, only to have too many doors slammed shut in her face. Against all odds, she left the Cangjun Commandery and attempted to persuade the various major garrison troops until her voice went hoarse, and she did so regardless of whether anyone heard her. Finally, she took her father home just as you did. That was the beginning of her rise to prominence. It propelled her forward into the limelight from then on. Qudu was unwilling to confer upon her a noble rank or title, and many people assumed she would be intimidated because of this. But, Ce'an, I never again saw her cry in anguish the way she once did in the desert. She matured quickly after going through all these trials and tribulations. Qi Zhuyin could assume the position of Commander-in-chief of the Qidong Five Commanderies' military forces not because she was forced to, but because she can. That is where she should be standing."

She was born to be on the battlefield.

"The same goes for you too," Lu Guangbai said.

CHAPTER 191: LUNAR NEW YEAR'S EVE

At the hour of xu in the evening, the north and the south gathered.

Xiao Chiye lifted the curtain, and Shen Zechuan led Xiao Xun by the hand as he bent over to enter. The discussion in the hall came to a temporary halt. Xiao Xun took off his fur collar and oversleeves himself, then handed them over to Gu Jin before making a beeline to his father's side, where he sat on his heels.

In this interval, Qi Zhuyin turned aside to whisper to Lu Yizhi, "You couldn't have given your son away to him, could you?"

Before Lu Yizhi, who was holding the teacup with both hands, could answer, she saw her son turning his head to look at Qi Zhuyin as if he had sensed what she had said. She whispered back, "Oh, no. Xun-er heard you."

Xiao Xun bowed in greetings to Qi Zhuyin, who drank her tea sheepishly.

Xiao Xun resembled Xiao Jiming, but he was not as refined and easygoing as his father. He did not like to smile, and when he kept his little face straight, he appeared particularly solemn.

Lu Yizhi ruefully said, "Who exactly does he take after?"

On the other side, Shen Zechuan had already taken his seat, with Xiao Chiye and Yao Wenyu to his left and right respectively. To the left of Xiao Chiye were those from the Libei camp, and to the right of Yao Wenyu were those from the Qidong camp. Those of them who were from Zhongbo had the fewest number of people, but they were also the ones with a sense of presence that proved most difficult to overlook.

"Zhongbo still has three more prefectures it has yet to reclaim," Qi Zhuyin said to Shen Zechuan, "We hope that the Prefectural Lord will be able to complete the reunification of Zhongbo before winter next year."

"If the commander-in-chief is willing to go easy on Fanzhou and Dengzhou," Shen Zechuan said, "I'd naturally be happy to oblige."

"That's hard to say." Qi Zhuyin smiled. "I can't do anything about it if Qudu forcibly commands me to crush King Yi."

Yao Wenyu knew what Qi Zhuyin meant. It wasn't that she could not do anything about it; she wanted to use King Yi in exchange for next year's military provisions from Shen Zechuan, so that she could make sufficient preparations for going on the offensive against the Qingshu Tribe.

“The fact that the Commander-in-chief is now sitting in Libei,” Yao Wenyu said placidly, “means that abandoning the punitive expedition against King Yi is merely a matter of words.”

The battle lines in the north and south were going to be integrated into one, and Qi Zhuyin had successively turned a blind eye to Qudu’s deployment orders one after another. If she was truly afraid, she would not have come to Libei at all. But Qi Zhuyin simply had to take a stab at fleecing Shen Zechuan—she was already poor to this extent.

“I came to Libei without anyone noticing. This is not the same as going against the ruler’s commands. Your Cizhou is such a beehive of activity this year. If I delay taking down King Yi any further, your military drill ground is going to be set up right at the entrance of the City of Dancheng,” Qi Zhuyin said. “The address ‘Prefectural Lord’ is worth ruminating over too. The way I see it, it’s no different from the words, ‘King Yi’.”

“That’s a gross misunderstanding there.” Shen Zechuan smiled. “From Chazhou to Dunzhou, our Cizhou has been going by the book and playing by the rules. How remarkable a title is the ‘Prefectural Lord’? Nowhere in the current stipulated rules and laws is it said to be inappropriate. I’m merely a guest of Cizhou’s prefectural prefect.”

This was taking advantage of the loophole of not establishing his own banner to rise in revolt. In truth, Cizhou had long broken itself away from Qudu’s jurisdiction. It was just that Qudu had not dared to issue the official notice all this while. One of the reasons was that they feared Cizhou would really ally itself with Libei in a moment of desperation and fight their way to the City of Dancheng. The second was that they were afraid the other areas would follow suit. Yet, owing to their internal strife, they did not show any intent on delivering an offer of amnesty to Shen Zechuan if he pledged loyalty to them. As a result, Qi Zhuyin could only count on King Yi to threaten Shen Zechuan.

If this threat had been made a month ago, Shen Zechuan would have had to think of a way to deal with it. But now, he was the key of all present here to decide if the establishment of the northern-southern battle line could come to pass. Money and grains became his greatest playing cards. He wanted to exchange what he had in hand for maximum benefits. Just like how Qi Zhuyin wanted to fleece him, he similarly wanted to fleece Qi Zhuyin too.

“Han Jin is in your hands,” Qi Zhuyin said. “Cizhou is guilty of a crime just based on this alone.”

“Han Jin.” Shen Zechuan enunciated these two words with no traces of fear in his eyes. “Who knows whether or not he’s in my hands?”

This was why Qi Zhuyin was usually loath to go to Qudu. It was too exhausting dealing with these kinds of seasoned schemers like Shen Zechuan. They would talk in circles without making any progress and pass the buck around until everyone was at the end of their ropes. This simply reminded her of the feeling when she had to demand money from the Ministry of Revenue before.

“Even if I let off Fanzhou and Dengzhou and let you eat them up, what about Duanzhou?” Qi Zhuyin then changed direction. “You have less than 40,000 soldiers on hand, of which 20,000 are new recruits. Don’t you think you are being a little too hasty in trying to recapture Duanzhou back from the Biansha people?”

By this, she meant for Shen Zechuan to plead with Qidong to dispatch troops and help them.

But Xiao Chiye piped up, “I’ll head over to Duanzhou by the second month at the very latest.”

“Although Zhongbo doesn’t need Qidong’s assistance for the time being, the ability of the Qidong Garrison Troops to deal a blow to the Qingshu Tribe concerns the situation on the battlefields in the north,” Yao Wenyu continued. “So Cizhou is willing to help share the Commander-in-chief’s burden. Before coming over to Libei, the Prefectural Lord has considered the issue of the military provisions on the Commander-in-chief’s behalf. As long as Qudu really dares to cut off the Commander-in-chief’s supply of military provisions, then half of Qidong’s military provisions next year can be borne by Hezhou.”

Yao Wenyu was merely embellishing his words. When Shen Zechuan was fleecing Yan Heru the Sheep in Dunzhou, Yan Heru said that he would also shoulder the burden of Qidong’s military provisions. Shen Zechuan took out a part of it and ordered Yan Heru to think of a way himself to supply Qi Zhuyin. So what they said at this moment could also be considered the truth. The only thing was that they slightly omitted some key details and erased Yan Heru from the picture.

Acting in accordance with Shen Zechuan’s aim of seizing every opportunity available to maximize their own benefits, Yao Wenyu continued after a moment's pause, "The Commander-in-chief is right. Zhongbo only has 36,000 men now that can be considered 'soldiers', which is negligible compared to both parties present. But Duanzhou is the gate of Zhongbo facing the east. If it's not shut tight, then there's no way we can cut off Biansha's supply line, let alone the possibility that Biansha will use the chance to erode Zhongbo from within and sever the connection between the battlegrounds in the north and south to catch Libei in an encirclement trap."

Qi Zhuyin inwardly thought, so—

Sure enough, Yao Wenyu continued, "So, we hope to establish a bridle path with direct access to Libei and Qidong next year and obtain some pointers regarding regimentation of military camps."

Regimentation of military camps was a reserved and subtle way of putting it. Qi Zhuyin felt that what he actually meant to say was that Shen Zechuan would like to obtain the help of the Qidong's commanding generals in training a garrison troop capable of heading into battle on behalf of Zhongbo next year. Libei was all cavalry, and the Garrison Troops of Zhongbo was infantry; he could only ask Qidong for help with this matter.

This revealed much ambition on his part, or at the very least, that was what everyone present could intuitively sense. It made clear that Shen Zechuan did not want to rely on the Libei Armored Cavalry nor simply borrow soldiers from Qidong; he sought to restore Zhongbo's line of defense and establish his own armed forces.

Money truly makes the mare go.

Everyone in attendance unanimously sighed with emotion. The conversion of military provisions into silver, coupled with the expenses for the bridle path, equipment, rebuilding of the city, and so on would add up to as much as several million taels for the year. In the past, Qudu would come up with all kinds of excuses to fob them off because they had no money, yet here Shen Zechuan was, getting down to action right off the bat.

"Also, about the cavalry the Prefectural Lord and His Lordship discussed in detail previously," Yao Wenyu questioned, "will Libei still be able to supply the battle steeds at the beginning of spring next year?"

There was currently a severe deficit of battle steeds on the battleground. If Libei was unable to bear the burden of supplying the battle steeds when the pastures sprang back to life at the start of spring, then he could postpone it as per Shen Zechuan's wish.

Xiao Jiming replied without pause, "Yes, but Zhongbo has to let us use Mount Luo as a riding stable."

This was what Xiao Jiming was planning. The only general in Xiao Chiye's hands was Tantai Hu, and stationing him in Dunzhou was equivalent to giving him to Shen Zechuan. When Xiao Chiye headed for Duanzhou in the second month next year, it would be inconvenient for him to switch battle steeds relying on the present Bianbo's bridle path. But if Libei were to establish a new riding stable on Mount Luo, it would not only ease the strain on the Bianbo Camp in transporting supplies but also allow Libei to build up a minor line of defense in Zhongbo. Even if Duanzhou were to fall, or if Shen Zechuan were to turn against Xiao Chiye, Libei would not immediately fall into the position of a defenseless, passive player.

"Is Duanzhou planning to establish a cavalry?" Lu Guangbai asked.

Shen Zechuan did not have that much of an opinion about this cavalry yet, so he merely answered, "Giving the light cavalry a try. I can only make a decision after obtaining the battle steeds next year. Is General Lu planning to remain on the battlegrounds?"

Lu Guangbai nodded. "Right now, Libei needs time. My troops can hold off the scimitars of Hasen's elite force on the battlefields for the Libei Armored Cavalry. I'm also rather intrigued by the scorpions."

"In that case, I have a request too," Qi Zhuyin said. "Since Lu Guangbai will be staying on the battlefield, then as an exchange, Xiao Chiye will have to head down to the southern battlegrounds during the sixth month next year and hold down the fort at the Bianjun Commandery on my behalf."

Xiao Chiye was stunned.

Qi Zhuyin tapped the desk and said nothing more. But Xiao Jiming and Lu Guangbai both understood the significance of her words—Qi Zhuyin was giving Xiao Chiye a chance.

On the banks of Chashi River, Heaven blessed the Liaoying tribe with a man called Amu'er. Then it bestowed upon Amu'er a son with extraordinary talents. They led the Biansha Cavalry to prominence along the river banks, relying on their strategies and scimitars to break down Dazhou. Perhaps, in Amu'er's eyes right this moment, the stage was all set to usher in an era of Biansha's reign. He saw the great curtains opening up before him. Biansha would bid farewell to the pain and suffering of trudging barefoot across the snowstorm. After going through so many tumultuous ordeals, they were finally about to leave this barren land to establish their own dynasty on that fertile soil.

The territories of Dazhou in the east and west had thoroughly split apart this winter. Shen Zechuan's barrier barred access to the eastern and northern borders. He used half a year to complete this wall and bridge together the northern and southern battlefronts in the tattered mess that was Zhongbo. Even if he had yet to explicitly direct his weapon at Qudu, the way the scale had tilted had already exposed an inkling of his ambitions.

This year, Libei did not light any lanterns or set off firecrackers, but it was not utterly lacking. Here, Shen Zechuan got to enjoy a new year's eve dinner. While staying up that night,<sup>29</sup> he fell asleep. Xiao Chiye placed a new fan and a few copper coins by his pillow. When Shen Zechuan woke up, still half asleep, Xiao Chiye stroked his head, lulling him back to sleep again.

In the night, Xiao Chiye stripped off his shirt. His entire back was occupied by a wolf extending from his left shoulder all the way to his waist. All of the rage, howls, and anguish that tore him apart were engraved here in ink. This wolf was not a picture of perfection; the placement of its left eye was reserved for the injury at the back of his left shoulder. It looked as though it had been gouged out, making it appear unusually ferocious.

Xiao Chiye remembered the humiliation in that heavy snow.

Hasen was right.

Everyone ought to return the favor, tit for tat.

End of Book

CHAPTER 192: WHAT THE SNOW BECKONS

As soon as the new year was over, Zhongbo was hit by a blizzard. The sudden snow came so hard and fast that there were incidents of houses collapsing in the various prefectures. Fortunately, the repair of the bridle paths had been expedited before the new year, so communications from Chazhou and Dunzhou to Cizhou were not cut off. Luo Mu and Tantai Hu made timely reports of the casualties and dealt with the situation before dawn, keeping the damage caused by the disaster under manageable control.

The advisors in the study stayed up all night. Likewise, Shen Zechuan did not get any rest either.

“The previous year’s heavy snow was a disaster in our Cizhou, so before the snow fell, the yamen has repeatedly confirmed the inventory of the granary reserves.” Zhou Gui flipped through the book on the table. “Meanwhile, the reinforcement of residential dwellings is indeed a problem. We cannot wait to come up with a solution only when the houses collapse every year.”

“But,” Kong Ling sat opposite him, “where will this extra expense come from? There isn’t any money left to spare due to the war this year.”

Shen Zechuan had been pinching the center of his brows until it was now a little red. His head was spinning as he sat in the main seat. The clicking sounds of abacus beads being flicked in the partitioned area had never stopped once; the people in there were all assistants who had been specially transferred over from the shops in Hezhou and Juexi to assist with the accounts. Charcoal braziers had been set up inside the study as it had been chilly the past few days, but after several hours with that many people crammed in the room, the study grew unbearably stuffy.

“The war is of crucial importance,” Shen Zechuan said, “so let’s not cut down on the military expenses for the various prefectures. Have it allocated from the taxes and duties paid by the merchants last year.”

“The period before spring is a hurdle we have to overcome. As long as we can survive these three months, things will naturally take a turn for the better once the snow melts.” Yao Wenyu made a slight attempt at reassurance. “The tea the merchants obtained from the mutual market has also been selling well at Yongyi Harbor, so we can increase the commercial tax by an appropriate amount this year.”

“If we are going to keep the copper mines in Juexi going, we have to deal with the Provincial Administration Commission of Juexi.” Shen Zechuan turned his folding fan and pushed aside the cooled tea beside his hand. “Whether things can still keep running smoothly after spring this year will depend on how Qudu decides to play their hand.”

Jiang Qingshan personally assumed command of Juexi, so he was most well-acquainted with the business dealings coming and going in the territory. If Qudu ordered him to choke off this tea trade route running through the northwest, it would be indeed a blow to Cizhou.

“On the bright side,” Kong Ling rubbed his knees, “the timely snow augurs a good harvest.”

“That’s indeed the case for our three prefectures, but the commoners of Fanzhou and Dengzhou will suffer.” Shen Zechuan had been thinking of Fanzhou these days. “King Yi seized the granaries of the two prefectures for himself before the turn of the year, and many people have starved to death even before the snow fell. I’ve been having sleepless nights turning and tossing over this matter.”

“We are going to pit our troops against Duanzhou in the second month,” Zhou Gui said. “So it’d be best to settle the issue with Fanzhou and Dengzhou now.”

Cizhou Garrison Troops had only 20,000 soldiers. Including Dunzhou, they had 30,000. They had to face up against the Biansha Cavalry from Duanzhou in the second month, as well as split their energy and attention to dealing with King Yi. As such, there would be a void in Cizhou’s defenses. If the Eight Great Training Divisions came feeling their way over from Dancheng during that period of time, they would be really overwhelmed.

“It’s also an opportune moment now to take down Fanzhou.” Yao Wenyu brushed aside the tea foam. “King Yi is so insatiably greedy that the commoners in Fanzhou have long been voicing their discontent. He can’t last for long. Why don’t we make the first move and issue an official denunciation-cum-proclamation of war?”

“It’s different from the ‘bandit suppression’ situation a year ago now that Cizhou has reached an agreement with the northern and southern battlefields. Assuming we make the first move to issue an official proclamation and King Yi refuses to surrender and insists on fighting, it will give Qudu a reason to deploy their troops.” Kong Ling, who had always placed priority on “stability”, was not in favor of the idea.

“Mister Chengfeng has a point, but the Prefectural Lord has already been appointed before the new year, so there is no benefit to keeping an outward show of peace with Qudu.” Yao Wenyu did not take a drink of his tea. He looked at Shen Zechuan. “In my opinion, Qudu will not dare to dispatch their troops now even if they have a reason to.”

Kong Ling was still of the opinion that it was inappropriate. “If the crime of rebelling against the state is substantiated at this moment, the business in Juexi this year is bound to be affected. All things aside, if Jiang Qingshan were to make use of this opportunity to seal the Xi clan’s copper mine, wouldn’t our losses far outweigh the gain? Your Lordship, in my humble opinion, the better tactic would be to send troops to Fanzhou on the quiet.”

“His Lordship’s occupation of Zhongbo is already a foregone conclusion. Even without this proclamation, Jiang Qingshan will still think of a way to seal the Xi clan’s copper mines.” Yao Wenyu said.

Both men differed in their views and held fast to their own arguments.

Shen Zechuan tapped his folding fan against his fingertips and said a moment later, “Shenwei, draft up the proclamation.”

They discussed the entire night in the study. Seeing as the arrangements had been more or less made, Fei Sheng called for the attendants to serve breakfast. Everyone helped themselves to the meals and hurried back for a rest, considering that they were going to continue with the in-depth discussion of the plans for the deployment of troops at night.

When Kong Ling rose to his feet and saw Yao Wenyu about to head out, he turned aside to lift the curtain for him. Yao Wenyu bowed to him, and Qiao Tianya entered to push him away. After everyone had left, Zhou Gui trotted along the corridor, panting for breath as he caught up with Kong Ling.

“Oh, my!” Zhou Gui rubbed his chest with one hand and reached out with the other as he shouted, “Chengfeng, Chengfeng!”

Kong Ling stopped in his tracks to wait for him. “You should have called out to me earlier if you have something to say. This walkway is extremely slippery. If you were to fall in a moment of carelessness, it would take you a long time to heal!”<sup>30</sup>

Catching his breath, Zhou Gui lamented with a wave of his hand, “I could still run several li along the fields the year before last, but I really can't do it anymore this year. It's truly the case that time flies, and old age now beckons."

"Look at the rush you are in." Kong Ling tightened his fur collar around him to keep out the bitterly cold wind. "Are you here about what happened earlier?"

"It has been a long time since I last enjoyed the snow with you." Zhou Gui tried to cover it up only to make his intent all the more conspicuous. "My wife has been keeping a close watch on me these days, and I have been looking after my grandson the whole day in the residence. Today's just perfect."

Kong Ling sighed and said ruefully, "You'd do better not to learn to be so furtive like the others." He drew back his hands and took shelter from the wind before continuing, "there's no need to persuade me. I will not change my opinion."

Zhou Gui could only say, "Still, don't harbor a grudge against Yuanzhuo because of this."

"Do you take me for a kid?" Kong Ling walked side by side with him. "The fact that Yuanzhuo can speak frankly without reservations shows that he has a clear conscience. A difference in political views is only inevitable; it's mindlessly playing along that's taboo. I understand that, and so does Yuanzhuo, and that's the Prefectural Lord's stance on the whole matter given that he didn't seek us out for a private discussion."

Zhou Gui had been castigating himself because of Gao Zhongxiong's incident. He no longer took decision-making into his own hands and always had to ask Shen Zechuan before taking action. During the recent discussions of official business, he also told the advisors on his payroll not to be complacent, fearing that they would clash with Yao Wenyu again.

Zhou Gui saw a branch of the withered willows in the courtyard snapped, and the wind sent it falling into the snow and over to the corner of the wall. Having caught his breath, he said dejectedly, "I'm just afraid it will cause us to be even more estranged from one another..."

"Water which is too clean has no fish."<sup>31</sup> Kong Ling raised his hand to brush away the snow on his white temples. He schooled his expression and said with all seriousness, "Which yamen in the world is truly without blemish? You've been the prefectural prefect for so many years in Cizhou, and you know that it's equally complicated both in the upper and lower echelons. There is no end to vices such as corruption and bribery, and they can never be fully eradicated. You have done a good job managing it the previous years, and the Prefectural Lord understands that too. From start to end, he has never blamed you or taken it out on you. Killing those two advisors was merely a reminder to you, not a warning. Your cautiousness of late will only serve to remind him of this matter.”

Tough was the governance of one’s subordinates, as was deference to one’s superiors.

Zhou Gui took a few steps and said despondently, “... My father-in-law was reluctant to recommend me for an official post in the capital also because he assessed that I was not cut out for it. I have no sense of propriety when it comes to certain matters, and I have to rely on fumbling my way through trial and error in order to determine whether to tighten my control or relax my approach. This is too difficult for me.”

“Since you have not done anything against your conscience, why do you have to be so terrified?” Kong Ling shook his head slightly. “Don’t make a conscious effort to give way to Yuanzhuo anymore. He is intelligent and quick-witted, so how can this little thinking of yours escape his eyes? You’ll only end up creating a genuine rift over time.”

It was gusty when Shen Zechuan was on the way back to his residence. Fei Sheng held his arm out to hold up an umbrella to shield Shen Zechuan from the wind, but the wind was so strong that it sent Shen Zechuan’s coat flapping all over.

With his back to the wind, Fei Sheng said, “Master, let’s switch to a sedan.”

Shen Zechuan could barely open his eyes from the intense wind, and he was so freezing cold that the tips of his ears had gone red. “It’s just a few steps; why would we need a sedan for that?”

But it’s cold!

Fei Sheng was worried that Shen Zechuan would catch another cold with just these few steps. He had been exceedingly careful these past few days both outside and inside the residence. Even the hallways in the courtyard had thick, heavy drapes hung up, the bottom of which the attendants would weigh down whenever they entered and exited to keep the cold out. For prudence’s sake, the ground heating system inside was also kept running at all times.

After much difficulty, they made it through the main entrance. Ding Tao, who had been waiting in the side room flanking the principal room, immediately jumped out. Along with Li Xiong, he stood in front of Shen Zechuan like a block of wall.

As they shuffled along slowly, Shen Zechuan said with a headache, "You may stop shielding me from the wind. Let's leave quickly. All we're getting standing here is a draught of wind. It won't be long before one of us collapses."

Ding Tao had grown taller again during this period of time. "Master's instruction was to shield you so that no wind can pass through, or he's gonna whip me." He patted Li Xiong and shouted against the wind, "Daxiong, move faster!"

By the time Shen Zechuan finally reached the veranda, his cloak had already been soaked through with snow. It felt uncomfortable to have it covering his neck, all dripping wet, so he raised his hands to undo it. Fei Sheng took it in a fluster and called for the maidservant to dry it. He was also about to drape a new cloak over Shen Zechuan, but the latter simply went on ahead without even looking back.

Fei Sheng had been in such a state of elation after having gotten the assignment of recruiting new members back in Dunzhou that he even found Qiao Tianya pleasing to the eyes when he saw the latter upon his return. During the period of time Shen Zechuan was in Libei, he remained at home with Ji Gang, mulling over the Ji Clan's Boxing Style while listening to the latter. Now that Shen Zechuan had returned, he was like a mother hen going all out to take meticulous care of Shen Zechuan in every way possible.

The Marquis has to run around the battlefields now, see!

Fei Sheng thought as he followed behind Shen Zechuan.

So long the Prefectural Lord did not fall sick, the Marquis would be happy and would not send dirty looks his way later. Everyone was going to be a family in the future. He could not always remain a thorn in Xiao Chiye's flesh.

Shen Zechuan entered the main hall and huffed into his hands as he took his seat. Fei Sheng asked, "Master, are you going to drink the medicinal decoction simmering over the stove now?"

Shen Zechuan did not want to drink it. He had not been ill the past few days, and he was concerned that he might get a nosebleed from the over-nourishment should he continue taking all these tonics and medicines.

Moreover, there was no one at home other than Ding Tao who had candies. So he pretended not to hear and continued to flip through the documents on his table.

Noting that Shen Zechuan's expression remained unchanged, Fei Sheng waited by the side. After a moment, he spoke up again like clockwork. "Master, the medicine—"

Shen Zechuan patiently raised his head and looked at him.

Fei Sheng pretended not to comprehend the expression in Shen Zechuan's eyes. There was not only Xiao Chiye but also Ji Gang backing him on this issue, and they were both people that Shen Zechuan could not afford to offend.

Shen Zechuan could only relent in resignation. "Go bring it over."

Fei Sheng swiftly left to get the medicine, but a moment later, it was Qiao Tianya who lifted the drapes to enter.

"Yan Heru is here." Qiao Tianya did not put the drapes back down and turned around to look again. "This jabbering brat ran over to Yuanzhuo to make a ruckus. I've brought him over."

Shen Zechuan dipped the brush in ink and said, "he's here to deliver the silvers. Treat him with a little more courtesy."

Before they could finish their conversation, a person came in from under the drapes. Yan Heru was all decked out from head to toe in a brand new, vivid red and golden-threaded brocade robe with embroideries of, unsurprisingly enough, golden ingots. There was a string around his neck, with a brand new abacus hanging off of it. It was so tightly strapped on that a red mark had formed on his nape, but even so, he could not bear to take it off.

The eyes on this lad's fair face curved into crescents as he jovially exclaimed, "Here I've come to extend my new year greetings to Your Lordship! Happy Spring Festival! I wanted to come and pay my respects to Your Lordship a while ago, but alas, it turns out you were in Libei! See, the moment you came back, I rushed right over. I've not only prepared precious gems and jades for the Marquis but also picked out for Your Lordship a number of pretty—"

Fei Sheng, who was carrying the bowl of medicine behind, locked eyes with Qiao Tianya. With a raise of his arm, Qiao Tianya held Yan Heru down.

Libei was in mourning, and Cizhou had not gaily decorated its streets for the festivities this year either. Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye themselves were both dressed in plain, mourning clothes, and Shen Zechuan had even removed his jade earring during this period of time. Who would have known that Yan Heru would be so insufferable the moment he opened his mouth? He was simply asking for a beating.

Shen Zechuan wrote “REJECTED” on the paper and did not even spare Yan Heru a single glance.

Credit: Thanks to MaruChan for pointing out the typo! <3

CHAPTER 193: MISGIVINGS

Yan Heru corrected himself at the last minute and finished up his words, “—pretty ruyi scepters!”<sup>32</sup>

“How polite of you to have prepared a gift.” It was then Shen Zechuan set down his brush. “Show Young Master Yan to a seat.”

Qiao Tianya released his grip, and Fei Sheng pushed Yan Heru in while saying, “Quick, quick, quick. Serve tea to Young Master Yan!”

Yan Heru suffered an enormous loss this time. He had carefully selected many a number of people from Cuiqing, all of them exceedingly good-looking young boys and girls. He originally meant to get on Yao Wenyu’s good side by letting Yao Wenyu take his pick first so that it would be a lot smoother when he dealt with Shen Zechuan later, but he did not even get to see Yao Wenyu at all. On entering this courtyard, he thought of giving them to Shen Zechuan. After all, which man did not love beauties? It was not like Xiao the Second was some ravishing beauty that could put flowers to shame.

Yan Heru stroked the back of his head and marked Qiao Tianya down in his book of grudges, then held up the hems of his robe to take his seat. He still wore an amiable expression, but his smile was restrained as he said with some melancholy, “The Prince of Libei was a hero of all times. Who doesn’t know of his exemplary military achievements? I was simply worried that the Prefectural Lord and Marquis would be overwhelmed with grief. If your health were to suffer, you would be doing a disservice to the late prince who was ever the compassionate man. See, that’s why I rushed over playing the jerk, all just to amuse a smile out of the Prefectural Lord! My deepest condolences, Your Lordship.”

Yan Heru spoke in officialese with a hint of Hezhou accent. He could not change his habit of adding words like “see”, “yes?” or “no?”, and the likes, which made him sound like a spoiled child using them. However, it was indeed quite impressive to be seeing him say words of comfort in such a well-mannered way now.

Shen Zechuan thanked him for this kindness. After all, the expenses in the entire territory this year were massive, and Yan Heru was inextricably involved in every single account. While Yan Heru was speaking, Shen Zechuan took the medicine from Fei Sheng and drank a few mouthfuls. With a gentle expression, he said, “When I was in Libei, I heard you supplied Bianbo Camp with tens of thousands of taels for the repairs of the bridle paths.”

“Those were just chump changes,” Yan Heru said. “Nothing of significance that the Prefectural Lord should keep in mind. Besides, the battle lines are now unified, yes? Libei and Qidong are both fighting against the Biansha baldies. I’m but a mere merchant who can’t be of help in any other way. This is just a small gesture of my goodwill.”

Fei Sheng scoffed to himself in secret, marveling at how this lad was not much worse than himself when pretending to be a decent human being. Look at how he was going on about the unification of battle lines now, yet he did not show the slightest twinge of guilt earlier in Dunzhou when he led the merchants to do business with Biansha.

Shen Zechuan finished his medicine and spoke after a moment’s pause, “What’s the nature of your business in coming to see me today?”

“That’s exactly it, to see Your Lordship.” Once again, Yan Heru flashed a smile. “Your Lordship is now like my own kin elder brother. I’ll miss you like crazy if I don’t see you for one day.” Acting without thinking, he straightened up in his seat and said, “Why don’t you take me as your younger brother? I’ll kowtow twice to you.”

Yan Heru was indeed shameless. He addressed Cai Yu as “pa”, Lei Changming as “big bro”, and even Lei Jingzhe as “eldest nephew” the last time he came across him. Now that the tides had turned in Shen Zechuan’s favor, putting him in control of the entire situation, he wanted to pass himself off as Shen Zechuan’s younger brother. Was it a big deal to remain in a lowly, subservient position? It was nothing compared to money — this lad saw it more clearly than anyone else.

“Sure,” Seeing Yan Heru getting all delighted, Shen Zechuan continued, “Kowtow twice to Shen Wei first, and we can be considered to hail from the same clan.”

Yan Heru almost spat out loud in disdain. He was not a fool. Being associated with Shen Wei in any way would ruin his reputation, and he would be cursed by all in both the east and west. He beat a retreat and said with waning interest, “Then forget it. We have rules at home, so kowtowing to Shen Wei is definitely a no-no.” He said to Shen Zechuan, “Your Lordship. Your Lordship~”

“Hm?” Shen Zechuan said.

Yan Heru perked up and said, "Well... I have something else to discuss with you. Hasn't Qidong already come to an agreement with our Cizhou? There will definitely be no problem with the commander-in-chief's military provisions this year. I'll make up for it. All of it."

In no hurry to respond, Shen Zechuan drank the tea to rinse his mouth.

Sure enough, Yan Heru continued, "Qudu is afraid of you now. You have powerful military forces all around you. If you were really to come to blows with Qudu, how would the Eight Great Training Divisions be able to hold their own against you? But lowering their heads like this isn't the way forward either, so I'm thinking, Qudu will cut off our business to Juexi from this year onwards. At least, they won't leave the Xi clan's copper mines and fleet of ships in your hands."

The fleet of ships at Yongyi Harbor concerned the business of Libei's mutual trade market. Unrefined tea was worth nothing in Juexi, and it was only through export with this fleet of ships that profits could be made. Yan Heru did not feel bad about the seizure of the Xi clan's properties. In any case, those were not his shops. The Yan clan could no longer trade in grains in Zhongbo now, and Yan Heru had to find a substitute to fill in this void. He was eyeing the harbor.

"What do you have in mind?" Shen Zechuan set down the lid of the teacup. "Give it to me straight."

"I think we should," Yan Heru plopped down on the table, "forgo Yongyi Harbor."

While tapping on the tea lid, Shen Zechuan raised his eyes to look at Yan Heru and saw the ambition in the latter's eyes. Shen Zechuan did not reply immediately. He remained in his seat patiently, and in no time, he figured out Yan Heru's plan.

Yan Heru blinked. "We can... build a new one."

The Yan clan of Hezhou occupied the waterways in the south of Dazhou. This was the key reason its businesses could spread all over from east to west. But after their goods arrived at Juexi, they had to be handed over to the Xi clan's fleet of ships at Yongyi Harbor for trading. That was why the largest share of profits from this route did not go into Yan Heru's pocket, but Xi Hongxuan's—which was now also Shen Zechuan's pockets. Yan Heru had been feigning civility with Shen Zechuan all this while in all kinds of brazen attempts to cooperate with Shen Zechuan because he saw the trade route in the whole territory shrinking. He had to keep up with Shen Zechuan's speed. To Yan Heru, Juexi's intent to seize and seal off the copper mines and Yongyi Harbor this year was an opportunity to capitalize on the timeliness of it all and get a step ahead.

A few years ago, it was tough going for Yan Heru to venture up north. Libei would not collaborate with him, so he simply established a small trade market in Dunzhou and made use of the pawnshop to launder money for officials around the world. It was the same now; he was still just as gutsy. Giving up Yongyi Harbor meant that the Xi clan could no longer hold back the Yan clan in the west. Yan Heru wanted to hold sway over the internal and external waterways and put himself on equal footing with Shen Zechuan in this turbulent time.

Shen Zechuan stroked the edge of the tea lid with his fingertips. "How are you going to get around Jiang Qingshan?"

"You are holding a handle against Juexi in your hands." Yan Heru grinned, revealing his canine tooth. "In the past few years, the merchants have gone to Dunzhou to launder money on behalf of the local officials, and there are plenty of officials from Juexi in that name list. If the account books in the pawnshop were to fall into Jiang Qingshan's hands, they would have hell to pay even if they don't die. I've dropped countless amounts of bribe money in Juexi in order to gain access to the market there, and now it's time for them to repay the debt."

There were hundreds of officials and lesser functionaries in just one region alone. Even if the prefectural prefect himself was upright and impartial, there was no way he could ensure that all his subordinates under him were uncorrupt. The administration of a prefecture and a city were extremely complex, and there were only so many Investigating Censors Circuit in the various areas. There were simply too many unseen blind spots from top to bottom falling through the cracks, and all of these were openings Yan Heru exploited. Yan Heru was able to do business on such a large scale next to the Xi clan in Juexi because these people were his subjects who had rendered meritorious service by protecting him, and now the same people were all stepping stones who would pave the way ahead for him.

Shen Zechuan was going to have to re-evaluate Yan Heru anew now.

Yan Heru had always appeared quite the shameless one from the time he was in Dunzhou. Even when he had been given the cold shoulder, he could continue on with a broad smile, making others forget he was the helmsman of the Yan clan of Hezhou who had profited off others' misfortune in Zhongbo just a few years ago. He had also been quite decisive when he abandoned Lei Jingzhe, and was even willing to encircle and kill Lei Jingzhe in Dunzhou to win Shen Zechuan over.

No matter how sweetly Yan Heru addressed said person, he would not waver in the slightest when it came to taking their lives. He was truly a money-grubber. Just like how he would never go out without a golden carriage, he would not even show his face if the person sitting across from him did not have enough bargaining chips of interest.

"Liuzhou, which lies along the coast, is a land with auspicious fengshui.<sup>33</sup> Its location is remote, and it lies quite a distance away from Yongyi Harbor. What's more, it's a crescent-shaped bay, so the fleet of ships will not lie exposed on the outside. As long as we seal the mouth of Liuzhou's Prefectural Prefect, You Tan, we'll be able to continue doing business." Yan Heru rapped that golden abacus of his. "Make good use of that list of names, and the merchants headed towards Juexi will no longer need to pay tax and duties to Jiang Qingshan. You will have the final say over the tariffs and inland commercial tax... In the future, when you come to reign supreme and take all thirteen cities of Juexi under your command, these corrupt officials will be the first gift I present to you. Kill them when the time comes and wash the land all over in blood, and we'll see who still dares take bribes on your watch!"

Exploit all resources to the fullest, and get rid of them once they outlive their usefulness!

Yan Heru had not even come of age<sup>34</sup> this year, yet he was already well-acquainted with the words' ruthless and merciless'. He flicked away noisily on his little abacus with that harmless, innocent face of his, calculating with it not just money, but also lives.

Shen Zechuan had no reason to reject Yan Heru; he indeed needed a new harbor to avoid Jiang Qingshan. He was not even willing to concede over the copper mines. The various expenses were increasing this year because of the war. By the time he took back the remaining three prefectures, the costs would no doubt skyrocket again.

"You are a far-sighted one," Shen Zechuan sighed with emotion. "I cannot compare to you when it comes to doing business."

After Yan Heru took his leave, Qiao Tianya set his hand on the chair's handle and looked on as the door hanging screen rose and fell. "This lad should be killed.”

“He is resourceful and extremely good at getting on a person’s good side,” Shen Zechuan glanced at that gently swaying hanging screen too. “In time, he will become trouble.”

Yan Heru walked out of the residence and stepped on someone’s back to get onto the horse carriage. As the carriage began to sway, he took off the golden abacus around his neck and tossed it onto a satin cushion. Rubbing the back of his neck, he asked, “have you found Hairigu?”

Yan Miao lifted the curtain of the carriage and entered to kneel at the side, “Everyone in the Shen residence keeps their mouth tight, and the Imperial Bodyguards are everywhere; I can’t find him at all.”

Yan Heru was a little displeased. He ticked off the beads on his abacus and threw a tantrum. “What Imperial Bodyguards? They’re just a bunch of beggars who hung up their hats to become lackeys in Cizhou after leaving Qudu! Because of the Liuzhou harbor matter today, I’ve caused Shen Zechuan to have misgivings about me. Who knows? He’s probably plotting my death right now.”

Yan Miao happened to be the messenger for the pawnshop in Dunzhou; in fact, he was also the shopkeeper who handled the incoming and outgoing accounts for the pawnshop in Dunzhou. He might have been the son of a servant<sup>35</sup> serving in the Yan clan, but the fact that Yan Heru had him stationed in Dunzhou a few years ago was evidence of Yan Heru’s trust in him.

Yan Miao lifted his head slightly to speak up by the dim light. “From what I can see of Shen Zechuan’s actions in Cizhou, he doesn’t seem to be as vindictive as the rumors have it. The war is of utmost urgency now, and both the northern and southern battlefronts are borrowing on his strength. Little Young Master, you mustn’t lose your head and ruin your relationship with him.”

“He had me take responsibility for providing for the two prefectures’ granaries at the start of spring.” Yan Heru slid the abacus bead back and forth. “That’s essentially serving me with a warning, no? Do you think he isn’t one to seek revenge over a small matter? I think it’s just the opposite.”

“Kong Chengfeng rejected him thrice, yet he didn’t fly into a rage and continued to treat Kong Ling with respect.” Yan Miao said, “We’ve supplied the grains for the two prefectures, along with the military provisions for Qidong this year. We will also be providing the funds and labor for the construction of the new harbor in the west. He ought to have taken notice of Little Young Master's sincerity."

Yan Heru suddenly swept away the abacus on his knees. He endured it for a moment before opening his mouth. Eventually, he said, "A-Miao, you don't understand. Shen Zechuan treats Kong Ling well because Kong Ling is still willing to do his best for Cizhou despite being unwilling to work under Shen Zechuan in an official capacity. Kong Ling was the one who negotiated the business in Huaizhou before autumn, and it was also Kong Ling who played the peacemaker when there was animosity between Shen Zechuan and Zhou Gui's advisors before the new year. How else do you think a blockhead like Zhou Gui can still get to be an official in Cizhou? Shen Zechuan is making the best of his resources; he knows to put these two men together as a team. Not only will they not turn against him, but they will also put up an unassailable defense of Cizhou on his behalf. As for me, if he genuinely and sincerely wants to have a long-lasting partnership with me, how could he tolerate the lapdogs by his side barking at me time and time again?"

Yan Heru was about to say something else when Yan Miao suddenly straightened up and warned in a low voice. "Little Young Master!"

Yan Heru promptly paused. After a momentary silence, he heard the sounds of horse hooves outside of his carriage. He picked up the abacus and crawled over on his knees to the side of the carriage drapes. In a soft whisper, he asked, "Who's that?"

Yan Miao answered, "The Libei Armored Cavalry."

Yan Heru felt a sudden pang of fear. He clutched his abacus tightly, wanting to take a peek while the carriage swayed, but then, the carriage came to an abrupt stop.

Lang Tao Xue Jin slowed down and stopped by the side of the horse carriage. Against the entire sky of snow bearing down on him from above, Xiao Chiye cracked his whip in the air, and Chen Yang and the Libei Armored Cavalry behind him followed suit and came to a stop too.

Yan Heru patted his cheeks with both hands and pulled the carriage curtains open. "It really is the Second Master! I've been thinking of you on the way."

Xiao Chiye turned his head slightly to sweep a glance at Yan Miao, who was kneeling inside, before looking at Yan Heru, "You've been to see the Prefectural Lord?”

Yan Heru gulped. He had heard that Xiao Chiye had run in the snow for half a night in order to retrieve the Prince of Libei, and that he had not only escaped freezing to death but even broke the necks of more than a dozen men. Yan Heru did not know if it was because of the rumors, but he felt Xiao the Second's sense of presence swell suddenly. That imposing and intimidating aura assailing him was so overwhelming that he involuntarily broke out into a sweat all over.

“I did, yes.” Yan Heru looked as though he was feeling very warm as he wiped the sweat on his forehead. “I brought some gems and jade for you. If you find them acceptable when you see them on your return, let me know. There are plenty of them in Hezhou.”

Xiao Chiye had just come over from Bianbo Camp, and he had no wish to engage in idle chatter with Yan Heru, so he merely nodded on hearing him and left with his men. The Libei Armored Cavalry passed by them like the wind, and it was only then that Yan Heru dared to rub his arms and shudder a few times.

As if remembering something, Yan Miao said to Yan Heru, “this Second Master has been looking for the Venerable Yideng.”

“Is that so?” Yan Heru tilted his head to look at the fine spray of snow kicked up by the Libei Armored Cavalry. His gaze gradually sharpened, and he said with a smile, “... But having Shen Zechuan sick is far more reassuring to me than letting him recover.”

CHAPTER 194: SOUND SLEEP

Qiao Tianya had still yet to leave the room. Shen Zechuan said, "When you return later, let Yuanzhuo know about Liuzhou's harbor. We'll discuss it in detail later. The weather has been cold recently. Keep the ground heating running. Don't let him fall ill again."

Qiao Tianya, who was more at ease before Shen Zechuan than Fei Sheng was, answered, "I'm keeping my eyes on it."

Shen Zechuan thought for a moment. "There are quite a number of people this year sending in their visitation cards<sup>32</sup> with requests for a meeting in the hope of seeking a prospective career here. Ward them off these few days until Yuanzhuo recovers from his illness. You did well today. Yan Heru has ulterior motives. Don't let him in next time too."

Qiao Tianya fished out a folded paper from his sleeve and pushed it before Shen Zechuan. "I'm here about this matter, actually. There are quite a number of scholars with a literary reputation among those who sent in their visitation cards. Yuanzhuo has taken a close look at them and prepared two lists of names for you."

"Two?" With warm fingertips, Shen Zechuan brushed the paper open for a look.

"This is a list of those you can retain but cannot use." Qiao Tianya pointed to the left. "While this is a list of those you can retain and use."

Shen Zechuan looked over the list of those that could be retained but not used; they were all scholars who were rather well-reputed. Of these people, few were usable, because what Zhongbo was in urgent need of at present were practical doers who would actually get things done. But these people came all the way from afar to throw in their lots with Shen Zechuan. For reputation's sake, Shen Zechuan could not slight them either. He had to keep them in his residence as literary retainers. On the contrary, those of use in the other list were basically all unknown nobodies.

"We need a group of people after early spring," Shen Zechuan said. "When the time comes, include the talents picked out from Zhou Gui's end and draw up a name list for the various prefectures to make arrangements to settle them in."

Shen Zechuan intended to reclaim the remaining three prefectures before spring. That way, he would be able to make it in time for the spring plowing. Otherwise, he would have to stress over the provisions again at the end of the year.

Qiao Tianya acknowledged his order. On hearing the sound of footsteps under the eaves, he rose to his feet and announced with a smile, "The Second Master is back."

After Xiao Fangxu's demise, Xiao Jiming became the Prince of Libei, and calling Xiao Chiye "Second Young Master" was no longer appropriate, so they simply changed their address of him to "Second Master".<sup>33</sup>

Xiao Chiye stood still under the eaves as Chen Yang and Gu Jin each stood to his left and right and helped him take off his coat. The maidservant waiting in attendance at the side presented a hot handkerchief to him, which he took to wipe his hands. Ding Tao hurriedly lifted the hanging screen for Xiao Chiye to enter.

Ever the tactful ones, Qiao Tianya and Fei Sheng promptly made to retreat, but Xiao Chiye asked, "Where's Hairigu?"

Fei Sheng cast a sideways glance at Shen Zechuan and answered only when he saw Shen Zechuan give his tacit consent. "To reply Second Master, he's at our Beiyuan military drill grounds." Taking his cue, he bowed to take the handkerchief from Xiao Chiye's hands. At the same time, he said, "Master has made arrangements for the Imperial Bodyguards to do a daily headcount to prevent them from running all over the place."

"Gu Jin," Xiao Chiye looked back and said, "Make a trip to the Beiyuan military drill grounds later and look for Hairigu."

Shen Zechuan was sitting right behind, so naturally, Fei Sheng would not speak out of turn and ask why. He bowed again to Xiao Chiye and withdrew with Qiao Tianya. As guards, they could not very well stand under the eaves and converse with each other with their master still inside, so the few of them simultaneously headed to the foot of the veranda at the side to discuss matters.

It was warm inside the room. As Xiao Chiye removed his blade and undressed, Shen Zechuan gazed at him from where he was seated. Xiao Chiye, having ridden his horse non-stop from the battlefield to Bianbo Camp, and from Bianbo Camp to Zhongbo, found it all worth it to see the expression in Shen Zechuan's eyes. He leaned over, his body completely blocking off the chair from view. "Losing weight now, are we?"

Shen Zechuan was still holding the brush. He caressed the smooth shaft of the brush with the pulp of his fingers and whispered back softly as if he could not understand his words, "Kissing, where?"

Xiao Chiye lifted a hand to pinch Shen Zechuan's chin to prevent him from shying away, then moved his head close and pressed him up in the chair for a kiss. When Shen Zechuan tilted his head up like this, he would reveal his bobbing Adam's apple as he absorbed all of Xiao Chiye's iciness and dissolved it into nothingness. Not wanting the brush anymore, he slid his hands up along Xiao Chiye's arms. At the same time, Xiao Chiye picked him up and wrapped them around Xiao Chiye's neck.

There was no consolation in a lover's kiss—that was a sentiment that could also be bestowed upon by others. Only the insatiable desire laid bare during moments in which they sought each other out was the real deal. This was a lick like no other between lovers. Xiao Chiye needed such a dependency that was both secretive and extreme. That was where he belonged; it was also his territory.

Shen Zechuan was burning up from the kiss. Xiao Chiye set him on the table and braced himself against the table with his arms to gaze at him with all the seriousness he could muster. It did not take long for the flush from the tips of Shen Zechuan's ears to spread rapidly to the corners of his eyes. He seemed as if he could not hold up against Xiao Chiye any longer; he could not even withstand such an invasive gaze. That was, to him, a different kind of... devastating seduction.

Both of them were evidently intimately familiar with one another. Even with their eyes closed, they could find each other's most sensitive spots. But at present, Shen Zechuan could still feel his heartstrings stirring from Xiao Chiye's tantalizing gaze. The quickening of his breath brought on tiny beads of sweat that trickled across his smooth, satiny back.

Xiao Chiye looked so very dangerous, as if he would ravage Shen Zechuan like a tempest once he was freed of the shackles holding him back. He needed Shen Zechuan way too much, but he was remarkably restrained. Desire surged like magma under thin ice. Through Xiao Chiye's eyes, Shen Zechuan sensed a love so doting and gripping it would physically hurt.

This was the change elicited by the suppression of desire.

Very slowly, Xiao Chiye kissed Shen Zechuan and reached his arm out to toss his outer robe into the chair. "I'm going to the bathhouse."

Shen Zechuan brushed off Xiao Chiye's fine sweat with his fingertip, then pulled away and blinked to motion for him to go on ahead.

By the time Xiao Chiye came out again, he had already changed into a clean set of attire. He was wiping his hair in the inner chamber when he saw a small box on the table. He opened it—it contained jades Yan Heru had sent over.

Outside, Chen Yang was talking to Shen Zechuan. “I have to return to Bianbo Camp three days later, but Master will be staying.”

Shen Zechuan seemed to be looking at the documents and was slow to answer. “The second month is right around the corner. Is the location to build the stables on Mount Luo already decided?”

Xiao Chiye picked up a piece of red jade and caressed it.

Chen Yang answered, “Yes. Once we reclaim Duanzhou, we can begin construction.”

Shen Zechuan said, “The new spears General Lu wants will be more or less ready at the end of the second month. When the time comes, transport it via the new bridle path to avoid taking another detour.”

The rest were all about trivial and tedious duties. As Xiao Chiye listened, he thought of the defensive battle a few days back.

Xiao Chiye was now leading the Imperial Army to guard Sha’er Camp in Jiang Sheng’s place. Guo Weili and Zhao Hui were both transferred back to their original camps, while Zuo Qianqiu and Lu Guangbai were jointly in charge of guarding Shayi Camp. Xiao Jiming’s intent with this arrangement was obvious—the Libei Armored Cavalry had given up on advancing and was now relying on the two men who were best at defenses to face Hasen’s attacks. Libei had completely switched from going on the offensive to being on the defensive.

Not only that, but Xiao Jiming had also made an adjustment to the battlegrounds. In the past, a change of general was equivalent to a change of battle line in which the Armored Cavalry in the same camp had to be swapped out as well. It was different now. Other than Zuo Qianqiu, who would remain in place, the other three commanding generals of the three camps would all be irregularly rotated. This gave Guo Weili a headache. Soldiers he was used to leading would no longer follow him, and there was even Zuo Qianqiu to keep an eye on him when he fought defensive battles. It was like his chain had shortened to the point it was strangling him by the throat; it made him uncomfortable all over. Xiao Chiye had to break away from the Imperial Army and learn to adapt and get along with the Armored Cavalry of the remaining two camps. This was even more so for Lu

Guangbai. He had to familiarize himself with the cavalry and reverse the way he thought as an infantry on the ground... Everyone seemed to have been tied up by the limbs as they crashed into one another, unaccustomed as they were to fighting battles in this way.

But the effect was evident.

Since the rotations were not in order, Hasen could not be sure who exactly his opponent was each time he launched an attack. Without Xiao Fangxu, the morale of the Libei Armored Cavalry was indeed low, but even so, the Biansha Cavalry did not get their wish. Hasen not only faced Zuo Qianqiu, who used to guard Tianfei Watchtower, but also had to guard against the Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops, who could conceal themselves in the snow.

Hasen had no idea what happened to Libei behind that wall, except that victory did not come as he expected, and both parties had instead fallen into some kind of unsettling stalemate. It was here Hasen finally got a taste of how formidable Xiao Jiming truly was. The new Prince of Libei was totally poles apart from Xiao Fangxu. He seemed to have cowered back and holed himself up, but in reality, he had delimited a battle line in the east, making it impossible for Hasen to press forward even the slightest.

Xiao Chiye put aside his distracting thoughts and closed the box.

Chen Yang had already taken his leave, and Shen Zechuan was still writing something. The rustle of ink and brush blended into the sound of the snow. Xiao Chiye did not go out to disturb him. He knew Shen Zechuan was in a rush to take down King Yi before the second month. What's more, Shen Zechuan still had to go to the study later to further discuss the deployment of troops. Xiao Chiye set down the handkerchief at the side and fell back onto the bedding.

He did not know if it was intentional or not.

But Shen Zechuan did not let the maidservants clean up the bed when he got up last night, and Xiao Chiye could still seem to catch a whiff of Shen Zechuan's scent as he rested his head on it. It relaxed him enough to dispel the heavy, depressing mood that had tagged along with him from the battlefields.

Xiao Chiye closed his eyes and fell asleep before his hair had even dried.

At the hour of you, Fei Sheng came to call Shen Zechuan, who extracted himself from his work and said, "open the windows. It's rather stuff.” As he rose to his feet, he remembered something else and added, “Never mind, wait for me at the door.”

Fei Sheng retreated out of the room with his head lowered.

Shen Zechuan’s nape was aching from having bent over the desk for too long. He lifted the hanging screen of the inner chamber and heard Xiao Chiye’s steady breathing when he entered.

Xiao Chiye lay on his side, with half of his face burrowed in the bedding. He was in such a deep sleep that it was apparent he had been exhausted for a long time. The injury on the back of his shoulder had yet to fully heal, and he seemed to feel nothing even though he was pressing down on it in his sleep. Shen Zechuan leaned over and gently pulled away the back of Xiao Chiye’s collar for a look. Afraid that Xiao Chiye might aggravate the injury by pressing his weight down on it like this, Shen Zechuan pushed him over so that he laid on his stomach.

Xiao Chiye, smothered as he was in the bedding, was still not fully awake, and it was in this way he remained sprawled on the bedding and murmured, “military intelligence report...”

Shen Zechuan leaned in closer to Xiao Chiye’s ear. “No military intelligence. Go back to sleep.”

Without opening his eyes, Xiao Chiye turned his face to the side to breathe. Shen Zechuan lowered his fingers to wipe his sweat for him very carefully, with exceedingly gentle movements. Xiao Chiye grabbed that hand of his and grasped it in his palm, refusing to let it go.

Shen Zechuan murmured admonishingly, “I’ll be back real soon, hm?”

Whenever he used to speak in this tone back in Qudu, chances were that he was miffed at Xiao Chiye. But now, the way he said it was so light and so gentle, like the caress of a soft feather. Not even hundreds of Yan Heru could hold a candle to him.

But Xiao Chiye did not let go.

Fei Sheng waited for quite a while at the door. Seeing as it was getting dark, he feared that Shen Zechuan would catch a cold should the snowstorm intensify at night if they delayed any further, so he hurried in and said softly across the hanging screen at the door, “Master, it’s almost time.”

After a moment’s pause, Shen Zechuan replied, “Go stop Yuanzhuo from heading over to the Zhou residence and tell him to come straight here instead. Then send someone to summon Zhou Gui and Chengfeng over.”

Fei Sheng could tell from his words that he meant to discuss official business at home tonight. He asked, "Then, shall I invite the various gentlemen to the side hall?"

Sitting at the edge of the bed without lighting up any lamps, Shen Zechuan said, "Let's hold the discussion just outside of here. We'll just keep our voices down."

Fei Sheng nodded and took his leave, aware that the operative phrase here was "keep our voices down". Hence, before the gentlemen made their way over, he called for his subordinates to quietly set up a screen in the hall, moving the venue of the discussion off to the side corner.

Zhou Gui and Kong Ling did not see Shen Zechuan when they came in. As they looked at each other, Fei Sheng hurriedly guided them behind the screen. Keeping his voice low, he said, "Master is in the inner chamber."

Kong Ling lowered his voice, "The Second Master too?"

Fei Sheng nodded slightly. As if still not reassured, he added, "He's sleeping."

They were in the middle of brewing tea when Qiao Tianya pushed Yao Wenyu in. Fei Sheng had laid out a rug inside earlier so that the wheelchair would not make any noise when it entered. As Kong Ling watched, he could not help but let loose a laugh, thinking Fei Sheng to be truly a genius.

Yao Wenyu did not inquire about Shen Zechuan's whereabouts after settling in. Handling the teacup with care, he said, "Shenwei's proclamation was published today. There should be activity from Fanzhou later on; I will have to trouble Your Excellency to keep a close eye on the matter."

The three of them did not have loud voices, so they were all rather at ease gathered here. Zhou Gui nodded his head in answer. "Fanzhou has now been surrounded. King Yi and Mount Luo have not come to an agreement, and the troops under the former are too weak to resist. My guess is that he will not put up a fight to the death, but he will definitely make use of the opportunity to bargain with us."

"It would be best not to have to deploy troops." As someone who had suffered the ravages of war, Kong Ling would rather resort to reason. "King Yi made a series of boasts to the citizens of Fanzhou during his rise to prominence, yet he has achieved not a single one of them to this day. He should also be aware of just how powerless he is to resist."

"The only concern is that the men under King Yi will not concede even if King Yi himself is willing to." Yao Wenyu thought about it and said,

“Fanzhou and Dengzhou, where King Yi is sitting, both have a major banditry problem, one that is even worse than it is in Chazhou. Then, there’s also interference from the brothels where Cuiqing and the likes are selling women from decent families; these people all know that surrendering is akin to a death sentence.”

Shen Zechuan raised his hands to cover Xiao Chiye’s ears as he listened to their discussion in the darkness.

Yao Wenyu was right; whether for official or private reasons, there was no way that Shen Zechuan would let off these bandits and brothels. These people were the root cause of the decay in Fanzhou and Dengzhou, and keeping them alive would mean retaining a scourge of calamity that would hinder the two prefectures’ progress, so Shen Zechuan would never go soft on them when he started killing them.

“What if we pretend to pardon them when our troops are at their gates?” Zhou Gui said, “Then make the arrests after the city gates are open?”

Kong Ling shook his head and said as he served the tea. “Have you ever considered that if they make use of the opportunity to incite the common folks of both prefectures, it will equate to tarnishing the Prefectural Lord’s reputation?”

Shen Zechuan was presently treading with caution everything he did. It was imperative they took Shen Zechuan’s reputation into consideration while striving to take over the world. In order to overwrite Shen Wei’s notoriety, every move they made from Chazhou onward had been conspicuously one of benevolence and magnanimity. That was why they had to have a justifiable reason for his deployment of troops into battle; there must be no involvement of any kind with the bandits. Otherwise, even if they occupied Zhongbo in the future, Shen Zechuan would not be able to establish a virtuous reputation for himself.

Shen Zechuan was listening to their conversation when there came the sound of footsteps beneath the eaves. Fei Sheng had gone to the kitchen to call for someone to brew the concoction, so how was Gao Zhongxiong supposed to know what was happening inside? He patted the snow off him and called out as he entered. “My greetings to Your Lordship, that proclamation—”

The three people who were off to the side turned their heads towards him in unison and shushed him.

Gao Zhongxiong was so freezing cold his cheeks had gone red. He immediately stopped talking and shrunk his neck back. He was still feeling trepidation when he saw Zhou Gui beckon to him, but seeing as none of the gentlemen said a word, he gingerly tiptoed over to them and bowed down to say in a very soft voice, "I'm here to submit my report to His Lordship."

Unsure how to go about explaining it, Kong Ling could only say, "Later. Why don't you take a seat first and have some tea?"

CHAPTER 195: MASTIFFS

Gao Zhongxiong did not dare to ask any further and sat at the side, all prim and proper. The freezing cold had gotten to him quite badly on his way here. It was gradually getting better now, with some sensation restored in those ears that had been frozen numb.

Seeing as Gao Zhongxiong's robe was still old, Zhou Gui said, "It's bitter cold in Cizhou. You're way too flimsy dressed."

Gao Zhongxiong looked a little embarrassed as he clenched the hem of his clothes and answered in a small, mosquito-like voice, "Yes... yes."

Kong Ling could see that something was up. "As someone in a yamen with limited funds,<sup>34</sup> you're in a far worse position than the others with lucrative posts. Money that passes through your hands are all bits and pieces of silver. What's more, you have only just arrived in Cizhou, and it isn't easy for you to settle down in a whole new place. If there's anything you need, don't hesitate to bring it up."

The show of concern put Gao Zhongxiong at ease. His eyes misted over, and he hurriedly stood up. "You have all shown me utmost solicitude, and His Lordship, too, has treated me with such tremendous kindness..."

Zhou Gui immediately waved his hand. "Take a seat. There's no one else here tonight; there's no need to be so formal."

Gao Zhongxiong had no wife, children, or relatives in Cizhou. No one dared to let him pick up the tab during the usual yamen's social functions either. By all logic, his monthly salary should have been sufficient. However, he dared not tell a soul that his money had all gone to finance Han Jin.

Last autumn, Shen Zechuan released Han Jin from prison and put him up at the side courtyard. Han Jin had a hard time in prison, and with adequate food practically guaranteed on his release, he ate and drank to his heart's content for quite an extended period of time. There were people in the courtyard taking care of his needs, and when he was back in the pink of health, a young male servant even came over to play with him. The lad took him along to throw dice and hold cricket fights, keeping him so entertained he abandoned himself to pleasure. In less than two months, he forgot all about returning to Qudu. Then he got addicted to gambling. Unable to remain in the courtyard, he started venturing outdoors with the lad, having the whale of his time drinking and having fun without a care in the world.

But there was only so much monthly budget Shen Zechuan allocated to Han Jin. Since he could not stop himself from gambling, he had to think of a way on his own. And so, he set his sights on Gao Zhongxiong again. He ran to Gao Zhongxiong's house almost every day, shouting "disloyal, turncoat slave" <sup>35</sup> as loud and clear as he possibly could and stood in Gao Zhongxiong's path, demanding money.

Gao Zhongxiong could do nothing about him, and he was embarrassingly low on funds, so how would he still have the money to buy winter clothes?

Inside the inner chamber, Shen Zechuan's fingertips had already gone numb from being grasped by Xiao Chye, although he was as perspicacious as ever as he listened to their conversation.

The wind had picked up again at night, sending the cotton-like snow dancing all over the sky and the wind chimes under the eaves tinkling ceaselessly. Fearing that the din would disrupt the discussion within, Gu Jin, who had just returned from Beiyuan military drill grounds, called for someone to take them down. As he swept away the snow from his hair, he saw Fei Sheng walk over to him from the walkway.

"Looking for the Second Master?" With medicine in hand, Fei Sheng motioned to the room with his chin. "He's resting. Master doesn't allow us to call for him. The journey has been hard on all of you."

"It's snowing so hard that just spurring on the horse alone is enough to be the death of me." Gu Jin had just gotten off his horse, and his ears had gone so numb from the biting cold wind that he could feel nothing in them. "Second Master hasn't had a decent night's sleep for half a month running."

Fei Sheng sighed.

Gu Jin made way for him. "Go on ahead. Don't hold the Prefectural Lord up from taking his medicine."

Before Fei Sheng entered the room, he said in a hushed tone, "I think everyone will be busy for quite a while, and there's no need for anyone to guard this place too. When Chen Yang and Qiao Tianya come over later, go to the duty room with them for a break. I'll get someone to serve snacks and hot tea. Just make do with these first to fill your tummies."

It was hard to say when Xiao Chiye would wake up, and when he did, he would no doubt want to discuss official business. They had been on the go for several days running, and they would not be able to withstand standing like a pole here under the eaves with the wind blowing. This was indeed very thoughtful of Fei Sheng. The duty room was just a stone's throw away from the courtyard, and they would be able to come over right away without any delay if they were called.

Accepting his kindness, Gu Jin cupped his fists to say his thanks and held up the hanging screen for him.

Shen Zechuan did not let them light up the lamps, so Fei Sheng naturally did not carry one. He entered with the tray in his hands and ladled out the medicine into a porcelain bowl. They were still speaking softly in the outer room at a volume Shen Zechuan could hear. Shen Zechuan took the spoon with the hand he could move and drank it slowly.

Fei Sheng tried his best not to make a sound, but Xiao Chiye still woke up.

With brows furrowed, Xiao Chiye took a moment to orient himself before he sat up in one swift move. His black shadow abruptly enveloped Shen Zechuan, giving Fei Sheng a fright. Xiao Chiye was still drowsy from his sleep. After a moment of silence, he looked at Shen Zechuan and asked in a hoarse voice, "What time is it now?"

Shen Zechuan set his spoon down and looked at Fei Sheng.

"Second Master, it should be the hour of hai now," Fei Sheng answered.

To Xiao Chiye's surprise, he had slept for almost six hours, and he was still holding onto Shen Zechuan's hand. As he lowered his head, he rubbed his nape with his other hand and asked, "Is Gu Jin back?"

Fei Sheng took Shen Zechuan's medicine bowl and answered, "Just did. They are all currently in the duty room. If Second Master wants to call for them, I'll get someone to summon them."

"Do it." Xiao Chiye said right at once. "Tell them to go over to the side hall. I'll be there in a while."

On hearing the sound of talking in the inner chamber, those outside stopped conversing. Fei Sheng stepped out with the empty bowl, signaled to the various gentlemen with his eyes, and made his way out under the hanging screen to get someone to summon Chen Yang and the rest over.

Shen Zechuan moved his numbed fingers that had reddened from Xiao Chiye's grip. At the same time Xiao Chiye put on his outer robe, he asked, "Have you been sitting here all this while?"

All Shen Zechuan could feel in his mouth was the bitterness of the medicine. He was still thinking over the matters in Fanzhou, so he half-heartedly replied, “been sitting until my waist ached.”

Xiao Chiye poured himself a cup of cooled tea and held it in his mouth as he dressed himself quickly. When he saw Shen Zechuan stand up, he stood in Shen Zechuan’s path, refusing to let him leave. As Shen Zechuan looked at him questioningly with raised eyebrows, Xiao Chiye pinched the latter’s chin and fed him the tea, mouth to mouth, taking away that lingering bitterness.

Shen Zechuan was not tall enough to reach up to Xiao Chiye to begin with, and Xiao Chiye did not lower his head when he held Shen Zechuan’s chin, so Shen Zechuan could only stand on tiptoe. Xiao Chiye led Shen Zechuan into his arms, and Shen Zechuan gripped Xiao Chiye’s sleeves as Xiao Chiye created such havoc in his mouth that Shen Zechuan felt weak all over. Unable to hold in the tea and sensing that it was about to spill, Shen Zechuan had no choice but to swallow it down hastily, only to choke on it and burst out into fits of coughing.

Those in the outer room had already drunk their fill of tea. Listening to the coughs, Zhou Gui was worried that Shen Zechuan had caught another cold. He was about to voice his concern after a moment when Kong Ling interrupted him.

“The ground heating system is making this room too warm. I’ll push Yuanzhuo to the door to get some air.”

Yao Wenyu wrapped his overcoat around himself and said, “Then I shall have to trouble Mister Chengfeng.”

They whisked Zhou Gui outside and stood under the eaves for less than an incense time<sup>36</sup> when they saw Xiao Chiye lift the hanging screen and step out. The group bowed in obeisances and greeted, “Second Master.”

Xiao Chiye’s chin was red from being bumped against. Seeing as Chen Yang and the rest had arrived, he returned the greeting and said, “I’ve been busy on the road these few days and inadvertently ended up holding all of you back from your discussions. I’m truly sorry.”

“Second Master has been working day and night tirelessly on the battlegrounds. It’s time you take a rest.”

They bowed once more to Xiao Chiye. Without further ado, Xiao Chiye stepped away and led his men over to the side hall.

Zhou Gui felt cold standing in the same place. He swept a glance around the rest and asked in bafflement, "Shall we go in?"

Yao Wenyu sighed softly at Zhou Gui, but he could not help but smile as he lifted his hand in a gesture and replied, "Let's go in. Your Excellency, you first."

While Cizhou was having discussions through the night, Fanzhou had already received the proclamation.

This was not the first time King Yi had received a denunciation-cum-declaration of war from Cizhou, but the few times it happened last year had all been all talk and no action. Shen Zechuan did not have the intention to mobilize his troops to fight him, so he took the proclamation this time as an empty threat too and did not think much of it.

Fanzhou's yamen had been expanded and renovated anew; King Yi housed all the gold, silver, and treasures he plundered from the two prefectures here and called it the state treasury. He claimed to be saving them to purchase grains and lands after spring, but in reality, he had appropriated them for himself and was using it to fund his debauchery.

With the snow as heavy as it was this year, the number of common folks from the two prefectures who either starved or froze to death was beyond measure. A few days ago, the residential dwellings in multiple locations had also collapsed and crushed even more people to death. The lower ranks reported this to King Yi, but he had turned a deaf ear to them all and continued to indulge in the company of women.<sup>37</sup>

A bunch of those who had stood by King Yi's side from the very beginning of his revolt had been slaughtered in the fight for crop fields, and the majority of people who still remained were bandits from the two prefectures. When King Yi was establishing his position, he had once promised the scholars of both prefectures that he would change the current situation of the prefectures and restore the livelihoods of its people. But he wielded his blade the moment he took control over the yamen and slain the scholars who remonstrated against him.

Many of the commoners of the two prefectures, finding themselves in a perilous situation, attempted to flee under cover of the snow, but they were executed on the spot by the soldiers under King Yi's command. Even if someone was brought back alive, they would be branded with a mark on the chest and set aside in Fanzhou's prison as "animals" for King Yi's winter hunts.

It was after the third night watch at midnight, and King Yi, with his potbelly, lay on satin cushions drinking himself drunk under the music of reed pipes. He lifted his golden cup high and said, "Fill it up!"

Two scantily clad women on both sides of him poured the wine for him. King Yi held his arm up and muttered, "Keep pouring! Keep pouring!"

The red pomegranate-like wine spilled over the rim of the cup, and the woman twisted aside to cover her face seemingly bashfully as King Yi roared with unbridled laughter. King Yi had long lost his sense of propriety and was now exposing himself with a public display of his degenerate, gluttonous self. Due to his obesity, he had difficulty moving, and he even had to open his arms as wide as he could to hug the women by his sides.

Cuiqing was sitting in the seat to the bottom left of King Yi. She had a new face with dashing looks holding her pipe for her. As she smoked, her eyes darted down below his waist. "I escaped death by the skin of my teeth and fled back from Dunzhou. What will Your Highness reward me with? I think this one will do. He is going to be incredible after a period of training from me."

This man was a handsome one with an unpowdered face, broad shoulders, and a narrow waist. Kneeling before Cuiqing, he raised his head to look up at her upon hearing her. The expression in his eyes was sultry and frank, and it was so titillating that it sent an electrifying tingle through Cuiqing's body and made her heart itch.

King Yi, being too obese, needed the woman serving him to help him turn his head. He cast a glance at that man and sneered. "You have got a good eye. Do you know who this is?"

Cuiqing lifted a foot to step on the man's chest, feeling the solidness underneath. "I've never seen such a character... Honey dear, would you like to leave with me?"

King Yi roared with laughter and hissed maliciously, "His surname is Huo. He's Huo Lingyun, the eldest, lawful son of Huo Qing, the Garrison Troops Commander of Dengzhou who was bitten to death by dogs. Back then, when I wanted to take over Dengzhou as its master, Huo Qing would rather die than yield and killed my second younger brother during the battle. After his capture, I had him tortured for seven days and seven nights before dumping him at the hunting grounds to let the dogs tear him to pieces!"

Cuiqing uttered an “oh, my” in surprise and moved in to scrutinize Huo Lingyun. With a cackle, she said, “Then Your Highness is truly a magnanimous one to have kept him by your side and raised him to be so well-built.”

“I initially wanted to kill him,” King Yi said contemptuously. “He looks the part of a gentleman, but he’s as timid as a mouse. When he saw his old man being eaten by the dogs, he immediately kneeled down to hug my thighs and begged me to spare his life. For that, he was even willing to slave like an ox or a horse for me, so I kept him by my side as a dog.”

Cuiqing started feeling up Huo Lingyun, and Huo Lingyun showed her an ingratiating smile. She tenderly gave him a push and said, “Good dog, show me exactly how obedient you are.”

King Yi tossed aside his golden cup and said, “There is nothing he can’t do, and he holds up pretty well. I sent him over to Chief Fang for seven or eight days to have fun with, and he was still alive when he returned.”

The expression on Cuiqing’s face frosted over, “Old Fang the Ninth is already so advanced in age, and yet he’s still so despicable! He can’t even control his bowels anymore, yet he still wants to vie with me over a man! Baby, look at me. I’m much better looking than Old Fang. It must have been hard on you serving an old macaque like him.”

Huo Lingyun’s chest heaved. He was in a partial state of undress, with his clothes secured around his waist. He was all docile and obedient as Cuiqing came pressing in towards him. The interior of this hall was already a lewd scene, made even more obscene by the whiny moan Cuiqing let loose at being fondled by Huo Lingyun. She fell back onto the cushion and motioned for him to continue.

King Yi, having over-indulged in carnal pleasures, was presently only bothered with drinking his wine. He loved wine as he did his life, and he drank himself bloated in this rowdy ruckus as he rested upon the tender, fragrant bodies of the women serving him while they massaged his shoulders and kneaded his legs. His snores boomed like thunder.

The snow outside the hall fell for half the night, and the people inside were all dead asleep by the time it was almost dawn.

King Yi, his arms spread out, exhaled stale air that reeked of wine. Huo Lingyun wiped down his body and cleaned up the sweat. He looked at King Yi a short distance away from him amidst the undulating snores, then soundlessly stepped over the others to make his way over to squat down next to King Yi's pillow.

King Yi did not like to bring his guards along when he was making merry. He feared death, so the guards, armed with their blades, all had to stand outside the doors. Huo Lingyun had served as a plaything under King Yi's command for an entire six months, suffering all kinds of humiliation imaginable before he managed to get such an opportunity.

He looked at King Yi as if he was looking at those dogs that had bitten his father to death.

Three soft knocks sounded, right outside the door.

And that was when Huo Lingyun knew that the matter had been done. He did not stand up, however; instead, he patted King Yi's cheek at the same time he picked up the cushion.

King Yi's snores were cut short in his throat. He reached out a hand to brush away that empty golden cup, and as the cup clattered noisily to the floor, he opened his eyes. On seeing Huo Lingyun, he broke out in a cold sweat and reproved in a stern voice, "Get away—"

Huo Lingyun had already burst into action. He ruthlessly held down the cushion over King Yi's head. King Yi struggled violently, and the flailing of his thick limbs startled the others in the hall awake. Huo Lingyun held down that pasty flesh with pudgy rolls of fat; under the cushion, King Yi was still gasping for breath.

Cuiqing woke up, but she did not realize what was happening around her.

The terrified King Yi shouted in a muffled voice in between heavy breathing, "Men, men, save me—!"

Huo Lingyun started laughing even as King Yi was struggling. He suddenly released his grip, abandoning his attempt to smother the latter. King Yi tried to scramble up in a panic from under his hands, but he was too fat, and he sank into the cushion, shouting himself hoarse, "Men! Come quick!"

Huo Lingyun touched something from the bunched clothes around his waist. He followed after King Yi.

King Yi crawled on the ground naked like a maggot, gradually coming to a realization amidst his shouts. It was as if the guards outside the door were dead—they were indeed dead.

King Yi started to cry. He moved his obese body with stacks and rolls of fat and prostrated himself at Huo Lingyun's feet. "Ling, Lingyun!" He reached out to pull over a woman and shoved her towards Huo Lingyun. "Don't kill me, and I'll give you Fanzhou. I'll give you everything t-that's mine! I'll even give you the title of King Yi too!"

With his chest heaving, Huo Lingyun bent his head down and yanked King Yi by the hair to drag him towards himself. King Yi did not understand how the situation could have changed so abruptly. Everyone from top to bottom in Fanzhou was still at his command before he had fallen asleep. He kicked out his legs and squealed loudly like a pig being slaughtered.

It finally hit Cuiqing what was happening. She fumbled for her clothing in a fluster. Seeing Huo Lingyun dragging King Yi towards herself, she hurriedly shook her head. "It has nothing to do with me! Nothing to do—"

A blast rang out at this instant, and the thunderous sound of something blowing up on impact roared in Cuiqing's ears and made her ears buzz. She cried out involuntarily, her eyes wide opened as she froze in place, stupefied, and with a face splattered full of red and white filth.

The area between Huo Lingyun's thumb and the index finger was hurting intensely from the recoil of the bronze gun.<sup>38</sup> The burning sensation thrilled him. King Yi's head was just like a watermelon being trampled into pulp.

Deadly silence descended upon the hall, and then Cuiqing suddenly shrieked out loud and crawled on all fours like a madwoman. Clutching her clothes, she ran barefoot across the hall and lunged at the doors. The doors opened, but Cuiqing stepped back and fell on her buttocks, her eyes on the doorway where there were firearms everywhere.

"You abducted women for him." Huo Lingyun stood in the gloomy darkness and sent the splattered gore from King Yi into his mouth. He promptly spat it out. As he stared at Cuiqing, he said in an icy voice, "You even reared mastiffs you held in captive for him."

Cuiqing shook her head and covered her body as she scooted across the floor. She heard the sound of barking and saw those mastiffs boring their way out between the gaps of the humans' legs.

Huo Lingyun stepped on King Yi's corpse and said as though he was sizing up meat on the chopping board, "All of you ought to get a taste of it."

Cuiqing's eyes widened. She wanted to run, but she had gone weak in the knees. She could only watch helplessly as those mastiffs broke free of their chains and pounced on her at the same time she screamed uncontrollably.

Under the sound of the mastiffs tearing and devouring, Huo Lingyun draped his wide-sleeved robe over his shoulders. He picked up the proclamation that King Yi had flung away and promptly proceeded to crumple it.

NOTICE:

New updated Character Chart from the QJJ Simplified CN Physical Copy!
Check out the Character Glossary!

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin
Footnotes

- 1.
2. Cat's cradle, a game which involves making string figures with the hands.
3. 寒衣节 Hanyi Festival, or literally winter clothing festival, which is also called the ancestor worship festival, falls on the first day of the tenth lunar month, where winter clothes made of paper or cloth are burned in memory of the deceased ancestors. It also marks the arrival of the severe cold winter.
4. 清谈 Qingtan is a Chinese philosophical movement and social practice among political and intellectual elites where the literati engaged in highly sophisticated intellectual and philosophical discussions on lofty and non-mundane matters.

5.

6. 道袍 Daopao; not to be confused with a Daoist priest robe. This was a common robe typically worn by men in the Ming Dynasty.

7.

- 8.
9. 襕衫 Lanshan, a Chinese traditional hanfu made especially for scholars
10. 万物不(无)以生将恐灭 from Daodejing (道德经) by Laozi (Lao-tzu, 老子), also known as the founder of philosophical Daoism.
11. 道 “the Way”, or the path, is a conceptual term used by the school of thoughts, although it has different connotations for Confucianism, Daoism, and Buddhism. Daoism embraces nature. The Way, or Dao, according to Laozi and Daoists, is the natural order of the universe, and Daoism emphasizes doing what is natural and “going with the flow” in accordance with the Way, with the aim of becoming one, or in harmony, with nature.
12. The concept of “gentleman” or “man of honor” (junzi, 君子) in Confucianism (a different philosophical stance from Daoism), is a virtuous man who is noble in character and an exemplar for his conducts, morals, principles, etc.
13. 无为而治, 道法自然 Specifically, “govern not by interfering in all that goes against nature, for the Way models itself on what is natural.” i.e., man should observe the law of nature and go with the flow. From Daodejing (道德经) by Laozi (老子).

14. Full line 天下有道，以道殉身；天下无道，以身殉道。(未闻以道殉乎人者也。) Specifically, “when the Way prevails in the empire, it goes where one’s person goes; when the Way is eclipsed, one’s person goes where the Way has gone. (I have not heard of one’s Way being dependent on their manifestation in other men).” i.e., One must live or die with his principles, acting for himself, not with regard to other men. The Way here refers to one’s principles. Contrary to Laozi, Mencius (or Mengzi, 孟子) subscribed to the Confucius school of thoughts, which regards the Way, or dao, as the way human beings ought to behave with principles and propriety in society and government. (To put it simply :V)
15. 斩首 the word here used is decapitated or beheaded, although it also implied the slaying of the Xiao Fangxu in this context, leaving the Libei Armored Cavalry headless, or without a leader.

- 16.
17. 鬼头 kind of carving on the hilt of the blade. See examples here or here

18.

19. 垛口 duokou, or crenels, empty space between two merlons

20.

21. Specifically 悬眼 Xuanyan, a loophole opened at the base of a parapet in-between two crenels.

22.

23. 鬼头刀 literally ghost-headed blade. It's a kind of blade used for beheading people sentenced to death in old times.

單梢砲

24.

25. 单梢炮 Single-component catapults, or one-branch trebuchet

26. 丈 zhang; a measure of length, 1 zhang = ten Chinese feet (3.3m)

27. Specifically a changdao, or a two-handed, single-edged Chinese sword.

28.

29. Snowtrooper Lu Guangbai.

Thanks Jia for suggesting.

30. 地龙 dilong, an ancient method of warming with an indoor ground heating system, built by concreting circular flue underground where heat would flow from a fire pit outside through the channels to the entire room and raise the temperature indoors.

31. 军屯 military troops (mostly in border regions) who carry out garrison duties as well as farm crops to supply the border garrisons with grains

32. Tiger, also refers to an extraordinary man or hero. Tiger is a symbol of ferocity, agility, and courage.

33. 细刀, literally slim blade, although it may also refer to the miaodao (苗刀, image below)

34. 守夜 shouye, or 守岁 shousui, the tradition of staying awake until midnight on the eve of Chinese New year. It is said that if the children stayed up late, their parents would live a longer life in return.

35. 伤筋动骨一百天 literally, takes a hundred days for the bones to knit and for the tendons to heal.

36. 水(至)清则无鱼 literally, water which is too clean has no(/few) fish, i.e., one should not demand absolute purity, you cannot expect everyone to be squeaky clean.

37.

38. 如意 ruyi, an ancient auspicious symbol that served as a ceremonial scepter or a symbol of power, often given as gifts because of the good wishes they implied.

39. Fengshui, or the art of geomancy, is the traditional Chinese practice of selecting auspicious sites for buildings and tombs, believed to have a vital influence on the fortune of a family.

40. 及冠 a man's 20th birthday, i.e., coming of age at 20 for a male.

41. 家生子 Children of domestic servants or slaves. These children were also born in the household and also served as servants and slaves in the same household.
42. 名帖 (also 拜帖), a visitation card (or name card) written on paper or wood used by officials, nobles or distinguished people to notify the other party of their visit. It would usually indicate his name, position, and so on. It's like a name card in the modern world.
43. In this context, the “young master” would be Xiao Xun, since his father is now the “master” of the household, so it makes sense to call Xiao Chiye the second master (after Xiao Jiming) as calling Xiao Chiye young master would make it seem like he's Xiao Jiming's son instead.
44. 清水衙门 government office with low receipts or expenditures and hence little or no chance of corruption.
45. 三姓家奴 literally, a slave with three surnames. The term originates from the Romance of the Three Kingdoms 《三国演义》 and refers specifically to Lu Bu. It's used mockingly to refer to capricious, disloyal and unrighteous people who serve traitors.
46. 一炷香 the time an incense stick takes to burn. Some sources suggest one stick takes 30 minutes or one hour, but it really depends on a variety of factors (the environment, wind, length of the stick, etc).
47. 温柔乡 land of warmth and tenderness, or a place where a man can find solace in feminine charms, such as a brothel, etc.

火銃

48.

49.

50. 铜火铳 Huochong, or blunderbuss (according to baidu), or sometimes known as a hand cannon, is a tube-like projection firearm used as a gun. The Huochong gun was an important invention as the Ming Dynasty was creating weapons to defend themselves from attackers.

CHAPTER 196: OLD MAN

After breakfast the next day, Xiao Chiye put on his heavy armor with the intent to head over to the Beiyuan hunting grounds. Shen Zechuan slept little these few days, and it was only until last night that he got a good night's sleep, so much that he was still a tad lethargic when he stood under the eaves to see Xiao Chiye off.

The snow had ceased today, and the sun shone so brightly the courtyard was practically glittering. Xiao Chiye let Meng perch on him and turned back to talk to Shen Zechuan, only to see Shen Zechuan standing sleepily in front of the door with an unhappy expression.

"When will you be back?" Shen Zechuan asked.

Xiao Chiye undid the chain on Meng's talons, and Meng promptly made to pounce on Shen Zechuan. Xiao Chiye held it down and answered, "I'll try my best to return earlier. If anything's the matter, send someone to call for me."

Being bathed in the sunlight also made Shen Zechuan sparkle. Avoiding the rays, he squinted his expressive eyes and called out, "A—Ye."

Xiao Chiye made to kiss this little baddie, startling Shen Zechuan. Capitalizing on his height advantage, Xiao Chiye raised his arm against the door frame and, when Shen Zechuan stepped back, led him back with a hand. The hanging screen covered the back of his head, although Xiao Chiye did not bother with moving it out of the way.

Shen Zechuan took a kiss to the mouth.

Chen Yang, busy mulling over the escort tasks they were about to return to Bianbo Camp to make arrangements for, was not paying attention to the movement on the other end. Gu Jin saw the hanging screen swing, and then both men were gone. He took off his gloves and said, "The Prefectural Lord and Master..."

Unable to find the right words, Gu Jin could only look at Chen Yang and hinted at the latter with his eyes.

Chen Yang knew Gu Jin had been alarmed by Shen Zechuan's discussions in the hall last night, so he closed the book and looked over too. After watching for a moment, he said, "Master has had it rough fighting battles on the battlefields after what happened with the former Prince of Libei. He may seem fine now, but I fear his heart is still healing like the wound on his back... it's a good thing for them to stick together to each other like glue."

After that specific night, many people wanted to baby Xiao Chiye. They kept away from the heavy snow as much as they could and watched Xiao Chiye cautiously, as if Xiao Chiye had already lost his strength and was now no more than a fragile vase. Shen Zechuan was just the opposite. He said not a single word of consolation to Xiao Chiye, but the expression in his eyes spoke volumes of his dependence on Xiao Chiye. It was as if he would resent the weather for being cold and fault the medicine for being bitter if he so much as stepped away from Xiao Chiye by even half a step. In fact, Shen Zechuan was revealing another layer of meaning behind his extreme reliance on Xiao Chiye, and that was, Xiao Chiye was strong.

Xiao Chiye did not need to be treated as porcelain. He was iron. He was steel.

He was also Shen Zechuan's Hongyan Mountains.

And this was how Xiao Chiye responded to him too.

Before the discussion of official affairs, Shen Zechuan had Fei Sheng summon Gao Zhongxiong, who stood before the study waiting for Shen Zechuan. When Shen Zechuan arrived, he had him dispense with the formalities. "I had someone take your measurements last night. The winter clothes will be delivered to your residence in a few days. It's cold at present. Do you still have charcoal fire in your house?"

Gao Zhongxiong was formerly an adviser to Han Jin. When he first came to Cizhou, he knew Shen Zechuan would not employ him, and that was why he had taken such an ill-advised step. It was only because he came highly recommended by Yao Wenyu that he could get a job in the yamen. But Shen Zechuan rarely spoke to him, and this, in turn, made Gao Zhongxiong somewhat terrified to be speaking to him now.

Whenever Gao Zhongxiong was nervous, he would sweat and stutter—an unfortunate conditioned effect of being ridiculed too much when he was in Dancheng. He wiped away the beads of sweat, his chin lowered so low it was about to jab into his chest as he muttered, "It's as Your Lordship admonished. Your Lord, Lordship..."

The advisors in the room were all already in place. Kong Ling was presently standing under the eaves waiting for Shen Zechuan to enter. Gao Zhongxiong knew he was clumsy with words, and so he was even more worked up with anxiety as he sweated buckets and tried to finish his sentence.

Shen Zechuan remembered how bold and spirited Gao Zhongxiong had been when he kneeled in the heavy rain a year ago to denounce the eunuch faction, so he listened in all seriousness for him to finish saying his piece before he added, “You are not married at present. If the monthly salary from the yamen is insufficient, just let the local government know.”

Gao Zhongxiong initially thought Shen Zechuan detested him and that it was only on Yao Wenyu’s account that Shen Zechuan did not voice it out. He did not expect Shen Zechuan to be so amicable today. For a moment, his emotions got the better of him, and he choked out a sob, “It’s all thanks to the grace and kindness of the Prefectural Lord that I could have a job in the yamen. Moreover, the salary is issued on time every month. How c-can I take more?”

With even more gentleness, Shen Zechuan said, “You are also a man of letters in my employ; it will be ill-advised for you to keep on belittling yourself anymore.”

A multitude of emotions welled up in Gao Zhongxiong’s heart as he wiped his tears. Shen Zechuan was willing to use him and even respected him. As the saying went, a gentleman would die for the one who understood and appreciated him on his own merits. He was truly willing to serve under Shen Zechuan. He was about to voice some words of gratitude, but Shen Zechuan raised his hand to stop him and gestured for him to keep up pace as they headed for the study.

Cizhou initially planned to borrow a general for their mobilization of troops to Fanzhou this time, but seeing as King Yi had long-standing public resentment stacked against him and that Fanzhou was internally empty, Shen Zechuan did not borrow one from the Libei Armored Cavalry. Instead, he appointed the commander of the Cizhou Garrison Troops, Yin Chang.

This Yin Chang was a high-ranking military officer of the Cizhou Garrison Troops before the defeat of the Zhongbo troops. After its commander died in battle, Zhou Gui promoted him to the post. Before Shen Zechuan came to Cizhou, Yin Chang was a one-man army commander.

This man was about the same age as Ji Gang. He was an avid drinker with a full beard, and he hated taking a bath the most in life. For this reason, he appeared particularly unkempt. He could be considered to be kindred spirits with Qiao Tianya. Before Qiao Tianya quit drinking, they often drank together.

Looking hesitant, Kong Ling said, "Yin Chang is advanced in age, and he has not stepped into the battlefield for several years. I'm afraid he is not up to the task if he's sent into battle."

Surprisingly enough, Zhou Gui did not agree this time. "A veteran general has the advantages of a veteran general. If the Prefectural Lord is willing to assign him to deploy troops, he will definitely do his best."

"Other than Yin Chang," Shen Zechuan unexpectedly piped up, "Fei Sheng will also tag along during the deployment of troops to Fanzhou this time."

Yao Wenyu's wide sleeves bulged from the crouching cat underneath. He covered it with his hand and said, "Now that the bridle paths are accessible, the military provisions can be supplied by both Cizhou and Chazhou. It takes only one day to reach Fanzhou."

"That's right." Shen Zechuan set his fan on his lap. He looked at the others. "Time is of the essence now. It's imperative we obtain Fanzhou and Dengzhou. We will have to fight a quick battle for this one."

A chorus of acknowledgement in the affirmative rose, and with that, everyone began to discuss in hushed tones about the arrangements to be made for filling in the vacancies in Fanzhou and Dengzhou's yamen when the time came.

Yin Chang deployed his troops as he was commanded to, while Fei Sheng went along for the ride with forty Imperial Bodyguards as part of the entourage.

Fei Sheng had only met Yin Chang just before setting off. This commander's hair was even whiter than Ji Gang's. He was not at all tall, and he had a drunkard's nose that was a bright shade of red. Fei Sheng paid his obeisances to Yin Chang before the horse, although the latter seemed to have yet to sober up from his inebriation as he mumbled, "Rise."

Fei Sheng had specially taken a leaf out of Qiao Tianya's book and brought along some fine wine to show his respect to Yin Chang. Yin Chang opened it up for a sniff and shouted out "awesome" in a voice so booming that Fei Sheng nearly lost his grip on the reins from the force of it.

Seeing as Yin Chang was about to drink the wine now, Fei Sheng hurriedly raised his hands to stop him. With an apologetic smile, he said,

“Elder Yin, please hold on. This wine is strong, and it’d be hard to travel if you’re drunk. Let’s wait for us to return in triumph, and I shall play host and drink with you into oblivion!”

Yin Chang twitched his nose. While Fei Sheng was talking, he had already taken several consecutive gulps of the wine as though he was starving. The wine relaxed him all over, making his nose even redder. He breathed out several puffs of hot air and patted Fei Sheng heavily on the shoulder. Loudly, he said, “Lad, there’s no need for you to worry. I’ve traversed Zhongbo for over ten years, and I can find my way around even with my eyes closed! This wine sobers me up the more I drink it; a great perk-me-up for the journey!”

Fei Sheng estimated Yin Chang’s age. He was pretty tempted to leave right now had this battle not been to take down Fanzhou—Which part of this senile old man looks like he can fight a battle?! Although this was what he was thinking deep down, he still said with a smile, “Sure thing, I’m at your command this trip.” He led the horse over to Yin Chang and asked, “Shall I help you up the horse?”

Yin Chang tied the wine bag<sup>28</sup> to his waist, patted it, and grinned mischievously at Fei Sheng. “Heh heh, just you watch. I’ll get on myself—”

“Whoa.” Seeing Yin Chang’s foot slip off the saddle, the sharp-eyed Fei Sheng deftly supported the old man and hastened to say, “Steady there, man!”

Fei Sheng, in holding Yin Chang, realized that this old man boasted a pair of thick, sturdy legs that weighed a ton. He helped Yin Chang onto his horse, finding this old man to be quite the character; who knows, maybe he was truly capable. But not long after, Yin Chang felt sleepy on his horse and almost slid off the back of the horse numerous times. It was all thanks to Fei Sheng for having someone keep an eye on him that he did not tumble off.

Cizhou was not that far away from Fanzhou. It was just a two-day journey or so, yet Fei Sheng was on tenterhooks the entire way, fearing that the commanding general would first fall to his death before they had even made it to Fanzhou. Their journey was daunting but uneventful, and they finally arrived at their destination. After setting up camp, Fei Sheng waited for Yin Chang to make military plans for the siege. But never in his wildest imagination would he expect this old man to lie down and fall asleep the moment he entered the tent. In no time, his snores reverberated throughout the tent like claps of thunder, and no amount of noise they made in their attempts to wake him up could stir him.

Fei Sheng stood outside of the tent and looked all around him. All the soldiers from the Cizhou Garrison Troops were new recruits; Yin Chang had not even arranged for a night patrol squad, and as such, they were all stumbling about like fools without so much a dignified air to them.

The hell they gonna fight this damn battle?

Fei Sheng spat, sorely tempted to write a letter to Shen Zechuan right there and then. In the end, the Imperial Bodyguards could only stand in for them and conduct the night patrol themselves. Fei Sheng guarded the camp until the day broke. Both of his eyes were bloodshot as he watched Yin Chang step out of his tent with renewed vigor. He forced a smile on his stiff, frozen face.

“Elder Yin, you sure had a good sleep, huh?” Fei Sheng rubbed his hands and feet together. “So, when do you think we should lay siege to the city?”

Yin Chang sat down and poured wine from the wine bag, although he only drank two small cups. “No rush. No rush.”

But the command Fei Sheng had received was to fight a quick battle, so he said, “There has been no wind or snow for the past few days. If we miss the opportunity, the battle will be much harder to fight.”

Yin Chang sipped the wine and looked in Fanzhou’s direction. His beard shook as he smacked his lips to savor the wine. “Whatcha’ in such a rush for? I don’t think it’s time yet.”

Fei Sheng guessed that this old man was afraid to fight battles. The man called Yin Chang did not exist in the Imperial Bodyguard’s records, and when Fei Sheng had been gathering intelligence and taking records, he had flipped through Cizhou’s archives; Yin Chang did not have any meritorious achievements prior to the case of the troops’ defeat. The reason he could be promoted to the position of commander was because the commanders of the Cizhou garrison troops were all dead. That, and the fact that he had the fortune to meet a nice fella like Zhou Gui who promoted him on the basis of his seniority.

Yin Chang had no sense of presence even after he was promoted to commander. He was drinking when Zhou Gui and Kong Ling reclaimed the wastelands, and he was still drinking when the bandits of Mount Luo led by Lei Jingzhe harassed Cizhou time and time again. Even when the Cizhou garrison troops had been re-established, he still seemed like an ornament merely there for show; he had never played a role in any capacity at all.

Shen Zechuan's decision to deploy Yin Chang to war this time was because Cizhou did indeed lack generals, along with the fact that Fanzhou was easy to take down—there was nothing of difficulty for him to contend with. The Cizhou garrison troops needed an opportunity to stand on their own feet, and this was a good chance, for it did not require too powerful a commanding general to lead. All he needed to do was to go with the flow and capture Fanzhou when the right opportunity arose, and that would have sufficed.

As Fei Sheng thought things over, he saw Yin Chang sit down opposite him, kick off his boots, and start to scratch a foot. Fei Sheng wanted to speak up, but was too overwhelmed by the stench of the old man's feet to say a word. He hurriedly stood up and cupped his fists towards Yin Chang before running off to the side for some fresh air.

Yin Chang wiggled his toes and picked the crevices clean. He had gone without bathing for almost two months now, and even he himself could no longer stand his own stench as he held his foot and muttered to himself.

Hairigu was presently staying at the Beiyuan military drill grounds; Shen Zechuan had left all the Scorpions here. Initially, the Scorpions did not get along with the Cizhou garrison troops and were constantly subjected to verbal attacks. It was only after the Imperial Bodyguards mediated that both sides did not come to blows.

Hairigu had only just finished cleaning himself up from showering bare-back despite it being such a cold day today. On his way back from the well, he saw the gates of the camp open.

Dark and dreary suits of heavy armor swept in, stomping over the mud concealed beneath the thin snow and sending them splattering and splashing all over Hairigu when they passed by him. He cursed under his breath and wiped his face, only to see that the horse at the head had already turned around and was presently staring at him.

Hairigu recognized Lang Tao Xue Jin. He raised the wooden basin in his hand, toeing the line as he greeted, "hello, Second Master."

Xiao Chiye was so heavily armored up that not even his eyes were revealed. He cut an overwhelmingly intimidating figure with his tall, strapping stature on horseback. Lang Tao Xue Jin kept closing in towards Hairigu, leaving the latter with no choice but to raise his head to look at Xiao Chiye.

“The Prefectural Lord said to keep me.” Hairigu was still wearing his cloth shoes like slippers, with heels treading down on the backs. He scanned the surrounding Libei Armored Cavalry, who was eyeing him menacingly, and looked at Xiao Chiye again. “... I think he’s right.”

“I’ll give you the horses today,” Xiao Chiye’s voice was low and deep. “Bring your soldiers to the military drill grounds.”

Hairigu understood what Xiao Chiye meant to do. In the past few days, he had been training here with the Libei Armored Cavalry. He put down the wooden basin and wore his shoes properly. “I can also bring along my iron hammers... if you would try out our new military formation.”

Lang Tao Xue Jin snorted hot puffs of air. The heavily armored horse inched closer once more, forcing Hairigu to retreat backward.

“New military formation?” Xiao Chiye asked.

Hairigu took a step back and immediately explained himself. “I learned it from an old man.” He raised a finger to point at his nose. “An old man with a red nose.”

CHAPTER 197: (UN)EXPECTED

Fei Sheng could not figure out what Yin Chang was up to. The Cizhou garrison troops had arrived in Fanzhou for two days, yet no action had been taken. The few times Yin Chang went out had all been to take aimless strolls after his meals. Fei Sheng was burning with anxiety, but he was only part of the entourage and could not even be considered an army-inspecting censor.

Fei Sheng wanted to write to Shen Zechuan, but he was worried that Yin Chang might turn out to be really capable. If it so happened that the garrison troops were to return in triumph, then, before Shen Zechuan, he would become the real villain who made false accusations on the sly for his own selfish purposes. Even if he had been initially justified in doing so, he would still become the unreasonable one.

On this day, Fei Sheng lay down to rest. He slept until approximately the hour of xu when he was suddenly awakened by his subordinate.

“Bad news,” the Imperial Bodyguard said. “That old crook is gone!”

Fei Sheng swiftly sat up and picked up his boots. As he hopped and stomped his feet into them, he asked in disbelief, “Gone? He ran?”

Fei Sheng swiped the tent flap open and stepped out for a look. The entire campground was still illuminated, but there were only a thousand or so men left. His heart started pounding hard. It's over, he thought. If they lost the battle of Fanzhou, then his future was as good as finished too. But then, he thought, that can't be right!

No matter how he looked at it, they would not lose the battle of Fanzhou. Win this battle and take down Fanzhou, and they would be rewarded. Yin Chang could even cement his position as the commander with this one battle; there was no reason for him to flee. Besides, half of Zhongbo was already surrounded by Shen Zechuan. Even if Yin Chang ran, he had nowhere to go. Not unless he switched camps and threw in his lot with King Yi.

Fei Sheng looked up suddenly in Fanzhou's direction. “That old crook better not switch allegiance right before the battle...”

The Imperial Bodyguards on night patrol returned bearing their whips in hands and sounded the whistle before dismounting. “There are traces of troops on the move three li to the southeast!”

Fei Sheng took a few steps forward and asked, "The garrison troops or the Fanzhou traitors?"

"They are heading our way." The Imperial Bodyguards hung up their whips and righted their blades. "In all probability, it's a night attack."

Fei Sheng's heart sank. From Qudu to Zhongbo, he had never once served as a general, and he was no expert in mobilizing troops to war. He turned around to survey the campground. "So the commander fled. What about the next-in-command, the Platoon Commander? Call him out to fight!"

The Imperial Bodyguard following behind him answered, "He fled too!"

Fei Sheng was really regretting it now. If he had known that Yin Chang would be so unreliable, he would have dragged Gu Jin over. At the very least, Gu Jin would be able to stand in for the missing commander. He calmed himself down and asked his subordinate, "How many men do we have left?"

"One thousand." The Imperial Bodyguard pressed against the hilt of his blade. "The old man even rounded it up to a round number."

Fei Sheng hissed through gritted teeth, "well, I thank his entire family for that!"

Left without a choice, Fei Sheng could only brace himself and step into the role. He shouted for the soldiers to extinguish all the torches and prepare to evacuate. At the very least, they could not remain in the campgrounds as live targets for the enemy forces. Besides, they could still circumvent the enemies once they got to the snowfield. But they had only put out half the fire when he heard the sound of the enemies' running footsteps in the wind.

"Withdraw now." Fei Sheng knew just from the sound alone that he could not win this fight. "Retreat!"

The remaining soldiers buckled up and dragged their blades along to follow behind the Imperial Bodyguards. They ran with all their might, cutting a particularly sorry sight as they threw everything away while taking flight. Fei Sheng had a horse, but he dared not leave these 1,000 men behind and flee back to Cizhou by himself. The battle had not even been fought, and they had already lost the soldiers. Fei Sheng could already imagine Shen Zechuan's wrath.

Fei Sheng had not even run a few li when he heard the sound of troops surrounding them right ahead in the dark night. They had pitched camp here for several days running, and the Fanzhou soldiers, having long gotten a clear grasp on the routes, had surrounded the front and rear of the campground in preparation of rounding them all up with one fell swoop tonight.

Fei Sheng was caught in a dilemma, with no room to advance or retreat. This situation differed completely from the situation a few months ago in Dunzhou. He was exposed in this wilderness with nothing to provide him with cover. Perhaps the 1,000 soldiers he had on hand might be able to ward off small groups of surprise attacks, but they were undoubtedly too powerless to resist an onslaught of attack from a force that far exceeded their own numbers.

The Fanzhou soldiers gathered together as they approached. These people were even more of a motley crew than the Cizhou garrison troops were; they had no armors or even standardized weapons. The circle of soldiers shrank as they closed in on them like an ant colony swarming towards them. Fei Sheng's horse and the garrison troops pressed up against each other. Enemy troops that were more than double their numbers were everywhere around them. The wave of enemy forces pushed against the wall of men, crowding the garrison troops so much that it was hard for them to even bend over.

The only way to get a slim chance of survival in such a situation was to do or die.

Gasping for his breath, Fei Sheng hesitated for merely a fraction of a second. He killed his horse with a slash, and as hot blood splattered, he raised his blade and shouted, "I am a trapped beast, just like all of you. If we cannot fight to the death and break out of this encirclement, then this can only be our burial grounds!"

The soldiers were already terrified when they were surrounded, and when they saw Fei Sheng riding on his horse, they were afraid he would abandon the troops and flee. That consequently made them even more unmotivated to fight. All they wanted to do was to kneel and beg for mercy. But now that Fei Sheng had slashed his horse dead and expressed his determination to advance and retreat with them, their morale was instantly boosted. Fei Sheng knew very well the effect of taking the lead in battle, and in the middle of his speech, he had already charged up to cut down the enemy's troops head-on as he led his men towards the northwest in a desperate fight to break through the encirclement.

Right at this moment, a bellow suddenly burst out from the southeast, and a file of soldiers charged into the ranks of Fanzhou soldiers like a sharp blade stabbing into their bodies, tearing them apart with terror and sending sprays of blood splattering all over. In no time, eight columns of troops had already penetrated their way in.

Yin Chang's face was so flushed from drinking that it was hard to tell if he was drunk or freezing cold. He blew his nose, so happy that he leaped in joy and boomed in a loud and clear voice to Fei Sheng across hundreds of men. "Oh, you're still alive!"

Fei Sheng kicked out at the enemy's chest without pulling his blade out. All the words he wanted to say condensed into one: "Fuck!"

He had been used as bait by Yin Chang!

Given that a total of 8,000 men from the Cizhou Garrison Troops were mobilized, there was originally no need to design such a tactic to take down Fanzhou. But Yin Chang sensed something amiss after their arrival in Fanzhou. He had long heard that King Yi did not permit the commoners in Fanzhou to flee out of the territory, and he had installed troops at the borders to stop these people. But they did not encounter any obstructions when they crossed into the border; in fact, they had not even come across a single Fanzhou soldier.

King Yi had already received the declaration of war. If he had the intent to surrender, he should have opened the gates a long time back to welcome them. But not only did he not open the gates, he even recalled the troops at the border. He was clearly concentrating his forces in preparation for a fight to the death with the Cizhou garrison troops.

Yin Chang guessed that Fanzhou would ally with the Dengzhou soldiers in order to emerge victorious. It was only when they had the numbers to crush the Cizhou garrison troops they would dare to meet Cizhou's attack in such a way. The old man was a crafty one. Knowing that he had not brought along enough men, he threw Fei Sheng out as bait for the Fanzhou soldiers to bite. He waited for the Fanzhou soldiers to assemble together in a group, then used the "dagger" formation<sup>29</sup> to launch a surprise attack from the back to break them up before destroying them one by one.

As Fei Sheng wiped away the blood, he saw those dagger squads<sup>30</sup> cutting through the enemy forces like hot knives cutting through butter, so much that the Fanzhou soldiers were unable to converge together again.

The blades of Yin Chang's squads were facing outward on all sides; it was a battle formation clearly drawn on the same one Lu Guangbai used to fight the Biansha Cavalry, although Yin Chang made some changes by lining these squads up in very narrow columns, turning them from Lu Guangbai's square-shaped "battering ram"<sup>31</sup> into a long-shaped "dagger".

Such dagger squads were ruthless and swift when launching a surprise attack from the back. The moment they pierced into the enemy camp, they would be able to tear the other party apart from within. The Fanzhou soldiers, who did not even have armors, had no time at all to cover their asses. In the blink of an eye, they were all cut down into bloody pulps of flesh.

This old man really is something!

Fei Sheng's confidence soared upon seeing victory within their grasp. But before he could open his mouth, he took a hit from Yin Chang's sweeping leg.<sup>32</sup> Yin Chang might have been advanced in age, but his martial art moves with his lower limbs were the real deal, and it caused Fei Sheng to fall headfirst. Fei Sheng had only just landed on the ground when a blade above his head sliced through the air with a "swoosh".

The Fanzhou soldiers were now beating a retreat. Dragging his blade along, Yin Chang chased after them and hollered, "Where are you running off to, lads!"

Since Fanzhou had amassed together its troops, then those who had turned up tonight were the main force in the territory. As long as they could defeat these people, there would be no more possibility of King Yi resisting. The morale of the Fanzhou troops was already crushed, while the morale of the Cizhou garrison troops was at an all-time high. This was the moment to fight and win a quick battle. Yin Chang would never let them return to the city.

Fei Sheng climbed to his feet and gave chase. But who could have guessed that this old man would have such amazing footwork? He was astonishingly fast as he ran and barged his way through in the night. Fei Sheng could only just about barely keep up. They chased for a few li when Fei Sheng realized that the direction was wrong. He was about to call out to Yin Chang when he suddenly heard the sound of horses' hooves.

"Reinforcements!" Fei Sheng's legs straightened as he came to a halt and tried to drag Yin Chang back. "Elder Yin, it's the reinforcements from Fanzhou!"

Fei Sheng was just the same as Gu Jin—he had a keen sense of hearing. As he had few opportunities to tag along with the army, he did not have Gu Jin’s ability to identify the type of soldiers from the sound alone. However, he had extraordinary observational skills, and he could tell that the sound of these horses’ hooves was slightly heavy; they did not seem to be ordinary cavalry.

The night was starless, with continuous stretches of snow dunes in the wilderness. Fragments of snow slid along the mounds, rustling in the wind as the wind blew them to the feet of the Cizhou garrison troops. Yin Chang, ever the obstinate one charging at the fore, could already see the small number of cavalry. With his sense of smell wrecked from inhaling the fumes of one too many wines, he failed to catch a whiff of the smell in the air even with the wind blowing in his direction.

Fine, delicate bits of snow pounced on Fei Sheng’s face. In that instant the snow melted, he caught the smell of gunpowder in the air. His hair promptly stood on end. He braked to a sudden stop, swung his arms apart, and said sharply to the Imperial Bodyguards beside him, “Firearms—!”

Before Fei Sheng’s voice even fully left his mouth, flames burst out of the darkness like that of a meteor shower. Without even thinking, Fei Sheng sprang into the air like a tiger and pounced onto Yin Chang’s back from behind, taking the old man along with him as he tumbled into the snow. That resounding “BANG” slammed into his ears like a blunt instrument smashing onto his skull, the sound so explosive that Fei Sheng nearly lost his sense of hearing.

What a miscalculation!

Fei Sheng’s back, which had been hit by shrapnel, was burning with searing pain. He propped himself up with an arm and shook his head hard. As he could not hear his own voice clearly, he could only shout with all his might at Yin Chang, “This stuff burns! Retreat, NOW!”

Fei Sheng had seen firearms in the armory of the Eight Great Training Divisions before. This instrument could only be equipped by the Chunquan Battalion of the Eight Great Training Divisions; it was restricted by the imperial court, with the blueprint to forge it left under the charge of the Ministry of War. Xiao Chiye and Shen Zechuan both had designs on firearms before, but neither of them had managed to get their hands on the blueprint.

No wonder this cavalry stood unmoving earlier—they were loading the firearms. Who knew how long the enemy had been observing them for the night? They were not here for the Cizhou garrison troops, but Yin Chang. As the saying goes, strike at the most vulnerable spot, much like hitting a snake seven inches below its head, and Yin Chang was the Achilles heel of the Cizhou garrison troops.

Yin Chang had been blindsided by this bullet. The old man struggled in the snow, covering his ears as he shouted in alarm at Fei Sheng, “Why the hell is there thunder?!”

Where in the world would Fei Sheng have the time to explain things to an old country bumpkin who had never seen the world? He got to his feet and dragged Yin Chang along as he ran back. Yin Chang shifted his palm away and cranked his head to take a look. Another explosion resounded from the cavalry behind them, and the barrage of fired projectiles scraped past Yin Chang’s buttocks, hurting Yin Chang so much that he yelled at the top of his lungs.

Fei Sheng thought Yin Chang had been hit. In a moment of anxiety, he said, “Don’t you die now!”

No matter what happened tonight, Fei Sheng had to keep this old man alive. He knew very well that Shen Zechuan was currently lacking generals, and Yin Chang would no doubt go on to be of great use in the future. The point was that if Yin Chang were to die here, then Fei Sheng, a stranger to warfare, would return in disgrace, and when that time came, it remained to be seen whether or not he could still retain his original post, let alone have a future to speak of. Shen Zechuan still had Qiao Tianya at his disposal; Fei Sheng was not his only option.

Therefore, Yin Chang must not die!

Frightened, Yin Chang took to his heels with his hands covering his head. He did not even need Fei Sheng to pull him along as he left Fei Sheng trailing behind in his wake after a few steps, repeatedly muttering to himself, “Strike anyone but me. This old man has never done anything unconscionable. Strike anyone but...”

Bullshit!

Following close on Yin Chang’s heels, Fei Sheng felt pissed. With a sudden burst of strength, he cursed Yin Chang as he chased him, “You old crook, you are too black-hearted! Weren’t you the one who threw me in the camp as bait?”

Yin Chang turned his neck around to refute, “warfare is all about deception, deception!”<sup>33</sup>

They dashed frantically through the wilderness without letting up. Fortunately, the enemy did not have the intent to pursue them, and they withdrew after chasing the Cizhou garrison troops away for half a li. After running for half a night and fighting with the Fanzhou troops for the other half, the Cizhou garrison troops were now utterly drained and exhausted. It was such a cold day, and yet they were all drenched in sweat and panting like an ox while propping themselves up.

As Fei Sheng wiped his sweat and caught his breath, realization hit him. He turned around. Looking at the first glimmer of dawn on the horizon, he spat hard and said, “We’ve been tricked.”

By the time the military reports made their way back to Cizhou, it was already the dead of night. Shen Zechuan had on in a loose-fitting robe as he finished looking over Fei Sheng’s report in the hall. The entire hall was utterly silent; no one dared to take a peep at the expression on the Prefectural Lord’s face.

Everyone had believed Fanzhou to be in the bag and had not expected to meet with a tough fight. The Cizhou garrison troops had prepared for half a year, and Shen Zechuan had previously invited Libei and the Imperial Army to train them, yet their first battle was so hopelessly botched. Anyone else would be infuriated.

It was so quiet in the study that one could hear a pin drop. Yao Wenyu covered his mouth and coughed for a long time. As he clenched his fist, he said, “Your Lordship, please be appeased for the time being. Firearms have always been prohibited by the court, so their appearance in Fanzhou is truly unexpected. Even though King Yi is in possession of such powerful weapons, his defeat is already cast in stone—he won’t be able to change the outcome.”

Yu Xiaozai, who had just returned from Dunzhou, had not even warmed his chair yet. Afraid that Shen Zechuan would severely punish the garrison troops because of this, he braved the solemn atmosphere and spoke up. “Chill, Your Lordship...”

Oh no, he forgot to switch to bureaucratic speak!

Yu Xiaozai slapped his knees in chagrin, and the advisors around him promptly bowed their heads even lower.

With this interruption from Yu Xiaozai, Shen Zechuan's fury cooled. He covered the letter, and his expression warmed up again. Only then did the rest of them dare to breathe.

"Yuanzhuo is right," Kong Ling continued in a soft voice. "Even with firearms in his possession, King Yi can't stir up any waves. Fanzhou is in short supply of grains. Even if he shuts the gates and stays inside, there is no way he can make it out alive."

As Yao Wenyu lowered his sleeves, he said, "But it's rather strange... if King Yi already had firearms in hand, how could he have been forced into a corner to such an extent? Just by reselling them to the Mount Luo bandits, he would have been able to earn enough to cover the military salaries for recruiting new soldiers. Moreover, the confrontation this time doesn't seem like King Yi's usual style."

Zhou Gui recalled the words Yao Wenyu said a few days ago, and the color promptly drained from his face. "Could it be that King Yi has already been killed by the bandits in Fanzhou as Yuanzhuo had anticipated? This battle feels rather odd to me when I look at it too."

Zhou Gui knew Yin Chang well. His promotion of Yin Chang was not what Fei Sheng thought it was. Rather, it was because he felt that Yin Chang had the capability to fight wars. If King Yi also had such an ability, then Fanzhou should have launched an attack on Cizhou a long time ago.

Kong Ling was also getting suspicious too. "As Fei Sheng said in his letter, it indeed doesn't look like what King Yi would do."

Silence gradually returned to the study as everyone waited for Shen Zechuan to speak. Shen Zechuan raised his eyes to look at the group with an icy expression in his eyes and said, "Reply and tell Yin Chang that either the garrison troops will return in triumph seven days later, or he will come and see me with his own head in hand."

Shen Zechuan gave the garrison troops abundant provisions and even equipped them with superior gear. If the garrison troops could not even take down Fanzhou, then there was no need at all to further consider his grand, ambitious plans to reign supreme.

A mountain cannot accommodate two tigers.

After this spring, Zhongbo could only have one master. Regardless of whether King Yi was real or fake, Shen Zechuan was set on taking Fanzhou.

Author's Note:

The bronze firearm is more like a shotgun or scattergun. It has an advantage only in the face of the enemy. It won't work from a distance away. For detail, please refer to chapter 37.

Thank you for reading.

CHAPTER 198: YIN CHANG

Fei Sheng no longer dared to belittle Yin Chang. The power of last night's 'dagger' had been shockingly terrifying; Fei Sheng had never even heard of that sort of formation before. If not for the sudden appearance of the firearms, they would have already been in the city of Fanzhou this morning.

Having been startled out of his drunken stupor by the firearms, Yin Chang held the bowl in his hands and craned his neck to ask, "what the heck are those things?"

Fei Sheng was staking their victory entirely on the old man this time. Seeing Yin Chang's empty bowl, he hurriedly filled it up again. "Firearms. Have you never heard of them before?"

Yin Chang shook his head like a rattle drum.<sup>34</sup> He had spent half of his life in Cizhou, and the highest-ranking official he had ever met was Zhou Gui. He could not even list out all the Eight Great Training Divisions, let alone know of the Chunquan Battalion. He was truly an old country bumpkin, a barely literate man who had never read a single book on warfare and relied entirely on feeling his way through battles.

"What's that? It exploded with a 'bang', like a strike of lightning." Yin Chang crushed up the dry rations. "We'll get struck before even making it up to the front. How are we supposed to fight this war?"

"It can only play its users for fools." Fei Sheng drew himself closer to Yin Chang. Both of them were equally filthy and covered in blood from head to toe. With his fingers, Fei Sheng made a circle the size of a gun muzzle and showed it to Yin Chang. "The reason why the cavalry didn't move yesterday was because they were loading their firearms. It takes effort to get it to fire from this opening, and it only works if they're in close proximity. They blindsided us this time. Damn it. Now that I think about it, it's possible that those are all the firearms they have, and they used it just for the specific purpose of scaring us."

Yin Chang finally kind of understood it. "Oh! Aren't those firecrackers then?!"

"You're absolutely correct! Think of them as firecrackers; it can't hit you if you run far enough." Fearing that Yin Chang would be cowed by the firearms and would not dare to launch further attacks, Fei Sheng went to great pains to explain to him. "Think about it. If this stuff was really that good to use, why did Chunquan Battalion only use it to perform for the emperor? It doesn't work as well in battles."

Fei Sheng did not lie. Why did the Chunquan Battalion set the firearms on the back burner? Precisely because it was hard to use. Loading them took time. Use them in street fights, and the firearms would probably still be in the midst of warming up even when the enemies' blades had already slit their throats. But pull away from the enemy, and the lethality of the firearms would plummet. Furthermore, the recoil would also make it difficult to aim accurately.

"It even burns asses." Yin Chang was still nursing a grudge over that fired round last night. He thought for a moment while staring at the campfire. "Are these things expensive?"

"Very." Fei Sheng soaked the dry rations in the bowl and gobbled it down whole. "Even the Imperial Bodyguards don't have the blueprint. They are manufactured by the Ministry of Works under the supervision of the Ministry of War. The quantity is limited every time, and they even come with numbers engraved on them."

Yin Chang promptly bared his stained, yellow teeth at Fei Sheng in a grin. "Then fuck it. I only fear that those firecrackers are cheap. Fanzhou is so brokeass poor now, so how would they bear to use expensive stuff as they please? It's great if its reach is limited. I don't for the life of me believe they can cower like tortoises in there for their entire lives."

Door panels swung and slammed under the intense howl of the north wind. The streets of Fanzhou were strewn with corpses all over. King Yi's tattered banner fluttered in the wind as beggars fought over it to keep themselves warm. The entrance of the yamen's wind shelter was crammed with hundreds of people, most of which were the elderly, weak, women, and children. All the young and healthy men in their families had either been abducted away by the bandits or hoodwinked by King Yi into joining his army. These people, so famished they were all skin and bones, were all here to beg for food.

This winter wind was so penetratingly freezing that people were dying of the cold every night.

"Brother Huo wishes to open the granaries and distribute the grains to the people." Yang Qiu, a bandit of Fanzhou sitting on the taishi chair<sup>35</sup> with his leg propped, said with a merry smile. "It's a good thing. We are all for it."

But the Cizhou garrison troops are right at our city gates now, and the soldiers in the frontline can't go hungry. As long as the soldiers don't starve, you can distribute the grains to whoever you want."

Both sides of the hall were packed with people standing or sitting; they were all bandits from Fanzhou and Dengzhou. Yin Chang was right in his guess. To guard against the Cizhou garrison troops, King Yi had assembled together the troops from both prefectures in the hope of bargaining with Shen Zechuan at the critical moment. But who knew? He invited a wolf into his own house and brought disaster upon himself instead. In the end, he was killed by Huo Lingyun and these people the latter was colluding with.

Sitting on King Yi's seat, Huo Lingyun said, "The city has run out of food, so I will have to borrow grains from my various brothers here."

"Shen Zechuan has sealed off the routes to the west, and the traveling merchants no longer dare to come this way anymore. After the tenth month, all I've been eating are fucking stale grains." Yang Qiu felt resentful just to bring up the matter. "I was even thinking of borrowing grains from all of you. Old Fang the Tenth, you were working hand in glove with King Yi, and must have had your fair share of licking his balls, so don't dare you sit here with us and pretend to be poor."

Old Fang the Tenth, who had a penchant for men, felt so self-conscious on hearing this that his face blanched with anger. He clenched his walnuts and sneered. "What a bunch of bull. Drop that hoodlum act of yours. My grains have long been used to make up for the military grains, feeding ingrates like you."

"The fuck we fighting a battle for when we have no grains." Yang Qiu said with ill intentions. "Might as well run while we can."

"Run?" Old Fang the Tenth spat. "The entire territory to the northwest has been choked off by Shen Zechuan. Either you go over to Tianfei Watchtower and surrender to Commander-in-chief Qi, or you go over to the Chashi River and work in cahoots with the Biansha people. Isn't Shen Zechuan going to attack Duanzhou in the second month? Say we mess up the game for him and leave an opening in Zhongbo, would he still dare to throw his weight around here?"

These people were bandits. At first, they heard Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye had killed Lei Changming in Cizhou, and then they got wind that Shen Zechuan had killed Cai Yu in Chazhou, followed by Lei Jingzhe in Dunzhou. All the big-name bandit leaders in Zhongbo had met their fucking ends in Shen Zechuan's hands. Even if they thought with their feet, they knew Shen Zechuan would never let them off.

Yang Qiu initially thought Huo Lingyun was not qualified enough to hold down the situation. He had come here to fish in troubled waters; his plan was to haul King Yi's money vault away before the city was breached, but when he arrived, he found Old Fang and all these other people having designs on the money vault too. Everyone was presently sitting here mutually scheming against one another, each of them only too anxious for the others to hurry up and die.

Although Huo Lingyun was sitting at the head, he was willing to play second fiddle. Without showing any expression, he said, "On the contrary, there's no need to be overly anxious. Shen Zechuan sent an old man this time, one without prestige and capability. What's more, he's timid. He won't get anywhere."

It was true that Yin Chang had no reputation to speak of, but Yin Chang had disposed of nearly half of their soldiers with just one appearance. Huo Lingyun himself was the one who went out to fight last night's battle, the details of which he kept mum about. All Yang Qiu and Old Fang the Tenth knew was that they had suffered severe casualties.

Yang Qiu thought of Huo Lingyun as just a pretty face who was all looks and no substance, practically good for nada. Even so, he still had a smile on his face as he said, "That's right. Brother Huo comes from a distinguished family. The hell does an old country bumpkin like him think he is? I'm only worried about food, nothing else. If we keep up with this rate of consumption, we won't last until spring even if we repel the Cizhou garrison troops."

"Then what do you have in mind?" Old Fang the Tenth said sarcastically, "Let's hear your brilliant ideas."

Yang Qiu rolled his eyes at him and looked at Huo Lingyun. "Yan Heru still has shops in Dunzhou. Let's trade King Yi's family assets for grains with him. He doesn't acknowledge anything except money, so he will definitely do us this favor. As long as we can survive this winter, the throne of King Yi will be as good as Brother Huo's. It won't be too late for us to recruit soldiers and buy horses then."

Old Fang the Tenth listened to Yang Qiu's nonsensical boasts but did not speak up to warn Huo Lingyun. Huo Lingyun was exactly his type, but he had seen King Yi's mutilated corpse back at the yamen, which the dogs had gnawed until it was all unrecognizable. He could not help but have the sense that he was not beyond sharing the same fate too.

Having remained close to King Yi these past six months, Huo Lingyun was not aware of the situation outside. Looking as if he believed Yang Qiu's words, he said, "but with the garrison troops besieging the city now, how are we going to conduct this business with Yan Heru's shop?"

"My people are most familiar with the areas in Dunzhou. I can use Liu'er's eyes too." Yang Qiu had some monkey business going on with Cuiqing, and he had tagged along for a few rides when Cuiqing went to Dunzhou for business in the past. "If Brother Huo is willing to trust me, I'll make a trip for you."

Old Fang the Tenth instantly turned hostile. "So you have it all plotted out, huh!"

They snapped at each other and incriminated one another, neither willing to give in. King Yi's money was future life insurance for them, and no one was willing to share it with the others. As such, they remained locked in a stalemate here, making the atmosphere rather tense and heavy.

Yang Qiu had no way to refute Old Fang the Tenth's words. He grew more and more restless with anxiety as he sat here, worried that Huo Lingyun could not hold up against the Cizhou's garrison troops, so he steeled himself, deciding to kill them all and grab the money tonight.

A Fanzhou soldier stationed on the city wall was relieving himself at a corner when he suddenly heard several whistles coming from below. He fastened his pants. Not daring to stick his head out directly, he glanced down from the middle of the battlement. A bonfire was blazing in the wilderness, and the Cizhou garrison troops had taken up formation in front of the city walls with their shields held up, yet they had not sounded the war horn.

Yin Chang stood at the very front and took a few gulps of wine before shouting, "Is King Yi here? Call him up the city wall. Let's have a little chat!"

The taste of being pierced by the dagger squads' sharp blades the night before was still vivid in the Fanzhou troops' minds. Yin Chang looked exactly like an old maniac when he chased after them, and the impact of that encounter still lingered. The Platoon Commander of Fanzhou, a bandit under Yang Qiu, had been specially assigned here by Huo Lingyun. He leaned over the battlement and spat at Yin Chang. "Chat, my ass. Don't even think about tricking us out of the city."

Not to be outdone, Yin Chang cursed back. "All of you in Fanzhou are fucking wimps. Cowering cowards like you are not even fit to kiss my ass! Bah, little brats! Do you even have the balls to fight battles? Get your ass down here and carry our Prefectural Lord's shoes."

Yin Chang, having hung out in the streets in his youth, spontaneously blurted out all the obscenities that came to his mind. With wine to add to his fun, he could stand here and curse for three days and three nights without ever repeating himself. His words were crude and vulgar as he swore with great relish and led the garrison troops to jeer with him, having such a merry time it was as though he was celebrating the spring festival.

The Platoon Commander, having served under Yang Qiu, had become accustomed to throwing his weight around in Dengzhou. Even King Yi himself treated him with courtesy when he came to Fanzhou. Seething with resentment now, especially after getting chased all around by Yin Chang and even stabbed in the buttocks last night, he propped himself against the battlement and let loose a torrent of verbal abuse.

The moment the Platoon Commander retorted, Yin Chang waved his hand to instigate the Cizhou garrison troops behind him to holler back with a litany of curses. The Platoon Commander was unable to beat them in might, and his voice was drowned out. Furious, he pounded the wall hard and commanded those at his sides. "Shoot him!"

The Fanzhou troops swiftly put up their bows, and the Cizhou garrison troops below them promptly took to their heels. They cursed as they ran while the arrows rained down noisily on the shields they were equipped with. Once they were out of the Fanzhou troops' range, they stood at the perimeter and started to boo in unison at the top of the city walls.

Yin Chang leaped beyond the shooting range and raised both hands to signal for them to sound the war horn at the back. The old man's ruddy face was glowing as he yelled, "Fanzhou—"

The Cizhou garrison troops responded in chorus, "—is all as chicken as they come!"

Yin Chang shouted again, "And King Yi—"

The Cizhou garrison troops continued, "—is a fucking cur!"

The Fanzhou arrows could not reach them. Soldiers of all ranks leaned over the battlements, trying to get a swear word in as they cursed back. A pity its effect was minimal. Yin Chang even composed a ditty for the Cizhou garrison troops, which they hollered at an earsplitting volume from where they stood.

Half of the Platoon Commander's body was already sticking out as he cussed until his face turned livid with rage. He bellowed across the air, "I dare you to repeat that, you old buffoon! I'll slice off your rotten tongues!"

"Bring it on." Yin Chang seemed to be drunk as he stepped on the snow and turned around in circles. As he clapped his hands, he said, "If you don't come, I'll take you as my daughter. Daughter, heh!" He pinched his fingers and twisted around to look back at the Platoon Commander at the top of the city wall, imitating the latter as he said in a shrill voice, "I'll slice off your rotten tongues and tear off your faces!"

Yin Chang was already advanced in years, and he had so many wrinkles on his face he could even make a flower pattern with them. Yet his imitation of a woman was absolutely spot on, having gotten that feminine charm more or less down pat as he stomped his foot and sent pieces of ice beneath it skipping all over.

The Platoon Commander's face blanched.

The composition of the Fanzhou troops was a rather complicated one; the men could not be considered soldiers at all. Sworn enemies and adversaries were even thrown into a squad together, so who knows? Perhaps they were all now laughing behind the Platoon Commander's back on seeing him humiliated.

The Platoon Commander had never before experienced such humiliation. He shoved aside the soldier next to him and ordered, "prepare the horse!"

The soldier hurriedly chased after him and said, "Huo—"

"Fuck that Huo," the Platoon Commander abruptly yanked up a soldier and barked at him. "I'm Chief Yang's foreman. Huo Lingyun was still a wee kid wetting his pants when I was back there in Dengzhou killing the garrison troops in. Is he even fit to command me? Bring out the guns!"

The sight of Yin Chang scampering away like a frightened rat from the firearms last night was still fresh in the Platoon Commander's mind. They had lost half their men in the tussle with Yin Chang then, when Yin Chang had split them up with his formation. But with the city of Fanzhou right behind them tonight, they had even more confidence than they did last night. At most, they would retreat back if they had to. What was there to be afraid of?! Either way, they had horses. If Yin Chang still dared to pursue them after they withdrew into the city with their bows at the ready, he would be courting death.

Yin Chang tugged up his trousers. The old man reached back for the hilt of his blade. He dropped the merriment, his cloudy eyes as quiet as this expanse of the night sky as he adjusted his breathing, a strategy he had thought of on his own. As long as he calmed his breathing before a battle, he would be able to stand firm on his feet.

There were incredibly gifted generals in this world; they were young and were not only ambitious but also dazzlingly brilliant. But there was also another kind of general who never had the opportunity to make a name for themselves. They always had their backs to the firmament of heaven, their eyes solely on the small piece of land beneath their feet.

Yin Chang was long past his prime.

The instant the city gates opened, Yin Chang once again felt a rush of fighting spirit coursing through his body. That was the desire that had been burning within him to this very day. He could not see the onslaught of old age assailing him; he was still as young as he had once been. The fervor that blazed anew in him let him draw his blade without the slightest decrease in his speed at all.

Win one battle!

Even if he was no famous general.

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 斩首 the word here used is decapitated or beheaded, although it also implied the slaying of the Xiao Fangxu in this context, leaving the Libei Armored Cavalry headless, or without a leader.

- 2.
3. 鬼头 kind of carving on the hilt of the blade. See examples here or here

- 4.
5. 垛口 duokou, or crenels, empty space between two merlons

- 6.
7. Specifically 悬眼 Xuanyan, a loophole opened at the base of a parapet in-between two crenels.

- 8.
9. 鬼头刀 literally ghost-headed blade. It's a kind of blade used for beheading people sentenced to death in old times.

- 10.
11. 单梢炮 Single-component catapults, or one-branch trebuchet
12. 丈 zhang; a measure of length, 1 zhang = ten Chinese feet (3.3m)
13. Specifically a changdao, or a two-handed, single-edged Chinese sword.

14.

15. Snowtrooper Lu Guangbai.

Thanks Jia for suggesting.

16. 地龙 dilong, an ancient method of warming with an indoor ground heating system, built by concreting circular flue underground where heat would flow from a fire pit outside through the channels to the entire room and raise the temperature indoors.

17. 军屯 military troops (mostly in border regions) who carry out garrison duties as well as farm crops to supply the border garrisons with grains

18. Tiger, also refers to an extraordinary man or hero. Tiger is a symbol of ferocity, agility, and courage.

19. 细刀, literally slim blade, although it may also refer to the miaodao (苗刀, image below)

20. 守夜 shouye, or 守岁 shousui, the tradition of staying awake until midnight on the eve of Chinese New year. It is said that if the children stayed up late, their parents would live a longer life in return.

21. 伤筋动骨一百天 literally, takes a hundred days for the bones to knit and for the tendons to heal.

22. 水(至)清则无鱼 literally, water which is too clean has no(/few) fish, i.e., one should not demand absolute purity, you cannot expect everyone to be squeaky clean.

23.

24. 如意 ruyi, an ancient auspicious symbol that served as a ceremonial scepter or a symbol of power, often given as gifts because of the good wishes they implied.

25. Fengshui, or the art of geomancy, is the traditional Chinese practice of selecting auspicious sites for buildings and tombs, believed to have a vital influence on the fortune of a family.

26. 及冠 a man's 20th birthday, i.e., coming of age at 20 for a male.

27. 家生子 Children of domestic servants or slaves. These children were also born in the household and also served as servants and slaves in the same household.

28. 名帖 (also 拜帖), a visitation card (or name card) written on paper or wood used by officials, nobles or distinguished people to notify the other party of their visit. It would usually indicate his name, position, and so on. It's like a name card in the modern world.

29. In this context, the “young master” would be Xiao Xun, since his father is now the “master” of the household, so it makes sense to call Xiao Chiye the second master (after Xiao Jiming) as calling Xiao Chiye young master would make it seem like he's Xiao Jiming's son instead.

30. 清水衙门 government office with low receipts or expenditures and hence little or no chance of corruption.

31. 三姓家奴 literally, a slave with three surnames. The term originates from the Romance of the Three Kingdoms 《三国演义》 and refers specifically to Lu Bu. It's used mockingly to refer to capricious, disloyal and unrighteous people who serve traitors.

32. 一炷香 the time an incense stick takes to burn. Some sources suggest one stick takes 30 minutes or one hour, but it really depends on a variety of factors (the environment, wind, length of the stick, etc).

33. 温柔乡 land of warmth and tenderness, or a place where a man can find solace in feminine charms, such as a brothel, etc.

火铳

34.

35.

36. 铜火铳 Huochong, or blunderbuss (according to baidu), or sometimes known as a hand cannon, is a tube-like projection firearm used as a gun. The Huochong gun was an important invention as the Ming Dynasty was creating weapons to defend themselves from attackers.

37.

38. 酒囊 wine bag or pouch, a portable water bag typically made out of animals' hide.

39. 尖刀阵型, dagger, point, or spearhead formation that concentrates manpower and firepower to pierce enemy lines and create an opening for its attacking forces.

40. 尖刀队 dagger, point, or spearhead squad, a squad in the forefront of a battle that first invades enemy territory or pierces the enemy lines in a battle.

41. It was called 撞车 (battering ram) in chapter 190, although in 197 this was written as 战车 (war chariot or tank). Will double check and confirm again with the uncensored traditional chinese physical copy when it is released.

42. 扫堂腿 a leg sweep, a martial art move where one typically sweeps out a leg in a circle.

43. 兵者，诡道也, all warfare is based on deception, from Sun Tzu's The Art of War.

44.

45. 拨浪鼓 Bolang Gu , also a Chinese rattle drum or a pellet drum, is a typical child toy in China. It's shaken or rotated from left and right quickly to produce a drumming or rattling sound.

46.

47. 太师椅 Taishi Chair or Grand Preceptor Chair, is a classical style of a wooden armchair in ancient China.

CHAPTER 199 : TRIUMPHANT RETURN

As Yang Qiu left the yamen and stood under the eaves, he saw the commoners who were seeking refuge in the wind shelter. Finding it just his luck to come across them, he spat and ground it with his foot. “Are you people dead?” He said to the men in attendance. “Huo Lingyun may be ignorant, but all of you too? The poor are like venereal diseases. It’ll be too late to cry by the time they infect the yamen!”

The men behind him responded with fear and trepidation and hurried over to berate and drive the commoners away.

Yang Qiu got on the carriage and closed his eyes to rest, fuming as he recalled the conversation in the yamen. Midway through his journey, his subordinate suddenly piped up through the curtain, “Chief, there’s a message!”

Yang Qiu opened his eyes. “Tell me.”

“Old Fang the Tenth has not returned to his residence at all,” the subordinate said. “He resorted to trickery to shake off the informer following him, then swapped out the carriage and made a beeline for the money vault!”

Yang Qiu promptly pulled the carriage curtain open and glared for a moment. Fearing that he had already lost the opportunity to get a jump on the others, he said, “Quick, gather our men!”

In less than an hour, the subordinate reported back that the Cizhou Garrison Troops had attacked the city. The Platoon Commander had charged out with firearms in hand, but he had not even reached the Garrison Troops when the Imperial Bodyguards, who had been lying in wait for a long time, broke his head with one clean, efficient twist. As the turn of events had been so unexpected and sudden, the city gates were not shut in time, and now the banners at the top of the city wall had all been set on fire.

Yang Qiu's face turned deathly pale when he heard about the death of the Platoon Commander. Holding on to the carriage door, he looked towards the city walls, where he saw that there was indeed a raging fire against a backdrop of purplish clouds.

The 4,000 men that Yang Qiu had brought along had filled in for half of the spots at the top of the city walls. At first, in order to have a hold over Huo Lingyun, he had arranged to place the fiercely strong men under his command there too. Who could have known that they would be so easily killed by the Garrison Troops?

Yang Qiu flew into a sudden rage. "Is he out of his mind?! The heck he's defending the city for? It's not even my fucking city! Bring along your broadswords and head right over to the money vault. If you come across that Old Fang cur, hack him to pieces! Once you're done loading the money and valuables into the chests, leave immediately!"

A flurry of footsteps resonated throughout the city as the bandits' boots trampled over the slurry of snow, sending the slush splattering over the legs of their pants and smearing it with streaks across the hems of their robes. Sounds of whistles fused into one. No one could tell who was who when the several gangs bumped into one another. Without so much a word, all of them first drew their blades to cut the others down to the ground. Puddles and puddles of blood coagulated in the snow. The bandits, in hankering after the money vaults, were all frantic with anxiety.

When Yang Qiu barged into the money vault, he saw stacks upon stacks of treasure chests. He pried open the nearest chest, which was filled to the brim with dazzling gold. All at once, Yang Qiu was frozen in place, unable to move his feet an inch. He gathered them up into his bosom several times and wept with joy. "King Yi really is rich!"

Shen Zechuan had locked off the northwest of Zhongbo, and Yang Qiu was feeling quite suffocated from being boxed in. But now that he had gold, he would be able to bribe his way out of Shen Zechuan's encirclement, even if that meant he had to drop a ton of money to do so.

“Move them, quick.” Yang Qiu stared fixedly at the gold in his arms. “Move them all onto the carriages!”

Yang Qiu’s horse carriages were parked in the money vault’s courtyard, but there were too many chests, and they were all exceedingly heavy. They had only moved half of the chests when Yang Qiu’s fleets could no longer take more. However, he was unwilling to leave the rest of the chests behind, so he had his subordinates go and snatch more carriages.

Having just arrived, Old Fang the Tenth got all anxious the moment he got off his horse carriage. Waving his handkerchief, he yelled, “Block him! Don’t let him leave!”

The door to the money vault was narrow. A great number of bandits, greedy as they were for money, had hidden the gold on them when they were inside moving the chests, only to be slashed to death by Yang Qiu when he found them out. He had already lost his mind and could not tolerate anyone fighting with him over the money. Just as they were moving the chests, Old Fang the Tenth’s fleet of horse carriages entered from the back and mixed in along with the other party’s carriages, forming a jumbled mess that completely blocked off access to the courtyard door.

Leading his men, Old Fang the Tenth leaped his way across the carriages into the courtyard and hacked away at Yang Qiu’s men whenever they encountered one. Yang Qiu’s subordinates were all crowding in the spaces between the carriages, and with their hands full with the chests, they did not even have the chance to fight back. A slash of the blade, and they all toppled over to the ground, dead.

Old Fang the Tenth cursed, “Sneaky son of a bitch! Return the money!”

Wiping away the blood on his face, Yang Qiu kicked the money vault door open and charged in with blade in hand to hack away at the men. They slaughtered one another in this cramped and narrow space. Blood colored the chests a deep shade of red. The carriages at the back were still jostling against one another, knocking over the chests that had yet to be secured in place. Rocks tumbled all over the ground.

“Rocks,” someone shouted. “Why the fuck are these rocks?!”

Yang Qiu and Old Fang the Tenth stopped at the same time and saw the rocks rolling on the grounds. Yang Qiu panicked. Not bothering with killing anymore, he turned and lunged at a horse carriage and smashed a chest open, only to see that it was all rocks inside too. Only a few chests on these dozen or so carriages contained gold; the rest were all rocks. Under the sound of chests being opened, Yang Qiu's legs went weak. He supported himself against the carriage, his eyes so bloodshot they were about to drip with blood.

Old Fang the Tenth looked all around in a fluster. "We've been had!"

A carriage at the entrance of the courtyard suddenly moved as someone stomped it through the door. Following right after, the courtyard door banged shut. Liquid poured down from the top of the walls all around. A bandit who was close by took a sniff, and the color promptly drained from his face as he exclaimed in a panic, "kerosene!"

"Smash down the door." Old Fang the Tenth clung on to the horse carriages and jostled his way to the entrance of the courtyard, where he yelled, "Quick, smash down the door!"

Huo Lingyun stepped on the snow at the top of the wall. The night was so freezing cold his hands had turned blue.

Yang Qiu heard the sound of flint being struck and bellowed, "Huo Lingyun, you son of a bitch—!"

Huo Lingyun clutched a bunch of yellowish papers—these were all notices that King Yi posted outside the yamen. He set those nonsensical lies on fire and, under the glow of the licking flames, said with repulsion to Yang Qiu, "Go to hell."

Trails of fire suddenly blazed forth and swept through the courtyard of the money vault like tempestuous waves. There were not only rocks in the chests but also flammable weeds. The waves of flames engulfed everyone, and Yang Qiu and Old Fang the Tenth struggled in the blaze. They rolled on the ground, cursing Huo Lingyun venomously amidst blood-curdling screams.

Huo Lingyun watched the raging fire. Like belated firecrackers, the sound of splitting and crackling flesh exhilarated him. He roared with laughter under the stench of charred flesh, his eyes equally bloodshot from having stayed up all night.

BURN!

Burn these scums to death.

Power and influence were a bunch of crock. All he ever desired was for these people to pay with their lives! From King Yi to Cuiqing, and from Yang Qiu to Old Fang the Tenth.

Not a single one of them shall get away scot-free!

Left with no means of escape, the bandits pounded on the wall with their arms and wailed in the raging fire. Kerosene got on them as they rolled about, and the inferno tore away their hair and burned them to an unrecognizable crisp. The flames made their way out of the compound, blazing all the way along the eaves of the houses and setting the whole of Fanzhou ablaze.

“Who’s setting the city on fire?” Yin Chang, who was carrying the Platoon Commander’s head in hand, was in such a state of anxiety that he stomped his foot. “The Prefectural Lord still has to pay out of pocket for the damages after it’s done burning!”

Fei Sheng wiped away the bloodstains and looked in the direction where the flames lit up the sky. “Internal strife, huh...”

The city gates had been beached, and no one came to their aid. Distracted and fatigued from shooting all those arrows, the Fanzhou soldiers defending the city did not even put up a decent attempt at resistance the moment they saw the Platoon Commander dead.

Fei Sheng returned to his senses and signaled with his eyes to the Imperial Bodyguards behind him to search the whole city and seize all the firearms.

In the gap of time when Yin Chang was not cussing at others, he had a craving for wine, and he insisted on drinking two cups after the battle was fought and won. He scratched his cheeks with his empty hand and handed the still warm head to Fei Sheng as though he was giving him a gift. “Take him. Keep him well.”

Fei Sheng dodged out of the way to avoid the blood. “Why the hell are you always carrying him around?!”

Looking as though he treasured the thing, Yin Chang said with a cheeky laugh, “Heh heh, hand it over to the Prefectural Lord on returning as evidence for meritorious service rendered.”

Fei Sheng felt a chill run down his spine the moment he thought of that scene. Shen Zechuan wore all white when he sat in the front hall. Push this bloody thing over, and he would have to die if a drop of the blood so much as splattered onto Shen Zechuan’s folding fan. He hurriedly took the head and, while Yin Chang was preoccupied drinking his wine, shoved it to a junior soldier and sent him out to bury it.

Sure enough, the Cizhou garrison troops returned in triumph. Zhou Gui set up a welcome reception by the city gates to receive them; as encouragement for these new soldiers, he had the kitchen prepare a spread of roasted meat and grilled fish to let them eat their fill. While the soldiers stopped at the gates, the commanding general had to enter to meet the Prefectural Lord.

Yin Chang did not even dare to take a sip of his wine today. He followed Fei Sheng into the residence. The door to the study was open, and Kong Ling and the rest were all waiting by the steps. Upon seeing them enter, Kong Ling immediately came forward to welcome them.

“Elder Yin,” Kong Ling smiled at Yin Chang. “A warrior’s treasured blade truly never ages. Looks like you still have it in you!”

Yin Chang was on familiar terms with him. He craned his head to look in and asked softly, “the Prefectural Lord is inside?”

“Waiting for you.” Kong Ling guided them up the steps. Aware that Yin Chang always went weak at the knees whenever he met officials, Kong Ling made a special effort to say to him, “The Prefectural Lord was the one who personally assigned you to this battle, so there’s no need for me to tell you what that sentiment means. Just answer the questions His Lordship asks of you later accordingly. Don’t worry and just relax.”

Fei Sheng answered from the side. “I’ll back Elder Yin, I won’t let him blunder before His Lordship.”

It would have been fine if they hadn’t mentioned it; the moment they did, Yin Chang’s legs turned into jelly. He placed his hands on the steps for support in a panic, scrambled to his feet with an “oh, my”, and asked after Kong Ling, “What’s His Lordship gonna ask? What if I can’t answer?!”

Kong Ling turned back and was just about to answer when Yin Chang’s body odor – the result of not bathing for two months – hit him full-on and made him so dizzy he could not continue the conversation. Earlier, he had been standing somewhere windy to receive them and so did not notice the smell, but now that they were already standing right before the hanging screen, it was too late to withdraw.

Kong Ling threw Fei Sheng a look.

Why didn’t you remind Elder Yin to take a bath?!

Fei Sheng felt suffocated with aggravation building up in his chest. He wanted to respond, I told him to but he wouldn’t do it so what was I supposed to do. This crafty old man even had a ton of excuses at his disposal. What was that about winter being too cold and it was more practical to be dirty since they had to march the troops to war and the accumulation of dirt could keep them warm and prevent their feet from freezing in their sleep and all that hogwash.

The hanging screen had already been lifted, so Kong Ling could only enter. Out of habit, Yin Chang lifted his leg to stride across the threshold, only to realize that this doorway had no threshold. With Yao Wenyu in a wheelchair, Shen Zechuan had long gotten someone to tear down the thresholds inside and outside the residence. Yin Chang gently set his foot down and shuffled in.

Shen Zechuan had seen Yin Chang before, but it had been from a distance away. Previously, when the garrison troops had yet to be rebuilt, the Imperial Army was the one who fought against the bandits from Mount Luo. Later, during the period when the garrison troops were recruiting, Shen Zechuan made several consecutive trips outdoors, so both men could more or less recognize the other.

Shen Zechuan was wearing a wide-sleeved robe over his regular wear today in a shade so white he looked ethereally pure and untainted. He sat in the master's seat and watched as Yin Chang entered.

Kong Ling said, "Your Lordship, this is—"

Kong Ling had not even finished his words when Yin Chang fell to his knees on the ground. A series of "thud, thud, thud" rang out as the old man kowtowed repeatedly in Shen Zechuan's direction. This has all gone to the dogs, Fei Sheng thought as he kneeled to kowtow too. Once he was done, he hurried to help Yin Chang up. But how would the advisors behind them know what was going on? They had only just entered when they saw those in front of them kneeling, and thinking that the Prefectural Lord was in a rage, they followed suit and kneeled too.

The atmosphere in the hall turned weird. The Prefectural Lord – suspected of being enraged – grasped his folding fan, the words he was about to say all but cut off by their kowtows. He floundered, for it wouldn't do for him to remain seated, and it wouldn't do for him to stand up either.

Yao Wenyu was quick to react. He bent over from his wheelchair and spoke gently to Yin Chang before him, "Elder Yin headed into battle and narrowly escaped death, so it is not unusual for you to feel worked up upon seeing His Lordship. But your return in triumph today is a joyful occasion, so let us not be so somber."

From the side, Yao Wenyu's words appeared to be praising Shen Zechuan's judicious selection of a general, which inspired such gratitude in the old general that he was moved to the point of tears. At the same time, he was also telling the advisors at the back that this pair of master and servant was on good terms with each other and that all was well between them.

It was then Shen Zechuan figured out what to say. "It has been hard advancing the army. Fei Sheng, help Elder Yin up. Gentlemen, please get up as well and sit as you would."

Fei Sheng helped Yin Chang up, but how would Yin Chang dare to look at Shen Zechuan? He exercised the caution he applied in battle and did not even dare to breathe too hard.

Kong Ling was between laughter and tears. What had initially been a pretty relaxed atmosphere was destroyed by this one kneel of Yin Chang, and now everyone was finding it ill-advised to be all smiles.

Fortunately, Shen Zechuan had sway over the atmosphere in the hall. He lowered his voice and was much gentler than usual. He was in no rush as he asked Yin Chang about the food and clothing while on the move and the weather on their journey back. After a series of questions and answers, Yin Chang's answers flowed a lot more smoothly.

It was then Shen Zechuan cut to the chase.

Fei Sheng had initially planned on covering it up, but Yin Chang's body odor was just too strong. It was not that big of a deal for the old man to skip bathing for two months, but having just returned from the battlefield, they were reeking all over from head to toe with the stench of blood, a stench which was presently being amplified by the heat within the hall.

Sitting downwards of Kong Ling, Yu Xiaozai was listening to the exchange when he suddenly caught a whiff of a certain odor. Distracted, he attempted to decipher the scent, thinking that it was similar to a mix of rancid rice and stinky feet, and yet it also resembled salted fish soaking in swill. It was a smell like he had never smelled before, a one-of-a-kind odor like nothing else. What's more, this odor – sharp and intense – was a force to behold. In no time, it pervaded the entire hall and lingered at such intensity that Fei Sheng, who had an acute sense of smell, near about fainted.

Shen Zechuan's expression remained unchanged throughout.

Anyone else could cover their noses with their sleeves, but not Shen Zechuan. Yin Chang had fought the battle for him, so if he were to reveal any hint of disdain here, he would be hurting the old man's feelings. Moreover, in consideration of the earlier defeat, the rewards accorded to Yin Chang were not all that generous, at least on the surface. If Shen Zechuan were to cover his nose, that would give those beneath him the guts to belittle Yin Chang.

Unaware of what it was like around him due to his odor, Yin Chang gesticulated wildly as he told Shen Zechuan about the firearms in Fanzhou, his excitement increasing as he rambled on.

Xiao Chiye, who had been staying over at the Beiyuan military drill grounds for the past few days, was late to arrive. He had hurried over for the specific purpose of meeting this old man when he heard of the latter's return. Having made his way under the eaves, he did away with the briefing.

Gu Jin was helping Xiao Chiye remove his coat when he took a sudden sniff and revealed a horrified expression. Seeing the change in Gu Jin's expression, Xiao Chiye asked in puzzlement, "what's wrong?"

Before Gu Jin could respond, he heard a "CRASH" from the hall, followed by Yu Xiaozai's panicked voice. "Why'd he faint?!"

Fei Sheng, having heard of Xiao Chiye's arrival, was worried that Xiao Chiye would also catch a whiff of the odor when he entered. After all, the person sitting here was Shen Zechuan; he could not afford to shoulder the responsibility should something happen to Shen Zechuan due to the stench. Yin Chang had fought a winning battle, so everyone would not blame the old man for sure. That meant that they could only settle the score with him, Old Fei the Tenth. It couldn't be helped. Who asked him to be the Attendant Officer?! Everyone around them was close to getting overwhelmed by the stench. This was truly too gross an injustice for Fei Sheng. And so, he simply went the whole hog and made the first move to collapse and play dead before Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan immediately lifted his folding fan and put on the impressive air of a commander commanding his magnificent army. With calm and composure, he said, "Hurry, help him to the side hall and call for the physician to take a look at him. Elder Yin must be tired after the journey. Chengfeng, send someone to prepare warm water for Elder Yin. Once Elder Yin has bathed and rested, we can start the banquet."

The moment Yin Chang heard the mention of a bath, he just about jumped in alarm. "Your Lordship, I don't—"

Xiao Chiye called out from outside, “Qiao Tianya.”

“Got it.” Qiao Tianya bent to enter and simply hoisted Yin Chang over his shoulder. As the old man struggled, he laughed, “Elder Yin, happy new year. Time for a bath now!”

The gentlemen in the hall were so relieved that they did not even need Shen Zechuan to say the word before they hurriedly stood up to open the windows. The rush of cool breeze across their faces felt so refreshing that everyone sucked in a deep breath all at the same time.

 Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

CHAPTER 200 : BANQUET

No one could have expected it to take Yin Chang nearly four hours to take a bath. All the gentlemen in the study waited until they were famished. Yu Xiaozai glanced at the snacks on the table, his stomach growling incessantly.

“Youjing.” Shen Zechuan extracted himself from Cizhou’s affairs and said, “Dunzhou will serve as the supply camp when we mobilize troops to Duanzhou in the second month. Tantai Hu doesn’t have a clue about the workings of the yamen, so you will still have to go over and keep an eye on things. I’ll give you the authority to undertake inspection tours. If anything crops up, you can report directly to my desk without the need to go through the relay stations.”

Yu Xiaozai was a Chief Surveillance Bureau Censor who could be considered a student of Cen Yu. In his early years, he had served as a Touring Censor<sup>1</sup> and often carried out fieldwork in local areas. As such, he was very familiar with the ins and outs of the yamen. They were now establishing Dunzhou anew, and the key functionaries assigned over were newcomers selected by Cizhou; using them did not feel all that reassuring. Shen Zechuan did not retain Yu Xiaozai in Dunzhou as the Investigating Circuit; instead, he gave him the authority to conduct inspection tours and report directly back to him. Although Yu Xiaozai still did not have a definite official post, he carried a lot of weight. This was equivalent to the current Surveillance Commissioner in Zhongbo, who held sway over the various prefectures and circuits’ local administration assessments.

Yu Xiaozai hurriedly retracted his gaze from the snacks and rose to bow to Shen Zechuan.

“It hasn’t been long since Dunzhou was newly established,” Xiao Chiye said to Yu Xiaozai as he sat beside Shen Zechuan. “As someone in a military post, Tantai Hu should not be interfering with the affairs of the yamen, but manpower is lacking in the various prefectures, so we are doing away with the taboos for now. He’s a tad obtuse in this area, so he will need you to advise him as much as you can when it comes to the major issues.”

Tantai Hu was a trusted subordinate of Xiao Chiye. Delegating him to a lower position in Dunzhou was because they needed him to fill in the vacant post of general in Zhongbo. Getting him to guard Dunzhou could actually be considered as doing him an injustice, but with this layer of connection, no one in the Dunzhou yamen dared to defy Tantai Hu. By saying what he had, Xiao Chiye was actually backing Yu Xiaozai. Now that Yu Xiaozai had an appointment from Shen Zechuan to conduct inspections tours and make direct reports in addition to Xiao Chiye’s words, he no longer had anyone to fear when he made his rounds in Dunzhou. It would also help his cause when he headed down to the other prefectures in the future.

Yu Xiaozai was practically radiating with delight, but it would not do for him to be standing here and wear his heart too much on his sleeve, so he held his joy in check and bowed again to both of them. “This humble subject will definitely do my best to live up to the Prefectural Lord and the Second Master’s kindness.”

Yu Xiaozai’s answer was loud and clear, but so was the response from his tummy too. Their duet was so resounding that the study was stunned into silence.

“It’s the celebratory banquet for the garrison troops tonight.” Shen Zechuan saw it was already getting dark. “So I shall not hold you gentlemen back. Let’s start the feast.”

The feast was set up in the side hall. Initially, Shen Zechuan was supposed to be in the host seat, but Xiao Chiye was back now, and Yin Chang had still yet to show up, so he simply sat for a while as a gesture of appreciation before he took his leave. Most of those present were the advisors, and they did not dare to drink and let themselves go in Shen Zechuan’s presence. With the Prefectural Lord gone for the night, they were a little more at ease.

Qiao Tianya was not around, and with no one keeping an eye on him, Yao Wenyu, unable to turn down the warm invitations of the various advisors to drink up, took a few cups too.

Seeing him in a rare moment of relaxation, Qiao Tianya did not stride across the door but let down the hanging screen at the door and accompanied him under the eaves instead.

Having found Qiao Tianya, Fei Sheng beckoned to him from afar and said across the fine snow, "Let's go. What are you standing here like a pole for? There's a table set up in the duty room too. Everyone's waiting for you."

Qiao Tianya did not move. He looked a little unrestrained as he leaned against the doorpost, "Has everything been arranged on Master's end?"

"Of course, they have to be." Fei Sheng walked over to Qiao Tianya and looked through the gap in the hanging screen. "The various gentlemen tend to break up late, so you can still make it on time when you come around later. Besides, there are guards both on the inside and outside. Nothing bad will happen."

Qiao Tianya thought for a moment and lifted the screen. Yao Wenyu looked over from the other side, as if he knew someone was here waiting. After a short pause, Qiao Tianya lowered the screen and said, "I still have a few jars of fine wine in my room. You can send someone to get them. Consider it a token of my apology to everyone."

Fei Sheng stood still at the side for a moment before he merely said, "Who cares about those few jars of yours? How boring. Master has already released us from duty today, and yet you still keep yourself here." Having drunk a little, he was much more talkative than he usually was. "Master gave me the assignment to recruit newcomers a few days back. Do you know about it?"

Qiao Tianya folded his arms and sized Fei Sheng up with his eyes. "Yeah."

Fei Sheng raised a finger to point at himself before pointing at Qiao Tianya. Holding in a burp, he said, "Let me say a word in all honesty. We'll be building a cavalry in Duanzhou in the future. Master favors you the most, since you're pretty good at fighting after all. But look at you now; how did you come to this? You follow Yao Wenyu around as though you have forgotten where your roots are. If you go on like this, you will ruin your own future, sooner or later."

Snow fell onto the hilt of Qiao Tianya's blade. He looked at the courtyard and said absent-mindedly, "This is where my future lies. You're worrying too much."

"The Grand Mentor gave you to Master." Fei Sheng lowered his voice, disappointed with him for not living up to expectations. "The day Master took you in, he also received Yang Shan Xue."

Qiao Tianya once swore to be Shen Zechuan's blade. Courage, insight, temperament, skills—he did not lack them all. Had he been willing, he could have been the kind of guard in Zhongbo like Zhao Hui and Chen Yang were. His future would be bright, with boundless prospects, and restoring his clan to its former glory would not be just a dream. But ever since he was assigned to Yao Wenyu's side, he had lost that desire. The tasks Shen Zechuan had handed over to Fei Sheng to recruit new soldiers and accompany Yin Chang's troops to Fanzhou as the Attendant Officer were all assignments Qiao Tianya did not want.

Qiao Tianya blew away the snowflakes drifting towards him and watched as the wind instantaneously swept them away into the pitch-black night, where they disappeared. He did not brush away the snow on his blade, nor did he answer Fei Sheng.

Xiao Chiye removed his armor and wore just a single piece of unlined garment as he read Fei Sheng's report, which included the details of the deployment of troops to Fanzhou. "To think King Yi could even get his hands on firearms. His capability is astounding."

"One hundred and thirty-five pieces." Shen Zechuan shed off his wide-sleeved robe. "They all come from the Chunquan Battalion, and there are even numbers from the Ministry of War engraved on them."

"He's just a mere mountain bandit without a proper army." Xiao Chiye set his arms on the chair handles and watched as Shen Zechuan undressed. "Who supplied him with such valuable stuff?"

Shen Zechuan's robe slid across the crooks of his arms and fell to the woolen rug. His regular wear had pearl clasps, which made subtle "pop" sounds as he flicked them open. That fair, smooth nape of his promptly materialized. Shen Zechuan covered it partially with his fingers, looking as though he was considering something. He was so unguarded in this slack moment it was as if he would not resist even if he were to be pinned down onto the rug, and with his mind preoccupied with other matters, he appeared all the more seductive.

“It does not benefit Qudu in any way for the firearms to be on the loose out there. It must have been stolen.”

Shen Zechuan’s Adam’s apple would bob when he was speaking. Xiao Chiye gazed at it without so much a change in expression; he was exceedingly familiar with it. Each time Shen Zechuan dripped with perspiration, he had the habit of tilting his head up and exposing his neck. This was because Xiao Chiye was too tall. Even if Shen Zechuan was lying on the bedding, he still had to meet Xiao Chiye’s kisses in such a way.

Xiao Chiye conjured up many scenes in his mind, but his expression was so composed and collected that he betrayed nothing of what he was thinking. His thumb was subconsciously caressing his thumb ring, rotating it gently. “Did Yin Chang bring back a captive?” he asked.

“King Yi’s male lover with the surname Huo. Chengfeng said that he’s the son of Huo Qing, the former commander-in-chief of Dengzhou.” Having spoken to this point, Shen Zechuan looked at Xiao Chiye. “We can take a look at him tomorrow morning.”

“This person used firearms to scare Yin Chang into retreating,” Xiao Chiye said. “Looks like he knows how to use it.”

“Someone must have taught him. Shen Zechuan undid the last of the pearl clasp, and when he released his hand, his regular wear slid to the ground.

The beauty, finally comfortable now, kicked off the wooden clogs on his feet in passing. With his back to the dim light and narrow waist revealed, he was like the personification of gorgeousness who could not be contained by his clothes. Xiao Chiye tasted secret pleasure. This was just like foreplay between the two of them not privy to others. His desire for Lanzhou gradually crept into his chest, filling it up.

“Send a few pieces of firearms to Libei tomorrow morning. The military craftsmen can draw up a blueprint. Hairigu learned Yin Chang’s formation on the sly back at the Beiyuan military drill grounds, and I couldn’t counter his moves. When we mobilize troops to Duanzhou this time, I want Yin Chang to follow along.” Xiao Chiye tossed Fei Sheng’s report on the desk.

Shen Zechuan, who was holding up the tea to take a sip, glanced at Xiao Chiye on hearing him and asked meaningfully, “are you not taking me along?”

“Sure,” Xiao Chiye said frivolously as he faced Shen Zechuan.

“There’s a ferocious tiger<sup>2</sup> back at home who usually keeps a tight watch on me, so I can only get up to some hanky-panky with you while the troops are on the march.”

Wickedness twinkled at the corners of Shen Zechuan’s upturned eyes.

“Your wife is so fierce. I’m scared.”

Xiao Chiye imitated Shen Zechuan’s tone the last time, “I’m fierce too.”

“I’m not afraid of you being fierce.” Shen Zechuan held up and pressed the folding fan between their lips. Like a fox from outside, he said, “But you only come over once in a blue moon.”

Xiao Chiye tilted his head slightly. “What can I do? I’m but a henpecked husband who fears my wife.”

“If it were me...” Shen Zechuan shifted away his folding fan and leaned close to Xiao Chiye’s lips, where he softly said, “I’ll stay at home all day longing for you, making love to you under the sheets, stirring up a storm with you...”

Xiao Chiye kissed Shen Zechuan, breaking up those shameless words of his. He felt his way down, but did not find Shen Zechuan’s tail. The light in the room dimmed a little, and the hanging drapes of the bed had long been let down. There was clearly no one else around, yet they both seemed to be having a clandestine affair. Both men rubbed up against the other, suppressing their gasps for breath.

“I want all of you,” Xiao Chiye whispered.

Shen Zechuan was bitten to the point of tears. The side of his face chafed against the bedding. Under Xiao Chiye’s gaze, he strained himself to look at Xiao Chiye with wet, glistening eyes and said in a fit of pique, “You... greedy... cad!”

Xiao Chiye had spent nearly two months on the battlefields, and when he returned to Cizhou, he stayed over at the Beiyuan military drill grounds. As he pinched Shen Zechuan’s chin now, he stared at him and whispered with a smile, “You’re absolutely right.”

Shen Zechuan was taken—possessed by Xiao Chiye.

After so long a time, it felt completely different this time. The change in Xiao Chiye was exhibited on full display right here. He no longer let Shen Zechuan off. The feeling of being invaded and possessed from bottom to top gave Shen Zechuan the sensation that he had completely fallen; he was now Xiao Chiye's captive.

His heartbeats. His voice. His breaths.

Xiao Chiye wanted all of Shen Zechuan, even as he dominated him.

Shen Zechuan could not endure it anymore. Sweat and tears interweaved. He could barely catch his breath now. Xiao Chiye even had to seize away tears he had yet to shed.

Xiao Chiye once wanted the sky, the grasslands, and also the Hongyan Mountains. He domesticated eagles and tamed horses, and he galloped among the vast lands in the dreams. But in the end, he no longer wanted them all.

He wanted Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan began to cry. He raised his head, his expressive eyes glistening with waves of emotions. At the peak of his euphoria, he slurred, "A... Ye..."

Xiao Chiye thought he was afraid.

But Shen Zechuan lifted his chin slightly, his face flushed as he licked his lips wet. "Oh, how I love you so."

These words were both his madness and his solace, either of which could easily vanquish Xiao Chiye. The temptation that glistened in this pair of eyes was so much like that day in Dunzhou, when he had leaped from Fuxian Peak into Xiao Chiye's arms. The expressions in those eyes were just as equally crazed. Even without the blistering wind and raging fire, he was bad to the bone.

For this, Xiao Chiye had feigned anger. At the same time, he was extraordinarily delighted. He had in his bosom, the one and only Shen Lanzhou in the world.

Xiao Chiye bent down to kiss Shen Zechuan, as though he was shackling him. He did not want Shen Zechuan to leave him by even half an inch amidst the jolts, nor did he want Shen Zechuan to break free of his hold amidst the gasps for breath. Every thrust went in deeper and harder, never lighter, making the bedding damp, and making Shen Zechuan tremble.

They went wild with abandon in the dimness, their sweats merging together into an expanse of dampness. There was nothing left but each other.

The damp night stirred among the dappled shadows of the trees, and the bamboo blinds came to a silent rest. There was no one waiting in attendance on the veranda, so the whispered confidence in the room remained concealed within the hanging drapes. Bamboo tubes in the courtyard tilted, discharging cool water among the snowflakes and scouring over the frozen moss. Meng folded its wings and rested on the beam in the hallway. It tilted its head to listen for a moment, then tilted its head back into place and closed its eyes to sleep. Occasionally, the caws of a jackdaw rang out, but even that could not disturb the pair of lovers deep in the throes of their passion.

Yao Wenyu pillowed his head on Qiao Tianya's back. With some difficulty, he opened his eyes and looked at the overcast sky. "The stars are right within reach..."<sup>3</sup>

"Rest up," Qiao Tianya said. "There are no stars tonight."

Light snow of the night caressed his face. Yao Wenyu reached out and grabbed at the empty air. The blend of the smell of wine on him and the aroma of medicine puffed onto the side of Qiao Tianya's ear as he suddenly spoke. "What are you all red for?"

Qiao Tianya did not answer.

"What are you all hot for?"

Qiao Tianya still did not answer.

Yao Wenyu bowed his head down and buried his face into the back of Qiao Tianya's shoulder. He mumbled, "what good is of talent to me? Getting nowhere with these legs of mine, as unclear as the path ahead lies..."<sup>4</sup> With no lofty aspirations to speak of... a blessed man I am not..."

Qiao Tianya stepped across the thin snow with the soles of his boots making soft squeaking sounds.

Yao Wenyu clapped his palm together in tandem with the sound of snow and murmured, "Since time immemorial, dead are the sages and men of virtues; only the reputation of the drinkers endures..."<sup>5</sup>

Qiao Tianya felt his own nape getting wet. He knew that was not the snow melting, but even so, he said, "The snow's getting in. Block it out for me, will you?"

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Novel || Author || JJWXC || Audio Drama

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 巡察御史 Touring Censor, a duty assignment for Investigating Censors twice a year to tour and inspect governmental operations in the various regions and to provide data for consideration in the promotion and demotion of local officials.
2. A 母老虎 (Xiao Chiye used 悍虎 here) back at home usually refer to a man's wife who is a tigress or a shrew.
3. 手可摘星辰 a line from a poem "Lodging for a Night at a Mountain Temple" (夜宿山寺) by Li Bai.
4. Since this whole line seemed to us like it has multiple layers of meaning, we just going to footnote them here :V

天生我究竟何用: a modification of 天生我才必有用, or "everyone has his own heaven-endowed talent", so in this vein, the line can be read as "what good is of talent to me?" Although another way of reading this line (albeit more literally) is "why am I born?", "what is the meaning of my existence?".

行不通，道不明: first part 行不通 can be translated as "can't walk" or "getting nowhere", while the typical translation for 道不明 (as in 说不清，道不明) refer to "can't explain oneself clear", personally tho, 道 could also refer to the philosophical "Way" Yao Wenyu was talking about in an earlier chapter, especially in relation to the earlier "getting nowhere" phrase. (i.e. feeling lost about his "Way" in life).

5. A modification from the line 古来圣贤皆寂寞，唯有饮者留其名 from the poem, Qiang Jin Jiu (将进酒) by Li Bai.

CHAPTER 201 : INTENSE DESIRE

Shen Zechuan could not get up; the inside of his thighs were all covered with teeth marks. He slept with Xiao Chiye on top of him, pinning him down, until the third quarter of the hour of si. When Fei Sheng came to call him, Shen Zechuan had still yet to wake. Xiao Chiye lowered his head to kiss him from behind, his kisses so intense that Shen Zechuan near about gave up the ghost.

“Please spare me...” Shen Zechuan strained himself to struggle before he eventually sprawled back onto the bedding. He narrowed his eyes and said to Xiao Chiye in a hoarse voice, “I... mind’s in a whirl... can’t think at all...”

Shen Zechuan was red everywhere. There were the bite marks, and then there were the pinch marks. His nape was the most piteous of all, having borne the brunt of it. Xiao Chiye’s chest pressed against him, making him so hot that he was sweating.

The most intense of all last night had been sitting in an embrace—in Xiao Chiye’s arms, with the crooks of his legs held down in place, and all he could do was to lean against Xiao Chiye’s chest.

Amidst the jolts and thrusts, Shen Zechuan forgot all about the part about it being a clandestine affair as he cried out “A-Ye” and “Ce’an” repeatedly until he came, even wetting the bedding under him later as he lay prone on the pillow. He could not remember how many rounds they had gone through, only that his tears had run out. Towards the end, he was all dazed and dizzy, but Xiao Chiye was still not done; he continued to thrust into Shen Zechuan, making him moan softly like he was begging for mercy. The way his moans trailed off tantalized Xiao Chiye right in the heart, causing such an insatiable itch that Xiao Chiye was stirred into biting him yet again.

“Poor thing.” Xiao Chiye clung close to him and whispered, “I’ll hold you up.”

Yin Chang got up early today and waited at the foot of the veranda to seek an audience with the Prefectural Lord. Fei Sheng saw the old man looking utterly uncomfortable as he glanced left and right. Fearing that he might make a fool of himself later, he said, “You’ve already met him yesterday. Why are you still nervous?”

The icicles on the eaves had been knocked off to reveal just how distinguished the man in the room was. Yin Chang’s feet were a little numb. He tugged at his sleeves and said, “I feel uncomfortable everywhere. They rubbed me so hard with such big bars of soap when giving me a bath yesterday that my skin’s about to get all wrinkly!”

On hearing this, Fei Sheng wanted to laugh. Seven or eight young male servants were sent to attend to Yin Chang yesterday. They bathed him for a full four hours, and even changed out several big tubs of hot water. It was only in the middle of the night when everyone left the banquet that the old man made his escape, holding up the legs of his pants as he ran while evading the servants.

“Bathing is good,” Fei Sheng said. “You look spirited. I think you look just like my elder brother today.”

“Don’t fucking lie to me.” Yin Chang did not have a good night’s sleep. He murmured to Fei Sheng, “You lad, have a glib tongue.” Having said that, he looked around furtively again, “Is the Second Master in the room too?”

“Uh-huh,” Fei Sheng replied. “He rushed back just to meet you.”

“Then can I go to Libei?” Yin Chang hurriedly asked. “I’d like to meet General Lu.”

Fei Sheng was in a predicament. He did not know how to reply to him. Yin Chang’s desire to see Lu Guangbai was only to be expected. That formation of his was adapted from the Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops, but Libei was fighting a war at present, and the areas along the Chashi River were unstable, so how could Yin Chang run around as he pleased?

As he was thinking about it, there were movements on the other side.

“Let’s see His Lordship first,” Fei Sheng said. “We’ll talk about it again after meeting him.”

A window was opened from inside to ventilate the room. The weather was not considered cold today, but Shen Zechuan was especially sensitive to the chill, so he layered up with a coat. During the journey back, Fei Sheng had checked up on Huo Lingyun’s background and reported it all in its entirety to Shen Zechuan, regardless of significance. Shen Zechuan did not have the time to read it before sleeping the night before, so he looked through it carefully now.

“The firearms seized by Fei Sheng were handed over by Huo Lingyun himself.” Shen Zechuan turned the folding fan between his fingers around and rested it on the side of his hand. “This person is interesting; I do have to meet him.”

All that separated Xiao Chiye from Shen Zechuan was a small table. With his arm propped up, Xiao Chiye looked a little playful, but the expression in his eyes was wicked. Just a glance over was an invasion. His eyes swept back and forth between the words “male lover”, “bitten to death” and “arson”. He said, “he’s a tough nut.”

If Huo Lingyun had not thrown a monkey wrench into their plans with the firearms, Yin Chang would have been able to take down Fanzhou during his first battle; he would not have given Shen Zechuan the opportunity to even tell him to bring his own head on a platter to meet him. Afterward, Yin Chang employed the use of verbal provocation to launch an attack on the city, thereby stepping onto the battlefield for real this time. But Huo Lingyun’s acts of arson diminished the battle in Fanzhou. With merits and demerits offsetting the other, Yin Chang’s reward was once again reduced by half.

Perhaps Huo Lingyun genuinely wanted to throw in his lot with Shen Zechuan, but he did not use the most optimal strategy. Instead, he fought a battle with firearms with the intent of letting Shen Zechuan know he was useful and even more valuable than the current commanding general of Cizhou. People who climbed their way to the top by trampling over others were all tough nuts to crack.

Yao Wenyu was the first to enter while they were in the middle of their conversation. Kong Ling followed behind him, pushing his wheelchair, and finally, Yu Xiaozai stepped through. The various gentlemen bowed to Shen Zechuan, who prompted them to take a seat.

"It's so cold," Shen Zechuan said to Yao Wenyu, "You should have asked Qiao Tianya to come over and drop me a note, and I would have shifted the meeting venue to your courtyard so that you wouldn't have to make the trip."

Yao Wenyu did not sleep well the night before, and his eyes were slightly bloodshot. He had even brought his cat along today. "It's just a stone's throw away; there's no need to go to the extent of having Your Lordship put everyone to the trouble. I saw Elder Yin and Fei Sheng both waiting at the foot of the veranda. Will you let them in for an audience now?"

"Let them in," Shen Zechuan said. "I've kept Elder Yin waiting for almost an hour."

Fei Sheng led Yin Chang in to pay their obeisances to Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye. No matter how worried he was about Yin Chang, he did not dare to glance over at this moment, lest the master noticed.

Xiao Chiye looked at Yin Chang and asked, "Did Elder Yin sleep well last night?"

This was the first time Yin Chang was meeting Xiao Chiye. He had not taken a good look yesterday, but now that he had a closer look... holy moly, he thought to himself, isn't this Second Master way too tall? His legs as he sat on the couch were almost as long as two of him!

Yin Chang tensed up again. Wringing the hem of his clothes, he vaguely answered, "not, not too bad..."

"Elder Yin, take a seat too." Shen Zechuan was aware that Xiao Chiye was an imposing presence, and he did not come across as an easy one to get along with; thus, he spoke to Yin Chang gently, "We will be discussing some military affairs with the various gentlemen today. With the troops soon to be deployed to Duanzhou, Fanzhou cannot be left unattended."

"Based on the report, Huo Lingyun is inextricably tied to this battle at Fanzhou." Kong Ling was familiar with Dengzhou. "He could be considered to have come from a military family. His father was Huo Qing, the commander-in-chief of Dengzhou who repelled the bandits in the territory during the sixth year of Xiande. The feud with Yang Qiu and the rest of Dengzhou's bandits was probably formed during that time."

“I have some impression of Huo Qing.” Yu Xiaozai picked up the thread of conversation after taking his seat. “During the suppression of bandits in the sixth year of the reign of Xiande, he submitted a memorial that could be considered a report of victory to the Ministry of War. However, in the next few years, the Prefectural Prefect of Dengzhou impeached him for being a headstrong and conceited commander who resorted to arms without due consideration, which in turn caused the bandits in the territory to seek revenge on the commoners, subsequently plunging Dengzhou into extreme misery. The Ministry of War deliberated over and over again before they finally did away with the notion to promote him.”

Shen Zechuan got Fei Sheng to stand up as he addressed the gentlemen. “The local governments are a mixed bag. From the time the two factions of Pan and Hua took over control of state power, the impeachments that came from the lower levels were a mess, with the majority of them arising from personal grudges. The procedures in which the cases were handled during the reign of Xiande can’t be counted as valid, so this Huo Qing might not necessarily be a headstrong and conceited person.”

Shen Zechuan was right. Apart from the reason for his dislike for Emperor Xiande, it was true that both factions were as irreconcilable as ice and fire when they were in power. At that time, Qudu depended on side-taking to distinguish between enemy and ally, and the dividing line in the local governments was even rigid. So a conclusion on whether Huo Qing’s impeachment was legitimate could not be made based on just those few memorials.

“Huo Qing is Huo Qing. Huo Lingyun is Huo Lingyun.” Xiao Chiye had now drawn a clear distinction between father and son. “You people were the ones who detained him and escorted him back. What did you think of him during the journey?”

Yin Chang was an honest man with a one-track mind. Fei Sheng did not let the old man speak, but he could tell from Xiao Chiye’s words that the Second Master did not like this Huo Lingyun. He did not like Huo Lingyun either.

Fei Sheng served Shen Zechuan, and he had plenty of opportunities to render meritorious service in the future when they established a light cavalry, but Yin Chang might not necessarily have the chance. The old man’s hair and beard were all white now, and he only got to battle this one time after waiting several years. But then, a male consort appeared out of nowhere and took most of the old man's credit with that bit of dirty, underhanded tricks of his.

Fei Sheng was displeased deep down, but his expression was natural as he said, "For the sake of revenge, this person could endure great hardships and steel himself to achieve his goals. He sure is something, and I respect him as a man. But when I arrived at the Fanzhou's yamen, I saw the furs of the mastiffs King Yi reared all glossy. Only when I asked around that I found out Huo Lingyun had fed King Yi and Cuiqing to the dogs. Since he has a feud with King Yi, why didn't he communicate with us earlier?"

By bringing up Huo Lingyun's feeding of people to the dogs at this point in time, he was tactfully telling Shen Zechuan in a roundabout way that it was hard for this person to be of great use.

Contrary to Fei Sheng's expectations, Shen Zechuan did not go along with it. Instead, he said after a moment's pause, "Since everyone is here now, call him over."

Huo Lingyun had been in the cell for two days, and the wardens who delivered his meals to him never spoke to him. Fei Sheng took special care of him and tampered with his fetters and shackles so that it was much heavier than the usual ones the others used. But he hardly moved around and merely remained in the same spot, as though he had countless never-ending thoughts on his mind.

Huo Lingyun stepped into the courtyard, and Gu Jin sensed something amiss from the sound. With Ding Tao and Li Xiong in tow, he watched from under the eaves as Huo Lingyun walked past.

"So heavy." Li Xiong pointed at Huo Lingyun's feet and said to Ding Tao, "it's the set of chains I wore!"

"Seems to me he can move freely." Ding Tao told on Huo Lingyun to Gu Jin. "Jin-ge, he's trained in martial arts!"

He was far from just "trained".

Gu Jin lifted a finger and motioned to the guards hidden in the courtyard to be on the alert. He patted Ding Tao and Li Xiong on their backs and pushed the two children to a side, while he stood by the hanging screen himself and signaled to Qiao Tianya, who was on the other end, with his eyes.

Qiao Tianya turned his head aside to stare at Huo Lingyun's back. In a deep voice, he said, "He's a rather formidable one."

Shen Zechuan did not size Huo Lingyun up. However, Huo Lingyun did not shy away from sizing up Shen Zechuan first.

The Prefectural Lord was twenty-two years of age this year. He was a beautiful one, with the upturns of the corners of his eyes just perfect; any higher, and they would give him a come-hither look. Even so, they looked like they were swimming in emotions at a quick glance. Yet, he was extraordinarily cool and detached. His gaze, when he did look over, was chilling. He was an unfathomable, bottomless pit that looked all the more dangerous the longer you laid eyes on him. Huo Lingyun did not know if it was because Shen Zechuan had been in a top dog position for a long time, but Shen Zechuan had an overpowering air to him when he did not speak. Not the kind that came assaulting head-on in the face, but the kind that gradually grew ice-cold as it crept along your limbs to your heart.

This was Shen Zechuan.

Since Shen Zechuan did not open his mouth, the gentlemen present did not dare to speak. Silence momentarily reigned in the room, making Huo Lingyun appear undaunted instead.

Xiao Chiye nudged his thumb ring. His posture remained unchanged, but his imposing aura was like a kick dealt to Huo Lingyun's face. He looked askance at Huo Lingyun with an air so oppressive that the other man almost could not lift his head.

Shen Zechuan was the precious jade Xiao Chiye held between his fangs. Any sort of prying eyes must die before they ever get within a few steps of Shen Zechuan. This was an affront to Xiao Chiye, and he was now offended, even if the other party was perhaps only looking out of curiosity.

The gentlemen in the room could hear nothing amiss, but they could sense that the Second Master was not very happy now. Very subtly, the atmosphere began to grow heavy, so much that it crushed down on their chests for no rhyme or reason, suffocating them until they could not take deep breaths.

"Your confession statements leave out the details." It was only at this moment Shen Zechuan looked at Huo Lingyun. "You reported the firearms, but you didn't explain their origins. It's most pointless to say things halfway."

As someone who had traversed both the overland and water routes,<sup>1</sup> Huo Lingyun could figure out a little something from the expression in Xiao Chiye's eyes. He retracted his gaze, and the shackles on his hands clanged. “Naturally, there are many matters that can only be discussed when I’ve seen the Prefectural Lord,” he said with a calm expression.

“If what you say makes me unhappy,” Shen Zechuan said with cool detachment, “there can only be one outcome whether or not you get to see me.”

“There will be the Scorpions in addition to the Biansha Cavalry in Duanzhou during Cizhou’s use of military forces in the second month.” Huo Lingyun looked towards Xiao Chiye without so much a trace of fear.

“Without Xiao Fangxu, can the Libei Armored Cavalry still make it?”

The break in the thumb ring stopped between the pulps of the fingers. Xiao Chiye finally moved. Very slowly, he leaned over, and his shadow enveloped Huo Lingyun from top to bottom, forming a trail of a phantom wolf with an injured eye across the ground.

Fei Sheng, who was standing at the side, swiftly dropped to one knee on the ground and lowered his head without uttering a sound. Beside him, Yin Chang felt the pricks of fear running down his back. With his heart thumping, the old man almost slid to the ground as he kneeled after Fei Sheng.

Dead silence descended, inside and outside.

Xiao Chiye was angry.

Xiao Chiye’s reply to Huo Lingyun:

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Novel || Author || JJWXC || Audio Drama

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. The text specifically wrote 走过旱水两路, or literally, has traversed through the overland routes and waterways/water route. This is, however, an euphemism for having sexual experiences with both men and women. We left the original for the “imagery”. (° 5 °)

CHAPTER 202 : CONNECTING THE DOTS

Huo Lingyun had seen wolves before. In the wilderness of Dengzhou, those wolves that were all skin and bones had their tails between their legs as they ran on King Yi's hunting grounds, their eyes glowing with ravenous hunger. But at this moment, the wolf he was seeing was one that hailed from Libei; not only did this wolf possess a strong physique, but it also had an aura so oppressively intimidating that he gripped his chains tight. Even the muscles on his back had tensed up with tension.

Huo Lingyun must not gasp for air, because if he opened his mouth again, Xiao Chiye would throttle him and snap his throat. Xiao Chiye completely dominated the atmosphere around him as he remained kneeling in place. It conjured the illusion of being pinned down by the back of his head.

Xiao Chiye wanted Huo Lingyun on his knees, with his head down.

Huo Lingyun broke out in a sweat as he simmered in that unending silence. He did not want to compromise, but by the time he returned to his senses, he had already averted his gaze and bowed his head.

Since that bout of heavy snowfall, the Libei Armored Cavalry had never won again. The battles they were fighting on the battlegrounds at present all proved to be aggravating. Gone were the days when the Armored Cavalry reigned over the battlefield. Huo Lingyun initially planned to crush Xiao Chiye's spirit and level the playing field for both parties during the negotiations. Yet he had run right smack into an iron plate and was now being held down to the ground by Xiao Chiye instead.

Xiao Chiye's shadow did not shift. His lowered gaze locked on to the back of Huo Lingyun's head as he repeated with cold detachment, "Can it?"

Huo Lingyun clenched his teeth as he deflated and swallowed down his indignation.

To think he had gotten afraid!

Xiao Chiye was completely poles apart from Shen Zechuan. He would not feign civility at certain moments; instead, he would dominate and dictate. He would hold down the heads of all of those who provoked him and offer them only one way out. The Imperial Army in its earlier days knew this very well from experience.

Shen Zechuan covered the teacup with the lid and tapped his fingers against it intermittently. He possessed the ability to warm up the atmosphere after a cold spell, and through this subtle action, he curiously unraveled the tension in the hall, allowing Fei Sheng, who was still kneeling, to resume breathing.

Outside the door, Gu Jin exhaled lightly and released his grip on the hilt of his blade.

It was only until Huo Lingyun's entire back was drenched in sweat that the shadow enveloping him pulled back. Xiao Chiye did not withdraw his gaze; he merely leaned back into his comfort zone, as though he had lost interest in the Huo Lingyun who had his head down.

It was at this moment Shen Zechuan opened up the lid and said in between sips of tea. "You're very well-acquainted with the situation in Duanzhou."

These two men took over from one another seamlessly, yet they both exuded a dangerous aura. Huo Lingyun's palms were all sweaty; he retracted his contempt, all the more certain that he had been right in his decision to come.

"The Scorpions came looking for King Yi before," Huo Lingyun decided to show his sincerity. "During the twelfth month last year, he instigated King Yi to ambush Chazhou and cut off your contact with Qidong. To that end, he gifted King Yi with a shipment of firearms."

In a flash, both Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye thought of the White Scorpions. These Biansha spies concealed themselves deep in Dazhou, collaborating with Amu'er from within and without to pierce through the heart of Dazhou.

The twelfth month of the previous year was the turning point when the Libei Armored Cavalry switched from offensive to defensive. Had King Yi been gutsy enough to launch a surprise attack on Chazhou at the Scorpions' instigation, Shen Zechuan would undoubtedly be held in check by this diversion and reduced his aid to Libei. Additionally, they only had to cut off the route to Chazhou, and Qi Zhuyin would have to make a detour from the eastern side of Tianfei Watchtower to head up north, where she was bound to pass through the territory of Fanzhou. With the Scorpions lying in ambush en route, the Commander-in-chief's life would be in peril.

"They're keeping a close watch on Commander-in-chief Qi." Shen Zechuan looked at Xiao Chiye, the expression in his eyes conveying all the words he left unspoken.

Hasen's encirclement of Xiao Fangxu to kill him was not only to deal a blow to Libei, but also to capitalize on the opportunity to lure out Qi Zhuyin. As expected, Amu'er knew Dazhou like the back of his hand.

"But King Yi didn't make his move. He was most willing to remain in Fanzhou like a cowering coward, and then he had his head blown off by you with a gun." Xiao Chiye's words were scathing. "So, did the Scorpions come looking for you?"

Huo Lingyun stared at both his knees. "No."

"You're lying." Shen Zechuan skimmed the tea foam and raised his eyes to say with certainty through that willowy spiral of steam, "You've had contact with the Scorpions before."

When Shen Zechuan was in the Imperial Bodyguards, he successively served as the Southern and Northern Judge, and the amount of time he had spent in the imperial prison was not exactly short. He naturally had his own means of interrogating people, just like how he had once tricked Ji Lei and Xi Hongxuan through his conversations with them. He was adept at using environments to manipulate the atmosphere.

Sometimes, one had to keep their words short without revealing more than necessary, and the other party would naturally let his thoughts run wild.

Huo Lingyun had to remain clear-headed. If he so much as gave a wrong answer again as he kneeled here, he might end up literally losing his head. He held up against the pressure from both men and exhaled deeply, as if exhorting himself to remain calm. He was already at a dead end, and the worst that could happen was happening now. Thus, when he lifted his head once again, he regained some of his composure.

“That’s right,” Huo Lingyun said. “I’ve had contact with the Scorpions long before King Yi. My father fought a winning battle during the sixth year of Xiande, and he dispatched someone over to persuade my father to give up Fanzhou. He also promised my father a noble title, but my father turned him down.”

Shen Zechuan inclined his head slightly, concealing the lingering redness at the corners of his eyes under the slanting, backlit shadows. “You said ‘he’.”

Not “they”.

Huo Lingyun recalled the night a few years ago, when the horse carriage from Qudu brought along a valuable letter of significance. Huo Qing stood by the candlelight and opened it, where he touched the heavy promise within.

If the Bianjun Commandery was the most wretched station for troops in Qidong, then Dengzhou was the poorest prefecture of Zhongbo. These two places were similarly poor. Dengzhou’s one and only advantage was that it did not have to face the onslaught of attacks from the Biansha Cavalry all the time like the Bianjun Commandery had to. After the Zhongbo’s troops’ defeat, the rampant banditry put Huo Qing in a terrible fix, and he remained stranded in this corner, unable to get any assistance from the imperial court.

That letter was the last chance Huo Qing had to get out of his predicament, but he did not take it and ended up as dinner in the dogs’ bellies.

“Yes, ‘he’.” Huo Lingyun enunciated the word through clenched teeth. “This man is hiding right in Qudu, and he’s by no means an ordinary person if he can make such a promise. After my father refused the bribe, he was impeached by that Peng dog. Consequently, the Ministry of War refused to promote my father. They believed that cursed Peng’s one-sided lies and stopped giving Dengzhou the military funds it was due. That was when the Dengzhou bandits resurfaced. Yang Qiu went to Fanzhou and joined hands with Cuiqing to set up a brothel trade and got back into the business of selling women. He also took the opportunity to make contact with Lei Changming of Mount Luo.”

The dots were all connecting now!

Shen Zechuan remembered his puzzlement when he was checking the Yan Clan's accounts in Dunzhou. How did Biansha not leave any traces behind when they stole away such a large batch of resources from Dazhou? The reason was that they were not on the Dunzhou, Mount Luo, and Duanzhou route at all. From start to end, Lei Changming and Lei Jinzhe had merely been a smokescreen Amu'er set up in the northeast of Zhongbo.

No wonder Yan Heru was so sure about this—he had indeed never touched these goods before. However, he must have been in the know, because the merchants in his hands all had dealings with Cuiqing. Coupled with what Yu Xiaozai had said about Peng Fangmiao's impeachment of Huo Qing during the sixth year of Xiande, Shen Zechuan was even more certain of his guess.

"The goods were transported from Fanzhou." Shen Zechuan held the teacup in his hands. "They sent the goods directly to the banks of Chashi River without even passing through Dunzhou."

"He" initially wanted to use a noble title to bribe Huo Qing into being a White Scorpion and turn the Dengzhou Garrison Troops in Huo Qing's hands into delivery escorts for the goods. After Huo Qing turned him down, "he" sought out the Prefectural Prefect of Dengzhou, Peng Fangmiao, who accepted the bribe and subsequently started to impeach Huo Qing vehemently.

"Youjing." Shen Zechuan suddenly asked Yu Xiaozai. "Which year was Peng Fangmiao transferred down to Dengzhou? Before that, whose student was he?"

Yu Xiaozai racked his brain, but all he had to say was, "... I can't remember. Zhongbo was negligent in its administration after the fourth year of Xiande, and the prefectural prefects in Duanzhou, Dunzhou, Fanzhou, and Dengzhou changed frequently. All I can remember is the impeachment memorial..."

The officialdom was as vast as the sea, with innumerable key positions of varying importance just in Qudu alone; the trivial posts in the local governments were even more complex. Even without Qudu in the mix, it was impossible for Yu Xiaozai to remember all the various vice magistrates under the Thirteen Cities of Juexi, not to mention minute details such as the year the other party was transferred or the person they had received advice from.

It had to be known that in Qudu, when someone sent in a visitation card to call on a powerful household in Qudu, all it took was for the head of the clan to be willing to see said person and exchange a few words, and said person could proclaim themselves as the other person's "student" the moment they stepped out of the door; they were also sure to address the other as "teacher" whenever they met. On top of that, the Hua and Pan factions had countless of lackeys after the reign of Xiande, when both factions plunged the imperial court into turmoil.

"Ding Tao," After a moment of silence, Xiao Chiye called out. "Come in."

Ding Tao anxiously stuck his head out. Frightened by Xiao Chiye's expression, he walked in with the same side of his arm and leg moving in tandem. Everyone in the hall looked towards Ding Tao. He opened his eyes wide, wanting to look at Shen Zechuan, but not daring to.

Xiao Chiye was in no hurry. He shifted his arm slightly, then asked Ding Tao, "Do you still remember the name 'Peng Fangmiao'?"

Ding Tao shook his head blankly.

Outside, Qiao Tianya had a sudden brainwave and piped up, "Tao-zi, this person should be in the Ministry of Personnel's reference list after the fourth year of Xiande. Think again. Hua Siqian, Wei Huaigu, or even Pan Rugui."

During the fourth year of Xiande when the Biansha Cavalry slaughtered the city, the people left in Dengzhou were Tantai Hu and the others, all of whom were taken into the Imperial Army by Xiao Chiye. The original Prefectural Prefect of Dengzhou had also died during that massacre, so Peng Fangmiao could only be a court official assigned over after the fourth year of Xiande.

Other than his exemplary ability in writing, Ding Tao's memory was also rather astounding. His family's notebook was modeled after the record-taking of the Imperial Bodyguards, and Ding Tao had grown familiar with the procedure during the times he tagged along with his father. Back in Qudu, Qiao Tianya had once visited the residence of the Prince of Libei at night but was turned away by Ding Tao and Gu Jin. Ding Tao could tell the origin of the concealed weapon he had tossed out at just a glance, a feat that Qiao Tianya still remembered to this day.

Ding Tao fished out his little notebook, staying silent amidst the rustling of pages being flipped.

At this sight, Yu Xiaozai also began to remember. Without realizing it, he spoke out, “Our Chief Surveillance...”

Ding Tao’s eyes abruptly lit up. He bookmarked a page. “Chief Surveillance Bureau! That’s right, the Chief Surveillance Bureau! Young Master,” Ding Tao looked towards Shen Zechuan as though he was seeking praise. “The assassination case in Qudu! The Imperial Bodyguards and Chief Surveillance Bureau wanted to investigate Master at that time. There was someone surnamed Fu. That’s him!”

Fu Linye.

Of course Shen Zechuan remembered the assassination case. He had sensed something amiss with the Quancheng silk while he was investigating that case. At that time, the person who had shirked responsibility for searching the Prince of Libei’s residence and passed it on to him was the Right Censor-in-chief, Fu Linye.

Yu Xiaozai suddenly slapped his thigh and even stood up. He was so miffed with himself he just had to laugh at the ludicrousness of it. Chortling himself silly with Ding Tao, he said, “I remembered it now too. Your Lordship, before the assassination case, everyone thought that Fu Linye was an official of humble origins! It was precisely because of Fu Linye that Second Master suffered so much back then. So that son of a bitch had long been colluding with Wei Huaigu!”

The tussle between the noble clans and those of humble origins happened after the fourth year of Xiande. Back then, Hua Siqian led the Grand Secretariat, and he also had the help of the Empress Dowager and Pan Rugui. Hai Liangyi thus had no choice but to rely on the Chief Surveillance Bureau’s evaluations of the various officials for promotion and delegation to hinder the minions of the Hua and Pan clans from running amok in the local regions’ governments. Fu Linye, who was at that time pretending to be a gentleman of worth, had considerable influence over Hai Liangyi and the other officials of humble origins’ consideration of those on the Ministry of Personnel’s reference list.

“If Fu Linye was the one who assigned Peng Fangmiao to Dengzhou,” Shen Zechuan paused for a moment, “then Wei Huaigu and even Xi Hongxuan could be this ‘he’.”

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Novel || Author || JJWXC || Audio Drama

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

CHAPTER 203 : SONGYU

Huo Lingyun obviously did not know who exactly “he” was, or he would have been able to voice out the name the moment he opened his mouth. However, regardless of whether it was Wei Huaigu or Xi Hongxuan, they were all already dead.

“During the sixth year of Xiande, only the Hua and Pan factions had the capability to make promises of noble titles to Huo Qing.” Yao Wenyu stroked the back of the cat’s neck with two fingers. “At that time, Xi Hongxuan had yet to join the imperial court, and Wei Huaigu was far from having the ability to do so. Why did Your Lordship put your guess on these two people?”

“Noble title.” Xiao Chiye stressed the two words. “Trace this promise up the hierarchy, and you don’t even need to guess to be able to list out the few who could do so. It’s as good as not covering it up.”

“Based on the speculation of Peng Fangmiao’s official career afterward, the promise of a noble title is very likely a sort of disguise. The real bribe used was something else.” Talking about the Scorpions had made half of Kong Ling’s body break out in a cold sweat. “Although Qian Jin was the Minister of Revenue before the eighth year of Xiande, it was still Wei Huaigu who held genuine control over the Ministry of Revenue starting from the first year of Xiande.”

Qian Jin was dismissed from office along with Hua Siqian during the rebellion at the Nanlin Hunting Grounds. However, the key to Dazhou's money still did not fall into Hai Liangyi's hands. Wei Huaigu stepped forward immediately right after and took over the office of the Minister of Revenue, where he continued to go around in circles with Hai Liangyi. It was not until Wei Huaigu was imprisoned during the Libei's military provisions case that the noble clans' embezzlement of state treasury during the reign of Xiande, which resulted in a deficit that eventually led to the Zhongbo troops' defeat, finally surfaced.

This was an intricate, complicated web that involved not only the officials from Qudu but even the officials of the various Dazhou local governments. Think about it. If "he" had used the same method to plant covert pawns and chess pieces in Juexi and Qidong, then how many of them now were Scorpions?

"It makes one's blood run cold," Kong Ling could not refrain from blurting out. "This is simply..."

Corroding Dazhou from within!

"Panic not." Shen Zechuan looked around at the various gentlemen. The calm tone he used flicked away the anxiety that was beginning to permeate the air. "It's all too easy to give themselves away when there are too many threads of clues. Even the most astute scheme is bound by the limitations of the mortal body. Manipulating such a game is time-consuming and labor-intensive, and having too many people involved will only prove to be counterproductive. After all, too many cooks spoil the broth."

Juexi and Qidong were both not the same as Zhongbo. Zhongbo was the result of a lax administration, while Juexi had Jiang Qingshan who, during his investigation of the deficit with Xue Xiuzhuo, did everything in his power to thwart the noble clans and the Scorpions. Meanwhile, Qidong had Qi Zhuyin, the commander-in-chief who was in charge of all the territories in Qidong. She had her own core team under her command, as well as Qi Shiyu to assist her in governmental affairs. She would never collude with the Scorpions. But Shen Zechuan was certain at this moment that the person who had tampered with the Bianjun Commandery's grains was a White Scorpion hiding in Qudu, and this Scorpion had not been trying to force Lu Guangbai into rebelling, but to drive him to his death.

Xiao Chiye, however, once again fixed his eyes on Huo Lingyun. "Since the Scorpions were the ones who gave the firearms to King Yi, then who's the one who taught you to use it?"

Firearms were not broadswords and swords. As a native of Dengzhou, Huo Lingyun would not have had the chance to come into contact with them before this, so he would have had to undergo training if he wished to use them with proficiency. Xiao Chiye had sniped and touched them before in Qudu, and thus he knew them like the back of his hand. Leaving aside the question of whether King Yi himself knew how to use it, if he had known that Huo Lingyun knew how to use it, he would not have kept Huo Lingyun by his side without so much as a precaution against the latter.

Huo Lingyun pursed his lips, his expression solemn in the silence. After a moment, he answered, "Old Fang the Tenth."

This was one of the reasons why Old Fang the Tenth had been willing to join hands with Huo Lingyun to remove King Yi from the equation. He was a fast learner when it came to using firearms, and he was able to move around by King Yi's side. What's more, he could pump him for information on the money vault, as well as keep an eye on King Yi's movements.

"After Dunzhou was reclaimed, Yang Qiu and Old Fang the Tenth started feeling uneasy," Huo Lingyun continued. "By the time Cizhou reached an agreement with Libei and Qidong, Fanzhou and Dengzhou were already facing the situation of having armed forces being sent to quell them. They were afraid that King Yi could not hold up under threat and ended up opening the gates to surrender, so they thought of making the first move to do away with him and empty out the money vault."

Huo Lingyun used the money vault as bait and burned Yang Qiu and Old Fang the Tenth to death. This sum of money was now in his hands, and he was the only one who knew where it was. This was also what gave him the confidence to dare to negotiate with Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye.

Huo Lingyun's gaze alternated between Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye. "I can use firearms, and I can teach the Libei Armored Cavalry and the Cizhou Garrison Troops." He looked at Xiao Chiye. "You want to attack Duanzhou in the second month. You can swap me over to the vanguard squad. I can lead the remaining garrison troops of Dengzhou."

Kneeling at the side for a long time, Fei Sheng's countenance promptly changed. It was only after he composed himself for a moment that he said, "It's not my place to interrupt before Master, but this matter concerns the safety of both Duanzhou and Second Master, so I'm left with no choice but to say a few words. This man is dodgy, and it's inappropriate to put him by Second Master and Master's sides. Second Master has no lack of generals either. Besides, there's also Elder Yin following along this time."

Fei Sheng was really exercising due diligence now. His misgivings towards Huo Lingyun were not without reason. Yin Chang was clearly the one who conquered Fanzhou! If not for this Huo Lingyun's underhanded tricks, Yin Chang would not have gotten a dressing-down. This was just great now. Yin Chang took down Fanzhou, but Huo Lingyun ended up getting the lion's share of the credit, making it look like it was only because of Huo Lingyun's act of arson that they managed to take down Fanzhou.

And that was not all. Fei Sheng found Huo Lingyun to be a man who could endure and dared to be ruthless. When he made his move, he struck with efficiency and decisiveness. His vindictiveness was almost on par with Shen Zechuan. Such a man had both capability and a mind of his own. To let Huo Lingyun remain by Shen Zechuan's side was to threaten Fei Sheng, and Fei Sheng had no desire to give Huo Lingyun the opportunity to stand out and steal the show.

Fei Sheng was very clear on how things worked, and he also knew where his own opportunities lay. He dared to speak up to interrupt now because he could tell for sure that Xiao Chiye did not like Huo Lingyun.

Sure enough, Xiao Chiye did not want to answer Huo Lingyun at all. He needed the firearms, but he did not need Huo Lingyun. Duanzhou could only be his – Xiao Ce'an's – playground. He had stopped over in Cizhou for such a long time, spending every single day at the Beiyuan military drill grounds and donning heavy armor to train with Hairigu's Scorpions, all just to find a breakthrough that could change the current situation in Libei and turn the tide in its favor. If he were to change the vanguard to Huo Lingyun, then it would undoubtedly be a heavy punch to the guts of the Libei Armored Cavalry, whose morale was already low to begin with.

Shen Zechuan's waist and back started aching after sitting for a long time. The swollen teeth marks on the inside of his thighs had yet to subside. What he had told Xiao Chiye in the morning about his mind being in a whirl was not a lie. And now, his mind was in a fog all over, no thanks to the White Scorpions. They still had to start sending provisions to Dunzhou in the afternoon, and the rations needed for the battle in Duanzhou had to go first... Then, there was also the thorny issue of whether Huo Lingyun could be put to use—or not.

“Since Young Master Huo has his mind set on it...” Yao Wenyu said to Shen Zechuan. “Your Lordship, the Imperial Bodyguards have been recruiting new recruits recently, haven’t they?”

That’s right.

Shen Zechuan understood Yao Wenyu’s intent right away.

Put Huo Lingyun in the Imperial Bodyguards, and Huo Lingyun would not be able to act as he pleased given Fei Sheng’s misgivings of him, and with Qiao Tianya at the side watching over them, Fei Sheng could not go too far trampling over Huo Lingyun either. Not only could they put him at a distance away from Shen Zechuan by doing this, but they could also put him to use instead of letting him go to waste. What’s more, leaving both Qiao Tianya and Huo Lingyun as double restraints to hold Fei Sheng in check could also serve as a warning to Fei Sheng, who was gradually becoming more and more “aloof”, reminding him not to let success go to his head.

“Fei Sheng,” Shen Zechuan said, “Pick from the remaining Dengzhou Garrison Troops. We’ll take everyone who meets your recruitment standards, including this Young Master Huo.”

Fei Sheng only had to think about it to understand the intent of this order. His heart sank, but he had to put on a show of accepting it gladly. “I shall respectfully follow Master’s arrangements. But these Dengzhou Garrison Troops are all Huo Lingyun’s old acquaintances. They may not necessarily be willing to serve in the Imperial Bodyguards.”

“That will be because you are not rewarding them enough.” Xiao Chiye raised his left hand and turned the ring on his right thumb back to its original position. There was no smile in his eyes. “Once they join the Imperial Bodyguards, they are no longer natives of Dengzhou. Their names in the previous military register of Dengzhou can be struck off.”

Xiao Chiye said just enough to make his point.

The Imperial Army the Second Master took in during his early years was even harder to deal with than the Dengzhou Garrison Troops, and his way of managing his subordinates had been none other than to be fair in meting out rewards and punishments. Xiao Chiye was reminding Fei Sheng that these remaining soldiers of Dengzhou could break away from their registered place of origin once they joined the Imperial Bodyguards and even be exempted from field taxes in Cizhou. As long as he could do a good job carrying out the task Shen Zechuan had instructed him, what could he not achieve?

Fei Sheng understood what he meant and hurriedly acknowledged his orders.

It was already late by the time the meeting was over. Qiao Tianya pushed Yao Wenyu back to their courtyard.

The slab stone paths in the courtyard had all been cleared, with not even a speck of snow on it. They had gone out of the way to sprinkle salt too, for fear that the wheelchair might skid while going up. The newly planted plum blossoms had all withered, the fallen red dead in the embrace of its branches; encased in ice and snow, they presented a scene that appeared particularly bleak and desolate. The road today was damp, so Qiao Tianya walked slowly, keeping the wheelchair stable and steady as he pushed it along.

Yao Wenyu's cat was called "Hunu".<sup>1</sup> If it were not stretching itself and licking its paws under the eaves, it would be nestling on Yao Wenyu's knees, sleeping soundly with its belly exposed. At present, it was a little bundle of energy as it kneaded its paws on Yao Wenyu's sleeves and nuzzled itself hard against Yao Wenyu's palm.

Yao Wenyu lowered his fingers to scratch Hunu. The lanterns at the sides shone upon the sides of his face. He had gotten a little fleshy lately, and he looked a lot better as compared to the time when he had first arrived. This was the Yao Yuanzhuo of distinguished demeanor and ethereal appearance.

Qiao Tianya did not speak. His gaze shifted to Yao Wenyu's collar before he averted it to the cuff of Yao Wenyu's sleeves.

They had not exchanged a single word today.

The wheelchair entered through the door, and the attendant under the eaves headed in to deliver hot water. Yao Wenyu sat in the inner chamber and read his books, while Qiao Tianya took off his blade and stood outside to look at his own seven-stringed zither.

A long time elapsed, and the servants all withdrew from the room and closed the door gently. Usually, Qiao Tianya was the one who personally bathed Yao Wenyu without any help from the others. Yuanzhuo liked to be clean, and he would not sleep if he did not bathe. Every time Qiao Tianya wiped his hair, he would sit quietly.

He seemed to have accepted the sorry figure he was currently cutting, but only to the extent that no one else other than Qiao Tianya was permitted to look. This was the limit of what he could bear.

Qiao Tianya stood for close to an hour before he finally heard Yao Wenyu call out in a low voice from inside. "... Qiao Songyue."

Qiao Tianya's fingers that had been strumming faintly across the zither strings came to a halt, but he did not respond, as though he had not heard him.

After a moment of silence, Yao Wenyu continued. "... time for bed."

The wind chimes beneath the eaves stirred, drawing in the loneliness in the wind as well. Yao Wenyu saw through the hanging drapes Qiao Tianya's shadow cast upon it. He seemed to have stood there for quite a long time. On hearing Yao Wenyu, he paused for a moment before lifting the drapes to enter.

The candlelight was very dim. The Yao Wenyu of this hour did not yearn for light, for this was the beginning of his frailty and helplessness every day. Hunu burrowed into the bedding and swatted playfully at the corner of the blanket, completely unaware of the awkwardness in the room.

Yao Wenyu had yet to school the expression in his eyes when Qiao Tianya bent forward with calm and composure to carry him up from the wheelchair. Their clothes touched, and Qiao Tianya placed Yao Wenyu's arm on the back of his shoulder. At the same time Yao Wenyu made contact with Qiao Tianya's back, his fingers curled slightly.

Yuanzhuo was a very reserved man; that was the effect of his upbringing as a gentleman of virtue.

Qiao Tianya untied Yao Wenyu's hair. It was at this moment the expression in his eyes was focused... so focused that Yao Wenyu could not bring himself to meet them. All he could do was to lower his own eyes to avoid Qiao Tianya's gaze. When he had been stripped down to his inner garment, Yao Wenyu muttered softly, "don't."

Qiao Tianya paused for a moment without letting go of the belt he had been pulling at.

Yao Wenyu suddenly clenched his collar with an expression similar to indignation. He repeated, "don't!"

“Don’t what?” Qiao Tianya, who had been silent this whole time, looked at him, his face a picture of calm.

Yao Wenyu’s “don’t touch me” caught in his throat. He stared at Qiao Tianya with bloodshot eyes, as though Qiao Tianya was some great scourge. His palms trembled slightly, yet the word that came out of his mouth was still, “... don’t.”

Yao Wenyu pursed his lips tightly and started to struggle. He pushed against Qiao Tianya’s chest, rejecting the latter’s touch.

The rattan chair creaked. Flashes of green and white shook in the blurred mirror as wide-sleeved robes and black hair struggled in the crooks of Qiao Tianya’s arms, like spring leaves that were all too anxious to make their escape with the wind. Qiao Tianya let him make a scene as he pleased. Just when Yao Wenyu was about to slide onto the ground, Qiao Tianya suddenly overturned the rattan chair, grabbed Yao Wenyu’s wrists, and pinned him down forcefully onto the woolen carpet.

“What do you want?” Qiao Tianya held down Yao Wenyu’s wrists with one hand and gripped Yao Wenyu’s face with the other hand to correct its direction. “Do you want me to throw you in like this, or throw you here?”

Yao Wenyu was forced to tilt his head up. His breaths quickened as he shut his eyes, biting down on his lip until it went pale. Qiao Tianya released the hand that was grasping his chin and pressed them between his lips to prevent him from biting down on them. He wedged his fingers in, only for Yao Wenyu to clamp down on them as if he was venting his anger.

“What are you afraid of?” Qiao Tianya let him bite, his expression slightly cold. “That wasn’t your fault.”

The intoxicated Yuanzhuo of last night was very different. He briskly forgot the pain of his legs and had a reaction to being touched in the bathtub. A noble young master was still human; what he had lost were his legs, not all that made him a man. He was still so young, and he still had all the same unspoken desires that he kept secret. But he did not even have the opportunity to pleasure himself, and yet he was laid bare and exposed in Qiao Tianya’s eyes every single night—even so, he never accepted such a powerless self.

“What’s wrong?” Qiao Tianya asked in a harsh voice. “Feeling aggrieved because I’m not a woman? My handjob can’t be that bad, right?”

“Stop it,” Yao Wenyu’s face betrayed his agony. All he could do was to yell dispiritedly as he lay here, “Don’t say a word more!”

The rattan chair that had rolled to one side knocked into a small clothes rack, which tilted over and smashed into Qiao Tianya's back. Qiao Tianya did not even blink. Under the flickering candlelight, Qiao Tianya did not know which part of him was in a rage either.

"How do you see yourself?" Qiao Tianya asked. "Do you think of yourself as a banished immortal?<sup>2</sup> Is it wrong to have desires? You—"

"I don't!" Yao Wenyu's eyes had gone thoroughly red. His voice trembled as he struggled to say, "I don't have that sort of... I don't need them!"

He could not sink to such lows and have his very last shred of dignity destroyed. What would he be left with then? He only had this bit of dignity left, and it was this bit of dignity that sustained him so that he could sit before the others in this weak and frail state and accept all of their pity.

As Yao Wenyu trembled, tears trickled out of his eyes. They did so against his will, but his tears were beyond his control, just like his crippled legs. He was ashamed to face this side of himself, just as he did not dare to face whatever remained of his desires.

Qiao Tianya's chest heaved. He abruptly flipped Yao Wenyu over.

With a sense of foreboding, Yao Wenyu's eyes widened in panic as Qiao Tianya pulled him into his arms from behind and undid his inner garment. Yao Wenyu struggled violently, pushing against Qiao Tianya's arms as he resisted. "I don't want to! Qiao Songyue, release me, let—"

Qiao Tianya groped for Yao Wenyu's hand, pulled it into his palm, and led it down to hold Yao Wenyu's object of shame with his hand over the latter's. It was in this way he embraced Yao Wenyu and heard Yao Wenyu crying when he was neck to neck with him.

The dim candlelight went out as they clung close to one another in this space. Yao Wenyu's face was to the woolen carpet, his cheeks wet with tears from the unbearable shame and indignation. A suppressed cry escaped his throat, a cry for the dignity he lost in Qiao Tianya's hands, and for the self he had gotten a clear look of. He panted for breath in between his sobs, his free hand clutching tightly at Qiao Tianya's sleeve as the pleasure of being defiled and broken into pieces in Qiao Tianya's masterfully sliding palm washed over him.

"Kill me..." A choke escaped from Yao Wenyu as he rasped, "Qiao Songyue... I hate you to the core..."

All the while that Qiao Tianya's palm was gliding up and down in that darkness, he was pressed up against the side of Yuanzhuo's face, listening to Yao Wenyu's sobs and ramblings, as well as Yao Wenyu's pants and rasps.

"You're not in the wrong." As Yao Wenyu shuddered, Qiao Tianya whispered into Yao Wenyu's ear, his voice raspy as he said in all seriousness, "Hate me all you want."

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Novel || Author || JJWXC || Audio Drama

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 虎奴, literally tiger slave
2. 谪仙 literally, an immortal who has been banished from heaven to live on earth; an epithet for exceptional individuals such as the Tang poet Li Bai (who also wrote the poem, Qiang Jin Jiu). i.e., a wayward genius

CHAPTER 204 : EMPRESS DOWAGER

Xiao Chiye deployed troops to Duanzhou in the second month, and Shen Zechuan had the grain wagons set off first. Tantai Hu, who was in Dunzhou, was all prepared and ready. To the north, Xiao Jiming dispatched Wu Ziyu to lead 5,000 Libei Armored Cavalrymen to standby at the northern side of Mount Luo. Once there was a change in situation, they would be able to combine forces with Shasan Camp to jointly attack Duanzhou.

Fine snow danced at the spurring of the breeze on this day. The outskirts of the city stretched on into the distance, where a panoramic view of the empty, boundless horizon provided a treat for the eyes. Xiao Chiye was clad from head to toe in his heavy armor, which sank into the thin snow. He looked just like a block of wall standing before Shen Zechuan.

“There are still bandits remaining on Mount Luo.” Shen Zechuan, wrapped securely in his coat, gazed at him. “You have to be careful when passing through the territory.”

Meng landed on Xiao Chiye’s shoulder. “I’ll remember it. This has to be a quick battle. I’ll be back in the third month at the very latest. If the soldiers you send to Dengzhou aren’t enough, let the Commander-in-chief know. She can transfer soldiers from Tianfei Watchtower. No problem there.”

Snow brushed past the hair on Shen Zechuan’s temples and landed on his collar. Xiao Chiye raised his hand to set his palm down on the top of Shen Zechuan’s head. A quote inexplicably came to his mind.

For my wife is still in the springtime of life; and tender are the words to comfort my beloved you.

Lanzhou was only twenty-two of age this year, and he would be by his side for decades to come. Xiao Chiye, however, would be fighting battles on all fronts in the days to come, regardless of life or death. Overthinking and dwelling too much on it would only serve to make him timid.

Shen Zechuan was the reason Xiao Chiye became tough. He was also the reason that Xiao Chiye mellowed. Xiao Chiye wanted to protect this man until the very end of his life, and as such, he was willing to give his very best in every single battle. But even the strong, like Xiao Fangxu, would also come to an unpredictable end. Xiao Chiye thought plenty after that incident. He loved this man, but he also worried for this man.

Perhaps other people in this world did not need him, Xiao Ce'an, that much. But Shen Zechuan did.

"I'll wait for you here." Shen Zechuan raised his palm to caress Xiao Chiye's cheek. In a soft voice, he said, "Don't fool around with others on the way. Not even a glance."

All of a sudden, Xiao Chiye hugged Shen Zechuan. In this snow, as he huffed breaths of hot air, he felt as if he owed Lanzhou too, too much; the latter clearly could not even leave him in his sleep.

"Enshconce yourself in the throne at the Hall of Distinction,"<sup>1</sup> Xiao Chiye nuzzled against Shen Zechuan's temple and whispered, "and let not the snowstorm come unto you."

Without waiting for Shen Zechuan to answer, Xiao Chiye released him. He put on his helmet, flipped atop Lang Tao Xue Jin, and turned his horse around to lead the Libei Armored Cavalry into a gallop east.

Seeing that Shen Zechuan did not move, Fei Sheng held up the umbrella to shield the Prefectural Lord from the falling snow. Shen Zechuan stood in the snow, clutching his blue handkerchief until it was silent all around.

Qudu experienced consecutive days of clear skies, and one could occasionally catch a glimpse of the birds flying in diagonal formations between the double-eaved roofs of the imperial palace. The heir apparent was a fast learner. Although she still did not possess the authority to make decisions, she was allowed to listen in on the discussions on state affairs in Mingli Hall. She rarely spoke up, yet in that pair of eyes of hers, Cen Yu saw her dedication to government affairs.

Other than reading and practicing calligraphy in the past six months, Li Jianting had no other hobbies. She rose early each day and did not even slack off on the days when she fell ill. The Chief Surveillance Bureau, which used to lecture Li Jianheng in the past, gradually could not find any shortcomings in Li Jianting they could admonish her for. In the eyes of these fastidious censors, this heir apparent was one who was the most like a proper crown prince since the Crown Prince of the reign of Yongyi. Even Kong Qiu, who was initially quite critical of her, no longer took to talking about her lightly.

No one knew how Xue Xiuzhuo had done it, but he had completely destroyed “Ling Ting”, and now, only Li Jianting existed in this world.

The Empress Dowager had been plagued by headaches lately. Initially, incense had been lit in the hall, but she had Matron Liuxiang snuff it out as the scent made her feel unwell. The amount of gray hair along her temples had increased; old age was eroding this person of power who had a hand in the storms and turmoil of Qudu for as long as thirty years. In the face of Li Jianting’s youthful appearance, she felt all the more willing in spirit but lacking in strength.

“Yesterday, Han Cheng presented a memorial to the throne. He’s still requesting for troops to be deployed to Cizhou.” The Marquis of Helian sat below and groused to the Empress Dowager. “Conflicts are now abound between people on our own side. Why is he still thinking about Zhongbo!”

The Empress Dowager let Matron Liuxiang massage her shoulders as she leaned back on the couch. She looked over Han Cheng’s memorial, then said, “Shen Zechuan has taken down Fanzhou, and now he even intends to use military forces in Duanzhou. After spring, he will become the tiger of Zhongbo. He harbors a deep-seated hatred towards Han Cheng for the murder of his teacher. It is only natural for Han Cheng to be afraid.”

The Marquis of Helian did not want to bother with Han Cheng’s personal feud at all. What he was currently worried about was of another nature. After the ninth month last year, the practical doers faction led by Xue Xiuzhuo collaborated with the Chief Surveillance Bureau to investigate the crop fields of the eight cities in preparation for the resurveying of the crop fields. This had always been the case for the past years, but those had been merely done for show. The officials going on inspection tours simply went through the motions and visited the eight cities as a mere formality to get things over and done with, then submitted a figure that everyone had agreed on beforehand to the Grand Secretariat to muddle their way through the process.

But it seemed that Xue Xiuzhuo was serious about it this time.

“I told all of you in the past to tell the rural manors you have in your names to restrain themselves. But did anyone listen? How many people froze to death in winter last year? Other than the three cities of Dicheng, Jincheng, and Quancheng that provide disaster relief to save the people, everyone else would rather be cowering cowards.” The Empress Dowager tossed the memorial onto the small table. The eastern pearls by her ears swayed along with her voice. “Why did Pan Lin have to antagonize Xue Xiuzhuo? Now Xue Xiuzhuo is going to work with Cen Yu and the rest to investigate the accounts. Was this not an opportunity Pan Lin himself served up to him?!”

The Marquis of Helian married Commandery Princess Zhao Yue to Pan Lin’s younger brother, so their Fei clan and Pan clan were now both in the same boat and would sink or swim together. He had initially thought the marriage would be an insurance against future troubles given that three members of the Pan clan – Pan Xiangjie, Pan Lin, and Pan Yi – were all significant officials of the imperial court, but who would have expected this Pan Lin to be such a pain in the ass?!

The Marquis of Helian did not dare to take the blame for Pan Lin, but he could not let Pan Lin continue with his ways either. Pan Lin was currently stuck in the opening that was the Minister of Revenue. The job he did was significant and crucial, yet he did not receive a promotion in name. Everyone was wrought with anxiety, fearing that Pan Lin would keep on getting defeated in this tussle between both sides and ended up handing the Ministry of Revenue on a silver platter to the officials from humble origins.

“Chengzhi is impatient by nature. I have no idea how he offended Xue Xiuzhuo.” The Marquis was restlessly burning with so much anxiety he was like an ant on a hot pan as he pleaded. “But Pang Xiangjie and Pan Yi are both loyal to Your Majesty. You have also watched our Zhaoyue grow up into a lady. She and the Third Missy are—”

“The gall of you!” The Empress Dowager cut him off and even righted herself to berate him. “How dare you push political disputes of the court onto my little baby?! Back then, when I wanted Zhaoyue to marry a lad of the Han clan, you refused and insisted on coveting that bit of petty advantage the Pan clan could offer you. Now that things have gone south, you have to shoulder the responsibility for it yourself!”

The Empress Dowager rarely flew into a rage like this. The palace maids and eunuchs both inside and outside the hall hurriedly fell to their knees and bent low over the ground, holding their breaths. How would the Marquis still dare to sit? He fell to his knees in a fluster, shuffled forward on his knees, and slapped himself several times as he pleaded, “Your Majesty, please be appeased!”

“The Third Missy has already been married away to Qidong,” the Empress Dowager declared solemnly. “She is the first lady of Qi Shiyu. With a proper rank now, every word she says and every action she makes comes under close scrutiny. The encroachment of the commoner’s fields by the rural manors under you people has nothing to do with her, so don’t bring this up again. You’re already at such an advanced age. Do you still need me to teach you to watch your words?”

“You, you’re right...” The Marquis of Helian was not a man with guts to begin with. The only lawful descendants of the Fei clan in this generation were the younger Marquis Fei Shi and the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue. Fei Shi spent his days fooling around, and even now, he still did not hold a proper official position. Because of this, the Marquis of Helian hesitated over the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue’s marriage for a long time over every little thing. Who would have known that trouble would still come knocking on his door?

The Empress Dowager rose to her feet. With Matron Liuxiang supporting her, she made her way over to the Marquis of Helian’s side. The Marquis was up in years, and for what it was worth, he was still a noble; it was a disgrace for him to keep kneeling like this. The Empress Dowager calmed down some and said, “Get up. This is so unbecoming of someone your stature.”

The Marquis of Helian scrambled to his feet and stood helplessly by the Empress Dowager’s side, not daring to stand too close.

The Empress Dowager raised her head back slightly to look along the palace eaves at the bright and clear sky. After thinking for a moment, she said, “Fei Shi has also come of age. If his inclinations do not lie in scholarly studies, then he can join the military. There are so many vacancies in the Eight Great Training Divisions; let him learn from them. He doesn't need to carve out a distinguished career, as long as he can temper himself and settle down. Once he has put in the hours and has the record of service to prove it, he will naturally be promoted to the Ministry of War."

The Empress Dowager had pointed out the Marquis' sore spot. He only had Fei Shi, this one son, and he had kept him sheltered back at home ever since the latter was young. After Fei Shi entered society, he was adept at all things related to the drinking of wine and the soliciting of courtesans, except for learning. What's more, he was an obstinate one who was close friends with Pan Lin. To date, he was not even willing to show Xue Xiuzhuo due respect. He spent his days wallowing in vice on Donglong street, typically listening only to what the courtesans had to say.

The Marquis of Helian's eyes momentarily grew moist. He lifted his sleeve to wipe his tears. "Your Majesty is the compassionate mother of all in the world; your graciousness knows no bounds. This humble subject originally wanted him to join the Eight Great Training Divisions as well, but with that temperament of his... alas!"

The Empress Dowager was fed up with the Marquis of Helian. She knew what he meant. The Eight Great Training Divisions were no longer a glamorous, lucrative post that managed Qudu's patrols. Given its proximity to Zhongbo, they might even be deployed to fight wars in the future. The Marquis of Helian was reluctant to send his son in to give his life for the cause for fear that Fei Shi might meet with a mishap on the battlefield, so he was hoping the Empress Dowager could get Fei Shi into the Six Ministries instead.

But Qudu was now no longer the playground of the noble clans. Domestic strife and foreign invasion were imminent. Shen Zechuan was not eliminated from the equation, and in just a short six months, he had become the overlord of Zhongbo, working in collusion with Libei. If not for the pressing threat of the Biansha Cavalry, he would have already fought his way to Qudu by now. Qi Zhuyin, on her end, had also written a letter to Qudu saying that she was going to use military force against the Qingshu Tribe in the fourth month. Meanwhile, Xue Xiuzhuo was pressing in on them every step of the way. Although he professed it to be a private feud with Pan Lin, his impeachment memorials were all legitimate. The eight cities did indeed encroach on the people's fields, and it would be a tough battle once investigations started after spring.

The situation was already at such a stage, and the Marquis of Helian and a few others were still only thinking of themselves and those small tracts of fields their rural manors have for fear that they would be confiscated.

The Empress Dowager recalled the times during the reign of Xiande. From Hua Siqian to Wei Huaigu, which of them was not a capable minister or general? And now, the Marquis of Helian was a bungling oaf who was good for nothing, Pan Xiangjie was a fence-sitter who swayed where the wind blows, and Han Cheng was a rapacious one with wild ambitions. Dealing with the Grand Secretariat exhausted the Empress Dowager, both physically and mentally.

“Xue Xiuzhuo’s investigation of the eight cities’ fields is meant to pave the way for the Heir Apparent to ascend to the throne.” The expression in the Empress Dowager’s eyes was deep. “It’s still not time for the Heir Apparent to step into the limelight. Go back and make it clear to Pan Xiangjie that he should open up the granaries in Dancheng and Chuancheng to distribute the grains as aid relief while the snow has yet to melt. Clean up the accounts in his hands as well, and return all those unnecessary fields to the people. Xue Xiuzhuo does not have the power to abuse as yet. If he wants to investigate, then let him investigate.”

Alarmed, the Marquis of Helian exclaimed, “if those accounts were to fall into this hands, it’d be hard to exculpate ourselves!”

The Empress Dowager looked at the Marquis of Helian and said, “Pan Lin has served in the Ministry of Revenue for so long, and the appraisals of him have been good. He also has capable men working under him. Xue Xiuzhuo wants to assist the Chief Surveillance Bureau, but even so, he can’t sidestep the Ministry of Revenue. The previous year’s field records are all in the Ministry of Revenue, which also manages the auditing of the account books. Pan Lin can avoid arousing suspicions; just get him to appoint someone he can trust over. Get through this, and Xue Xiuzhuo won’t have any way to force the issue.”

The Marquis of Helian pondered it over for a brief period. “Pan Lin has a man named Liang Cuishan under him. He was originally promoted by the Emperor Tianchen during the public ditch incident, and he has also been guided by Pan Lin before. This person’s appraisal last year was outstanding, and he also has a good reputation with the officials of humble origins. His home is in Qudu, and he doesn't have much of a history, which makes it most convenient for us to hold him in our grasp."

"As long as the Pan clan can survive this," the Empress Dowager said, "they will be able to come out of it for the better."

Since there were problems with the fields in the eight cities, then just how clean could the Xue clan's Quancheng be? Xue Xiuzhuo's audacity in touching the eight cities' fields account was tantamount to laying a hand on a slice of the noble clans' pie. This matter concerned the future interests of the noble clans, and no doubt heads would have to roll if the field taxes were to be investigated. The Empress Dowager wanted Pan Lin to use Liang Cuishan to choke off the opening in Dancheng. As long as the investigation could not move forward and the bookkeeping was messed up, they could make things difficult for Xue Xiuzhuo on the imperial court and turn the tables around to investigate his Xue clan's Quancheng first.

Under the sunset glow of the setting sun, the Empress Dowager took off the prayer beads on her wrists and tossed them on the couch. Incense smoke from the prayer hall behind her rose in spirals, accentuating the Empress Dowager's dignified and poised appearance that almost belied her old age had it not been for her gray hair.

 Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 明堂 or mingtang, a ceremonial hall in a palace where the emperor issued governmental instructions, declared punishments and rewards, and carried out large ceremonies. Other names used include Hall of Light/Brightness/ Brilliance.

CHAPTER 205 : DUANZHOU

It was not until the second month that Qi Zhuyin received a reply to the memorial she sent to Qudu. She read it over while she was at the residence in the Cangjun Commandery, then said to Qi Shiyu, who was lying on the bed, “I said to fight the Qingshu Tribe, but the Ministry of War dismissed the notion. The Empress Dowager told me to wait as she’s concerned about the military expenses, but Zhongbo is already at war now. I’ll miss the golden opportunity if I wait any longer.”

Qi Shiyu was getting much better these days, although he stuttered a little while lying on the bed, and he had to clutch a handkerchief in his hands when he spoke. “H-hurry.”

Qi Zhuyin distorted his meaning and set the letter down. “That’s right. I’m in a hurry. How could I not? When it all comes down to it, the defeat of Libei’s troops will not benefit Qidong in any way.”

Only then did Qi Shiyun complete his earlier words, “What’s the h-hurry?!”

While leaning back in her chair, Qi Zhuyin heard her father’s concubine in the courtyard wailing and making a commotion. She had ridden for half the night on her horse last night before arriving, and here she was now, sitting and relying on strong tea to keep her spirits up. Furthermore, she still had to ride back later. Vexed on hearing the cries, she said to Qi Shiyu, “Can you tell her to shut up?”

The concubine in the courtyard had given Qi Shiyu a son before, and now she was the picture of a tear-stained beauty as she leaned against her maidservant and sobbed out loud in the direction of the room, “Old Master... Can’t you even let me see the Old Master? Commander-in-chief, how very heartless of you!”

Qi Wei stood still under the eaves as he watched that particular concubine cry until her eyes were all red and swollen and she was almost sliding to the ground. He clicked his tongue lightly and shuffled his feet around to face the wall. Listening to her was giving him a headache.

Qi Shiyu could tell which concubine this was. Before he had a stroke, he was a tender one towards the fairer sex. He clenched the handkerchief tightly, his chest heaving violently as he shouted with all the might he could muster, “I-I’m telling you to sh-shut up!” He then paused to catch his breath for a moment and covered the corner of his mouth with the handkerchief as he addressed Qi Zhuyin, “Li-Libei, has no...”

“That was so many years ago.” Qi Zhuyin took over the conversation for him. “You’re already at such an age, and you still want to sulk about His Old Lordship? The commanding generals of Libei’s battle camps are quite the interesting batch. They are no longer the same as they were a decade or so ago.”

“Then, then Xiao Jiming, and, Xiao Chiye...” It was a strain on Qi Shiyu to speak, and even he had to frown on hearing himself. He tried his best to speak more coherently. “Can they beat A-Amu’er? By deploying troops now to clean up their mess, the Empress Dowager will view you with suspicion. Once the battle is over, watch how Qudu takes you to t-task!”

Several decades back, Qi Shiyu was the prince charming of many Dazhou ladies. He came from a distinguished background, and he was handsome. Of the Four Great Generals during the reign of Yongyi, he was the earliest to make his name in Qidong. Even Feng Yisheng was a high-ranking military officer under his command. At first, he had hopes of being conferred the title of a prince, but who would expect Xiao Fangxu to rise to prominence in Luoxia Pass all of a sudden? The Libei Armored Cavalry elbowed out the Qidong Garrison Troops’ military glory, trampling over Qi Shiyu for life.

There was no enmity between them, although they loved to pit against each other and had even fought before in Qudu. Qi Shiyu made little of Xiao Fangxu’s humble origins, and Xiao Fangxu once called Qi Shiyu names for being just a pretty face that was all looks and no substance. Feng Yisheng was the oldest among them when he was still around, and it was all because he went to a lot of effort – with Lu Pingyan following his lead – that Qidong and Libei could stay brothers for so many years.

Qi Shiyu rose to the challenge to prove his worth, but never could he have expected himself to be without a son and heir of lawful birth. At first, he had the idea of having Qi Zhuyin marry Xiao Jiming, but he felt rather awkward deep down and eventually did not broach the topic.

“Take me to what task?” Qi Zhuyin removed her blade. “If Libei is gone, so is Zhongbo, and if Zhongbo is gone, Dancheng will be a goner too. Who is the Empress Dowager going to take to task? Herself? For all their shortcomings, Xiao Jiming and Xiao Chiye are both His Old Lordship’s sons. With that bit of capability Han Cheng has, does he have the ability to stop the Biansha Cavalry when the time is nigh? Everyone might just as well let the state perish.”

Qi Shiyu was rendered so speechless by her that he wheezed for breath.

Qi Zhuyin poured a cup of tea while she was at it and continued, “You should rest for a while.”

“No!” Qi Shiyu’s obstinate nature took center stage as he childishly tossed the handkerchief at Qi Zhuyin. “You foolish woman! Bar, bargain with the Empress Dowager. At least have a noble title to your name before you g-go to war!”

Qi Zhuyin fell silent for a moment. She knew Qi Shiyu’s heart was aching for her. She had served as the commander-in-chief of the military forces of Qidong’s Five Commanderies for quite some years, but she still had no noble rank. If she were to get injured or disabled in the future, all Qudu needed was a transfer order on paper, and they would be able to remove her.

“At the very least, you’d have a reputation in life, and...” Qi Shiyu’s voice started trembling, “status in death!”

Otherwise, a hundred years on, she, Qi Zhuyin, would just be “a woman of the Qi clan”. No matter how illustrious her military achievements had been, she could never leave her rightful name and title behind.

Qi Zhuyin held the teacup with her fingers and studied the patterns on it. “A soldier only knows to die on the battlefield for his country; what need is there to concern himself with the return of his body home after?<sup>1</sup> If I were to really die in battle, etch my name on a memorial tablet<sup>2</sup> at home—it’s all the same.” She raised her head and smiled at Qi Shiyu. “Our Qidong is under the control of others, and we have to discuss every single matter with Qudu. As long as the Empress Dowager is willing to give us military provisions, I can do away with a title. It is what it is.”

Whether it was because of his old age or not, no one knew, but Qi Shiyu suddenly started shedding tears. He would not even let Qi Zhuyin wipe it away for him as he hung his head down and choked with sobs. “If only you were a boy...”

Qi Zhuyin folded the handkerchief and set it down beside the bed. When Qi Shiyu was a little better, she continued, “Brothers who have died before in battles are aplenty, but can each and every single one of them leave their name behind in history? General Feng was not conferred a title either, was he? I’m telling you this so that you know how things stand. We are really going to war this year. Before the turn of the year, I heard that Chen Zhen was in ill health. It’s also because of his powerlessness that the Ministry of War did not agree to my deployment of troops this time. Once he retires, we will have no one else in Qudu. I’m worried that it’ll be even harder to ask for military salaries and provisions. We should save on the various expenses in the residences as much as we can. Stop getting swayed by all those pillow talks. Those concubines of yours have the manors they want and the shops they ask for. Even if I die, they and those sons of yours won’t starve to death.”

Qi Shiyu said, miffed, “All, all the manors I gave you...”

“Were used to make up for the shortfall.” Qi Zhuyin thought for a moment before comforting him. “There’s a small plot of land left though. My mother used to plant flowers and herbs there, and I couldn’t bear to sell it off. I can still make a living with it in the future.”

The concubine outside went silent. It was an overcast afternoon, with thick clouds covering the sky, and it was even dimmer inside the room with the drapes let down. Qi Shiyu looked at his daughter from the couch, her skinny shoulders set against the weak light from the window, and his late wife’s hairpin in her hair.

Qi Zhuyin resembled her mother, and she looked charming when she smiled, especially when her imposing aura did not dominate her facial features—the Commander-in-chief was not as full of heroic spirit as the rumors made her out to be.

Qi Zhuyin waited until Qi Shiyu fell asleep before she left. She changed her shoes under the eaves, then stepped into the snow with her deerskin boots to ask Qi Wei, “Where is she?”

“Madam invited her away.” Qi Wei answered as he followed behind her.

Qi Zhuyin had yet to see Hua Xiangyi upon her return, and she hesitated for a moment. As she passed by Hua Xiangyi’s courtyard, she heard sweet, delicate voices like the pleasant trillings of orioles and sparrows from within. From where she was on the other side of the moon gate, she saw Hua Xiangyi in between that plum blossom branch.

Hua Xiangyi was bundled up in a fox fur robe today. Going by the quality of the material, she had most likely brought it along from Qudu. It was pure, unadulterated white. Fluffy fur lining the sides of her cheeks accentuated her clear-as-autumn-waters eyes, bringing out the vividness in them and making them appear even more distinct. She looked just like someone’s pampered daughter. The fingertips on the plum blossom branch were fair and dainty, never having been tarnished with a single speck of dust before in this life.

Qi Zhuyin inexplicably inclined her head and watched for a long time.

“The in-house accountant has prepared the account books and is waiting for you in the office. Our residence’s expenditure last year...” After saying a bunch, Qi Wei looked up to see that Qi Zhuyin had not moved, so he followed her gaze over.

Qi Zhuyin raised Zhujia and blocked Qi Wei’s view with its sheath.

On the other end, Hua Xiangyi picked up the plum blossom branch with her fingers. A petal-like flower embellishment lay between her brows.<sup>3</sup> She laughed as her maidservant whispered in her ear, then turned sideways where she was hidden from view.

Without turning her head, Qi Zhuyin said to Qi Wei, “Let’s go.”

Qi Wei, having not seen a thing, repeated, “Let’s go?”

Qi Zhuyin lifted her foot and left. Qi Wei, not making head or tail of what was happening and not daring to ask either, followed after her. Qi Zhuyin headed straight to the office to reconcile the account books with the accountant. She did not have the time to sit and settle down, so she simply stood and flipped through a couple pages.

“Has there been a change of steward?” Qi Zhuyin suddenly asked.

The accountant hunched over and answered in a small voice, “To answer the Commander-in-chief, no.”

“That’s strange.” Qi Zhuyin turned a few more pages. “The balancing of accounts has always been a mess in the previous years, with records that couldn't be more vague than the last. So why are last year's accounts so clear?"

These accounts were more than just clear. Even this year's advances had been separated out in a separate book, with the expenses of the various branches of the family all listed out clearly. Her father's concubines' cosmetic spending had also been halved at Qi Zhuyin's request, while the manors Qi Shiyu could not explain were also listed on it. This was simply done more beautifully than the Ministry of Revenue's accounts.

"The accounts in our residence were originally diverse and complicated, and with the various concubines unable to give a detailed account of their spendings, the various gentlemen were all at a loss where to start." The accountant took the teacup and held it out with both hands to Qi Zhuyin. "The Commander-in-chief wanted the residence to be more frugal, but we couldn't get a clear count of the rural manors in our name, and the monthly tributes were a mess when combined with the logistical expenses."

Qi Zhuyin raised her eyes to look at the accountant.

"This time, it was Madam who did the accounts." Afraid of incurring Qi Zhuyin's displeasure, the accountant hurriedly added, "Madam manages domestic affairs, so she has to look through all the accounts of the various concubines. She specifically sent someone to tell us that these accounts were too messy, and we had to redo them for the sake of your upcoming military salaries and provisions expenses. We rushed to redo them a few times, but we couldn't stand up to the commotion the various concubines kicked up. Many of them had manors hidden, and they refused to tell the truth..."

This was true.

Her father's concubines were all afraid that Qi Shiyu would kick the bucket, and so they kept a tight hold on the manors and shops in their hands. They even kept fishing for more from the residence, and none of them spoke the truth when it was time to settle the accounts. Qi Zhuyin did not live at home in the back courtyard, and her trusted subordinates like Qi Wei were all men that did not belong to the immediate family, so it was inappropriate for them to intervene. That was why these accounts had always remained a mess. She got a headache every time she thought of it.

So it seems that this Hua the Third is a rather capable one.

Qi Zhuyin took the account book and said, "And the concubines listened to her just like that?"

“At first, they pulled a long face and gave her a hard time.” The accountant said. “They are all mothers to the young masters, and they counted on the Old Master’s affections to refuse to hand over the accounts. They even wanted to head over to the Old Master’s courtyard to kick up a ruckus. Didn’t the Commander-in-chief put Miss Hongying at Madam’s disposal? So she had Miss Hongying send the concubines who cried until they fainted back to her courtyard and called for a physician to take a look at them. The physician couldn’t tell what was wrong, so she had them all buried in the courtyard.”

It did not immediately sink in for Qi Zhuyin. After being stupefied for a moment, she parroted, “buried in the courtyard?”

“Buried in the courtyard!” The accountant said. “This was just great. The concubines cried themselves a river and said they were going to complain to the Commander-in-chief.”

“Huh,” Qi Zhuyin said, “Complain to me?”

“So she gave them horses and opened up the gates to let them go.”

These concubines typically had to be waited upon even when they were getting dressed, so who would know how to ride a horse? Qi Shiyu did not fancy women of such ilk! It was such a cold day to boot, and yet Hua Xiangyi would bury anyone who dared to go wailing at Qi Shiyu’s courtyard like she was planting radishes. In no time, the concubines passed out from the freezing cold.

The matrons by Hua Xiangyi’s side were all old hands the Empress Dowager had carefully selected. If the concubines dared to make a scene, then they would dare to switch tactics to teach those concubines a hard lesson. The concubines kneeled in the walkway and waited in attendance, but they could not even get a glimpse of Hua Xiangyi’s face. When the concubines returned in tears to their own courtyards, their sons took over.

“Oh, it’s the young masters,” Hua Xiangyi sat behind the screen and said in a gentle tone. “I heard that you have yet to repay the debt of several hundred taels of silver you owe someone outside several days back, and they have already come hounding us at the residence. How would that do? As the lady of the house, I feel sorry for you brothers, so I asked the matrons to make the repayment first. Don’t be afraid. The memorandums of debt with handprints and signatures are with me for safekeeping in case the creditors claim not to have received the payment and go looking for the Old Master later... Young masters, are you leaving already?”

“And that was how it went.” The accountant was done mimicking Hua Xiangyi for Qi Zhuyin’s benefit. “Madam has the young masters’ debts in her hands. She only has to report to us, and the young masters’ shops will all be transferred under her name as collateral. Who would still dare to make a commotion now?”

Qi Zhuyin closed the account book and stood for a moment before opening it again. “That’s quite the temper she has there.”

This account had indeed been tidied up beautifully. Qi Zhuyin could not help but wonder if she would still need to fear those wily old foxes from the Ministry of Revenue if the military accounts out there could be this well done. But Hua Xiangyi was, after all, the apple of the Empress Dowager’s eye. So, after thinking about it, she dropped the idea.

The snow gradually abated in the second month, and the number of sunny days in Cizhou saw an increase. Once Shen Zechuan had free time, he brought Yao Wenyu to the outskirts of the city for a stroll.

It was cloudless for miles around today, with the bright, clear sky in a shade of azure blue. The snow in the forest had already begun to melt, and thawing stream water tinkled as they ran. There were already signs of wildlife to be seen. Ding Tao had to let Feng Ta Shuang Yi out to pasture, so he brought Li Xiong along to play at the edge of the forest.

“You don’t look too well these few days.” Shen Zechuan wiped his hands with snow and cast a glance at Yao Wenyu. “Are you not sleeping well at night?”

Yao Wenyu’s pale side profile was reflected upon the frosty leaves. He smiled at Shen Zechuan. “It’s cold, and my legs are hurting, that’s all...” He paused. “It has been half a month since the Second Master arrived in Dunzhou. Has Your Lordship received any news yet?”

“Tantai Hu discovered that there were still leftover bandits wandering on Mount Luo, so Ce’an was delayed for a few days there. It was reported the night before that the Mount Luo bandits have already been cleared out, and the Libei Armored Cavalry have occupied Mount Luo.” Shen Zechuan had changed into a jade-colored narrow-sleeved robe with a long, velvet outer garment today that made him look even younger. He was wearing the dogskin arm guard on his right arm, and as he raised his arm, he whistled. Meng came spiraling down from the forest and landed on his right arm.

Meng was too heavy, so Shen Zechuan could only let it perch for a while. He fed this messenger which had been traveling to and fro on both ends some white meat before letting it go off to play.

“There’s no need to worry over Mount Luo.” Yao Wenyu watched as Meng flew away. “The difficulty lies in Duanzhou.”

The entire Duanzhou battle line was directly facing the Chashi River, and it had been completely infiltrated by the Biansha Cavalry these few years. No one knew exactly how many Scorpions lurked within. Xiao Chiye only brought 5,000 Imperial Army soldiers along. The rest were all from the Libei Armored Cavalry. He was unwilling to completely give up the Libei Armored Cavalry, so no doubt he would have to find a way to deal with the Scorpions in the battle of Duanzhou.

Shen Zechuan’s heart was hanging on tenterhooks over Duanzhou.

“Now that the connection between the relay stations is running smoothly again, we will be able to send reinforcements immediately even if there is a change in the situation.” Seeing Shen Zechuan’s grave expression, Yao Wenyu said soothingly, “Besides, Second Master is a man blessed by Heaven.”

“Lu Guangbai said that Amu’er is planting grains on the opposite bank of the Chashi River.” Shen Zechuan pushed aside the withered branch beside his ear. “My concern is that he has long been wary of Zhongbo, and his placement of the crop fields near Gedale is meant to situate them in a better position to fight a protracted war with Duanzhou.”

Libei could not afford any delays now. If they could not take down Duanzhou, then the Shasan Camp would be in a rather perilous situation. Furthermore, Zhongbo was unable to completely shut their gates. Amu’er had set his sights so far and wide that Shen Zechuan even felt that nothing from south to north could miss his eyes.

Think back to last year’s battles. Amu’er first used Huhelu to hold down Guo Weili and give Hasen time to head up north. The Scorpions’ infiltration of Zhongbo to smuggle supplies back then was to prepare for the time they stormed and seized Libei’s battle camps. Now that he had used Hasen to take Xiao Fangxu out and reduce the pressure on the northern battlefields, he would have more confidence to face up against Qi Zhuyin. He relied on the Scorpions to hold Libei in check, then depended on the cavalry to engage Qi Zhuyin in a deadlock. Zhongbo was the weak and vulnerable belly. As long as he could free out another leg, he would be able to stomp down the battle line that had only just been stabilized.

The battle in Duanzhou would be a tough one.

Yao Wenyu was just about to say a word when Fei Sheng spurred his horse over. He dismounted to pay his obeisances to Shen Zechuan. “Master, Yan Heru is here.”

Shen Zechuan knew that Qudu was just done investigating Hezhou’s transportation of grains by water to the capital, so presumably, Yan Heru was here to whine about it. Besides, they still had yet to come to an agreement regarding the new Port of Liuzhou in Juexi. Thus, he turned around and said, “Let’s head back.”

Yan Heru was indeed here to whine and grouse. He arrived too late, and Zhou Gui and the rest sat with him and briefly discussed some Liuzhou matters with him. He only got down to business when Shen Zechuan returned and told him all about the issue with the shipments of grains by water in Hezhou.

“The official from the Ministry of Revenue who was initially in charge of the transportation of grain shipments in Hezhou is called Liang Cuishan. He also led the collection of taxes on salt in Juexi. Last year, he put the thirteen cities in order with Jiang Qingshan. The reason our business has been difficult is all thanks to these two people.” Yan Heru disliked how hard the chair was and shifted in his seat before he said, all bright and chipper, “Oh man, Your Lordship, I’m telling you, I really got worried there! This person is not an easy one to deal with, and he isn’t one to accept bribes either. But guess what happened? Before I could think of a plan, he was transferred away. They said it was to investigate the crop fields of Dancheng with the Court of Judicial Review. The imperial court has really done me a great favor~”

Shen Zechuan found this name to be a familiar one. He repeated, “Liang Cuishan?”

“Liang Cuishan, courtesy name Chongshen.” Yan Heru sprawled face down on the table and winked at Shen Zechuan. “Do you know him? You should’ve said so sooner! Then I don’t have to worry about him anymore.”

Naturally, Shen Zechuan knew him. After all, Shen Zechuan was the one who had Xiao Chiye recommend Liang Cuishan for office. He promptly asked, “they had him transferred to Dancheng to investigate the fields?”

“That’s right. Pan Lin is currently fighting it out with Xue Xiuzhuo. Xue Xiuzhuo is truly a real man to be stirring up the hornet’s nest.” Yan Heru said enigmatically. “Your Lordship, guess how many fields have the eight cities seized over the years? If Xue Xiuzhuo were to really get to the bottom of the accounts, even the Empress Dowager would be taken to task for it, let alone the Pan clan. At present, the noble clans all want him dead.”

The noble clans’ appropriation of the commoners’ fields had led to an increase in the numbers of displaced refugees. Those who had flocked to Zhongbo last year were all commoners who had been forced to leave. Qi Huilian relied on the implementation of the census registers<sup>4</sup> to curb the problem, but it proved to be ineffective in the eight cities, and now, Xue Xiuzhuo was using Yao Wenyu’s matter as an opportunity to deal the first blow to the Pan clan of Dancheng.

Even Yao Wenyu had to concede that Xue Xiuzhuo had guts.

“Liang Cuishan was promoted by Pan Lin.” Shen Zechuan understood it in a flash. “The noble clans want to rely on Liang Cuishan’s use of his Ministry of Revenue authority to obstruct Xue Xiuzhuo from investigating the lands and drag things out until the beginning of spring.”

“What a fine show of battle between those in power. Let them kill their fill in the bloodbath.” Yan Heru clapped his hands lightly and said to Shen Zechuan with a smile. “Best if they fight until Zhongbo is stable, and Your Lordship will be able to free a hand to teach them a lesson!”

“Then I fear you’d be disappointed.” With his folding fan, Shen Zechuan pushed away Yan Heru’s fingers that had made their way before him. “This Liang Cuishan...”

A commotion suddenly broke out under the eaves. Shen Zechuan stopped talking, and the gentlemen in the room all looked over. Zhou Gui rose slightly and inquired, “What’s all the din about? A discussion is currently underway in the hall!”

Fei Sheng lifted the hanging screen with a hand. His gaze moved past the others to land on Shen Zechuan, his face pale as he called out, “Master...”

Wind escaped from the dark vault of heaven, blowing over the corner of the hanging screen with such force that the various gentlemen all raised their sleeves to shield their faces. Shen Zechuan stood up. The expression in Fei Sheng's eyes gave him a sense of foreboding. He even took a few steps forward as he stared at Fei Sheng under the flickering candlelight.

"Incoming message of utmost urgency," Fei Sheng said in a solemn voice, "Second Master—"

 Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2021 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 只解沙场为国死，何须马革裹尸还 a line from the poem 《出塞》 by Xu Xilin (徐锡麟). The return of the body here specifically refers to wrapping the corpse in horsehide to be sent back to the camps or hometown for burial (a typical practice for the fallen in battles).

- 2.
3. a spirit or memorial or ancestral tablet, with the name, birthday, etc., of the dead inscribed and placed in shrines at home or in temples, etc.

- 4.
5. 花钿 known as huadian, these are flower embellishments affixed or painted onto the forehead for cosmetic purposes. Flowers are common patterns, although there may be others.
6. 黃冊 Huangce or yellow registers/yellow book served during the Ming Dynasty to provide basic data for taxation and recruitment based on the household's classification according to their occupation. It was mainly divided into three categories: civilian, military, and craftsman

CHAPTER 206 : RIVER OF ICE

Xiao Chiye's communications with Duanzhou were completely cut off three days after he left Zhongbo. They vanished in the snow after Achi's return in resounding victory. Tantai Hu's scouts could no longer find any traces of him. This squad of vanguards seemed to have disappeared into thin air.

The Biansha Cavalry had set up a perimeter to the west of the Chashi River, and this squad of vanguards had walked into the encirclement trap, where they were hemmed in by Achi at the Chashi River. Tantai Hu had no way of searching the battlefields, but even as he waited anxiously, he had to deliver the news truthfully to Dajing and Cizhou.

If something untoward had happened to Xiao Chiye, then Wu Ziyu would have to immediately notify Guo Weili of the Shasan Camp. They had to head down south to block off access from the opening that was Mount Luo. Otherwise, the consequences would be unimaginable.

Shen Zechuan did not take the horse carriage, but rode on Feng Ta Shuang Yi instead. When he arrived at Mount Luo, it was already late at night. Wu Ziyu trotted out to receive him and saw no expression on the Prefectural Lord's frozen blue face.

"Your Lordship." Not daring to engage in idle chatter, Wu Ziyu cut to the chase and followed Shen Zechuan into the campground. "The encirclement is located in the southeast of Duanzhou. It's mainly to stop Tantai Hu, who is still in the west, from proceeding further, and to deprive us of the chance to snoop around. For this reason, Second Master must still be in the southeast.”

Shen Zechuan stood at the entrance of the camp, his shoulders covered in snow. “Who are the Attendant Officers tagging along?”

“Gu Jin, Yin Chang, and Hairigu,” Wu Ziyu answered. “Second Master only had Tantai Hu stay put.”

“Master,” Fei Sheng spoke up behind him. “Why not let the Imperial Bodyguards hurry over to Tantai Hu’s camp? We can serve as scouts. By tomorrow night...”

Shen Zechuan had already turned around. He got on his horse once more and said to Wu Ziyu, “Write a letter to Yu Xiaozai and Kong Ling. Tell them to seal off all the Zhongbo’s bridle paths heading west right now and have all the merchants traveling to the mutual trade market take a detour from Cizhou.”

Yan Heru had just gotten off the carriage. His backside had not even gotten comfortable when he heard Shen Zechuan’s words. He still wanted to do business with Fanzhou and Dengzhou, especially now that these two places were suffering from a shortage of grains and clothing! Thus, he hurriedly ran a few steps after the horse and lifted his head to say, “Your Lordship, come on, let’s discuss this. Can the grains from Hezhou to the two prefectures still be allowed access? If so, why not...”

“Sure.” Shen Zechuan’s eyes were thin and icy. He bent down and patted Yan Heru’s cheek with the horsewhip. “But only grains. If your company of merchants dares to smuggle anything else other than grains to the east of Zhongbo before I give my approval, I will hang your head up at the city gate tower of Hezhou.”

The remaining bandits in the two prefectures of Fanzhou and Dengzhou had yet to be completely eradicated. So who knows if Yan Heru would play tricks again? Shen Zechuan was too preoccupied now to watch Yan Heru, but he had ways to make Yan Heru behave himself and stay put.

Yan Heru did not dare to move. He meekly swallowed his saliva, not even daring to blink his eyes. It was only after Shen Zechuan turned his horse around that Yan Heru realized his legs were trembling.

The saker falcon soared through the dancing snow and wandered around the banks of the Chashi River. The sky at the hour of you was dark and dreary, and the snow looked more like crushed grains of rice the closer they got to the ground. It felt uncomfortable to have them sticking to one's temples. The Gobi desert stretched on endlessly into the horizon. Bayin, from where he sat on horseback with a book under his arm, looked out into the distance before him.

"There will be a snowstorm tonight." Bayin muttered in the Biansha tongue.

The world was presently a picture of frozen landscape. Bayin could not bear the cold even when he was all bundled up in fur. Yet, Achi was squatting on the Chashi River washing his face with water from the hole cut in the ice. He rubbed his fingers clean, staining the water bloody red.

"I'll send you across the river tonight." Achi's right arm had a scorpion tattooed on it. His face, which was as dark as Bayin's, appeared a little good-natured.

Bayin was the brains by Hasen's side. He initially worked under Huhelu, but was now transferred over to Achi's side to observe the Duanzhou battle. He was the eyes Hasen put here.

Seven days ago, Xiao Chiye arrived at Duanzhou. Their siege on the city was unsuccessful. The Biansha Cavalry had already learned to use the weapons from within the city of Duanzhou itself. With the advantage they had from their occupation of the city, they left Xiao Chiye out in the cold outside the city gates to wear him down. Three days ago, Xiao Chiye launched a surprise attack, and Achi left the city to give chase. He chased them down near the Chashi River, where he annihilated the left flank squad of the Libei Armored Cavalry.

Bayin turned his head back and said to Achi, "Perhaps I should stay for a few more days."

"Hasen needs you." Achi stood up and lifted the Libei head in his arms as he said to the Scorpions on the bank of the river, "The Libei Armored Cavalry is already at the end of their tether. This pack of wolves is helpless against us. Last night is the proof. They can't withstand a single blow just like they couldn't before the new year."

Achi threw away the head in his hand.

"The Armored Cavalry is no longer our medal of honor—they are not worthy."

The Scorpions, who were mingling among the cavalry, followed Achi's lead and boo-ed as they threw away the heads at the side of their horses.

They were collecting the helmets of the Libei Armored Cavalry, using them as nighttime chamber pots in the wilderness.

Achi turned to Bayin. "We are elites of the Scorpions. It's not a good idea for the Hero to put us in Zhongbo. If I kill Xiao Chiye, you have to tell Hasen to transfer me back to the northern battlefields. That is where I should be."

This unit was the elites Amu'er left in Duanzhou. Achi was the leader of the Black Scorpions, having taken Hairigu's place. After Jida's death, he became the undisputed despot of Duanzhou. He wanted to obtain lands, and so he had to think of ways to render meritorious military service. For this reason, he was already displeased with Amu'er's arrangement to leave him in Duanzhou.

"You are all the natural enemy of the wolf pack." Bayin placated Achi. "The Hero naturally has his own considerations for his arrangements."

"His arrangement is to make me clear out the position for Hasen." The expression in Achi's eyes was gloomy. "Hasen stole the credit from the Scorpions."

Bayin did not have the numbers and strength to back him up, so he could not start a dispute with Achi here. He swallowed his frustration and watched as Achi got up his horse and stepped onto the frozen ice surface of the Chashi River with the Scorpions.

The Chashi River would freeze over in winter, and the layer of ice was strong and solid enough to bear the weight of the Biansha Cavalry. They liked to pass through the territory during winter in the past, as this would allow them to cross the Chashi River without having to take a long detour. The "slender waist" of the Chashi River was close to Gedale. If they moved fast, they would be able to arrive in one night.

The snow started to intensify. Worried that his book would get wet, Bayin kept it back in his leather bag. He wore a leather hat and a fur collar that covered his nose and mouth tightly, but even so, it was still so freezing cold that his exposed ears turned red.

"Spring had better come soon." Achi's horse trotted beside Bayin. "Many people in Gedale have died of starvation this winter. They gave all the grains they grew to the northern battlefields."

"This battle is a must for Biansha's transformation into a lion.<sup>1</sup> We have too few fields." Bayin said in a muffled voice. "There is no extra land in the desert to grow food. It's only by attacking our way west that we can survive. Zhongbo is a good place... you actually don't have to hate it that much."

"If my unit puts down their iron hammers, they will once again be reduced to being slaves of the various tribes." The iron hammer at the side of Achi's horse was stained with blood all over. He shook his head. "We will not till the land."

As the Scorpions' leader, Achi had once negotiated with Amu'er. The Scorpions wanted lands and names. It would be best if they could be merged into the Twelve Tribes and not serve as slaves. But Amu'er rejected him. He required the Scorpions to completely crush the Libei Armored Cavalry in this battle, and it was only when Libei fell would he consider Achi's suggestion.

Bayin was merely part of Hasen's retinue and could not question the Hero, Amu'er, but he understood Amu'er's intent. Amu'er was unwilling to give the Scorpions names because he wanted to hold them captive in his hands. Only then would these homeless bastards truly put in their best efforts.

The troops walked on the ice for four hours, and the snowstorm obscured the directions in the night. Achi came next to the route markers the Biansha Cavalry left behind and did not immediately stop. He wanted to escort Bayin to the opposite bank as soon as possible, then head back to annihilate the remaining Libei Armored Cavalry and clean up the Duanzhou battlefield.

Xiao Chiye was a nobody, but he was a wolf pup through and through. It was to the regret of Biansha that Hasen did not bring back Xiao Fangxu's head. Achi had his eyes locked on Xiao Chiye. He wanted to use Xiao Chiye's head to negotiate with Amu'er again. They attacked Libei relentlessly and without reservations, for they were already fed up with the stalemate in the northern battlefields.

Bayin lifted his fur collar and drank a couple mouthfuls of water. The wind and snow blew so hard that he could not open his eyes. As he attempted to cover himself, he shouted at Achi. "Let's stop for now and rest here. The snow is too heavy!"

The saker falcon was unable to continue flying and had already landed on its master's shoulder. The wind blew the snow on the ice into slopes, which gave off creaking sounds with every step taken. Achi dismounted to scout the path ahead. He swept off ice that had formed on the route markers, only to discover footprints before him.

Given how intense the snow was, there could only be two reasons why there could still be tracks left behind. The first was that they were too heavy and had compacted the ice underneath; the second was that the other party had left not too long ago and was very likely standing right next to them across the curtain of snow.

“The wolf is here,” Achi estimated the depth of the footprint with his fingers, then lifted his head to shout, “the armored cavalry has been here!”

Bayin waded through the thick snow, huffing and puffing as he kneeled and lay in front of the footprints. “But they were heading west. That’s the way back to Zhongbo.”

These footprints were all facing the direction that they had come from.

“Three days ago, you took out the left flank of the Libei Armored Cavalry.” Bayin looked towards Achi. “But their vanguards aren’t dead yet. It is very likely that Xiao Chiye led them to escape their way onto the frozen Chashi river. They’re looking for the way back.”

“It could also be a cover-up.” Achi prodded at the snow. “They could have walked backward so that they would be able to hide ahead of me and set up an ambush.”

Bayin shook his head lightly, frowning as he watched the snow. “It doesn’t benefit them to head east. That’s where our territory lies.”

Achi swiftly swept aside the snow along the footprints and saw that these footprints were all heading westward. He knew how Xiao Chiye had taken Huhelu out of the picture. In his heart, this person was adept at bluffs and ambushes; the more obvious the footprints were, the more he was certain that Xiao Chiye was right in front of them.

“We’ll take a detour.” Achi got to his feet. “Even if Xiao Chiye stays on the ice, he can’t go without water to drink. They will definitely leave traces behind. We’ll go after them by following their tracks.”

Bayin thought it was not the opportune time tonight to cross swords with the Libei Armored Cavalry. He chased after Achi. “If we can’t stop here to rest, we should still continue to head east. Achi, Dazhou has a saying, ‘do not pursue a beaten enemy too far’.<sup>2</sup> Don’t get led astray by them. Let’s return to Gedale first before making our plans.”

Achi shoved Bayin aside, exposing the scorpion on his right arm. His eyes were filled with murderous intent as he said, “the wolves are right here in this heavy snow. If we let them go, it will not bode well for us. You have absolutely no idea how to fight a war at all. By letting Xiao Chiye remain on the Chashi river, our unit could end up getting ambushed by him tomorrow morning!”

As Bayin watched Achi mount his horse, he reached the end of his forbearance and could not help but shout out, “I once advised Huhelu, but he didn’t listen to me. In the end, he didn’t even leave a corpse behind!”

“Was this how you advised Hasen?” Achi turned his horse around and spat with contempt, “So that was why he lost the King of Wolf’s head; it was all to preserve his own life.”

Having said that, Achi cracked his horsewhip and headed southeast.

“Achi!” Bayin chased a few steps after him, then spat hard and cursed under his breath. “Bastard, you won’t be able to tell the directions once you veer away from the route markers!”

Achi galloped among the snow without turning back. If he could not find his way around, then neither could Xiao Chiye. But he was more familiar with the Chashi river than Xiao Chiye was.

The wolf was close by.

And Achi was going to catch him.

Footnotes

1. 雄狮 literally lion, also a metaphor for a strong or powerful tribe/nation/figure, etc.
2. 穷寇莫追 One should not press a defeated enemy so hard (lest they turn and make a last-ditch counterattack in desperation.) i.e., Don’t force people into a corner, as they may fight back desperately like cornered rats.

CHAPTER 207 : PLAYED FOR THE FOOL

Gu Jin lay prostrate on the ice for an hour. Hail that came with the snowstorm rained down his armor, making clunking sounds. He remained motionless. If not for his eagle eyes still blinking, Yin Chang would have thought that he had frozen to death.

Yin Chang huddled in the snow and took small sips of his wine. It did not take long for the wine in the wine bag to run out. He shook the empty bag and drained the last few drops into his mouth. Flying flakes of snow pelted his cheeks. The old man's hair and beard were all white; only his nose remained red.

The wind wailed and howled in the night, making such a terrible racket that the tips of the Imperial Army's ears went numb. The rations in their bellies were almost gone, and even though limbs would naturally stiffen after such a long time of sprawling, very few of them moved.

Yin Chang turned his head back to cast a glance at the Imperial Army and marveled to himself.

The Imperial Army did not even blink when they faced up against the Scorpions a few days ago. Without Xiao Chiye's order, they would never act arbitrarily on their own. Who could still associate these men with the ruffian soldiers who did manual labor in Qudu? If the Cizhou Garrison Troops could be rallied to the same degree as the Imperial Army had been, then Yin Chang would even dare to fight Gedale, let alone Duanzhou.

A pity these were not his soldiers.

Yin Chang pouted regretfully and put the wine bag back on his waist.

Snow had accumulated on Gu Jin's back. He was not wearing a helmet, and the snow fell onto his nape, where it melted and trickled down along his neck. It was amid the violent gale that he detected those slight movements. Fragments of ice swirled and rustled across the snow. Gu Jin's hand, which had been pressing down on the snow, suddenly clenched into a fist. His eyes bore through the flying sand-like snow before locking onto a certain spot in the darkness.

"Here they come!"

Yin Chang prostrated his body and lightened his breathing as the sounds of horses' hooves approached. The old man's palms were sweating as he counted in silence, fearing that he might start shaking his legs out of overexcitement.

The kickup of snow turned the snowy fog in the sky into thick clouds; the ponies' hooves were almost about to trample over their faces. Yin Chang let loose a bellow. In the twinkling of an eye, he had already sprung up.

But the other party's ponies came to a stop!

Yin Chang had not even drawn his blade when a Scorpion's hammer came swinging over inches from his face. Yin Chang did not have the same arm strength Li Xiong possessed, so naturally, he did not dare block the blow. All he could do was roll into the snow and cut a sorry figure as he dodged it.

"Motherfucker, that's some fine arm strength there!" Yin Chang cursed as he steadied himself.

The Imperial Bodyguards behind him leaped out of the snowfield. At first, they had wanted to imitate Yin Chang and spring up in one suave move, but on seeing the old man bested, they all gave up the idea and opted to draw their blades without all the fanfare.

Once the Scorpions' hammers came up against the Imperial Army, they knew they had fallen for the trap. This was not the Libei Armored Cavalry at all, but a bunch of imposters in helmets!

"Helmets off!" Gu Jin clambered up the pony that was speeding past him and held onto the saddle as it brought him up. With both legs scraping across the snow, he slammed the hilt of his blade hard into the side of the Scorpion and turned over to forcibly seize the pony. Once again, he commanded sternly, "Helmets off!"

Helmets clattered noisily into the snow, and the Imperial Army leaped into the unit of cavalry. They were like mice who did not care how these Biansha Cavalrymen ran as long as they could startle the ponies. The snow under the hooves fell away as a hoop of rope net rose from its hiding place, bringing down a number of cavalymen in the process.

Snow and sand came assailing them in the face. Achi's soldiers took several mouthfuls of ice and snow in the mouth as they tumbled.

The Imperial Army's blades were short. Once they came in close before the Scorpions, the iron hammers would prove tough to fight with. Regardless of whether the Scorpions extended or retracted it, the Imperial Army's short blades would out-speed them, giving them no time at all to parry the blows.

Gu Jin rapidly observed the battlefield, but he did not catch any sight of Achi. His heart promptly sank. But before he could voice a warning, a branch of cavalymen came dashing out from his left at a speed so fast Gu Jin could not even dodge.

The Imperial Army seemed to be bitten down by a vicious beast that had materialized from across the sky, breaking them up in front and at the back. This unit of cavalymen did not use iron hammers, but they directly knocked Gu Jin straight off the pony with their swift and sudden advance. At the same time Gu Jin landed on the ground, it neighed, and a hot burst of fresh blood sprayed all over Gu Jin's head.

"Cunning!" Achi rebuked Gu Jin in the Dazhou tongue. He brandished his own scimitar, flinging the remaining droplets of blood onto Gu Jin. "But that's all there is to it."

The scimitars Achi's elite scorpions used were larger than those used by the common Biansha Cavalrymen. When held in hand, they looked like thick, silver hooks. Get caught in them, and one would meet their end, whether they were humans or beasts.

Achi had smelled a rat while he was following the trail. There were simply too many clues left for him along the way; it was like they were exposing the enemy's presence and location to him. Very quickly, Achi's windblown brain calmed down. He used his advance guards unit to probe the way ahead, and sure enough, he had baited the Imperial Army out of hiding!

Gu Jin inclined his head to wipe away the blood on his face and spat lightly, “Is that so?”

Yin Chang, who was on the other side, gave up resisting. Surrounded by the cavalry, he spread his arms open, his half-crouching body looking like he was going to lift something as he said at the top of his voice, “Time to get up—!”.

The layer of ice under the cavalry’s hooves shook violently. They thought the Imperial Army had smashed open a hole here and instantly reined their horses in and retreated in fright. However, as soon as they retreated, they saw Yin Chang lower himself in a roll along with the Imperial Army. They sprang their way out between the hooves, then dragged up their blades and took to their heels.

We’ve been had!

Achi’s fury blazed, and he cursed in mixture of Dazhou and Biansha expletives. But he did not immediately give chase; he was still keeping his wits about him at this point, thinking that there must be a trap somewhere. It was only when Yin Chang and the Imperial Army fled further and further away that it finally hit Achi.

They’re really fucking fleeing for real!

“Split up and give chase.” Achi cracked his horsewhip. “Hack off their heads!”

The cavalry was split into two flanks, with Achi in the center, presenting a claw shape that overlooked the squad, one that seemed to clutch the Imperial Army within. The two flanks advanced first and went around the left and right to come before the Imperial Army. As long as they could join up with the other, they would be able to form an encirclement ring. When the time comes, Achi would lead the center unit to barge their way into the Imperial Army from behind, and then it would be a slaughterhouse with the scimitars set loose within.

Seven years ago, Amu’er used this type of battle formation to ram the Duanzhou Garrison Troops into the Chashi Sinkhole. Achi, thus inspired, was extremely fond of this formation. It was also with this formation that he shredded the left flank of the Libei Armored Cavalry into pieces near Duanzhou a few days ago.

Both flanks, moving hard and fast, had already overtaken the Imperial Army to circle to the front. They turned their horses, and their units looped around like a long snake to the center, intending to block the Imperial Army's way out and to hem them in.

But a familiar figure was standing in the center.

The battle steeds did not neigh in the darkness of the night, although cloudy puffs of hot air spouted from their iron muzzles, and their armors looked particularly ferocious in the pitch-black surroundings. The Armored Cavalry towering motionlessly on horsebacks loomed large amid the raging snow and wind, cutting off the sounds of slaughter with their silence.

The vanguards on both flanks, having crossed swords with the Armored Cavalry before, were not afraid, so no one shouted the command to stop. The ponies kicked up snowy haze as they came attacking from both sides in a pincer attack, while the Scorpions who served as the vanguards of both flanks simultaneously swapped over to their scimitars.

They wanted to throw the Armored Cavalry off their horses with one swing of their hammer at the very moment of impact, relying on their horses' hooves and arm strength to smash the Armored Cavalry's helmets in like they had done so countless times before.

Xiao Chiye sat on the back of Lang Tao Xue Jin, which was presently digging into the ground with its hooves. Xiao Chiye was clad in heavy armor, and with steel obscuring his face, no one knew the expression he was presently wearing. He was like a stabilizing force amid the chorus of shouts all over, steadying the morale of the soldiers before and behind him.

Gu Jin exhaled deeply the very instant he saw Xiao Chiye. He braked to a stop almost at the same time that Yin Chang did, then turned around together with the latter amid the waves of snow to assume a fighting stance while facing Achi's pursuing soldiers.

The wind stirred up by the Biansha Cavalry swept through the whole field. Their scimitars and hammers had been driving away the men of Dazhou. From Libei to Zhongbo, no one could survive the assault of their hooves.

Xiao Chiye expelled a breath of hot air between his thin lips.

The Scorpions on both flanks swung up their hammers. At the moment of collision, the smell of gunpowder assailed their noses. Flashes exploded in the snowstorm, and the Scorpions, who were caught totally off-guard, were blown off their horses by the firearms, while their horses collided into one another in panic upon hearing the thunderous blast.

The muzzles of the guns started smoking. Xiao Chiye had only brought along thirty firearms. They were of little use when facing the main forces of Biansha head-on, but it was the key to blowing away the heads of the two cavalry flanks at this moment. That oppressive power promptly blindsided the cavalymen of both flanks to the extent that the Scorpions at the rear could not even catch what was happening.

Xiao Chiye made the first move, and the Libei Armored Cavalry behind him followed suit to bare their brand new fangs. These heavy armors were like vicious wolves that had been let out of their cages, so ravenous their eyes glowed with insatiable hunger. As they split into their respective columns, they leveled out their long blades in unison.

Although Achi's center unit was obstructed by the Imperial Army, he had already seen the Imperial Army's blades. It was already too late for the two flanks of the scorpions to pick up their hammers again. The battle steeds raised their hooves and trampled over the tumbling bodies, splashing sprays of erupting blood onto their armors.

The scorpions at the back of these two flanks surged forth to outflank them. Xiao Chiye followed up by shrinking the Libei Armored Cavalry into a "war chariot" battle formation that swiftly and aggressively went ramming into them. Their structure of strung-up blades on all four sides prevented the hammers from inching any closer. As the Armored Cavalry started lunging, they resembled a "battering ram" charging into the battlefield. Xiao Chiye was at the pointed end of this formation. They were an unstoppable force when they came together as a cohesive whole.

Reining in the battle steed beneath him, Achi snarled furiously from a distance away, "swing your hammers!"

As long as they had hammers, the Libei Armored Cavalry would be tofu all the same.

The hammer of a Scorpion swung from the side towards the head of the Armored Cavalry at the fringe of the formation. It was too late to avoid the attack, but a resonating and heavy "thud" rang out as Hairigu used an iron hammer to deflect the hammer from atop the Libei Armored Cavalry horse he was on.

"Traitorous betrayer," Achi gnashed his teeth in rage. "Hairigu, you've become a slave to Libei!"

With swift, dexterous moves, Hairigu heaved up the hammer to knock over the other party and landed on the ground at the same time the other man did. While the other person was still cussing, Hairigu lifted his hammer and slammed it down with precision onto the man's skull without so much as a second glance.

Achi's center unit was caught in a dilemma moving forward. The left and right flanks he had sent ahead had respectively gotten their "heads" hacked off and were now nothing more than headless chickens. And with military commands hindered and obstructed by the Imperial Army, he could no longer freely mobilize the two flanks into returning.

Bayin had only just rushed into the vicinity. He was aware of Achi's importance to Duanzhou. The remaining scorpions in Zhongbo all heeded Achi's deployment orders, and for this reason, he could not abandon Achi to escape on his own.

Bayin panted in the snow as he scanned the battlefield and chased after Achi on horseback. "Achi! Turn the horses around and head back. The Libei Armored Cavalry won't be able to catch up to us!"

As long as they followed the route markers and retreated west, then by daybreak at the latest, they would be able to make it back to the southeast of Duanzhou where they had stationed a large number of troops. By then, the only path that awaited Xiao Chiye would still be death.

Achi tugged at the reins of his horse hard and cracked his whip loud and clear. He did not refute Bayin and led the remaining scorpions out of the entanglement with the Imperial Army.

He was clear about his priorities. If he lost to Xiao Chiye here, then Amu'er would mete out the harshest punishment on him and skin him for the rash deployment of troops. His defeat was a small matter, but if this carelessness escalated into the loss of Duanzhou, then even if he could live to escape back to Gedale, Amu'er would not spare his life.

This battle did not count.

Achi whipped his horse hard to spur it on.

This was merely just him being made a fool of!

Special thanks to MaruChan and Anny for proofreading!

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2022 Lianyin

CHAPTER 208 : RETURN OF A NIGHTMARE

Achi fled towards their original path in a hurry. Along the way, the Scorpions let loose their own saker falcons. Lang Tao Xue Jin pressed forward and did all it could to catch up amid the clanging sounds of the heavy armors. The collective sound of the Libei Armored Cavalry's hooves in hot pursuit was so intense that it unnerved the Scorpions, who feared the ice beneath their feet would crack. What's more when that sound was catching up just right behind their horses!

Achi clenched his teeth and looked back in the wind in humiliation. All he could see was that one heavy armor.

Xiao Chiye!

Bayin suddenly pulled in the reins on the head of his horse as he bumped into Achi from the side and barked sternly, "Retreat, retreat, retreat! Achi, stop looking at him!"

The snowstorm that resembled flying willow catkins transformed Heaven and Earth into a sacred, untainted realm. The Biansha Cavalry charged madly in the wind for a little less than an hour before they managed to throw off the Libei Armored Cavalry. Even so, they did not dare to stop. On returning to their original path, Bayin suddenly piped up, "Pull out the route markers. Don't leave them behind for Xiao Chiye!"

They charged with all they could along their original path, heeding Bayin's instructions not to leave behind route markers for the Libei

Armored Cavalry.

“Deploy troops to counterattack tomorrow morning.” Bayin was covered tightly in his fur collar, and his eyelashes had been dyed white by the wind. He could barely even open them. “Xiao Chiye will not be able to escape out of the Chashi River once he loses all sense of direction.”

Achi was livid. His rage blazed so intensely that his chest felt uncomfortable. He had been played for a fool by Xiao Chiye even before they came face to face with one another. No matter what, he could not take this lying down.

“Listen, Achi.” Bayin chased after the lightning-swift Achi and pulled down his collar to shout, “Don’t fall for his goading, you hear me? He did it on purpose.”

“He wiped out both of my flanks!” Unable to contain himself anymore, Achi screamed back at Bayin. “He’s flaunting his military might to me. That son of a bitch!”

Three days ago, Achi took down Xiao Chiye’s left flank troops, and today, Xiao Chiye stood there and blew out Achi’s left and right flanks. The vanguards of both flanks were all elites. Achi’s heart was dripping blood. He felt this to be a warning from Xiao Chiye, and the threat was now rubbing it into his face.

“I’m going to kill him!” Achi lost control and growled. “I will kill—”

With one fist, Bayin punched Achi off his horse. Having lost its master, the horse slowed down and stopped ahead. Achi rolled in the snow, his chest heaving violently.

“The Hero knows all. If you still want to merge the Scorpions into the Twelve Tribes, then finish Xiao Chiye off tomorrow morning.” Bayin said in a deep voice. “Losing your mind will reduce you to being a jackal, and a jackal can’t bite a wolf to death. You’d best clear your head up!”

Achi lay on the snowfield and grabbed a handful of snow to wipe his face with. He climbed to his feet and caught up to his horse without so much as another word.

The atmosphere surrounding the cavalry was glum and heavy. With Achi and Bayin no longer speaking, those at the back did not dare to open their mouths either. They ran in the snowstorm for another two hours, and their battle steeds were all exhausted to the point they were panting. Fortunately, the route markers indicated they had reached the end.

“The saker falcon will notify the reinforcements to hurry this way.” Achi slowed his horse and stepped onto the bank. “We can wait here.”

Bayin was feeling uneasy deep down. Due to his introversion, he took particular notice of his environments. The boundless expanse of snow obstructed the world from view and prevented him from getting a clear look at the situation a few steps away, but he could keenly sense that this was not the southeastern part of Duanzhou from where they came.

“We went the wrong way.” Bayin muttered and squinted his eyes to keep out the gale. Amid the fog of snow that was being blown away, he indistinctly caught a glimpse of what lay ahead. “This place is...”

A horse at the back that had yet to step ashore suddenly lost its footing, and its hind hooves slid into a hole in the ice. The Scorpion on horseback yanked at the reins in the blinding snowstorm, intending to drive the horse back on ice, but in its panic, it broke its hind knees against the edge of the ice and neighed as its entire body overturned into the water!

The unit was promptly thrown into disarray. The horses all started panicking, and the Scorpions berated them to no avail. Fearing that they would slide in too, they could only lash out with their whips hard. Achi heard the sound of heavy armors among the noise. He initially thought it was a misperception, but not long later, the pitch-black Armored Cavalry materialized for real in the snow.

No matter how dumb Achi was, he could also realize what was happening by now. He retreated and shouted, “Get on your horses and move fast!”

This particular route marker was genuine enough, but Xiao Chiye had long shifted it away from its original location. The footprints were indeed a diversionary cover-up; Xiao Chiye’s real intention had been to herd them towards this place.

Seeing Bayin still in his original spot, Achi bumped into him hard and cursed, “Get on your horse! Snap out of your fucking daze!”

Bayin turned his eyes to look at Achi. As if sensing it too, Achi looked ahead, and the color drained from his face in horror.

The pitch darkness ahead was none other than the Chashi Sinkhole.

Achi wiped the sweat at his temple and looked out as far as he could, only to see that both flanks of the Libei Armored Cavalry had already surrounded them from both sides and were now ahead of them. He turned his head back and saw Xiao Chiye.

Seven years ago, the Biansha Cavalry buried 40,000 Duanzhou Garrison Troops alive here. Seven years later, on the same snowstorm night, Xiao Chiye used the same battle formation to push them before the Chashi Sinkhole. Achi did not know Xiao Chiye, but in this instant, he strangely understood Xiao Chiye's intent.

Bayin's Adam's apple bobbed. He squeezed his cowhide-bound book and muttered Hasen's words, "... returning the favor, tit for tat."

Xiao Chiye was the wolf that was the toughest to deal with. Bayin knew Xiao Chiye would even bite Hasen to death in order to retrieve Xiao Fangxu. Once an opponent like this committed his scars to mind, he would retaliate and tear away at his foes with his fangs on his own terms.

"Reinforcements will be here in a while." Achi unexpectedly calmed down at this juncture. He stared at Xiao Chiye. "Hang in there until then, and this place will still be our slaughterhouse."

Achi had never seen Xiao Chiye's real appearance before today, but through that helmet, he seemed to sense Xiao Chiye's scoffing. Achi did not believe in the Biansha gods; he believed in his own tattoo. As a Scorpion surviving in difficult circumstances between the gaps, he would not concede defeat until the very moment his head took leave of his body.

However, Xiao Chiye similarly believed in his tattoo. That was his father, and also his Libei. The scar Hasen left behind burned all the time. He had suppressed it for far too long, so long he could even hear Langli Blade howling in its sheath.

The violent gale under the snowy dome rode roughshod over the snowflakes, tearing them into pieces of willow catkins flying in the wind. At the moment when the swarm of white blinded his eyes, Achi saw the Armored Cavalry charge. Their armors were like dusty blades, charging head-on towards the Biansha cavalry with the momentum of a tempestuous storm that brushed away all the dust on them to reveal sharp blades that glinted coldly in all its glory.

The moment the iron hammer came swinging, Xiao Chiye parried it with Langli Blade. His horse did not stop as he led the Armored Cavalry to crash head-on into the Biansha Cavalry amid the screeching sound of friction as blade scraped against blade. Meanwhile, the armor-clad Lang Tao Xue Jin, clad in heavy armor, threw its head back and knocked askew a pony that was blocking the way.

The Biansha Cavalry was like a canteen that had been crushed until it burst. They resisted Xiao Chiye's onslaught of heavy blows for just a mere few blinks of an eye before they were repeatedly rammed back in a retreat by the "war chariot" battle formation. The sinkhole stretched across them a short distance away; if they retreated again, they would no doubt plunge into it.

Achi lifted the iron hammer that weighed a hundred jin.<sup>1</sup> In this short period as they crossed swords, he had come to recognize Xiao Chiye as the most vital part of the Libei Armored Cavalry. He knocked over an Armored Cavalryman before him with a swing of his hammer and heard the other man's head slam into the snow with a "thud". Hooves stepped over the body, and in a split second, he was already swinging his hammer right in Xiao Chiye's face.

But he struck at empty air!

Achi thought Xiao Chiye would follow up his victory with an attack, but Xiao Chiye did not. He retreated back in front of the Libei Armored Cavalry, and this "war chariot" instantly underwent a transformation.

Bayin crowded at the back with his book in his arms and got a clear look as the Libei Armored Cavalry transformed.

Was that the Libei Armored Cavalry?

That was a heavy-duty war chariot!

Xiao Chiye was unwilling to give up on Xiao Fangxu's heavy armors; he did not want to prove his old man wrong. It was through Lu Guangbai, Qi Zhuyin, and Yin Chang that he acquired a whole new Libei Armored Cavalry.

Xiao Chiye cast away the former long blades of the Libei Armored Cavalry on the basis of them being "heavy" and equipped the Libei Armored Cavalry under his command with new blades. These were the real long blades, with a length so long that there was no way for the iron hammers to get close. He had observed Lu Guangbai's infantrymen at the battlegrounds. The "war chariot" battle formation was able to conceal their weakness of not being fast enough. Xiao Chiye directly cut off their need to give chase; he wanted the Biansha Cavalry to come lunging into them themselves.

That offensive and defensive battle Qi Zhuyin fought in the war zone was skillful in its swap between light and heavy cavalry. Xiao Chiye consolidated the Imperial Army and the Libei Armored Cavalry together.

As long as they appeared on the same battlefield, they would have erratic and unpredictable ways of fighting. Hasen did not reign supreme when it came to field warfare.

The last was also the most crucial point—Yin Chang’s “dagger” squad.

Yin Chang modified Lu Guangbai’s “war chariot” battle formation and split the soldiers into “daggers” to advance onwards. Hairigu secretly learned this move on the sly, allowing Xiao Chiye to find a new opportunity back at the Beiyuan Hunting Grounds to turn things around. Xiao Chiye then incorporated the “dagger” into his own “war chariot” formation, thereby giving rise to the current Libei Armored Cavalry of tremendous might and formidability.

Very quickly, Achi came to understand that the iron hammers were now useless, as they could not avoid the long blades to get close to the Libei Armored Cavalry. But when he swapped out the iron hammers, the Libei Armored Cavalry would attack in columns. It was just like several bayonets suddenly flicking out of a box to stab at the Scorpions until they could not even fend for themselves.

Those bright, shiny edges of the blades extended and retracted at will.

This was equivalent to a heavy-duty war chariot, one that discarded the wooden structure of the common siege weapons, was completely forged with iron and steel, and came with improved mobility. As long as Xiao Chiye was willing to give the go-ahead, the Libei Armored Cavalry could even dismantle on the spot and switch over to field squads to lay ambushes.

Even though it was still in its infancy and was even a little raw around its edge, it was undoubtedly a Libei Armored Cavalry that completely belonged to Xiao Chiye.

Achi saw defeat looming right before his eyes, but then he heard a falcon’s cries among the snow. His saker falcon retracted its wings and circled its way down the heavens, bringing with it the reinforcement troops he had been waiting a long time for.

“Why are there so many soldiers?” Yin Chang was about to sit on the ground to pour away the watery blood in his boots when he saw the cavalry swarming out from the southwest like ants. He hurriedly clambered to his feet and stomped his feet into his boots. “We’re done for. This is almost fucking three times our military strength!”

The Scorpions’ morale was instantly boosted. Sounds of killing crashed over them like the roaring waves as both parties engaged in a battle of life and death before the Chashi Sinkhole. Gleaming blood splattered through the snow. The Libei Armored Cavalry and Imperial Army went all out. The only chance they had to break out of the encirclement was now. If they missed the opportunity tonight, they were as good as dead!

Gu Jin lifted Hairigu by his back collar and kicked him into the crowd of people. Seeing Yin Chang limping a little, he leveled his blade to strike away the Biansha Cavalry and shouted to the old man. “Elder Yin, are you injured?!”

Yin Chang wrinkled his red nose, rotated his ankle a few times self-consciously, and answered, “My, my foot is itching from all that soaking.”

Hairigu nimbly dodged the scimitars from where he was in the crowd. Every now and then, he even had to flash his little golden token to the Imperial Army, who had gone berserk from the killing. “We’re on the same side!”

On the other end, Achi, who was far more adept at wielding the scimitar than the hammer, was already battling it out with Xiao Chiye. The trampling and stomping in the tussle between both parties’ troops caused the ground to shake. No one knew whose horse flipped over first, but following that, the edges of the sinkhole collapsed entirely, sending everyone tumbling into it in one jumbled mess.

The Imperial Army ingested several mouthfuls of mud and popped their heads out from among the dense mass of enemies to shout to each other. “Fuck! Did Second Master get jostled down there too?!”

As Lang Tao Xue Jin rolled and sank into the bottom of the pit, Achi pounced from a rock. Unable to get to his feet in time, Xiao Chiye lifted his foot to kick Achi in the chest, causing Achi to stagger back a few steps from the impact. Meanwhile, Xiao Chiye had already straightened up. The hammer came swinging almost in his face, and as Xiao Chiye dodged the blow, he used his arm guard to block the attack.

“THUD!”

Feng Ta Shuang Yi knocked over the old and dilapidated wooden fence as Shen Zechuan galloped across the snowstorm with his overcoat flapping in the wind. Frosty snow flew between his facial features, his side profile reflecting a somber, forbidding harshness.

Fei Sheng, not daring to be complacent and careless on the battlefield, followed closely behind Shen Zechuan’s horse with the Imperial Bodyguards.

Tantai Hu, not daring to let Shen Zechuan take the lead either, led his troops to chase after the Prefectural Lord with such haste that he was almost standing on his saddle. He shouted at Shen Zechuan across the gale, “Your Lordship! It’s right in the northeast—the Chashi Sinkhole!”

Sprays of flying snow erupted under his horse’s hooves. Shen Zechuan had gripped the reins until it was soaked. He had not made a single stop on the journey here, and Feng Ta Shuang Yi was already exhausted.

Chashi Sinkhole!

All that Shen Zechuan passed by on his way was a white, boundless expanse of wilderness. But the moment he entered the vicinity of Chashi Sinkhole, that nightmare came surging to the surface like a tidal wave, and the familiar stench of blood choked his nose and throat. Shen Zechuan gasped for air, unable to see Xiao Chiye in the bloodshed.

Shen Zechuan shouted in a grim voice. “Xiao Ce’an—!”

Fei Sheng surveyed the surroundings and saw Yin Chang, who in turn saw the Prefectural Lord all dressed in white from afar—a rather conspicuous sight here. He jumped up and down, waving his blade as he shouted. “The sinkhole, in the sinkhole, Second Master is in the sinkhole!”

In that instant, Shen Zechuan’s face turned a shade of ghastly white. With icy-cold limbs, he rolled off the horse; even his hands that were holding onto Yang Shan Xue were trembling. Blood seeped through his white robe, wetting it as he stepped over the corpses. All he could see was the sinkhole that appeared in his nightmares millions of times.

Shen Zechuan could not bother with anyone else. He stumbled along the sinkhole and slid down. Heavy snow filled all over the sky. He trembled as he shouted, “Xiao Ce’an...”

Nightmare and reality overlapped. Shen Zechuan had seen his own body strewn among the corpses here before, but he had never imagined that Xiao Chiye would be among those lying here.

Fei Sheng had never seen the Prefectural Lord in such a state. He hurried over to help him up, but Shen Zechuan refused. He dug up the body before Lang Tao Xue Jin among the bloodied mountain of corpses, raking so hard with his hands that they both turned slick with blood. The ‘corpse’ suddenly raised a hand, and grabbed hold of Shen Zechuan’s wrist with speed and accuracy.

“Lanzhou,” Xiao Chiye felt suffocated under the helmet. “Lan...”

Shen Zechuan had already pushed off Xiao Chiye's helmet. In that whirling snow, he got a clear look at Xiao Chiye's face, and with no regard for the bloodstains, he hugged Xiao Chiye's head tightly in his embrace.

Xiao Chiye backhandedly stroked Shen Zechuan's back. He wanted to say something, but in the sougning of the wind, he heard Shen Zechuan call out over and over in a small voice.

"Xiao Chiye..."

Xiao Chiye's heart ached with such ferocity that it broke into pieces.

 Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2022 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 斤 jin or catty, 1 jin equal to 0.5 kg

CHAPTER 209 : EMBRACE

Chashi Sinkhole was Shen Zechuan's darkest hour.

When he first entered Zhao Zui temple, the insides of the temple were old and dilapidated, with broken windows that could not keep out the chilly wind. Ji Gang kept the only spot that was sheltered from the wind for him to sleep, and he would rest his head on his arms, not daring to tell his shifu that he could not fall asleep.

Back then, Shen Zechuan could still remember Ji Mu's face. There were shadows of Hua Pingting in his big brother, a handsome man with delicate features. The number of matchmakers coming to play go-between while he was still at home was enough to break their threshold from all those coming and going.

"I've been thinking about my promotion," Ji Mu was squatting in the courtyard, picking up dumplings to eat. "Let's move to the eastern side once I'm promoted."

Shen Zechuan imitated him and stuffed himself with dumplings until his cheeks were bulging. He nodded and slurred his words with his mouth full, "I'll watch sister-in-law for you."

Ji Mu had a childhood playmate, a maiden who originally lived next door to them and later moved away to the east. This maiden's father played up to those in power and was always thinking of marrying his daughter off to someone in the yamen. In order to prove himself, Ji Mu enlisted in the military and worked hard all day attending to official duties, hoping to wed the maiden before she was married away.

Ji Gang did not earn much. Their family was not well-off. With two sons to raise, Hua Pingting even saved her own dowry as funds for her sons' future weddings. Seeing as Ji Mu was already of age, she and Ji Gang contemplated engaging a matchmaker.

Winter in Duanzhou was a scene of desolation. The Chashi River lay to the east. When they were a little younger, they would go onto the ice in winter to pull sleds. Shen Zechuan was a smart one, and he always coaxed the little rascals who tagged along to be the horses while he himself played the old master sitting on the sled as he directed them to run all over the place.

Ji Mu told Ji Gang at that time, "My younger brother will definitely go far in the future."

Hua Pingting treated Shen Zechuan as her own son, and so Ji Mu treated Shen Zechuan as his own kin younger brother. When Xiao Chiye and Xiao Jiming were in Libei riding horses and drawing bows, Ji Mu was still taking Shen Zechuan running around all over the mountains and plains. Shen Zechuan was very sloppy in his training of the Ji Clan boxing style before he was fifteen years old, but Ji Mu always covered for him and would not let Hua Pingting admonish him.

In the third year of the reign of Xiande, Ji Mu was promoted to Squad Commander. The entire family was delighted, and Hua Pingting started making arrangements by counting the family's savings over and over again as she and Ji Gang prepared to hire a matchmaker to propose marriage to the maiden in the east.

At that time, Ji Mu had to be on duty. Shen Zechuan took the food Hua Pingting packed for him and went to the garrison troops camp to deliver the meal to his elder brother. That night was the last time Shen Zechuan saw Hua Pingting. His shiniang stood at the entrance of the courtyard, where she fastened his lined jacket for him and put on his fur collar. She covered him up securely and gave him the instructions to "leave and return early."

Ji Mu secretly gave Shen Zechuan wine to drink, and Shen Zechuan drank it by dipping his chopsticks in it, looking very much like a green radish wrapped in a lined jacket sitting among a row of tough and muscular soldiers. When the snow fell, these rugged men said that the timely snow was an auspicious omen for a good harvest; Duanzhou was going to have a bumper harvest next year.

Ji Mu rapped his chopsticks on the porcelain bowl and sang the tune “A Song for Peaceful and Tranquil Times”.<sup>1</sup> At that time, he was only twenty years old and was about to marry and bring home a pretty wife. Both brothers got along harmoniously with one another, and their parents at home were free from illnesses and worries. He was right in the prime of his life.

Every time Shen Zechuan thought back to that night, tears would stream down his cheeks. He lost the courage to reminisce and walk down memory lane when he was in Zhao Zui Temple; he no longer dreamed of those times again. Over the course of seven years in which he was plagued by nightmares, Ji Mu turned into a grotesque skeleton. Shen Zechuan forgot what his elder brother looked like; he could not even remember their last conversation.

Why didn’t he pull Ji Mu up?

Shen Zechuan crawled his way out, then fell back in again. In the first few years, he would still lie within and cry inconsolably. And so, “Shen Zechuan” was left behind here. He stood up and saw the snow burying himself.

Military boots trod upon the snow, making slight noises.

Shen Zechuan apathetically turned his head back and saw a travel-worn Ji Mu in the snow. Ji Mu was clean this night, without a trace of injury on him. He held on to the hilt of his blade and approached Shen Zechuan.

Ji Mu had not changed at all even after seven years. His cheeks were slightly red from the freezing cold, and he huffed breaths of hot air as he walked. All that hostility during the struggle in the sea of blood vanished without a trace. Shen Zechuan looked at him and remembered the “Song for Peaceful and Tranquil Times” he sang before his departure.

Shen Zechuan, who was already as tall as Ji Mu, called out wearily, “Ge.”

Ji Mu stood still before Shen Zechuan. As the snowstorm tousled the messy hair on his temples, he asked, “Why aren’t you going home?”

“The snow is too heavy. I forgot the way,” Shen Zechuan answered.

Ji Mu laughed as he looked at Shen Zechuan. “Silly lad. Mother’s looking for you.”

Shen Zechuan looked back and saw Hua Pingting on the other end. Shiniang was carrying a lantern in the heavy snow, the hem of her skirt swaying in the wind. As he watched her, the tears started to gush from his eyes.

He remembered everything. That was why he wanted to forget it all.

Ji Mu held his blade steady and passed through Shen Zechuan to walk towards Hua Pingting.

Shen Zechuan suddenly could not contain himself and shouted, “Ge!”

With a teary voice, Shen Zechuan disconsolately attempted to grab Ji Mu. But Ji Mu did not turn back. Shen Zechuan chased after him. Every step he took, the blood under his feet rose an inch. He hastily started running, but he could not break free of his shackles. Eventually, he fell into the pool of blood, where he was bogged down by corpses. He shouted himself hoarse after Ji Mu, “Come back!”

Ji Mu was already about to vanish in the snow.

Shen Zechuan failed to grasp hold of anything as the blood swallowed him up in the inundated sinkhole. The terror of drowning swept over him. He could not breathe. All he could do was struggle and look on helplessly as that faint light died out.

“Shen Lanzhou—!”

Xiao Chiye scooped up Shen Zechuan. Those sturdy shoulders of his could stand up against the assault of the storm. He brought with him the light of the blazing sun, and he used the strong wind to sweep this dark, gloomy world clean, dispelling the snowstorm. He was scorching hot, so scalding that there was no room for anything else around Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan abruptly returned to his senses. He was soaked all over through and through. Xiao Chiye cupped his cheeks, touched the tip of his nose to his in the darkness, and kissed him soothingly. Still gasping for breath, Shen Zechuan wrapped his arms around Xiao Chiye’s neck, his eyes turning damp as they clung to each other in a snuggle.

Xiao Chiye leaned in closer to coax him, “Lanzhou, come back. Come back to me.”

With his heart still palpitating, Shen Zechuan nodded. He bumped his forehead against Xiao Chiye’s and gazed at Xiao Chiye with panicky eyes. Xiao Chiye wiped the corner of his eyes with his thumbs and caressed his cheeks.

“Everything is alright now.” Xiao Chiye dropped him a kiss each time he spoke. “Give me a hug.”

The military tent was newly erected. The fire in the charcoal brazier did not burn strong enough and went out in the middle of the night. Both of them slept on a simple plank bed, padded with a thin mattress underneath, and with an overcoat blanketing them. Fearing that Lanzhou would fall sick, Xiao Chiye grabbed his icy hands, stuffed them into his clothes, and pressed them against his own chest.

Shen Zechuan’s breathing calmed as he grasped at Xiao Chiye’s clothes until they wrinkled. Not once had Xiao Chiye’s arms ever let go of him, and it was in this position he covered them with the overcoat and whispered to him underneath.

“Are you cold?” Xiao Chiye asked.

Shen Zechuan buried his face in the crook of Xiao Chiye’s neck and answered in a quiet voice, “cold.”

Xiao Chiye embraced Shen Zechuan tightly and pressed down in the center of the top of his head with his chin. With eyes half-closed, he said, “Stick a little closer, and you won’t be cold anymore.”

Both of them clung to each other for warmth, like a pair of mutually dependent cubs relying on each other for survival. Shen Zechuan reached out to feel his way to Xiao Chiye’s back, his touch so icy-cold that Xiao Chiye inhaled sharply. Touching that wolf set Shen Zechuan’s mind at ease. His touch was careful and delicate, as though he was stroking a wolf’s fur.

The stroking of the prominent muscles on Xiao Chiye’s back tickled him, but there was nowhere for him to hide, so he could only tilt his head back slightly and endure the waves of tingling sensation washing over the small of his back. Eventually, he could no longer bear it and lifted a hand to grab hold of Shen Zechuan’s wrist before turning over to pin Lanzhou down beneath him. His breathing was slightly heavy as he pressed up against him without moving.

Shen Zechuan sulked in a huff. “Didn’t you want to hug?”

“Is that what you call a hug?” Xiao Chiye leaned in closer to press down on him, then repeated his question in a whisper. “Is that what you call a hug?”

Shen Zechuan was of the opinion that this voice was one that escaped from his throat. He looked at Xiao Chiye, seeming to be choked with silent indignation.

Xiao Chiye released Shen Zechuan's wrist and slid his hand down along the latter's waist, his touch turning Shen Zechuan's face a shade of red. That was ticklish. Initially, he could endure it, but Xiao Chiye pressed against him with his chest, stirring him up so much that his expressive eyes gradually glazed over with water again. In between short, urgent breaths, he tilted his head up and smiled.

Xiao Chiye loved Lanzhou's smile to the moon and back—when those half-shut eyes rippled with tidal surges of emotions, with his Xiao Ce'an's silhouette drowning in them.

Shen Zechuan smiled until his neck turned damp and his clothes clung to his back, soaked with sweat. He felt tired as he calmed his breathing to welcome Xiao Chiye's kiss. It was warm under the overcoat, so stifling that Shen Zechuan forgot all about the snowstorm.

Xiao Chiye knew Lanzhou did not sleep well, but tonight, he was here. And he was burning with the ambition to make sure that he was all Lanzhou ever dreamed of from now on.

Support the Author!

 Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2022 Lianyin

Footnotes

1. 清平调 Qing Ping Diao, or A Song/Tune for Peaceful and Tranquil Times by the famous poet, Li Bai.

CHAPTER 210 : QINGSHU TRIBE

The snowstorm was still raging the next day at the hour of mao, and the charcoal braziers in the military tents had all gone cold. Various generals gathered around a map on the table in the tent and waited for Xiao Chiye to speak.

The battle over at the Chashi Sinkhole was not considered a tough fight, but it was rather perilous. Xiao Chiye took advantage of the snowstorm and led Achi away on ice from the southeast to the Chashi Sinkhole, where the deployment of Biansha troops was relatively weak. Achi's reinforcement troops came so quickly because there was still a relay station in Duanzhou, but as he had shifted his focus to the southeast and was helpless against Xiao Chiye's Libei Armored Cavalry, he gave Tantai Hu, who always had his eyes on the movements in Duanzhou, the opportunity to provide diagonal support.

Xiao Chiye had already removed his armor last night. After the military medic withdrew from the tent, he moved his shoulders and arms a little and looked around at them. "We are not here this time to fight a showdown battle with them but to wrest Duanzhou from them. Now that Achi is dead and a large number of their troops are still stationed in the northeast, the number of troops in Duanzhou is less than 10,000. It's an excellent opportunity."

Fei Sheng brought the medicine to Shen Zechuan and stole a few glances at the latter, noting the Prefectural Lord to be in passable spirits.

“Quite a number of cavalymen escaped yesterday.” Yin Chang pressed a finger down to the southeast of Duanzhou. “The troops here will suspect we are going to attack Duanzhou once they receive the news. They will definitely move to intercept us first.”

The old man feared no one during military discussions. He even casually tied his messy beard together. It was just that he did not dare to drink in Shen Zechuan’s and Xiao Chiye’s presence and could only rely on strong tea to satisfy his cravings.

Xiao Chiye did not reply immediately; instead, he left the opportunity to Tantai Hu.

In these two years, Tantai Hu had gradually come to gain some insights and opinions of his own. He pondered over the Second Master’s meaning and raised a hand to point at Duanzhou’s location. “We are now at the Chashi Sinkhole, which is some distance away from Duanzhou. If the troops in the southeast come here to intercept us, then the military strength in the city of Duanzhou will remain unchanged.” He looked at Xiao Chiye with some apprehension and continued when he saw Xiao Chiye’s neutral expression. “Get Wu Ziyu, who is stationed in Mount Luo, to make a detour to the west gate of Duanzhou when that happens, and we will be able to launch a surprise attack directly.”

Xiao Chiye nodded as an indication that Tantai Hu was right.

With a slightly heavy expression, Gu Jin looked at the Chashi River and said, “We can lure all the troops to the Chashi Sinkhole by being bait, but Master, the Chashi River lies right behind us. The moment Amu’er seizes the opportunity to mobilize troops for a sneak attack, or if Hasen is deployed over from the south, then we will end up being attacked from the front and rear. By then, Wu Ziyu would have already gone around to the west of Duanzhou. We will be left without reinforcements.”

“By saying that, you’re breaking the hearts of those in the war zone.” Xiao Chiye watched Shen Zechuan drink his medicine in between speaking. When he was done, he continued, “Is the Shasan Camp not reinforcement?”

Gu Jin paused for a moment, then shook his head. “I can’t trust Guo Weili.”

Xiao Chiye did not continue the thread of conversation. He raised his hand and patted Gu Jin lightly on his back. “My eldest brother has a clear view of the situation from where he is in Dajing. We must obtain Duanzhou at all costs. There's still Lu Guangbai and shifu on the battlegrounds. The Three Great Camps will certainly do their best to stall Hasen. As for Amu'er..." Xiao Chiye smiled derisively. "The tribe he can deploy at such urgent notice is the Qingshu tribe."

Qi Zhuyin wanted to send troops to attack the Qingshu tribe. The Empress Dowager and the Ministry of War did not consent, but did that mean there was absolutely nothing she could do about it?

"Qidong's military provisions are being supplied by the Yan clan, and the carriages are already heading for the Cejun Commandery three days ago." All Shen Zechuan could taste in his mouth was bitterness.

"Commander-in-chief Qi should have already eaten her fill by now."

As long as they could let Qi Zhuyin eat her fill, she would dare to play games with Qudu. She did not venture into the capital the last few years to contend with those wily old foxes because she did not want to go looking for trouble. But now that the scimitars were almost right before her eyes, all those concerns went flying out of the windows.

"The speed of the cavalry's advancement in the snow is not as fast as it usually is. We still have time here to prepare," Xiao Chiye said. "The current campground is rather rudimentary. Have the Dunzhou Garrison Troops dig horizontal trenches in the vast expanse of open ground. Take turns to carry out night patrol duty, and send the falcons out for reconnaissance too. The Imperial Army and Libei Armored Cavalry have been fighting hard for several days, so rest up whenever possible. We have to conserve our strength and stall the enemies long enough for Wu Ziyu."

With the heavy snow obstructing the roads, it would be too late to deliver the message on horseback to Mount Luo. The good thing was that the Libei Armored Cavalry all brought along their own falcons, which could deliver the message by flying northwest for a few hours.

Everyone responded in the affirmative. When they started to discuss among themselves, Xiao Chiye reached under the clothes on his chest and groped around for a moment. Shen Zechuan set down the medicine bowl and grasped the folding fan in his sleeves when something suddenly sprang onto him between his sleeves. He fixed his eyes on it—it was a piece of candy wrapped in oil paper.

Xiao Chiye looked at the map with a straight face, looking as if he was not the one who had done it.

Wu Ziyu slept in Mount Luo until he was awakened by the deputy general at midnight. He opened the letter the falcon delivered, read it by the candlelight in the tent, and was instantly wide awake. Not even daring to sleep anymore, he rose to put on his armor. "Where's that Yan Heru?"

He had only just said that when Yan Heru popped his head out from the side of the hanging screen and answered, "Here!"

Wu Ziyu clutched the letter and said gruffly, "Is everyone dead? How can you let him enter as he wishes?"

"Aye, come on now, don't be mad." Yan Heru made his way in with his hands around his little golden abacus. "His Lordship told me to wait here, so I did. What can I do, man? Master Wu, aren't you being a tad too cautious?"

"Marching troops to war is different from merchants transporting goods. If something goes awry, we will literally lose our heads." Wu Ziyu had dealt with the Mount Luo bandits before when he was preparing military provisions for the Libei Armored Cavalry last year, so he was not flustered to encounter those like Yan Heru. He put away the letter first before saying, "I'm going to mobilize troops soon. The Mount Luo bandits have only just been eradicated, so it doesn't reassure me to leave you here. Let's do this. Go and pack up quickly. You'll be leaving with me."

Yan Heru had conducted deals with the Biansha people before. There would be no one to watch him if they were to leave him in Mount Luo, and Wu Ziyu found it inappropriate. He had to keep an eye on him.

Yan Heru was so frightened that his face turned a shade whiter. Hugging his abacus to his chest, he followed behind Wu Ziyu and said, "Blades and swords have no eyes, Master Wu. Why are you taking me with you? My family's businesses all depend on me, so I can't have anything happen to me. You know about Qidong's military provisions? I'm the one delivering them now. I'll just stay behind. Or how about you assign someone to send me back to Cizhou? Dunzhou is fine too!"

"Don't tell me we aren't capable of protecting you given how many soldiers we have." Wu Ziyu bared his frightfully white teeth at Yan Heru. "I'll send you back after the battle. You won't go wrong going with the Prefectural Lord. I assure you it will not hold up your affairs."

Then, without waiting for Yan Heru's reply, he yelled for the guard outside to stuff Yan Heru into the horse carriage and secured him to take him away with the troops.

Wu Ziyu exhaled deeply at the entrance of the tent. It was dark. He took out the crumpled letter earlier to read through it again. The candlelight from the tent fell upon his back. He stared blankly at the word “surprise attack” for a long time.

Launching a surprise attack on Duanzhou concerned Xiao Chiye’s safety. This battle had to be fought not only quickly but also steadily. Two men who were inextricably linked to the war situation were now both at the Chashi Sinkhole, and Wu Ziyu could not afford to take responsibility for the loss of either one of them; he had to shoulder the load of this weight.

But I’m just an escort in the convoy squad.

Deep creases formed between Wu Ziyu’s brows as he frowned. He gazed out through the long night and recalled the first time he met Xiao Chiye.

“Aren’t you the Libei Armored Cavalry?”

Under the blazing sun, Xiao Chiye partially looked back with eyes deep and quiet.

To this day, Wu Ziyu still did not dare to answer Xiao Chiye. He seemed to have tacitly agreed that all he could do was to escort the supply wagons, but at the same time, he was loath to accept it. In his early years, he had been sent to Bianbo Camp as a punishment by Xiao Jiming for drinking on the job. He watched as Zhao Hui became the Commanding General of the Three Great Training Divisions of Liuyang, and now he was watching as Chen Yang and Gu Jin were successively entrusted with heavy responsibilities. Meanwhile, Xiao Chiye held him back in Bianbo Camp, never putting him at the forefront.

Wu Ziyu spat and stuffed the letter back into his bosom. He took two steps in the snow before suddenly leaping up and swinging his clenched fists around in the air a few times.

Since Xiao Chiye dared to give him the opportunity, then he would dare to stake his life and all that he held dear to fight a battle for Second Master!

The snow gradually lightened at the hour of you the next day.

Xiao Chiye put on his heavy armor in the military tent. His armor had taken some damage from the assaults of the iron hammers the day before. The left and right arms were the most severely battered, especially the left arm which had repeatedly taken the brunt of Achi’s iron hammers; it was even somewhat dented.

“Wu Ziyu has already arrived at the western side of Duanzhou. Last through this night, and we will be able to make a simultaneous attack from the front and back with him tomorrow morning.” Xiao Chiye appeared visibly taller when he was in armor, so much so that he was almost blocking off all the light before Shen Zechuan.

Shen Zechuan sat on the plank bed. In the eyes of the others, his presence here had a far deeper purpose. Xiao Jiming’s current daringness to pull out all the stops and let the Three Great Camps in the war zone assist Zhongbo in the battle of Duanzhou was not just because Xiao Chiye was here, but also because Shen Zechuan was here; this was the sincerity Libei saw.

“Fei Sheng, in leading the Imperial Bodyguards to follow after Hairigu, can make up for the temporary lack of scouts.” Shen Zechuan looked on as Xiao Chiye put on his arm guard. “If you don’t come back tomorrow, then the remaining troops will be put at the forefront of the battle.”

The troops that Xiao Chiye left behind were meant to serve as a protective barrier for Shen Zechuan. If something unexpected were to happen, these people would escort Shen Zechuan up north. When the time came, Shasan Camp would naturally come to receive him.

Xiao Chiye’s hand that had been securing the arm guard paused slightly. He looked at Shen Zechuan, understanding what Shen Zechuan meant. Shen Zechuan motioned for Xiao Chiye to squat down. It was inconvenient for Xiao Chiye to squat in his armor, so he simply withdrew a leg and knelt on one knee on a spot near Lanzhou.

Snow outside the tent fell like light willow catkins. Intermittent sounds of Fei Sheng lecturing Yin Chang about his drinking drifted through the air. Meanwhile, the Libei Armored Cavalry in their heavy armor stepped in the snow and moved in concert with one another. It was noisy all around. Inside the tent, tea that had been set above the charcoal brazier with firewood burning in it started to boil.

The expression in Xiao Chiye’s eyes was penetrating. Of late, the dazzling brilliance of his talent was becoming harder and harder to conceal. “Wait for me here.”

“As a matter of fact, I would like to go.” Shen Zechuan’s overcoat slipped off his shoulders. Imitating Xiao Chiye’s past action, he pinched Xiao Chiye’s chin and cocked his head slightly. “But I don’t have that capability. All I can do is to remain here as the wife who shares hardships with his husband.”

Xiao Chiye, who had been letting Shen Zechuan pinch as he wished, burst out laughing on hearing him.

Shen Zechuan listened as Gu Jin stopped outside the tent. He took the helmet over and put it on for Xiao Chiye. In that brief exchange of glances, he and Xiao Chiye exchanged a kiss across the steel.

“After tonight,” Xiao Chiye’s icy iron fingers caressed Shen Zechuan’s cheeks, his voice low and deep as he said, “my Lanzhou will be the overlord of Zhongbo.”

Xiao Chiye tested his new blade on Achi, but it was far from enough. He was so ravenous he could devour the north and south battlefields. Every battle was a trial; he wanted to hone his blade even faster here.

The Biansha’s massive troops in the southeast numbered 25,000, of which 5,000 were the Scorpions. The remaining cavalymen lacked horses, so many of them could only stand in temporarily as infantrymen. They lost their commanding general, and they were unable to obtain updates from the opposite bank of the Chashi River. Obstructing Xiao Chiye was a measure they were forced to take in order to ensure the safety of Duanzhou.

What Xiao Chiye wanted was for them to be forced into doing so. Once these 25,000 men moved, the western side of Duanzhou would be completely vacated, and Wu Ziyu could immediately begin his attack on the city. The advantage in having Shen Zechuan seal off Zhongbo would then become apparent—Duanzhou would not get any form of assistance, and since their grains had already been supplied to Achi’s 20,000 soldiers, the 8,000 troops remaining behind to keep guard on Duanzhou would all have to meet the enemy’s attack on empty stomachs.

When the battle in Zhongbo started, it was in the dead of night over at the Bianjun Commandery.

News of Achi’s defeat had yet to make it to the Qingshu tribe, whose night patrol squad was presently roaming around the Bianjun Commandery. The commanding general of the Qingshu tribe was called Sumeng, who used to be Hasen’s deputy general and could also partake in the discussion of official affairs when he was under Amu’er command. But because his tribe was not powerful enough, he lost the opportunity to follow Hasen up north. He had also crossed swords with Lu Guangbai here before.

The Bianjun Commandery was devoid of snow tonight. From afar, Suotian Pass looked like a sleeping beauty lying in slumber upon the city. There were bits of floating snow in the air, while no trace of the moon could be seen when one raised their head.

Sumeng felt the Bianjun Commandery to be too silent tonight. It made him feel ill at ease, so he increased the number of people on night patrol, keeping all eyes on the eastern front of the Bianjun Commandery in case of a surprise attack from the garrison troops.

During the latter half of the night, the night patrol squad set up a bonfire in the wilderness, where they filled their stomachs with melted snow as they roasted the dried meat jerky they carried with them.

“The Scorpions in the north have been winning battles.” A cavalryman of the Qingshu tribe said in the Biansha tongue as he broke off the dried meat jerky. “They’re about to merge into the Twelve tribes and become a tribe near the north. By then, will we still be able to get our hands on provisions?”

Sumeng drank the melted snow, shaking his head as he said, “The Hero will never allow the Scorpions to become a tribe of their own. They are the slaves of the Liaoying tribe.”

The mothers of the Scorpions were all natives of Dazhou, and with the emergence of traitors like Hairigu, it would be difficult to convince the masses even if they were victorious in battles. Moreover, the person who all the tribes in the desert answered to was Hasen.

“If they can give us Gedale,” the cavalryman smiled at Sumeng, “then we won’t have to worry about starving in the future anymore.”

Sumeng gulped down the melted snow and did not answer immediately. He had sounded Amu’er out before, but did not receive a response. The Qingshu tribe was not a powerful tribe, and the Liaoying tribe of today was no longer the minor tribe it had been in the past. In addition, the Huiyan tribe had thrown in their lot with Libei, leaving their Qingshu tribe behind here to choke on sand with the Bianjun Garrison Troops. But who would have expected the Bianjun Commandery Garrison Troops themselves to take off in the end? After being stationed here day in and day out, Sumeng could not see a future. He pinned all his hopes on his son, but as it happened, his son came to a premature end at the beginning of spring this year.

“There is purpose in waiting.” These were the only words of comfort Sumeng could offer. “At least we won’t face reprisals from Libei if we stay here.”

The cavalrymen burst into laughter.

Halfway through the bonfire, a cavalryman saw several stray dogs behind him. He brandished a withered branch at them and shoo-ed at them to drive them away. But these stray dogs were so starving they were drooling and panting warm air as they circled the cavalry.

“Chase them away,” Sumeng ordered.

So the cavalryman stood up, grabbed his scimitar, and started to stomp his feet as well. The stray dogs cowered back for a moment, and the cavalryman, with his bulging belly, turned back to suggest to Sumeng. “We can hunt them. Dogskins can—”

Before the cavalryman could finish his words, the stray dogs pounced. It was as though they had gone mad as they tore at the cavalryman with their fangs and dragged him with such force that he fell over to the ground. The dogs latched onto his arm that had been holding onto the scimitar. The leather could not withstand the sharp fangs of the stray dogs, and the pain cut so deep that it sent him screaming.

Sumeng promptly stood up, and the cavalrymen on night patrol caught up to the cavalryman in distress and kicked out at the stray dogs as they dragged him back. Sumeng noticed that the eyes of these dogs were oddly red with rage, so to be on the safe side, he told the cavalrymen, “Shoot them to death with the bows. Something’s wrong with these dogs.”

A few faint cries of a Chinese francolin reverberated through the night. As if sensing danger, the stray dogs turned tail and fled as the cavalrymen got on their horses and drew their bows. The dogs ran westward in a panic, and the cavalrymen followed in hot pursuit.

A stray dog took an arrow to the leg and limped as it continued to flee onward. The cavalryman behind it drew his scimitar and leaned down with the intention to end the stray dog with one slash in between the sprinting of his horse. They galloped wildly, splashing froths of snow in the air. An explosive “whoosh” rang out, and a long arrow came hurtling from the west. The cavalryman instantly fell off his horse. His legs, however, were still hanging from the saddle, and he ended up getting dragged by the horse across the demarcation line.

Oh, shit!

Sumeng swore to himself, feeling a sense of foreboding. Amu'er had long instructed them not to engage Qidong in battle at this moment. As long as they did not attack, Qi Zhuyin could not step to the fore. He immediately reined in his horse and shouted, "Fall back!"

But the torches ahead lit up all of a sudden, illuminating the surroundings brightly.

"Qi Zhuyin!" From where he was on horseback, Sumeng decried in the Dazhou tongue, "Women are devious—"

Qi Zhuyin stood in front of the combat-ready garrison troops in full battle array. As she crushed the snow beneath her foot, she leisurely said, "Light up the beacon tower. Inform Qudu that the Qingshu tribe has breached the boundary line and invaded our territory."

The Qidong Garrison Troops abruptly lined up their shields, and the cold steel of their blades glinted and flashed.

Support the Author!

If you like this story, consider supporting the author!

Novel || Author || JJWXC || Audio Drama

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2022 Lianyin

CHAPTER 211 : HEAVY FROST

Warning: Animal Abuse :V

A boundless expanse of thick clouds swarmed forth and swallowed up the sunlight. Falcons from Libei soared across the vast horizon. Meng was the first to swoop down. Under the cries of the falcons, it spread its wings, dispersing the thin fog as it looked down upon the stretch of pure white snow. The saker falcons came from the south like a volley of sharp arrows shooting straight towards the falcons. Letting out a long, loud cry, Meng spun and brushed past the military banner beneath. The sound of war drums instantly reverberated through the sinkhole.

Cavalrymen surged towards them with the momentum of a tidal wave incoming from the south.

The Armored Cavalry remained still. Once the scimitars of the Biansha Cavalrymen could be clearly seen, Yin Chang drew his old blade with a loud clang and roared at the sky, “Unveil the trenches—!”

The Imperial Army, who had been lying prostrate in the snowfield, promptly released their grip on the ropes at both ends, exposing the newly dug trenches. Meanwhile, the Biansha Cavalry, renowned for their speed, was charging long-distance towards them when they crossed the trenches. Unable to stop in time, the horses fell into the trenches, and cracking sounds instantly rang out as their front knees broke on impact.

The vanguards of the Biansha Cavalry tumbled into the trenches, throwing the array at the head into disorder. The Imperial Army instantly drew their blades and pounced like wolves to engage this batch of vanguards in the trenches. Without losing speed, the Biansha Cavalry at the back spurred their horses into leaping over the trenches to continue with their charge forward.

Even as Yin Chang hacked down the Biansha Cavalry, he still had to dodge the hooves leaping over his head, or he might just get his head kicked into a bloody pulp in a moment of inattention. He bent over and shouted over to the other end, “Laohu, what’s wrong with you? You dug this way too narrow!”

Tantai Hu’s palms were slick with sweat. He heard Yin Chang’s shouts as he fixed his eyes on the Biansha Cavalry galloping over, but he did not dare to divert his attention to answer. Gripping his own twin blades, he silently recited Tantai Long’s name to himself.

A Biansha cavalryman’s scimitar was already swinging towards him when the ponies were right about to reach him. Tantai Hu rolled forward, and Xiao Chiye, who was behind him, stuck out Langli Blade in a flash, making use of the cavalryman’s momentum to stab through him. Blood splattered. Leading the garrison troops, Tantai Hu crouched and slashed his blade across to cut off the ponies’ legs.

The ponies screamed and threw back their heads as they toppled over to the ground, like wild geese that had lost their wings. The cavalrymen fell off the ponies and rolled. Tantai Hu wiped the blood from his face, lifted both blades, and roared, “Revenge avenged!”

After getting thwarted again and again, the Biansha Cavalry decreased the momentum of their charge, no longer willing to advance rashly. But the distance between them had already shrunk. They wanted to retreat, but Xiao Chiye was now advancing.

Xiao Chiye tapped gently on the abdomen of his horse with the back of his blade, and Lang Tao Xue Jin charged forth. The sound of the Libei Armored Cavalry’s hooves was as resounding as muffled thunder as they pushed forth urgently with the snowstorm moving in tandem. They rammed into the Biansha Cavalry, breaking the latter’s battle array into tatters. The “war chariot” formation left the Biansha Cavalry with no time to catch their breaths. As long as they were slammed over to the ground by the heavy armors, the iron horseshoes of the Libei Armored Cavalry would trample over flesh and blood as they steamrolled over the Biansha cavalrymen’s bodies.

A saker falcon swept past overhead, with the wind trailing in its path as it attempted to flee east. Meng swooped through the snow and grabbed hold of the saker falcon with its talons. As it passed by Libei's wolf banner, it ripped off one of the saker falcon's wings before flinging the saker falcon away.

The Biansha Cavalry retreated like the receding tide, and one of its young generals galloped on horseback and yelled a series of swift commands. He withdrew the regular cavalry, then chided the Scorpions in the Biansha tongue for them to advance. The scimitars were instantly drawn back as the cavalymen retreated with their eyes on the Libei Armored Cavalry.

Xiao Chiye slowly returned to the battle formation, and the protruding columns on all sides followed suit and merged back swiftly. The Scorpions took the place of the vanguards. The iron hammers they swung no longer faced up to one Armored Cavalry, but a group of Armored Cavalries.

Xiao Chiye led the charge. As he sped forth, he suddenly kept away Langli Blade. Following his action, the Armored Cavalry behind him unleashed those new blades of terrifying length. Xiao Chiye bent over slightly as they stabbed hard into the ranks of the Scorpions like a flash of cold glint in the night.

Xiao Chiye flipped the longer hilt with both hands and took away a Scorpion's head as his horse passed by. To reduce its weight, the sharp steel of the long blade was thinned down, and it took just the blink of an eye for throats to be slit. A spray of blood instantly splattered towards his heavy armor along its iron arm before spilling onto the ground.

The iron hammers could not keep up with the speed of the long blades, and they were not long enough to swing and hit the Armored Cavalrymen themselves either. All they could do was watch helplessly as the Libei Armored Cavalry killed their way into their formation and cut down their own ranks into two halves.

Lang Tao Xue Jin broke through the Biansha Cavalry's encirclement and snorted as it turned around on its hooves. Xiao Chiye held his long blade at a slanting angle and shook off the viscous blood on its blade.

Scorpions on both sides gasped for air as they watched all of their center unit tumble off their horses. Everywhere Xiao Chiye passed, streams of flowing blood formed. His long blade practically sliced off the heads of everyone who stood in his way.

A Scorpion pulled at his reins as he murmured in the Biansha tongue, “Chidaqi...”

The Libei Armored Cavalry spurred on their horses once more, and the Scorpions, no longer willing to continue fighting, turned their horses around at the sound of that muffled thunder. When the young general of the Biansha Cavalry at the back saw the Scorpions retreating, he hurriedly brandished his blade to berate them, but to no avail. Fear had already been sown in the hearts of the Scorpions. Following the loss of their leader, they had been reduced to mere sacrifices on this battlefield.

Lang Tao Xue Jin galloped out of the pack, while the Libei Armored Cavalry followed close behind on its trail.

The Biansha Cavalry on the south side of the sinkhole were too powerless to resist, as their scimitars were unable to pierce the heavy armors. Those who lost their ponies scrambled over themselves to run like mad in the snow, their urgent breaths of white air resembling a wave of floodwater breaching its dam. Surfaces of snow quaked as the Libei Armored Cavalry made its passage through. A Biansha Cavalryman who was falling behind the rest fell to the ground, and his scimitar went flying from his hand. Before he could even reach out a hand to draw out his piked dagger, he was swallowed up whole under the hooves of the Armored Cavalry.

Xiao Chiye charged out from the fringe of the battle formation and chased after the Biansha Cavalry like Xiao Fangxu had done so thirty years ago, showing no mercy under the iron hooves of his horse. The Libei Armored Cavalry ran on a rampage as they assaulted and massacred their way forward. Heavy armors gravely traversed the battlefield, turning into heavy blades in the midst of emerging from their sheaths in Tantai Hu’s eyes.

As the Scorpion galloped on his horse, he shouted sharply, “Chidaqi!” Vicious wolf!

Seven years ago, Xiao Jiming led the troops down south, earning himself the name “River of Ice Armored Cavalry”, and tonight, Xiao Chiye chased after the Biansha Cavalry for twenty li, the echoes reverberating through the lands he stepped on.

“Damn...” Yin Chang’s Adam’s apple bobbed as he wiped the blood off his face and recited silently to himself,

The passage of heavy frost through the lands leaves not a blade of grass in its wake.

Shen Zechuan was boiling tea in his tent. The Prefectural Lord, inept as he was in the art of tea, simply stuffed the tea leaves into the teapot, filled it with water, and set it on the fire to boil. His folding fan was resting on his knee, and there was a stack of piled-up documents on the desk at his side, yet his eyes were fixed on that tea as he watched it gradually start to boil and bubble over.

Hairigu squatted at the entrance of the tent and peeked through the gap. "It's not drinkable if you boil it like this, or is it?" he asked Fei Sheng.

Fei Sheng did not have a favorable impression of this Scorpion, so he looked ahead with his arms folded and listened to the urgent beats of the war drums. "It's not like you are going to be drinking it, so what are you worrying about?"

Shen Zechuan stared blankly for a long time, and by the time he returned to his senses, the tea had almost evaporated. He lifted the teapot off, added more water, and continued to boil it. The sound of boiling water could cover up some of the drumming from the war drums, which was putting him in a dazed trance. He had not done any work today either.

Seeing as it was late, Fei Sheng lifted the flap to enter. He said softly to Shen Zechuan, "Master, how about taking a quick nap? As soon as there's news from the battlefield, I'll call you."

Shen Zechuan lowered his eyes and did not answer him.

Fei Sheng understood that the Prefectural Lord was reluctant to do so, so he dared not persuade him further and retreated to the entrance of the tent to wait in attendance. The tea in the military tent boiled for the entire night. When it was almost dawn, Shen Zechuan heard the war drums stop.

Shen Zechuan rose and pushed aside the flap. Fei Sheng hurriedly draped a cloak over him and accompanied Shen Zechuan out of the tent. They made their way outside, where Shen Zechuan waited again for a moment in the snowy fog bathed in the first glimmer of dawn. It was extremely frigid in the morning, so frigid that the tip of one's nose would turn red from the freezing cold if one stood for too long out there. The north wind pounced on their faces like sharp knives. After a little less than an hour, Shen Zechuan suddenly heard the rising sound of hooves, followed by rows after rows of emerging silhouettes overlapping one another. Meng was the first to return to camp.

Fei Sheng heaved a sigh of relief as if he had been relieved of a heavy load. He immediately congratulated Shen Zechuan, “Master, it’s a success!”

Meng circled in the air, wanting to land on Shen Zechuan’s arm. Shen Zechuan was not wearing his arm guard today. Just as he lifted his arm, a whistle sounded from the other end.

Xiao Chiye broke through the boundless expanse of heavy fog and spurred his horse on without stopping. The moment he rushed into the campgrounds, he swept up Shen Zechuan. Lang Tao Xue Jin slowed and turned its hooves around to gallop away into the fog again with both men on its back. Meng, which had pounced on empty air, landed on the military banner and wiped its talons clean as it watched them run further away into the distance with a sidelong glance.

Yin Chang, with arms cradling his war trophy, wanted to say something, but Fei Sheng held him back and did not give him the chance to open his mouth. The rest of them wore a wide array of expressions. Tantai Hu spat on his palms and rubbed them together to warm them up a little. “... Let’s enter the tent first. Military affairs can be reported a little later. There’s no hurry to do so right now.”

With that, he repeated it once more, only to make what he had been trying to cover up all the more conspicuous.

“No hurry to do so now.”

“Whatcha’ mean? No hurry?” Yin Chang craned his neck to look around him and said in bafflement, “We have to head back to the city at the hour of mao. His Lordship’s very much in a hurry!”

CHAPTER 212 : DREDGE (UP THE PAST)

Lang Tao Xue Jin galloped away from the campgrounds, but did not go far. It came to a stop on a snowy slope at the northern end of the Chashi Sinkhole. The humid fog and snow made Shen Zechuan appear to be situated amidst the vast expanse of misty, rolling waves on the lake's surface. All his eyes could see where they roamed was white.

Xiao Chiye rolled off his horse and removed his helmet. There was sweat along his temples as he panted slightly, yet his eyes were full of spirits. "Can you see Duanzhou?"

As Shen Zechuan held onto Lang Tao Xue Jin's reins, he handed the blue handkerchief in his sleeve over to Xiao Chiye. He could only catch a glimpse of the abandoned relay station's watchtower in the far distance amidst the visible clouds of his breath, but he understood Xiao Chiye's jubilation. "Looking at Duanzhou now is just like looking into what's already in my bag."

Xiao Chiye lifted his chin slightly, and beads of sweat trickled down. He smiled. Shen Zechuan gazed at him, realizing that he still retained the unyielding and untamable attitude he possessed during their time in Qudu; this was the spirit that Shen Zechuan desired to have in his possession.

Shen Zechuan leaned over, breathing onto Xiao Chiye's cheeks. The tip of his nose pressed right up against Xiao Chiye and edged up along the latter's temple as he licked the latter's sweat like he desired. Those beads of astringent, salty sweat dissolved in Shen Zechuan's mouth. As his Adam's apple bobbed slightly, he said, "This will be your, Xiao Ce'an's, riding track from now on."

Xiao Chiye raised a hand over Shen Zechuan's nape, covering it, and the iron fingers of the armor he had yet to remove were icy and hard as they lay over the soft, fair neck, leaving behind a touch that resembled the cold steel of a blade.

"I don't want a riding track." The straight bridge of Xiao Chiye's nose nuzzled along the spot on Shen Zechuan that had been bobbing earlier. He watched fixedly as Shen Zechuan narrowed his expressive eyes. His words had an edge of danger to it as he said, "I want Shen Lanzhou."

Shen Zechuan breathed out a puff of hot air at Xiao Chiye. Xiao Chiye thought Shen Zechuan wanted to kiss him. He did not expect Lanzhou to grab the chance to pull back the blue handkerchief in his hand. Shen Zechuan then straightened up and wrapped the overcoat tightly around himself. The Prefectural Lord, who was sensitive to the cold, revealed only his eyes and the reddened tips of his ears as he said in a muffled voice, "Shen Lanzhou's freezing to death."

Xiao Chiye, his arms empty, had still yet to realize what just happened.

Shen Zechuan watched Xiao Chiye's expression undergo several changes. Xiao Chiye looked as though he was going to make a grab for him, so Shen Zechuan immediately shook the reins to urge Lang Tao Xue Jin into returning back to camp. Xiao Chiye cradled his helmet in his arms. There was still a lingering warmth from where he had been licked on his temple. He touched it, gradually getting riled up as though he were a maiden of a decent family who had been disrespected by a frivolous philanderer.

"Shen Lanzhou..." Xiao Chiye watched as Shen Zechuan fled. With a stride of his long legs, he slid down the snowy slope and yelled, "Heartless cad!"

Achi, who had been confident of success, had been defeated at the Chashi Sinkhole, and the Biansha people, who had been winning battles in the north for half a year, never expected Achi to lose to Xiao Chiye. The remaining soldiers in Duanzhou were no match for Wu Ziyu's surprise attack. Consequently, the six prefectures of Zhongbo all fell under Shen Zechuan's command. Qudu received news of it only seven days later. At the same time, the military report of Qi Zhuyin's mobilization of troops into battle with the Qingshu tribe also made its way into the palace.

The Empress Dowager sat in Mingli Hall behind the hanging curtain and flung the memorial onto the seat across the luminous pearls. The eastern pearls swayed beside her ears as she held back her rage and barked at the ministers in the hall, "Did the Ministry of War reject Qidong's request to deploy its troops or not? Chen Zhen, you handle military affairs, and you can't even make yourself clear?!"

The Minister of War, Chen Zhen, immediately knelt on the ground, knowing that the Empress Dowager was venting her anger. Qi Zhuyin now had a strong and well-trained military, and Qudu was unwilling to act rashly and offend them, so they could only take it out on the easy games like him. He listened expressionlessly until she was done speaking before saying, "In the first month of the year, Commander-in-chief Qi presented a memorial to the imperial court, hoping to deploy troops to fight the Qingshu tribe. We rejected her request on the grounds that we were lacking in military provisions. The Grand Secretariat kept a copy of the correspondences for archival records. The Senior Grand Secretary and the various other ministers are all aware of it."

The Empress Dowager understood that this was in no way authorized by the Ministry of War, but she was still fuming. After a moment's pause, she continued, "So why did she go ahead with it this time?"

"Seven days ago, the Bianjun Commandery's night patrol encountered a surprise attack by the Qingshu tribe." Chen Zhen lifted his head slightly at this point. "Commander-in-chief Qi was thus forced to mobilize troops."

"Amu'er is at war with Libei in the north. Why would the Qingshu tribe provoke Qidong for no rhyme or reason?" Han Cheng had been at the receiving end of Qi Zhuyin's frostiness when he escorted Hua Xiangyi to her new home. Sitting in the hall now, he suddenly bared a smile and said, "Then again, it's really such a coincidence that Commander-in-chief Qi happened to be in the Bianjun Commandery just when the Qingshu tribe launched their surprise attack. This battle was such a swift and abrupt one that the report of victory and request were both presented together. Even if she was at fault, she had already succeeded."

Kong Qiu, who had fallen ill after the new year, sat in the hall with his complexion all ashen as he covered his mouth and coughed. "We cannot listen to only one side of the story. If the Qingshu tribe had genuinely crossed the line, then Commander-in-chief Qi's mobilization of troops was an act of emergency. For the past years, the situation at the frontiers has been unstable. When Lu Guangbai was still stationed at the Bianjun Commandery, the Qingshu tribe often invaded as well. The details of the matter still need to be presented by Commander-in-chief Qi. What is of utmost urgency now is how long this war will continue? We are right about to enter the plowing season in spring, and the thirteen cities of Juexi are still waiting for the arrangements to be made. The supply of military provisions is of major concern."

Pan Xiangjie timidly folded his arms up his sleeves. Xue Xiuzhuo wanted to investigate their Pan clan of Dancheng, and this matter had been stuck at an impasse for a long time. Given that the fields were still in dispute, he did not dare to butt in now for fear that the Grand Secretariat would apportion the shortfall of military provision to them.

The Empress Dowager did not consent to send their troops to war because Qidong's deployment of troops at this moment was akin to supporting Libei, and also because Xue Xiuzhuo had been too impatient in chasing the accounts. The Eight Great clans were presently in a situation where one slight move could lead to major consequences for all of them. Fields were their roots, and the young masters of the eight cities all depended on these fields to survive. If an investigation were to be launched, then the noble clans would suffer debilitating effects just by having to return the fields to the common folks and make up for the arrears in taxes. Not to mention that there was also the risk of dismissal and prosecution as well as imprisonment. Qi Zhuyin's battle with the Qingshu tribe meant that the expenses for the Qidong's Five Commanderies' military salaries and provisions would have to go through the accounts of the Ministry of Revenue. Once the state treasury ran out of money, all the past events during the reign of Yongyi were going to get dredged up again. The Empress Dowager was acting in place of the crown prince, and there was still the Heir Apparent beside her eyeing the throne, so she dared not act rashly without careful consideration.

Whether Amu'er was a rapacious aggressor or not, the noble clans did not know, but they knew it was inadvisable to keep delaying given the current situation. Zhongbo had already grown to be a thorn in their sides, and getting themselves stuck in a stalemate with the Heir Apparent and the Grand Secretariat would not do the noble clans any good.

“Since it was the Qingshu tribe that invaded, Qi Zhuyin can just repel them; there is no need to mobilize troops again to penetrate deeper into the enemy’s territory.” The Empress Dowager’s fury had subsided. She deliberated it over and said, “I know that it’s bitterly cold and impoverished at the frontiers. No doubt the battle with the Biansha people must be fought, but not now. Just as the Grand Secretary has said, the spring plow season is right around the corner. We should place the commoners as our priority. Not all of Juexi’s territories last year had bumper harvests either, and the granaries in Qudu have still yet to be filled to the brim, so where would the imperial court have the spare grains to give Qidong to fight wars? This matter has to be conveyed properly to Qi Zhuyin. As someone who assists in the government affairs of the Five Commanderies, she should have long known about this.”

Silence descended upon Mingli Hall for a moment. The hanging screens at the entrance were all securely tucked in to keep the wind out. Because of Qi Zhuyin’s mobilization of troops, the atmosphere in the hall was grave and heavy.

In truth, Kong Qiu and Cen Yu approved of Qi Zhuyin’s wish to wage a battle against the Qingshu tribe. But they were presently duking it out with the noble clans. Pan Lin was the one who had the Ministry of Revenue in his grasp, but he presently had his hands too full with Xue Xiuzhuo incriminating him to jointly discuss the matter of Qidong’s military salaries and provisions. Moreover, it was precisely because the Pan clan was the first to bear the brunt that Pan Xiangjie did not dare to let his son get too involved with the Grand Secretariat at this juncture.

Pan Xiangjie was used to playing fence-sitter. It was all thanks to this ability to sway where the wind blows that he could survive until now. He did not want to offend Xue Xiuzhuo, and he did not want to offend the Empress Dowager either. As long as there was no victor in the tussle for power in Qudu, he was unwilling to let the Pan clan follow another’s lead easily. In the past, he threw in his lot with Hua Siqian and Wei Huaigu, but these two men both used him as a scapegoat. Now wary and guarded, he trusted none of these three parties.

Cen Yu sighed lightly. He rarely spoke up in Mingli Hall now. Yu Xiaozai left the capital with the letter he wrote to Shen Zechuan, but Shen Zechuan never replied, and he understood what Shen Zechuan meant by that. Everyone had drinks in his house a year ago, and he still remembered the distinguished figures Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye had cut then. He found it a pity the way things had turned out.

Cen Yu shifted his gaze to Li Jianting, who was sitting upright at the side staring at the tea before her, as if she had not heard the discussion in the hall. After the court session was dismissed, Cen Yu and Kong Qiu walked along the long path that had been cleared of snow.

The palace eaves on both sides hung low, turning the paths oppressively dim. The eunuch in front was holding a lantern. As Cen Yu walked, his sleeves flapped in the wind. The wind blew his short, newly grown beard all over, and he lifted a hand to stroke it.

“Why didn’t you say a word today with something this big happening?” Kong Qiu asked.

Cen Yu lifted his eyes. “Her Majesty’s mind is already made up. The result will be the same, whether or not I speak up.”

It was already dark by the time both men walked out of the palace gate. Cen Yu did not get into the horse carriage. Instead, he carried the lantern himself and stepped on the snow as he walked on the level path with Kong Qiu.

“Xunyi, you seem to have a lot on your mind today.” Kong Qiu scrutinized him. “What are you thinking about?”

“Thinking about today last year,” Cen Yu answered, “when Vice Commander Shen and Marquis Xiao were both still in Qudu...”

If Emperor Tianchen had not been assassinated, perhaps Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye would still be in Qudu today. Cen Yu had always been one to cherish talents. He once thought of having Shen Zechuan join the imperial court as an official, but alas, things did not go the way he wished—the weight of Shen Zechuan’s crime was too heavy.

Kong Qiu let out a long sigh and thought of Hai Liangyi again.

“If Emperor Tianchen possessed even a fraction of a crown prince’s disposition, would you and I be reduced to such a state? I’ve been feeling more and more out of my depth lately. There are simply too many situations that are beyond my ability to salvage. They do not consent to the current war Commander-in-chief Qi is waging with the Qingshu tribe for fear that the military provisions would drag the eight cities’ fields into it. But I can tell that the war in Libei is at a tense and critical juncture. Even the Prince of Libei, Xiao Fangxu, met his end in battle. The strength and the capabilities of the Biansha can no longer be underestimated.” Cen Yu could see it all clearly, but it was pointless. He could not solve the conflict in Qudu just with his eloquence alone. It was simply a tall order to get the noble clans to relinquish their existing interests.

Both of them had not gone far when they saw a man standing under a bamboo umbrella ahead of them, waiting. Cen Yu and Kong Qiu traded looks and looked at Xue Xiuzhuo.

Xue Xiuzhuo's official robe was brand new, and he was not wearing a lined jacket. He stood in that spot all by his lonesome self, like a floating leaf among the torrential currents even as the wind sent his sleeves fluttering. He kept away his umbrella and bowed in greetings to Cen Yu and Kong Qiu.

"Why are you standing here? Is something the matter?" Kong Qiu asked.

Xue Xiuzhuo straightened up as floating snow sporadically danced past. "This humble official has been waiting here for both gentlemen to discuss the issue of Dancheng's fields and taxes in detail."

Cen Yu frowned slightly and said, "Affairs of the imperial court should be settled on the imperial court itself. There is no reason to discuss them in private. This case, in particular, should avoid having aspersions cast on it. If others were to see this, rumors and slanders would inevitably start making their rounds. You should go back first. We'll discuss it in the Grand Secretariat's office tomorrow morning after the morning court session."

"If not for the urgency of the matter, this humble official would naturally not dare to bother both of you." Xue Xiuzhuo's expression remained unchanged. "At the beginning of the month, Her Majesty drew up a decree to have a key official from the Ministry of Revenue tag along to investigate the case, and Pan Lin appointed Liang Cuishan, who is in charge of salt taxes in Hezhou and Juexi."

Kong Qiu and Cen Yu both knew who Liang Cuishan was. Xiao Chiye had vouched for him and recommended him for an official position during the collapse of the public ditches. He was a Ministry of Revenue official who had been personally appointed by Emperor Tianchen to investigate Wei Huaigu in the case of the military provisions. He was very talented in the administration of financial affairs and taxes. Last year, he sorted out the old accounts of the thirteen cities with Jiang Qingshan in Juexi, and for a period of time, he even managed the transportation of grains by water from Hezhou to the capital.

Yan Heru told Shen Zechuan that it was tough to do business via the waterways. The Yan clan's goods heading for Juexi were all subjected to rigorous checks, and Liang Cuishan was the reason for this. This man was smooth and diplomatic in his work, but he was not a slippery character. In his position, the amount of tax money passing through his hand every day numbered tens of thousands of silver. Yan Heru wanted to pull strings and make backdoor deals with him, but his attempts were all rebuffed.

“Liang Cuishan has already returned to the capital and will enter the palace tomorrow morning to seek an audience.” Xue Xiuzhou held his umbrella in his arms. “But he had a narrow escape this trip and must meet both gentlemen tonight.”

Copyright secured by Digiprove © 2022 Lianyin

CHAPTER 213: TURN OF EVENTS

Liang Cuishan was not wearing his official robe; instead, he had on a sheepskin-lined jacket over his upper garment with overlapping collars and a pair of green cloth shoes. He was the total antithesis of “His Excellency Chongshen” as town rumors went, with a short beard, squarish face, and a tanned complexion from being on the go outside all day. His hands also did not seem to be the kind that held brushes, but hoes. Cen Yu almost took him for an errand-runner when he stood under the relay station’s lantern to meet Kong Qiu and Cen Yu.

“Why does Chongshen look like this?” Cen Yu asked in astonishment.

Liang Cuishan led them upstairs and waited for them to take their seats before he answered. “It’s a long story. This humble subordinate is truly indebted to both of Your Excellencies for your willingness to come—I can die a hundred deaths without regrets now!” With that, he gave Xue Xiuzhuo a long bow. “Your Excellency saved me from calamity today. This humble subordinate shall never forget this kindness for as long as I live!”

Xue Xiuzhuo wiped his hands with the hot handkerchief in the room and took a seat at the side. He merely said, “It’s a matter of urgency. You should discuss it in detail with both His Excellencies first.”

“What is it?” Kong Qiu sized up Liang Cuishan. “Going by the dates, you should arrive in Qudu only the day after tomorrow.”

“The superiors are rushing me, so this humble subordinate dare not delay on the road. To tell Your Excellency the truth, it is also to pull the wool over the eyes of others that I dressed up like this.” As Liang Cuishan spoke, he fished out an account book from under the clothes on his bosom and set it down lightly by Cen Yu’s hand. “Your Excellency supervises the Ministry of Revenue’s audits of accounts all year round, and you would have seen this kind of account book before. Please take a look.”

Cen Yu flipped the account book open and looked through it for a long time before hesitatingly asking, “isn’t this the account book the City of Chuancheng submitted to the Ministry of Revenue at the beginning of the year?”

“That’s right. It’s the account book of the Marquis Helian from the City of Chuancheng. Along with the accounts from the rest of the seven cities, it was handed over to the Ministry of Revenue at the beginning of spring to be reviewed. The aim was to straighten out the details of their taxes and expenditures with the assistance of the Chief Surveillance Bureau. There was no issue with it at that time.” Liang Cuishan fished out another account book from his bosom. “This account book, on the other hand, has been tidied up by this humble subordinate these few days.”

Cen Yu’s countenance changed the instant he read the beginning of the book. “How did you sort out this account?” he asked Liang Cuishan.

With a solemn expression, Liang Cuishan organized his thoughts and said, “Her Majesty drew up an imperial edict last month, and Vice Minister Pan wanted this humble subordinate to assist the Court of Judicial Review in investigating the City of Dancheng’s accounts. But this humble subordinate was in the City of Yongcheng in Juexi at that time reviewing the thirteen cities’ sales taxes with His Excellency Jiang.”

Within a few days, Liang Cuishan received a visitation card from the Tax Circuit Intendant of Juexi at the relay station. Liang Cuishan never received visitors when he was attending to official duties, but this Tax Circuit Intendant took the opportunity to leave Liang Cuishan a “small gift”. Liang Cuishan opened it to find gold inside.

“Juexi is connected to the city of Dicheng and the prefecture of Hezhou through the waterways, and the Tax Circuit Intendant is in charge of the administration of all affairs relating to grains and the transportation of grain by water in between. It’s a lucrative job, but this humble subordinate was based in the Provincial Administration Commission of Juexi, which has the Provincial Administration Commissioner, Jiang Qingshan, overseeing matters, so I dare not act rashly and inadvertently alert the perpetrator.”

The position of Tax Circuit Intendant shared some similarities with Liang Cuishan’s position, except that it did not hold as much authority of office as Liang Cuishan had from concurrently holding the position in two places. Even so, the Tax Circuit Intendant wielded considerable influence when it came to a place like Juexi. Liang Cuishan did not dare to act without due consideration and end up tipping the perpetrator off, as he suspected at that time that this person had come to offer bribes at Jiang Qingshan's behest.

Liang Cuishan was a very cautious man. It had not been easy for him to finally see better days after all the hard times he had to go through, so he was extremely careful when navigating the official circles. He wanted to be a capable minister, but at the same time, he also wanted to keep himself alive. Juexi was Jiang Qingshan's territory. If he had immediately submitted a memorial to impeach this Tax Circuit Intendant, then his memorial might not even have made it out of Juexi before being detained. In addition, Jiang Qingshan's opening up of the granaries to distribute relief grains in the fourth year of Xiande and his taking full responsibility for the matter had sent shock waves through the imperial court and the common people. He was well-loved and held in high esteem in all thirteen cities of Juexi. Liang Cuishan had no chance of winning against him just based on this point alone. Furthermore, anyone with a discerning eye knew that Jiang Qingshan was Xue Xiuzhuo's weapon.

"This humble subordinate spent sleepless nights in the relay station. Naturally, the gold cannot be accepted, but there was also the concern of sowing the seed of disaster if it was hastily returned." At this point, Liang Cuishan cast a glance at Xue Xiuzhuo. "Moreover, His Excellency Jiang has an unimpeachable reputation out there, and this humble subordinate, having worked with him for quite some time, more or less has some understanding of his character. For that reason, this humble subordinate went ahead and summoned that Tax Circuit Intendant over."

This was a dangerous and risky move. Liang Cuishan, who did not dare to make a rash move, had to find other traces from this breakthrough point. At the very least, he had to figure out if Jiang Qingshan was the mastermind behind the Tax Circuit Intendant.

"The Tax Circuit Intendant handles the matters pertaining to taxation of the transportation of grains via the waterway of the thirteen cities. Getting money is not a difficult matter for him." Kong Qiu said. "But the Censor-in-chiefs under the Chief Surveillance Bureau also have their eyes on the accounts, and the origins of those ships are all clear. How could he have been able to get away with the deception?"

"This is where this humble subordinate has doubts," Liang Cuishan said. "This humble subordinate pretended not to dare accept it and asked the Tax Circuit Intendant to take the gold back. He then told me that those golds were clean and were not items on record in the Juexi's accounts."

"He is in charge of the transportation of grains by water. Since it's not an entry in the Juexi's accounts," Cen Yu closed the account book, "then it must be from..."

The City of Dicheng or the Prefecture of Hezhou.

"Yan Heru of Hezhou is a thieving and unscrupulous merchant. He attempted to bribe me when I went to check on the transportation of grains by water in Hezhou last year. But this man is immensely wealthy, and there is no need for him to take the risk and embezzle money from the imperial court's internal account books." Liang Cuishan was even more careful when he came to the part about the City of Dicheng. "The Prefectural Prefect of Dicheng is the son of a concubine from the Fei Clan who married into the Hua clan.<sup>1</sup> He is very much in the Empress Dowager's good graces, and his track record of political achievements in the yearly appraisal these few years have been outstanding too. This humble subject dare not incriminate him without any evidence and could only contend with that Tax Circuit Intendant in the hope of obtaining more details."

A bribery meant that there was something to be done in exchange, especially for someone in Liang Cuishan's position. He initially thought that the Tax Circuit Intendant was Jiang Qingshan's man, and that he had come to offer a bribe because of the Juexi's salt tax they were auditing at that time, but very quickly, he discovered this to be not the case. Since these golds were not on record in the Juexi's accounts, then it meant that there was someone else behind the Tax Circuit Intendant, and this person could only be a high-ranking official of a noble clan close to Dicheng.

Liang Cuishan would never bring up the Hua clan of Dicheng, because this was the empress dowager's clan and birth home. When Hua Siqian fell from power, the only property the imperial court confiscated from the Hua clan was Hua Siqian's manor. In less than a year, the Empress Dowager had staged a comeback and was presently in charge of the administration of government affairs. Even if Liang Cuishan was every inch a dauntless and gutsy one, he would not dare to incriminate the Empress Dowager.

But Liang Cuishan only had to think of this matter from Qudu's perspective, and he could understand what these golds were supposed to buy. Who would be the most flustered during the time when the Empress Dowager drafted up an edict to have Liang Cuishan check the fields in Dancheng with the Court of Judicial Review? The Pan clan of Dancheng.

At this point, Cen Yu had already figured it out. After going around in one big circle, it turned out to be Marquis Helian who bribed Liang Cuishan through the Tax Circuit Intendant in order to preserve the Pan clan. The Marquis Helian's daughter, the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue, had married a lad from the Pan clan, and his common son born of a concubine was betrothed to a maiden from the Hua clan. He was the only one who matched the profile, except that this move of his was truly unwise.

Liang Cuishan owed Pan Lin a debt of gratitude for the kindness the latter had shown him by promoting him. Pan Lin had initially granted that favor at Xiao Chiye's behest, but Liang Cuishan later went on to prove himself to be capable, and that was why Pan Lin was willing to let him step into the limelight. As long as Liang Cuishan had a smidgen of selfish interest, he would, for the sake of this kindness, think twice before acting when it came to the matter of Dancheng. This was something he could not refuse. But this was just great now. The Marquis Helian sent someone to bribe him. Liang Cuishan only had to skip reporting this to the top, and he could be considered to have repaid Pan Lin's kindness to him. Subsequently, he would no longer be encumbered when checking Dancheng's accounts in the future.

And that was not all. Liang Cuishan even secretly re-examined the eight cities' accounts following along the trail of this bribe and repeatedly reviewed the accounts of the Marquis Helian's Fei clan of Chuancheng. The so-called money that could not be found in the account books actually came from the invisible checkpoints the noble clans set up within their own cities when ships or caravans of traveling merchants passed through the checkpoints. In order to transit through, the merchants could only pay private taxes to the noble clans at double the price. Later on, men like Yan Heru joined the fray. He wanted to get back all the money he had forked out, so he took the Xi clan's place and started to resell the copper, iron, and salt within the territories on behalf of the noble clans and the local officials of various ranks, thereby bypassing the tariffs. The small trade market of Dunzhou was thus established.

Cen Yu reopened the account book Liang Cuishan had put into order and looked at the sum of silver for a dizzying moment. They had been caught in a tussle with the noble clans all these years in Qudu, and many a number of capable officials had all successively met their ends in their quest to get to the bottom of the accounts. The two account books of Hua Siqian and Pan Rugui that Hai Liangyi recovered during the reign of Xiande had been merely the tip of the iceberg!

Even though the resurgence in the reign of Yongyi had been short-lived, the taxation system it had left behind in the various regions made up for the largest share of the state treasury's annual revenue. Dazhou's rapid decline in just over a decade was inextricably linked to bad debts; it had been internally dug clean, with this lot of money flowing into the pockets of the noble clans.

Cen Yu could barely remain steady in his seat. Even his hands that were holding onto the account book were trembling.

Other than the tax money, there were also the crop fields. Cen Yu did not even have to do the math, and he could already imagine just how colossal the outflow of money was.

"When Libei resorted to arms during the reign of Xiande, it did not receive any military salaries and provisions. Xiao Jiming could only rely on whatever bits of grain farmed by the Libei military garrison who also did farming duties<sup>2</sup> to head down south and fight the Biansha Cavalry back."

Cen Yu's breathing quickened as his trembling hand flipped the pages.

"Qidong did not receive any military salaries and provisions then either. Lu Guangbai supplemented reinforcements up north using Qi Zhuyin's dowry, and for the past few years, Qi Shiyu has spent all the money from his estate on the garrison troops. Then, there was also the time during the first year of the reign of Tianchen, when the Qingshu tribe fought their way to the entrance of the Bianjun Commandery. Lu Guangbai's army was so starved they had to eat sand!"

Every time. Every single time.

The reason the commanding generals of the north and south entered the capital was to ask for money. Qi Zhuyin was even forced into fraternizing with the ruffians-cum-loansharks in Qudu. Meanwhile, Lu Guangbai did not even manage to get a single audience with the emperor during the reign of Xiande. How many people died when Juexi was suffering from drought? Jiang Qingshan gritted his teeth and opened up the granaries to distribute relief grains to the people, and his octogenarian mother even had to weave cloth to pay off the debt. The six prefectures of Zhongbo were helpless in the face of the empty coffers, forcing Zhou Gui, Luo Mu, Huo Qing, and the rest of them to submit to and grovel before the bandits.

This was the “poor” the Ministry of Revenue bemoaned.

Clenching his teeth in hatred, Cen Yu flung the account book onto the table. “The private crop fields appropriated by the eight cities haven’t even been included. This is all blood money...” At this point, he started to get choked up. “The Secretariat Elder pursued the matter to such an extent... The country was already heading for ruin in the reign of Xiande... is it still salvageable? No, it isn’t!”

The room fell silent. Liang Cuishan hung his head in silence. He was drifting duckweed without roots and connections. If he wanted to continue delving deeper into this matter, he needed a powerful backer. He first communicated with Jiang Qingshan, through which he was granted a meeting with Xue Xiuzhuo. It was only then he finally managed to see Kong Qiu and Cen Yu. He did not accept the gold from the Marquis Helian, but it was useless to merely keep it sealed on hand. Someone had to vouch for him. Otherwise, he would have to die as long as he did not forge the accounts as Marquis Helian wished once he arrived in Dancheng. Not even Pan Lin would be able to protect him.

The handkerchief Xue Xiuzhuo had set at the site had gone cold. “I should avoid doing anything that might cast suspicions on me when it comes to this, but this concerns Chongshen’s safety, and it also involves the investigations of the fields in Dancheng, so I can only discuss it here with both gentlemen.” As he spoke, he poured tea for Cen Yu and Kong Qiu. “I heard news today of Qidong’s use of military forces, and I presume the Ministry of Revenue is going to shirk responsibility again. With all the bad debts from the various areas thrown together into one big mess, I fear that the spring plowing and Qidong’s military provisions will be delayed.”

Kong Qiu had misgivings about Xue Xiuzhuo. Xue Xiuzhuo’s move with the Heir Apparent had been too daring and dangerous. What’s more, he used the storm the Imperial College stirred up to suppress and edge out the officials of humble origins, which left a bad taste in Kong Qiu’s mouth now that the practical doers faction was in full swing. His intuition from all his years of service in the Ministry of Justice told him in no uncertain terms that Xue Xiuzhuo would never ever be at his wits’ end, so he said, “surely you did not call us here just to look at the account books.”

“A matter discussed, a matter concluded.” Xue Xiuzhuo changed his form of address for Kong Qiu. “The Senior Grand Secretary did not question Commander-in-chief Qi’s use of military forces on the Qingshu tribe during the discussion in Mingli Hall. I presume you approve of it, but the Ministry of Revenue is indeed hard-pressed to bear the expense for military salaries and provisions due to the depleted state treasury. That was why you did not discuss it in detail with Her Majesty.”

“That’s right.” Kong Qiu was even more composed now compared to the time when Hai Liangyi was still around. “Commander-in-chief Qi’s use of military force on the Qingshu tribe at this time may seem to be removing foreign aggression for Libei, but in fact, it is to sweep Dazhou clean of invaders. Amu’er has wild ambitions. No egg stays unbroken when the nest is overturned; likewise, no one can escape unscathed if Dazhou is invaded. Helping Libei now is helping Dazhou.”

Xue Xiuzhuo retrieved a booklet<sup>3</sup> from his sleeve and pushed it beside Kong Qiu’s hand. “This is a rough estimate of Qidong’s expenses for military salaries and provisions. Deploying troops long distance is not as cheap as stationing garrison troops in the Bianjun Commandery in the past. Just the consumption of grain wagons is enough to eat up the tax silver of the entire Baimazhou territory last year.”

Kong Qiu looked at that booklet and said, “a portion of the silvers was used up last year to provide relief in the disaster-stricken areas. Furthermore, it’s nearing the beginning of spring now. Whether the spring plowing in the eight cities can be carried out without a hitch is a major issue we have to consider too. If the noble clans aren’t willing to return the commoners’ fields and make up for the arrears in land taxes, the Grand Secretariat has no way of giving Commander-in-chief Qi an official written reply with regard to her request to deploy troops. No matter how clear your estimates are, it’s pointless.”

“I do have an idea.” Xue Xiuzhuo looked at Kong Qiu. “The Xue clan can bear Qidong’s expense this time.”

Not only were Kong Qiu and Cen Yu stunned when the words left his mouth, but even Liang Cuishan was too.

It was common knowledge that the Xue clan of Quancheng were already showing signs of waning since the last generation. The lawful son of the principal wife, Xue Xiuyi, was a hypocrite who pretended to be virtuous and lofty. He kept getting hoaxed by a group of charlatans from the marital fraternity into chalking up debts everywhere. To date, their household only had one Xue Xiuzhuo who was capable enough to stand on the imperial court. So where on earth would the Xue clan have money?

It suddenly dawned on Liang Cuishan, and he remembered Shen Zechuan before Xi Hongxuan came to his mind.

Kong Qiu gazed at Xue Xiuzhuo in astonishment and uncertainty. "It's such a large sum. We might not be able to repay it even if I issue a memorandum of debt to you in my capacity as the Senior Grand Secretary of the Grand Secretariat."

"There is no need for the Senior Grand Secretary to issue me a memorandum of debt." Xue Xiuzhuo poured a cup of tea for Kong Qiu and said with a severe countenance, "all I ask is for the Senior Grand Secretary to join forces with me to audit the eight cities' field taxes."

The lanterns outside the relay station started swaying as the wind swept away the tattered notices on the road. The indistinct reed pipes music from the Donglong Street of Qudu wafted through the long road of the relay station until it was obstructed by the palace walls, where it then disappeared among the double-eaved roofs. Li Jianting, who was within those palace walls, sat by the edge of the couch and recalled her past under the tinkling of the metal wind chimes.

Fengquan was putting down the drapes for Li Jianting when he suddenly heard the Heir Apparent ask, "do you wear earrings?"

With her black hair cascading over her shoulders, Li Jianting gazed at the deep and quiet bedchamber and continued as if answering for both Fengquan and herself.

"I abhor earrings." Her eyes that so resembled Emperor Guangcheng turned towards Fengquan, gradually curving into a smile under the darkness. "Wearing it makes one look like livestock—the kind that lies at the mercy of others."

CHAPTER 214: COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF

On this day when the sun was shining high in the clear sky, the entrance of the Duanzhou city gates was a riot of noise. Damp snow on the ground went splattering all over under the hooves of the horses. The wheels of wagons transporting provisions skidded between the stone slabs, dragging the horses until they skewed their bodies and neighed, obstructing the path in the process. The Libei Armored Cavalry behind them was unable to enter, so they had no choice but to dismount their horses to lend a hand.

“This cursed weather...” Yin Chang urgently needed to answer the call of nature, and his face was all red from holding it in as he wrung the belt of his pants. “... keeps changing at the drop of a hat. It was so freezing cold a few days back that someone died, yet it’s so blazing hot today it scalds my ass.”

Horses ran along the path, splashing wet snow over the people until they were dirty all over. Fei Sheng bundled up his robe and tucked it into his belt. He lifted a hand to pinch his nose and grouched, “why do these Biansha ponies stink so bad?!”

“They roam the Gobi desert, where they poop as they please.” Just as Tantai Hu was speaking, the Biansha pony before him stuck up its tail to take a dump. That steaming hot dung plopped into the damp snow. Tantai Hu scraped his boots, wanting to pull this horse farther away. Before he could move, a few people on horseback sped past him from behind, splattering hot dung all over them.

Fei Sheng's face was already green from holding his breath. It was so stinky it made him hop. The moment he saw the fresh dung assailing towards them, he dove behind Yin Chang, using the old man as a shield and letting him bear the full brunt of the hit.

"The balls of you to run!" Yin Chang yelled at the Libei Armored Cavalrymen who had sped past him and wiped his face before turning back to snap at Fei Sheng, "the balls of you to dodge!"

Wu Ziyu tugged at the reins, meaning to turn around and head back here when Tantai Hui wasted no time in brandishing his hands and cursing, "motherfucker, get off your horse!"

Wu Ziyu had just changed into a new pair of boots, and the filthy, muddy figures they all cut were enough to deter him from getting off his horse. He slowed his horse and trotted over to them to ask, "why is it just the few of you? Where are the Second Master and the Prefectural Lord?"

"They went in first." Fei Sheng's breathing was ragged as he said in a nasal tone, "Why wasn't this snow cleared earlier? Now the entire path is obstructed. Look how filthy it is. My master's white robe would be ruined if it so much as touched the ground!"

Wu Ziyu had fought a victorious battle and was feeling pleased as punch with his success. He was just thinking about inviting them out for drinks one of these days. Despite being cussed at, he was not at all angry. Smugly, he said, "I'm busy, okay?"

Before he was done laughing, a snowball from the other end flew over and smacked him right in the face.

Gu Jin's nose could not bear the stench any longer. His expression was livid as he broke out in a string of curses after swinging a ball at Wu Ziyu, "the balls of you to laugh! If this hot weather persists, the snow in the city will melt. Just you wait for the sewage in these rotting public ditches to start overflowing. The entire city inside and out will stink to high heavens then."

Gu Jin was usually a man of few words who rarely cussed since he also shouldered the heavy responsibility of raising Ding Tao. He did not even lose his temper when he was humiliated by Guo Weili at the Tudalong Banner last year, but the stench was so overwhelming it almost knocked him out from where he stood a short distance away.

Wu Ziyu used to be quite attentive and thorough in his work, but his victory in the battle this time had gone to his head, leading him to expose his shortcomings and leave behind loose ends in trivial matters. If Chen

Yang were here, he would no doubt remind him. But to Gu Jin, scolding him was more straightforward.

The three men still standing at the back were all struck dumb. Yin Chang held in his pee and stood in a row with Tantai Hu, all just waiting for Gu Jin to give the command to dismount and get to work immediately.

Fei Sheng murmured, “oh, how familiar this curse sounds.”

Tantai Hu vaguely hinted, “balls, he said.”

“Bah,” Yin Chang stooped over and denied, “it wasn’t me who taught him that!”

Wu Ziyu had already obediently rolled off his horse.

Duanzhou had never suffered a great fire as Dunzhou had, and its streets all still looked the same as they did seven years ago. Stores and restaurants had long since closed. Achi had only kept a few cooked meat shops around; the Scorpions loved the braised beef here. The Biansha troops had resided here for a period of time, and they had slaughtered everyone in the residential areas in the east and west. However, they retained the night market to the north.

“It was here Lei Jingzhe carried out his deals with the Scorpions.” Shen Zechuan stepped on the pile of obsolete junk and leaped onto the collapsed courtyard wall. He could see the night market in the north standing here at the top. “Shifu used to love to come to this place in the past as he could buy stuff that could not be found on the market.”

“What’s to the south?” Xiao Chiye strode up and looked south. “... Biansha’s riding stables.”

Shen Zechuan exhaled. “So, this is an empty city.”

Shen Zechuan once worried about the overwhelming numbers of refugees swarming to Cizhou and Chazhou from Dancheng, but it now seemed that Zhongbo, with its depopulated population, was a good place to take in the refugees from the eight cities.

“It’s time to reorganize the Yellow Registers.”<sup>4</sup> Xiao Chiye watched Meng soared on the horizon. The warmth of the sun was making him lazy. He was not wearing his armor today, just his arm guard. “It was primarily administered by the three prefectures last year. The garrison troops of Chazhou and Dunzhou were lacking in numbers, so the registrations were all jointly handled by the lesser functionaries. But now that the six prefectures have fallen under our command, it's time to separate the civilian and military registries."

The civilian registry fell under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Revenue; it actually could not be integrated and jointly managed with the military registry. Xiao Chiye held the post of the Imperial Army's Viceroy back in Qudu, and the Imperial Army's office compound had a place specifically dedicated to the overall management of the Imperial Army's military registry. This was one of the reasons the Imperial Army and the Eight Great Training Divisions were irreconcilably antipathetic to one another. It was not that easy a job to be the overlord of Zhongbo. There were already not enough Cizhou advisors to go around; the six prefectures all needed yamens for government administration, warden's offices for military affairs, as well as the corresponding investigation censors of the respective circuits.

"All of these won't pose that much of an issue. Yu Xiaozai has the authority to go on a tour of inspection in the six prefectures, which is akin to being an investigation censor. I actually meant to make him the Surveillance Commissioner of Zhongbo. His appraisals in Qudu are all excellent. Moreover, his job in Qudu encompasses fieldwork in various areas, so he's well-acquainted with the tricks and maneuvers in the yamen. And while Chengfeng isn't willing to serve under me, he's willing to assist in the governmental affairs of the remaining five prefectures, which more or less resolve my most pressing needs." Shen Zechuan watched Meng fly back as he continued, "we have no lack of lesser functionaries. As long as the various prefectural yamens are willing to open up opportunities, people will naturally come. What we lack are key officials that can govern and administer government affairs in the prefectures."

Not only that, Shen Zechuan lacked generals too.

At present, the military affairs in Chazhou were temporarily managed by Luo Mu. It was no big deal if it was just for a short while, but Shen Zechuan would never let him continue with it for long. This was because Luo Mu had three powers – legislative, executive, and judicial – in his hands now. The Imperial Bodyguards were temporarily standing in as censors, but they did not have the authority of office to interfere with the government administration of Chazhou. If Luo Mu harbored ulterior motives, then it was possible for him to hide it from Shen Zechuan's eyes as long as he did it covertly enough. To avoid this kind of incident from happening again, Shen Zechuan had to confirm the candidates for the various prefectures as soon as possible.

Meng landed on Xiao Chiye's arm. "We lack a treasurer too."

Shen Zechuan thought of Liang Cuishan when Xiao Chiye brought up this matter. He looked at Xiao Chiye and said, "a pity about Liang Cuishan."

"Liang Cuishan has work to do under Pan Lin's command, so it's not really a waste of his talents." Xiao Chiye soothed Meng's feathers. "I heard from the reports a few days back that Xue Xiuzhuo is going to check the Dancheng's fields? If this can be successfully carried out, none of the eight cities will be able to escape unscathed, and that will be a heavy blow to the noble clans."

"No definite news yet," Shen Zechuan said as he leaped off the wall. "We will have to wait for them to come over before we can know the details."

They walked back along the path. When they arrived before the house they were lodged at, only Fei Sheng was there waiting. There were no signs of Gu Jin or the others.

"They all went to clear the snow." Fei Sheng's words took an about-turn in his mouth. He added, "It's Gu Jin and Wu Ziyu's turn to take over this time."

What he meant was that he was not loafing on the job—he just happened to be taking a break.

Shen Zechuan knew Fei Sheng's temperament, and he had no plans to pursue it further either, so he merely said to Xiao Chiye, "The public ditches in Duanzhou have to be re-inspected. We don't know the state they are in, so we have to make plans for it as soon as possible."

Xiao Chiye cast a glance at Fei Sheng but said nothing. Fei Sheng had done a fairly decent job playing it safe in his handling of Huo Lingyun's matter. He had held his temper in check and did not attack the other man, and even if he could not stand the sight of Huo Lingyun, he did not go around creating trouble for him. As a result, Xiao Chiye was now finally willing to remember and recognize him.

Fei Sheng did not dare to let both of them remain standing at the entrance, so he led the way inside and had the Prefectural Lord take his seat first. This place was the residence of the former Duanzhou's commander of the Zhu clan, the same Zhu clan in which Lei Jingzhe was born. It had fallen into disuse here, and Wu Ziyu had tidied it up to receive both of them from their journey afar so they could take a rest.

The clearing of snow at the city gates continued until the hour of xu. These were all men who had led troops to fight wars, so Shen Zechuan did not call them over for a discussion all night. The kitchen had long prepared the dishes, and everyone took a few bites before getting on with their rest. Fei Sheng, who shared a dwelling with Yin Chang and Tantai Hu, fainted right there and then as soon as these two men took off their boots.

Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye had only just finished their meals when Gu Jin, who had been waiting outside, entered.

Seeing something amiss with Gu Jin's expression, Xiao Chiye set down the light read in his hand and asked, "what's the matter?"

Gu Jin took out the letter from his bosom and presented it to Xiao Chiye. "There is a letter from Libei to Master."

Xiao Chiye noted that there were two letters—one was official business Xiao Jiming wrote, and the other was a private letter Chen Yang had sent over. He first looked at Xiao Jiming's letter. His eldest brother mentioned the horses would be able to arrive at Mount Luo at the end of the second month, which was also when Xiao Chiye was slated to return to the battle zone. Xiao Chiye had long known about this, but there was one mention of interest worth ruminating over.

When Gu Jin left the room, Shen Zechuan popped his head out from behind and set his chin down on the top of Xiao Chiye's head. He lowered his eyes to read the letter, then said in a calm tone, "so, a surprise from your eldest brother."

Xiao Chiye read that part a few times. "He transferred Guo Weili over to my Sha'er camp, a move that is meant to free up the Shasan Camp for my shifu. Guo Weili isn't used to fighting at Hasen's rhythm. It's too aggravating for him to remain in Shasan Camp."

In all fairness, Guo Weili did indeed possess the talent to lead troops. The fact that he could defend the Tudalong Banner for so long was proof enough of his capability. However, this man had a short fuse and a bad temper, and he was extremely impulsive. He was not an easy man to get along with, especially when he was unconvinced or unwilling to concede defeat and would be all belligerent and combative when he opened his mouth. Last year, he wounded Gu Jin and even stripped Gu Jin of his military rank. For that reason, his relationship with Xiao Chiye was rather delicate, and his soldiers repeatedly clashed with the Imperial Army in the Shasan Camp after Xiao Chiye took down said camp.

The commanding generals of the Three Great Camps in the battle zone were on rotation this year. Both Xiao Chiye and Guo Weili were unaccustomed to each other's troops. Ever since his arrival at the Sha'er camp, Guo Weili had hardly touched and mobilized the Imperial Army. He found the Imperial Army a slippery bunch who played dirty. They relied on their Qudu origins to throw their weight around and had no respect for their superiors. Because of Xiao Fangxu's incident, he no longer acted acrimoniously or created a scene even if he could not stand the sight of Xiao Chiye, but the issue with Gu Jin remained unresolved, like a thorn that stood between them.

This person was difficult to use.

There was also a deeper meaning to Xiao Jiming's arrangement. The other two camps could both communicate and work with Guo Weili; whether it was Zuo Qianqiu, Lu Guangbai, or Zhao Hui, none of them would get into a dispute with Guo Weili. Yet Xiao Jiming just had to transfer him to Xiao Chiye's Sha'er camp.

After a moment of silence, Xiao Chiye said, "as expected of my eldest brother."

This arrangement was truly a blow that hit right at the crux of the matter where it hurt.

After this battle in Duanzhou, Xiao Chiye's words would carry a lot of weight once he returned to the battle zone. He did not get along with the Libei Armored Cavalry, but both of them could slowly get used to each other. Much like this occasion, no army would reject a commanding general that could lead them to victory. Moreover, not only was Xiao Chiye fair in meting out rewards and punishments, but he was also a man of his word. However, if he wanted to put the Libei Armored Cavalry to full use, he would have to overcome the obstacle that was Guo Weili. Otherwise, a lack of unity among the generals who were not of one mind would surely lead to disaster.

Shen Zechuan felt sleepy in the room. With his eyes half-closed, he murmured softly. "Ce'an, the vastness of the ocean comes from its acceptance of hundreds of rivers.<sup>5</sup> This is an opportunity your eldest brother is giving you."

Under the dim light, Xiao Chiye recollected the campfire in the snowstorm. Xiao Fangxu had clenched his fist right before his eyes, and amidst the flickering light of the fire, his old man had asked him:

“You want this position, but are you truly qualified enough?”

CHAPTER 215: IRON FINGERS

Hasen stood in the vast wilderness and watched the girl leap off the horse a short distance away. Without even removing his scimitar, he spread his arms open to catch that beautiful red figure pouncing towards him in a steady grip.

Duo'erlan gasped softly, her red skirt fluttering as she was spun around, her laughter, clear and melodious. "May the gods bless my heroic eagle!"

Hasen hugged his newlywed wife with a slight blush on his face. He brushed away the snow off Duo'erlan and responded, "and may the gods bless my Duo'erlan."

Hasen had only just gotten married at the beginning of the year, a marriage bestowed upon him by Amu'er. His beloved Duo'erlan was a girl from the Hulu tribe deep in the desert. She wore a jujube-red pleated skirt, and was as beautiful as the morning dew on the shores of Lake Chiti. She was the most intense filly of the Twelve Tribes. Hasen was head over heels in love with her.

Duo'erlan scrutinized Hasen. "Bayin broke his promise to me. You've lost weight."

Hasen laughed in spite of himself. "He can't always stay by my side."

"Then he shouldn't have promised me." Duo'erlan landed on the ground and took Hasen's hands. "I brought fresh goat's milk."

"It's too far." As Hasen was led away by Duo'erlan, he gazed at her. "Let Chagan do all this work next time."

Hasen rested for a mere two days after his marriage before returning to the battle zone. It was hard for Duo'erlan to see him, and she could only depend on the opportunities to deliver supplies to meet him here. She happily showed Hasen the food she brought along, and Hasen gobbled up the flatbread she made with her own hands.

“I want to come here and see you.” Duo’erlan sat on the sack and watched Hasen eat. “I miss you so much, just like the morning dew misses the sun. Will you go back when the snow melts?”

Hasen took a sip of the icy cold milk and met Duo’erlan’s eyes. The color of her pupils was a light shade of green. Each time Hasen gazed into them, it was like gazing into the clear, shimmering waters of Lake Chiti. He would think of everything wonderful, which made it impossible for him to say “no” to Duo’erlan. He lovingly caressed Duo’erlan’s cheeks and answered, “if the war ends.”

“You avenged Gegenhasi. Father is grateful to you. You’re not only the Hero of the Hanshe Tribe, but also the Hero of the Hulu Tribe.” Duo’erlan cupped his face. “The heroic eagle shall fly across the Hongyan Mountains. I’ll always be waiting for you at Lake Chiti.”

The “heroic eagle” Duo’erlan spoke of was more like a term of endearment. In the entire desert, only she and Hasen’s mother could call him that, for Hasen would be shy. Gegenhasi was Duo’erlan’s elder brother. He was also Hasen’s brother that Xiao Fangxu killed.

The wind in the wilderness was too cold. After Hasen finished his milk, he brought Duo’erlan back to the camp. A fire was burning in the military tent, and it was here Duo’erlan steeped milk tea for Hasen. They both liked unrefined tea.

“If the Huiyan Tribe was still around,” Duo’erlan sipped her milk tea, “we would have a never-ending supply of tea to drink in winter.”

Hasen had just finished slicing the roast meat for her and was in the midst of wiping his dagger. With a serious expression, he answered, “They will come back.”

Duo’erlan would be leaving with the squad escorting the supplies tomorrow, so Hasen did not stay with the soldiers tonight. As briefly separated newlyweds who just reunited only to part again soon, they retired for rest very early. Snow suddenly fell in the middle of the night. Hasen was sleeping soundly when he suddenly heard the call outside the tent. He got up carefully, put on his robe, and stepped out.

Snow lunged full-on at Hasen as soon as the tent flap was lifted. With his hair loose around his shoulders, he patted his robe as he asked the soldier before him, “what’s wrong?”.

“Bayin is back!”

Hasen turned his head over and saw the remaining cavalry.

Bayin, who had been galloping on the road for days, rolled off his horse and landed on the snow-covered ground with legs gone weak. Refusing support, he first snatched the water canteen at the side and tilted his head back to gulp the water down. It was only after the front of his robe was drenched that he appeared to have caught his breath.

“What happened?” Hasen picked up Bayin’s scimitar, then looked at Bayin again with a slightly heavy expression as he said with certainty, “Achi has been defeated.”

Bayin rubbed his frozen cheeks and exhaled deeply. He cut an extremely sorry figure, with both his legs covered in mud. He tossed the canteen back into the arms of someone beside him, looking particularly haggard as he stood before Hasen. “Xiao Chiye lured us on the frozen river to Chashi Sinkhole. It was there he killed Achi.”

As he spoke, he reached out to tug hard at the left side of the horse saddle. Achi’s head tumbled off in response and bumped into Hasen’s foot facedown.

“Xiao Chiye let me go.” Bayin’s voice trembled as he said with lips blue with cold. “He had me bring this back.”

Hasen gradually pursed his lips into a grim line—a warning sign of his looming fury. He looked at Achi’s head, and fire blazed in his eyes again. There was dead silence all around, with only the gale continuing on with its rampage. The chill Hasen inhaled swiftly coursed through his limbs. He turned his gaze away and looked into the far distance, where the snowflakes danced.

“Duanzhou has been taken over by the pack of wolves; they’re making peace and colluding with a fox from Zhongbo. Hairigu is there too. He has become Xiao Chiye’s slave.” Bayin’s Adam’s apple bobbed as he recollected the terror of being pursued by the Libei Armored Cavalry that day. He continued in a hoarse voice, “Xiao Chiye has gotten his hands on a new blade, and the scorpions have become weeds in the Gobi desert in the face of his Libei Armored Cavalry. Hasen, the hammers can’t hold him back. That’s no longer Xiao Fangxu’s armored cavalry.”

“That has long since ceased to be Xiao Fangxu’s armored cavalry.” Hasen abruptly turned his gaze back and took a step closer towards Bayin. “The pack of wolves needs a new alpha wolf—a new King of Wolves. Xiao Jiming will deploy him back to the north, and I will be here waiting for him and his new blade.”

A sound suddenly rang out behind him. Duo'erlan stood at the entrance of the tent, watching them worriedly. Hasen curbed his fury and turned back to look at Duo'erlan, but did not smile.

He should have killed Xiao Chiye.

Hasen thought once again.

Back during that autumnal rain hunt, he should have killed Xiao Chiye.

The courtyard was silent in the middle of the night.

Xiao Chiye had just finished washing up and was rummaging through the small box by the candlelight, picking pearls and jade. Shen Zechuan's folding fan was resting on the edge of the table; its owner was still soaking in the bath.

"The horses will arrive at Mount Luo in a few days," Xiao Chiye picked out the agate he had placed inside yesterday and said to Shen Zechuan, who was behind the screen. "Are you going with me for a look?"

Shen Zechuan was exhausted these few days. Even though he did not fall sick again, he had also never touched Yang Shan Xue again. Soaking in the water, he said, "Going to Mount Luo is a must. It's also more convenient for you to return to Libei from there."

The days were passing too quickly; Shen Zechuan merely had a few rounds of discussions and it was already the end of the second month. Tilting his head back, he closed his eyes in contemplation. The curve of his neck was beautiful, its luster smooth and luminous bathed under the dim light filtered through the screen.

"Has the candidate for Secretary of Duanzhou been picked?" Xiao Chiye turned the orb of agate between his fingers as he casually asked.

"Yes," Shen Zechuan said, "a talent."

Xiao Chiye looked over and offered, "Kong Chengfeng?"

Shen Zechuan raised his dripping wet arm to prop his head against it. He cast a sidelong glance at Xiao Chiye's shadow and responded, "nope, guess again."

"Yuanzhuo has limited mobility and isn't suitable." Xiao Chiye genuinely could not think of anyone else. "Who else could there be?"

Shen Zechuan got to his feet and wiped himself dry with a towel at the side. Xiao Chiye did not look in this direction; Shen Zechuan brought the washed blue handkerchief to the tip of his nose and sniffed it lightly. He answered, "Shen Lanzhou, of course."

The thickest wall of all of Zhongbo was going to be built in Duanzhou, and Shen Zechuan did not feel all that assured to hand the job over to anyone else given the connection between Mount Luo and Libei. He had to stay here and build up this wall with his own hands. What's more, by heading south from Duanzhou, he could also directly bypass Tianfei Watchtower to arrive at the Bianjun Commandery. Shen Zechuan found this location to be excellent; by establishing a reserve depot here that was comparable to Cizhou, he would be able to provide reinforcements to both the northern and southern battlefields in the future.

"Do you still remember the 'steel needle'?"<sup>6</sup> Shen Zechuan put the handkerchief back, his fingertips lingering, reluctant as they were to part with it. He continued, "Qiao Tianya is the most suitable candidate to lead this, but he presently has to take care of Yuanzhuo and is unable to leave Cizhou. But if I were to use Fei Sheng, this place is so far from the reach of the central administration that I don't feel at ease leaving him here without anyone to keep him in check."

The 'steel needle' referred to the light cavalry, one that would be deployed to the banks of Chashi River as Shen Zechuan's eyes and ears. They would also stay at a Duanzhou that could go on to become the central hub of both places. Whoever could be the commander-in-chief of this place would be a key official concurrently in charge of both military and governmental affairs. He would also have money coming and going under his hand when the Yan clan's business expanded over after spring, and Yan Heru was no honest man.

Shen Zechuan did not really have much to fault Fei Sheng on, but he had to assess in his heart just how long Fei Sheng's loyalty would endure. He could not gamble it all on the words "share weal and woe, through thick and thin". Never mind if it was just for a year or two. But once Fei Sheng had been stationed here for a long time, he would have gotten a taste of the benefits that came with the convergence of the north and south. With this "steel needle" in his hand and with Yan Heru on the sidelines doing his utmost to butter him up, how much of today's master-servant bond through their shared tribulations of life and death would remain? By then, Shen Zechuan would no longer be the sole party Fei Sheng could fall back on. As long Fei Sheng had so much as an ounce of inclination, he was dangerous.

In this world, authority was not something that could be bestowed on its own. Qi Huilian had long warned Shen Zechuan before, the cornerstone of the “art” of governance and rulership was checks and balances.<sup>7</sup> Leading a group of outstanding men was akin to overlooking a game match. One should never be biased for private, selfish reasons.

Why did Huo Lingyun have to be placed in the Imperial Bodyguards? It was precisely to fill out the position left by Qiao Tianya. He posed a threat to Fei Sheng and could make the latter knock senses into himself and draw a line in the sand. Similarly, why did Yao Wenyu offer up this suggestion? It was meant to push Qiao Tianya back into the game and remind Shen Zechuan, who was lacking subordinates, that Qiao Tianya was indispensable. If Fei Sheng wanted to advance a step further, Shen Zechuan had to deliberate his moves carefully. In other words, as long as Fei Sheng was promoted up a level, Qiao Tianya would also be discreetly promoted in the same manner. He was the chain that held Fei Sheng in check; Shen Zechuan would never allow Fei Sheng to surpass Qiao Tianya and hold “sole” authority in his hand.

Fei Sheng had said to Qiao Tianya that in Shen Zechuan’s eyes, the latter was the most suitable candidate to be deployed to command the light cavalry in Duanzhou. This was because everyone mutually understood one another; Qiao Tianya was a sentimental man who placed importance on relationships. This was both Qiao Tianya’s strength but also his weakness.

Shen Zechuan slipped on his robe and stepped out from behind the screen.

Xiao Chiye was sitting at the edge of the desk with his long legs all stretched out. Upon hearing footsteps, he clenched his fist and hid away that agate gem, then looked at Shen Zechuan and said, “then I just so happen to have something to tell you.”

Shen Zechuan’s belt was tied rather loosely. When he stepped over the rug, the soles of his feet felt a little ticklish. With his collarbone exposed, he sipped on his tea and nodded at Xiao Chiye to motion for him to continue.

Xiao Chiye then said, “The Biansha ponies that we’ve seized this time will also be placed at Mount Luo. You want a light cavalry, so give these ponies a try. They are swifter than the battle steeds of Libei, and they have great endurance and stamina in the Gobi desert.”

Shen Zechuan held the teacup with both hands and thought about it for a moment.

“Libei can’t use these ponies anyway. Our battle steeds are all specifically born and bred on the Hongyan Mountains for the armored cavalry; it took several generations to produce the exceptional horses of today that are able to bear the weight of heavy armor.” Xiao Chiye spread his legs apart so that Shen Zechuan could stand before him. He propped an arm up and watched Shen Zechuan contemplate it over.

“Let Fei Sheng take a look at the Biansha ponies here first,” Shen Zechuan said, “use the riding stables Achi left here.”

“That’s my riding track.” Xiao Chiye pinched Shen Zechuan’s chin and pulled it close. “When will you give Shen Lanzhou to me?”

Under the force of the grip pinching him, Shen Zechuan remembered Xiao Chiye’s iron fingers from that day, as well as the hard, solid sense of touch of those iron fingers caressing his nape. His breathing hitched slightly; he wanted to avert his gaze, but Xiao Chiye was holding him in place. It was hot inside the room, and tiny beads of sweat began to materialize on the temples of the Prefectural Lord who had just soaked in a bath.

Staring at Shen Zechuan, Xiao Chiye leaned closer and said, “you got all excited when I touched you that day, didn’t you, Your Lordship?”

CHAPTER 216: DAMP NIGHT

The address of “Your Lordship” for the Prefectural Lord was usable by all, and for this reason, these two words became even more clandestine coming from Xiao Chiye. It was like they were hiding secret codes in their words in plain sight of the crowd, hinting at a certain kind of unmentionable pleasure and intimacy. Desire was the rising surge of tidal waves, spreading and flowing to the parts where they touched, exuding a thin layer of sweat.

During the day, the Prefectural Lord sat high above the rest and gazed down at the group of outstanding men. His folding fan obscured the rest of his emotions, giving rise to a cold indifference in his eyes, a sharpness that could, with a single glance, send alarm bells ringing in warning of danger. But right now, his mouth was slightly parted as he bit down on Xiao Chiye’s finger. That soft tongue, that overflowing saliva, and that expression of a shame he was silently enduring. They all carried with them a “come-hither” undertone.

Xiao Chiye desired him.

He not only desired his fair neck, but also his wet, slippery tongue.

His calloused finger rubbed against Shen Zechuan’s gums, and given that Shen Zechuan had just drank hot tea, the lining inside his mouth was sensitive. His eyes were now wet with tears, and he had gone so incoherent from the storm Xiao Chiye was stirring up in his mouth that he could not answer Xiao Chiye.

Secreted fluid spilled as the tip of Shen Zechuan’s tongue probed along the pulp of Xiao Chiye’s fingers.

They faced the wall, with Shen Zechuan leaning forward while being pinned by Xiao Chiye's chest on his back. This position made Shen Zechuan feel as though every thrust went in deep to the hilt. He braced himself against the wall, resting his forehead against it as his tears fell in never-ending torrents. And when he lowered his head, he exposed his nape that Xiao Chiye once again bit. The robe beneath crumpled into a ball.

Shen Zechuan could not answer Xiao Chiye sitting on their heels like this. The initiative to call the shots lay in Xiao Chiye's hands.

The tip of Xiao Chiye's nose nuzzled imperceptibly along Shen Zechuan's nape, seeming like both a demand and a coercion. His dangerous gaze lingered on Shen Zechuan's side profile, where he saw the seductive temptation hidden in the upturned corners of Shen Zechuan's eyes.

Shen Zechuan did not know what trouble the corners of his eyes were courting. He was so very innocent, so much that even his grunts on being bitten were exceedingly soft. But Xiao Chiye was so savage that he turned Shen Zechuan's entire person into a small boat adrift amidst the great billowing waves. Turbulent waves crashed over him, not permitting him to even struggle under the intricately woven sound of water permeating the room.

Seeing the intermittent drops of Shen Zechuan's falling tears, Xiao Chiye turned his head aside to drop a kiss on the corner of his eye.

Shen Zechuan sobbed in that kiss and accidentally smeared his robe wet. He turned his gaze towards Xiao Chiye, his voice trembling, "it's all, all—hngh, your fault..."

Xiao Chiye bit down on the tip of Shen Zechuan's ear and whispered, "oh, so you're blaming me now, huh."

This thrust went so unimaginably deep that it left Shen Zechuan too breathless to even grunt out loud.

Shen Zechuan was all drenched in sweat after taking Xiao Chiye in several times, and his robe remained soaked even after a wring. Xiao Chiye pinned him against the rug and made to kiss him. Too exhausted to tilt his head up, Shen Zechuan stuck out his tongue lazily.

Xiao Chiye engulfed it in his mouth and remained in this way, pressing down against Shen Zechuan.

The rug in this room was unlike the one at home; it was not as soft. Instead, it resembled a little brush with fine bristles. Xiao Chiye tore off Shen Zechuan's robe that had long been soaked through, and the friction of the entire bare front of Shen Zechuan's body against the rug proved too much for him to bear.

"No," Shen Zechuan strained to plead for mercy in between his sobs, "Xiao'Er, I can't."

Pinning him down, Xiao Chiye took that soft tongue back into his mouth again so that all Shen Zechuan could do was cry.

How could Shen Zechuan withstand an onslaught like this? That chafing of his front was making his waist and legs weak, and it was also so brutal back there. He was entirely consumed by Xiao Chiye in between his ragged, hectic breathing, so much that he was incoherent. His face flushed red, and he cut a sorry sight as he vaguely muttered, "turn, turn over, Ce'an!"

"Hush." Xiao Chiye stretched out his arms to hold down Shen Zechuan's sliding arms. His entire chest pinned him down, making all of him sink into the fine fur of the rug. "My wife's about to return."

Why's he still harping on about this?!

With his cheek partially buried, Shen Zechuan cried in a small voice, "y-you, mn."

Xiao Chiye pressed the tip of his nose against Shen Zechuan's soaked temple, his breaths lingering in his ear. The candlelight in the room had long gone out. Light reflecting off the snow penetrated through the window paper, glowing brighter than usual. This exceedingly pure radiance spoke not of gentleness as it incited the beast inside the room, allowing Xiao Chiye to see even more clearly how Shen Zechuan was jade that could not be concealed. A branch outside the window pressed low by the snow hung horizontally from the side. Occasionally, birds would come disturbing, sending the branch swaying and the snow rustling off. But no matter how hard they tried, they received no attention from the men in the room. Subsequently, the branch turned bare, appearing all the more lonesome. Shen Zechuan rubbed against the rug until it was all soaked, and the rug chafed against Shen Zechuan until he was very nearly wet.

Xiao Chiye was almost on the cusp of orgasm as he grasped Shen Zechuan's hand and bit him. Veiled words, dim light, dampness, and the intensity of lovemaking... Xiao Chiye always had a way of making Shen Zechuan cry.

"I—" With tears in his eyes, Shen Zechuan said vindictively, "I'm going to t-tell your wife! Y-you..."

“Sure.” Xiao Chiye let loose a muffled laugh. “Tell him you get all excited on seeing me.”

Shen Zechuan could not hold out any longer. Xiao Chiye was pounding him so hard it was making him tremble. Shen Zechuan clenched the rug with his fingertips, already nearing his climax. The arc of his neck seemed to be a concession of defeat, except that even his posture of surrender was so maddeningly titillating it drove Xiao Chiye crazy.

Xiao Chiye scored a full victory tonight, as he always did, but he was never complacent, only content. This was a scene he would never tire of watching.

The snow on the branch outside the window rustled off again. Shen Zechuan could indistinctly hear a few cries of a night crow. The crow flew away, and Shen Zechuan turned into snow. The heat in the room melted him into water, leaving him too preoccupied to even breathe. There was so much he remembered in his mind, but every time it came to this moment, all that was left in there was Xiao Chiye.

Xiao Chiye, A-Ye. A—

Xiao Chiye grasped Shen Zechuan by the cheeks and kissed him, and Shen Zechuan ejaculated until he was completely spent.

And forgot all about finishing his words from before.

The next few days were all sunny days. Spring hung in the air in Zhongbo as the third month approached. The snow had not only melted in Cizhou but also somewhat in Duanzhou. Gu Jin and Wu Ziyu cleared out the roads and reported the public ditches that ought to be repaired at the first opportunity.

As Shen Zechuan could not return to Cizhou for the time being, Yao Wenyu could only come over to Duanzhou. His mobility was limited, and health, poor, so the horse carriage moved slowly on the way over. Kong Ling and Yu Xiaozai waited for him in Dunzhou, after which all three of them arrived together in Duanzhou.

Fei Sheng received them outside. He sent the gentlemen in first, then followed Qiao Tianya to do an inventory count of the supplies that they brought along. When he came to the front, he saw Huo Lingyun, so he whispered to Qiao Tianya, “why did you bring him too?”

The weather was neither cold nor hot today, so the roads were cleared quickly, and there was no mud to be stepped on when they stepped outdoors. Fei Sheng was initially in a good mood, but all that was left was impatience when he saw Huo Lingyun. There were many people unloading the cargos around them, and with that many eyes around, Fei Sheng had no wish to fall out with Qiao Tianya over Huo Lingyun. If this made its way to his Master's ears, then his loss would far outweigh his gains. Thus, he endured it and followed behind Qiao Tianya, hoping to seek clarification on the matter.

"Once he hangs up his authority token, he's a legitimately conscripted Imperial Bodyguard." Qiao Tianya jumped onto the horse carriage in a few steps. "Should I not have brought him here?"

Sunlight shone down upon them. Fei Sheng rubbed his slightly icy cold hands, feeling irritable. His gaze on Huo Lingyun was too blunt and undisguised. Qiao Tianya looked over too. On the other side, Huo Lingyun sensed their gaze and turned his head over to meet their eyes, in particular Fei Sheng's.

"This man spells danger if placed close at hand." Fei Sheng shifted his gaze away without a smile on his face. He had no wish to pay Huo Lingyun any attention. "Duanzhou is not like Cizhou. Who's going to take responsibility for it if something goes wrong?"

"I will." Qiao Tianya squatted down and fished out his pipe. As he struck up the fire, he cast a glance at Fei Sheng and said with well intentions, "Don't be too smart for your own good and play mind games with Master."

Qiao Tianya was already making it very clear with his words.

Fei Sheng was none too pleased on hearing it. "Ever since he joined us, I've never caused any trouble for him. So why get all so aggressive?"

"What are you angry about?" Qiao Tianya puffed on his pipe and paid no mind to Fei Sheng's tone. He understood Fei Sheng. "I'm simply telling it as it is. By leaving him idle on the sidelines, are you waiting for Master to use him instead? When the time comes, he will no longer be under your charge."

Shen Zechuan retained Huo Lingyun and did not kill him because he wanted to use him. If Fei Sheng were to keep Huo Lingyun idle like this now that the latter had been set before him, then, like Qiao Tianya said, once Shen Zechuan grew impatient, Huo Lingyun would no longer be under Fei Sheng's charge. When that happened, it would be humiliating for Fei Sheng.

Fei Sheng cast another glance at Huo Lingyun and let Qiao Tianya's words sink in. But those words were adding fuel to the flames in his heart, making him even more displeased. He held back his resentment, having no outlet to vent. He still wanted his dignity before Qiao Tianya, and he was unwilling to lower and demean himself too much. He and Qiao Tianya both served in the Imperial Bodyguards, and he understood all that Qiao Tianya had said; he just could not stand it anymore.

"Your origins formally trace back to Qudu." Qiao Tianya weighed up his pipe in his hand. Feeling that it had to be said, he continued to persuade him. "He is not trained for this at all. His bond with Master is not the same, and neither is his bond with the Imperial Bodyguards. So what the frick are you scared of? You can one-up him with just this mouth of yours alone."

"You're disparaging me with this." Fei Sheng retracted his gaze and thought for a moment before speaking the truth. "This person is both scheming and capable. As long as he remains, it's only a matter of time before he comes out on top."

Shen Zechuan now wanted to remain in Duanzhou to establish a light cavalry. That was not a job that could be secured with just a glib mouth. Fei Sheng initially thought he would definitely be the one in charge on this end, but he never expected Shen Zechuan to directly transfer Yao Wenyu over, along with Qiao Tianya in tow. Fei Sheng did not dare to delve too deeply into it. He knew what was good for him. This was his strong point.

"You are capable too," Qiao Tianya said. "But keep dwelling on this matter, and you will only be holding your own self back. Is there anything that can escape Master's eyes? What's meant to be yours will eventually be yours."

Fei Sheng did not want to talk about this matter in detail with Qiao Tianya. They were not birds of the same feather that flock together, and he did not count on Qiao Tianya to stand with him against a common adversary either. He frowned as he looked at the pipe in Qiao Tianya's hand. Waving away the smoke drifting before him, he asked, perplexed, "why have you started smoking again?"

"Nothing to do." Qiao Tianya put it out, but did not continue with his words.

He appeared to be somewhat taciturn, unlike before, and after rising to his feet, he did not engage in further conversation on the topic and merely watched carefully as the others unloaded the goods.

Shen Zechuan held his folding fan upside down and tapped it gently on the table. He had just changed to a new earring, an agate earring that accentuated the fairness of his complexion. It was so conspicuous that the others dared not keep looking at it.

“I’ve transcribed a copy of Luo Mu’s account book.” Yu Xiaozai presented the book to Shen Zechuan. “Your Lordship, please look it over.”

There was a withered tree branch in a vase on the table. Ding Tao was the one who picked it up and brought it back to put in the vase. Yu Xiaozai did not know that and originally thought of saying a few words of praise, but he was afraid of barking up the wrong tree and finding himself in a predicament he could not get out of. Shen Zechuan nodded for Yu Xiaozai to sit, so Yu Xiaozai took his seat again and calmly concentrated without another glance at that withered branch.

Unaware of this, Shen Zechuan looked over the account and said, “the spring plowing is just around the corner. Pick someone to go over and assist Luo Mu in his official duties. He’s only one man after all, and it’s tough on him to be running around on both ends.”

What he meant was that they could no longer allow Luo Mu to have a monopoly on power in Chazhou this year. They had to send someone over to keep him in check. And Kong Ling was the one who knew best the kind of man Luo Mu was.

“I do have a candidate in mind,” Kong Ling said from the side. “I went down to Dengzhou on Your Lordship’s orders this time and encountered an old acquaintance of the Second Master there.”

“An old acquaintance of Ce’an?” Shen Zechuan closed the account and thought for a moment, but no one came to mind.

What old acquaintance would Xiao Chiye have in Dengzhou? He was rarely in Zhongbo.

Seeing as Shen Zechuan did not remember, Kong Ling reminded him. “Wang Xian. Does Your Lordship still remember this person? He was originally the Secretary of the Ministry of Revenue in Qudu, who managed the Imperial Army’s expenditure during the eighth year of the reign of Xiande. He had several encounters with Second Master.”

It was only then Shen Zechuan remembered.

Come to think of it, this Wang Xian was initially on bad terms with Xiao Chiye, and he had handled the Quancheng silk matter too. During the assassination case, he was framed by Xiang Yun for bribing Xiao Chiye, and as a result, he was demoted and relegated. Before leaving the capital, Xiao Chiye went to the Ministry of Revenue to pull a few strings so that Wang Xian did not completely lose his official position and was merely sent to Zhongbo to handle affairs.

Even Xiao Chiye himself had forgotten all about this matter, much less Shen Zechuan.

Not long after Wang Xian arrived in Dengzhou, the bandits took them by storm, and he fled the yamen by feigning madness, only to be stranded in Dengzhou along with the refugees. It was not until Kong Ling went to inspect the yamen after Yang Qiu's death that Wang Xian could come to the fore and make a fresh start again.

"Going by Second Master's intent, this person was originally meant to come over to our Cizhou, but shortly afterward, something cropped up," Kong Ling said tactfully, "so the Ministry of Revenue changed his posting and sent him down to Dengzhou. He suffered a lot in Dengzhou, and the kindness Your Lordship and Second Master showed him was still on his mind when he saw me."

Shen Zechuan thought about it carefully for a moment. "Since he's willing, assign him to Chazhou. His original position was that of a Ministry of Revenue official, so he won't be a stranger to assisting on taxation matters in Chazhou."

Shen Zechuan could not trust Luo Mu, so this was just perfect. By putting a Wang Xian who was proficient in taxes in Chazhou, he would be able to bring Luo Mu's account books under strict control. What really mattered most in Chazhou at present was money. As long as he had the money in his grasp, Luo Mu would not be able to rebel.

It was still early, so after settling this matter, Shen Zechuan set aside the miscellaneous affairs of the three prefectures and asked Yao Wenyu, "how is Yuanzhuo doing these few days?"

Yao Wenyu, whose knees were covered with a woolen blanket, answered upon hearing him, "thank you for your lordship's concern; it's nothing serious."

"Although there is a bridle path from Cizhou to Duanzhou, it's still a long distance away. I was worried you would catch a cold on the way, but seeing as you're fine, I can now put my mind at ease."

Yao Wenyu waited for Shen Zechuan to finish with the pleasantries before he said, "I've brought a message from Cizhou for Your Lordship." After a moment's pause, he continued, "there's a rumor in Dancheng a few days ago saying that Pan Lin and Pan Yi have been dismissed from their posts pending prosecution and have been handed over to the Court of Judicial Review and the Ministry of Justice to await trial."

Shen Zechuan's eyes swiveled to Yao Wenyu. "So soon?"

Three members of the Pan clan of Dancheng – Pan Xiangjie, Pan Lin, and Pan Yi – were all significant ministers of the imperial court. What's more, they were connected to the Fei clan of Chuancheng via a marriage alliance. They carried a lot of weight among the remaining noble clans at present. If the Empress Dowager still wanted to monopolize state power, then she could not do without the Pan clan's valuable assistance. For this reason, Pan Lin's dismissal was the Empress Dowager's loss.

"As soon as Liang Cuishan and Xue Xiuzhuo arrived at Dancheng, they immediately set about auditing the fields' accounts," Yao Wenyu said. "They did not ask for Pan Yi to submit the original accounts, but assigned someone down directly to measure the lands personally."

Pan Yi initially thought that with Pan Xiangjie and the Marquis of Helian as guarantors, and with the assistance of Liang Cuishan whom Pan Lin had assigned to act as an intermediary, they would be able to fool their way through the audits of the accounts this time, or at the very least, hang in there until spring was over, but who could have expected Liang Cuishan to come here for the deliberate purpose of checking the accounts?

"In the meantime, there was a memorial impeaching Xue Xiuzhuo with the demand to check the Quancheng accounts, but Kong Qiu overruled it." Kong Ling said.

Shen Zechuan's folding fan paused on the table. His brows slowly furrowed into a frown. "It has not even been a year since the storm the Imperial College stirred up last year. Kong Qiu and Cen Yu were both successively denounced in writing then, and they were at daggers drawn with Xue Xiuzhou, so why did they so quickly..."

"The Tax Circuit Intendant of Juexi has also been imprisoned, with the Chuancheng accounts implicated as well. There is talk that something is off with the tariffs. He is now impeached by the Chief Surveillance Bureau. Even the City of Dicheng is feeling the repercussions." Yao Wenyu, having been born of a noble clan, was far more perceptive to the "thread of clue" than others. He continued, "The Tax Circuit Intendant of Juexi, by all reasonings, has nothing to do with Chuancheng, but the Chief Surveillance Bureau impeached them together."

"The Marquis of Helian of Chuancheng is close to the Hua Clan," Shen Zechuan said. "But he apparently doesn't concern himself with the Chuancheng accounts. Cen Yu's impeachment of him now means that he has a handle against the Marquis of Helian in his hands."

He caressed the edge of the fan with the pulp of his fingers and thought it over.

"There's something fishy about this matter... Where's Yan Heru? Call him over."

There must be a reason Kong Qiu was willing to bury the hatchet with Xue Xiuzhuo. Shen Zechuan's eyes were blocked off outside the city of Qudu, but he had to be cognizant of what Qudu was doing at all times. If Pan Lin was really taken down because of this, then it would not only mean that the noble clans had suffered a setback, but also that the Empress Dowager was now all on her own in the struggle for power in Qudu.

As soon as Yan Heru's butt touched the bench, he rambled, "oh man, these days have been stifling the life out of me! Your Lordship, if you hadn't called for me, that Wu Ziyu wouldn't have let me go out. Qidong's military provisions have yet to be fully delivered. I was so anxious, my temper rose. This Duanzhou is so rundown... can I have a cushion or not? This seat's killing my ass..."

Yan Heru's voice gradually trailed off under Shen Zechuan's gaze. He shifted his body.

"... Bribery, of course," Yan Heru said in a small voice. "What other handle would the Marquis of Helian have on this? He's a marquis with a sinecure that has practically no obligations. For the sake of his son's future, he runs all over and usually likes to gift others a little something. That Liang Cuishan is going over to Dancheng, isn't he? The Marquis of Helian must have had his head slammed by a door to ask the Tax Circuit Intendant of Juexi to deliver a bag of gold to Liang Cuishan. Isn't that just playing into the hands of others? I told you Liang Cuishan is not an easy man to mess with. He's cut from the same cloth as Jiang Qingshan. See what happens now? This one bag of gold from the Marquis of Helian screwed over an entire bunch of people..."

“Bribery?” Yao Wenyu suddenly piped up and looked at Shen Zechuan. “Pan Lin’s willingness to assign Liang Cuishan means that he sees Liang Cuishan as his trusted aide. Why would the Marquis of Helian make the redundant move of sending him gold?”

“He’s foolish, I guess.” Tapping the teacup lid, Yan Heru recalled how Fei Sheng had pressed down his head. Still bearing a grudge, he said, “the Fei clan are fools. They aren’t all that bright. That Junior Marquis Fei Shi is already of age,<sup>8</sup> yet he’s still a loafer. Is their household even capable of being up to any task?”

“For what it’s worth, the Marquis of Helian is on the Empress Dowager’s side, and he did not even die when Hua Siqian fell from power.” The light in Shen Zechuan’s eyes dimmed slightly. “Even if he wants to have Liang Cuishan in his grasp, he shouldn’t have sent him gold. He even turned it over to the Tax Circuit Intendant of Juexi. He is simply delivering himself with a ribbon to Liang Cuishan. What is he trying to achieve?”

“Who knows...” Yan Heru suddenly hit upon a thought and straightened up in his seat, then he leaned over the table, showing Shen Zechuan an astonished expression. “If this was not done by the Marquis of Helian himself, then he’s really too tragic! This simply allows Xue Xiuzhuo to deal a direct stab to his clan and drag the entire Pan clan down into hot water at the same time!”

In a flash, Shen Zechuan connected the dots. The folding fan smacked down on the tabletop with a “thud”, startling Yan Heru so much that a shiver ran through his body.

Yao Wenyu suddenly broke out in a coughing fit. He covered his mouth, clutching the handkerchief. With his back slightly arched over, he recovered and continued, “What a brilliant scheme... Xue Yanqing, well-played!”

Note:

This is a combination of the uncensored version and the revised (censored) version on JJWXC. We took some liberty in rearranging the sentences and/or paragraphs in order to bring you the best of both worlds. (There are whole chunks of paragraphs in the censored copy but removed in the revised, and newly added paragraphs in the revised but not in the original.) As usual, the final version will be based on the uncensored traditional Chinese physical copy when it is released in 2075. In the meantime, please bear with us. Thank you! <3

Credits: Special thanks to papapa senpai Alex for consulting on the *ahem*

CHAPTER 217: HEWEI

It was sleeting heavily in Qudu today, with a chill that cut deep. The Marquis of Helian had been kneeling in the hall until his legs had gone numb and his sleeves were soaked through with his tears.

“That Xue Yanqing is so shameless and unscrupulous he would stop at nothing to frame me. How is it possible for the Tax Circuit Intendant of Juexi’s act of bribery to implicate our Chuancheng? That’s Jiang Qingshan’s territory, so if one were to dig to the bottom of it, it’s Jiang Qingshan who is the instigator!” The official hat that the Marquis of Helian had taken off was resting by his knees. He cried, “And then there’s that Cen Xunyi who keeps incriminating me relentlessly. He’s clearly colluding with Xue Yanqing to set up a trap and dispose of those who stand against him. They shamelessly engage in shady deals for personal gains, yet Kong Boran still wants to tolerate and abet them. It’s the imperial court’s ethos they are ruining!”

“Stop trying to fool me with such words!” The Empress Dowager was in a towering rage. “If you had behaved yourself, would Xue Xiuzhuo have been able to track down the issue with the accounts? The Tax Circuit Intendant of Juexi has been engaging in his fair share of corruption in the City of Chuancheng. If you had not backed him in this, would he have the capability to do so?!”

It was brightly lit inside the hall. All the palace maids and eunuchs had retreated outside the doors, leaving only Matron Liuxiang kneeling in attendance at the side. The Marquis of Helian, having come to apologize, was flimsily dressed, and now he was trembling with fear and trepidation under the wrath of the Empress Dowager.

After the death of Emperor Tianchen, the Empress Dowager has been covering up for the noble clans' failings from this position of hers, and she was already bone-weary having done so all this time to such an extent. She sighed in disappointment across the beaded curtain at the Marquis of Helian.

Sensing that it did not bode well on hearing her sigh, the Marquis of Helian hurriedly shuffled forward on his knees and said, "Your Majesty, please be appeased. The wise strategy now would be to sacrifice the pawn to save the rook. No matter what, we have to first preserve Pan Lin."

Pan Lin was Pan Xiangjie's lawful son and a key official of the Ministry of Revenue. They lost Wei Huaigu last year, and now they only had Pan Lin who could still get a foothold in the Ministry of Revenue. If they were to lose Pan Lin at this point, then the noble clan would be without a money-keeper.

The Empress Dowager said, "Even if we can save Pan Lin's neck, we can't save Pan Yi."

Pan Yi was the husband of the Commandery Princess Zhaoyue. Without Pan Yi, Zhaoyue would be widowed. Momentarily grieved, the Marquis of Helian bent over the ground and choked with sobs. Wiping his tears, he said, "As a father, how would I cast aside such a fine son-in-law had I not been forced into such a desperate situation? I have no other choice. I would rather have her widowed than have her get implicated in this."

The Empress Dowager's face behind the beaded curtain was haggard. Eventually, she merely said, "Go back and have Zhaoyue and Pan Yi mutually agree to a divorce."

Sleet outside the palace drummed against the palace eaves, blanketing the top of the vermilion walls with white snow, while the mournful wails of the ancient watchtower bell pushed their way into the joint hearing hall. Pan Lin was an official of rank, so he did not have to kneel and pay his obeisances to the various presiding judges in the hall.

"After the reign of Yongyi, the City of Dancheng no longer received rewards of fields, but the land surveyance conducted by the Ministry of Revenue threw up a wholly different total amount of land than was reported by the City of Dancheng." Xue Xiuzhuo sat upright and looked at Pan Lin. "As the Prefectural Prefect of the City of Dancheng, Pan Yi concealed the additional fields from the Ministry of Revenue instead of reporting it.

Meanwhile, you have the important duty of presiding over taxation matters in the Ministry of Revenue, and you have never voiced any doubts about the field taxes discrepancies in the audits all these years. Let me ask you, were you aware that the City of Dancheng was forging accounts for its field taxes?”

Pan Lin had been locked up for a few days, and his official robe was wrinkled as he sat across the table and looked at Xue Xiuzhuo without answering.

Xue Xiuzhuo faced off against Pan Lin in confrontation.

Pan Lin was not an easy man to put on trial. These kinds of top-rank imperial court officials were all familiar with the investigation process. The smart ones would maintain their silence when interrogated and cross-examined by the Court of Judicial Review and Ministry of Justice. This was because the presiding officials were all proficient in the art of probing, and it was too easy to trip up and give them a handle against oneself when contending with them. Pan Lin was obviously a smart man, as he held his silence in response to all of Xue Xiuzhuo’s questionings throughout.

If the case were to get stuck at an impasse here without any headway made, then the remaining seven cities would have sufficient time to clean up their accounts and get rid of the evidence of their sordid deeds before Xue Xiuzhuo focused the investigation on them. Xue Xiuzhuo had lied low in wait for many years before he managed to get this opportunity. He could not let Pan Lin get away with it at this point.

“Pan Xiangjie’s original position remains untouched.” Xue Xiuzhuo laced his fingers. “Her Majesty commended him for being a minister of significance who assists in the governance of the state. He is expected to be transferred out of the Ministry of Works after the imperial examination held in spring. This is a hint that he will be promoted to the Grand Secretariat. Get yourself locked in a stalemate with me here, and his appraisal after spring is bound to get affected.”

Pan Lin leaned over and gave a contemptuous spat. “You manipulated the Tax Circuit Intendant into carrying out bribes and made use of the chance to build a bridge to Kong Qiu of the Grand Secretariat. You want to take down our Pan Clan only because I let Yao Yuanzhuo go. You’re but one twisted common son born of a concubine, so what’s with this capable pillar of the state act?”

Xue Xiuzhuo's expression remained unchanged as he said, "Before Pan Xiangjie took up the post of Minister of Works, your Pan clan was already appropriating the common folks' fields in the City of Dancheng. During the reign of Yongyi, Cao Chong, a commoner of Dancheng, entered the capital to lodge a complaint of injustice, but he was trampled to death by Hua Shisan's horse on Shenwu Street, and his octogenarian father killed himself by banging his head at the entrance of the Dancheng's yamen—you are right. I'm indeed taking down your Pan clan because of Yao Wenyu, but Yao Wenyu was merely an opportunity you handed me. Even without Yao Wenyu, the Pan clan still has to pay their dues."

Pan Lin's limbs were icy cold. He leaned back in his chair and avoided Xue Xiuzhuo's gaze.

"During the reign of Xiande, Secretariat Elder Hai received orders from the Emperor to audit the City of Dancheng's field taxes. The official assigned was a man named Jiang Jun, a fellow official of mine in my position as the Chief Supervising Secretary of the Ministry of Revenue. There were already signs of issues with the Dancheng's field taxes at that time, but Jiang Jun fell off his horse and died on his way back to the capital to submit his report, and the account book he had on him vanished without a trace." Xue Xiuzhuo said calmly. "In the second year of the reign of Xiande, when the Secretariat Elder continued digging into the accounts, Hua Siqian thought we had evidence in our hands, and so he ordered the noble clans to make up for the deficit in taxes. You people were unwilling to cough up the money from your own private coffers, so you intensified efforts to encroach on even more land in the eight cities in order to make up for the sum. In that year, seven households in the City of Dancheng successively consumed poison to commit suicide. You know why, right?"

Of course, Pan Lin knew why.

That year, Hua Siqian was pushed into such a corner that even Pan Xiangjie grew anxious too. Thus, at the same time he appropriated even more of the commoners' fields, he had the original fields taxes split up between the commoners in the city. These common folks had lost their fields that could feed them, and they were still burdened with hefty amounts of taxes to pay. Unable to have this gross injustice redressed, they could only seek death.

This was not exclusive to the City of Dancheng. It was a common scene in the eight cities after the reign of Xiande.

There was no longer anyone else left in the hall by the time Xue Xiuzhuo spoke to this point. He continued, “later on, Juexi was hit with a disaster, and Jiang Qingshan... Do you know why Jiang Qingshan refused to wallow in the mire with Hua Siqian at that time? Because Jiang Jun was his brother from the same clan. There’s karmic retribution in this world.”

Pan Lin’s throat tightened, and he forced a laugh. “Then aren’t you afraid of retribution by framing the innocent now?”

“Innocent? Is the Tax Circuit Intendant of Juexi innocent? He was able to take up the post of Tax Circuit Intendant because you people vouched for him. Then the Ministry of Revenue gave him a favorable appraisal and had him placed in Juexi as a counterbalance to Jiang Qingshan. Using this position, he had dealings with the Yan Clan of Hezhou, reselling copper and steel in the territory on behalf of the two Cities of Chuancheng and Dicheng. The tariffs he obtained from embezzlement and corruption are enough to rebuild this office compound.” Xue Xiuzhuo rose to his feet. His official robe appeared dark in the hall. He continued, “If the Tax Circuit Intendant had no connections whatsoever to the Marquis of Helian, how would he have heeded the hint and hurried over to make a heavy bribe? You people called this a frame-up, but this is merely a ‘tactic’ all of you habitually used in the past. I’m just following your example.”

Pan Lin gulped. Anxiety started to burn in him. “You go to great lengths and efforts in an attempt to support the Heir Apparent ascend to the throne, but I fear it will all be for naught in the end, much like trying to draw water with a bamboo basket.”

“My Heir Apparent to the Throne<sup>9</sup> is called Li Jianting, not Li Jianheng.” Xue Xiuzhuo braced himself against the edge of the table and looked down at Pan Lin. All of a sudden, he asked, “do you know about the Scorpions?”

The expression in Pan Lin’s eyes was blank. He maintained his silence to refuse to fall into Xue Xiuzhuo’s trap again.

“Zhongbo’s troops suffered a military defeat in the fourth year of Xiande, giving Hua Siqian a chance to catch his breath. Whether it was Shen Wei’s evasion of the battle or the Biansha’s invasion, Heaven seems to be helping the noble clan escape a calamity,” Xue Xiuzhuo said. “But you know what? I don’t believe that.”

Pan Lin had no idea what Xue Xiuzhuo was talking about at all, but he smelled danger. He could remain tight-lipped and evade the topic on the appropriation of the commoners' fields, but he could not just breeze past the subject when it came to colluding with the foreign foes. This kind of matter would be a catastrophe leading to their ruin once it reared its ugly head!

"Are you trying to frame me again?" Pan Lin snapped. "You ingratiate yourself with the Heir Apparent for power and position, yet you get rid of those who challenge you in the imperial court and bend the law to suit your own purposes! If you truly have the state's interest at heart, then why do you have to force Lu Guangbai to turn against the state?"

"Who exactly was it that tampered with the Bianjun Commandery's military grains?" Xue Xiuzhuo abruptly flung away the confession statement in his hand. "And who was it who misappropriated and embezzled nearly half of Qidong's military salaries and provisions? You people repeatedly suppressed Qi Zhuyin and let the military power of a single clan in Libei grow so unchecked that their 120,000 Armored Cavalry soldiers overran the northeast. Without Xiao Chiye, who would have been able to tether Xiao Fangxu and Xiao Jiming and keep a hold on them? Why don't you ask yourself how the Secretariat Elder has been remedying all of your transgressions all these years?! The Empress Dowager holds sway over the imperial court and the common people, and yet even now, she is still unwilling to give up the noble clans to make up for the shortfall in Qidong's military funds!"

Xue Xiuzhuo's chest heaved. He turned his head to calm down some.

"I'm indeed getting rid of all those who stand against me." Xue Xiuzhuo looked at Pan Lin once again. "I want to weed out the dregs of society like you people at its roots, along with that 'Scorpion'."

Yao Wenyu, having suffered a cold from traveling a long distance, collapsed on the first night he arrived in Duanzhou. Seeing as Yuanzhuo was quick to fall ill but slow to heal, Shen Zechuan had the physician remain on standby in the courtyard.

Xiao Chiye was having his meal when he saw that Shen Zechuan was about to go over, so he said, "Let's go together. I'll go pay him a visit too."

After their meals, both men draped on their overcoats. Fei Sheng followed far behind them, while Xiao Chiye held up the umbrella and walked with Shen Zechuan to Yao Wenyu's courtyard.

Shen Zechuan saw it was empty under the eaves, so he asked the maidservant who came over to receive them, "why aren't all of you inside waiting on him?”

The maidservant bowed in greetings and answered in a hushed tone, “the Mister doesn’t want anyone to wait on him at night.”

Xiao Chiye held Shen Zechuan’s hand and motioned for the maidservant to take her leave. He shook the umbrella and said, “Yuanzhuo is a man of pride.”

“I don’t see Qiao Tianya around.” Shen Zechuan looked around before his eyes stopped on the principal room. “Let’s knock.”

Both men were in the midst of talking when the door opened. Qiao Tianya was in his regular clothes. He bowed slightly in greetings to both of them and made way for them. “Yuanzhuo... Mister has yet to retire to bed. He’s waiting inside the room for Your Lordship and Second Master.”

Yao Wenyu was already up. His washed face was resting against the back of the chair. Hunu scratched away at the book on his knee until it fell to the ground. Xiao Chiye bent over to pick it up for him and took a look at it in passing. “Oh, an atlas. There is a set in the study of your Plum Blossom Residence.”

“Second Master had spent such a large sum of money that it’s a pity to leave that residence in Qudu.” Yao Wenyu’s voice was like the tinkling of jade. He had already schooled away his fatigue. Turning around his wheelchair, he motioned for Xiao Chiye to take a seat.

Shen Zechuan removed his overcoat and observed Yao Wenyu’s complexion. “You have been on the go for such a long distance. I shouldn’t have summoned you to the hall today.”

“With the snow melting of late, falling sick is inevitable and just a matter of time.” There was no one else around, and Yao Wenyu could be considered to be long-time friends with Xiao Chiye, so he was naturally much more relaxed than usual. He poured tea for Shen Zechuan, showing no sign of suffering from a chronic ailment in his movements. “Your Lordship must be still thinking about Qudu right now.”

“The spring plowing is just around the corner.” Shen Zechuan pressed his index finger against the teacup. The agate gem on his ear swung under the dim light. “If the Dancheng case continues to be investigated, the remaining seven cities will be affected too. This matter has a bearing on the granaries in Dazhou.”

“Sacrificing a pawn to save the rook is a habitual practice of the noble clans. If Xue Xiuzhuo had truly pushed them into a corner, then their throwing away of a Pan Lin,” Xiao Chiye rearranged the remaining chess pieces on the small table at the side, “... is not entirely impossible.”

“Xue Xiuzhuo killed three birds with one stone this time. He used gold to pull Liang Cuishan over to his camp, push Dancheng’s field taxes onto the agenda, and set the stage for future investigation into Chuancheng’s tariffs,” Yao Wenyu said. “What’s so brilliant here is that such a thing had indeed gone down between the Tax Circuit Intendant and the Marquis of Helian. The Empress Dowager would be hard-pressed to voice her woes. However, this must not be the only reason Kong Qiu was willing to lend him a helping hand.”

Seeing Hunu running over to the side of his foot, Shen Zechuan quietly shifted aside a little and looked at the cat as he said, “... Qi Zhuyin’s mobilization of troops against the Qingshu Tribe was of pressing urgency. The Empress Dowager held back the Ministry of War in her refusal to give permission because she feared another investigation into the Ministry of Revenue’s accounts. Had Xue Xiuzhuo been willing to give the Grand Secretariat several millions of taels of silver at this juncture, Kong Qiu would naturally not turn it down.”

Hunu set its paws on Shen Zechuan’s boots and stuck its butt up in the air as it stretched itself. It “meow-meowed” a few times and nuzzled itself against Shen Zechuan’s calf. Just as it was about to paw at Shen Zechuan’s robe, Xiao Chiye picked it up by the scruff of its neck.

Xiao Chiye looked askance at it and said, “oh right, I almost forgot. Xue Yanqing still has a sum of silver in his hands.”

Hunu turned around in the air. On seeing Xiao Chiye, it shrank its ears back, put up its front paws, and dared not move again. Xiao Chiye tossed it back, and it landed deftly on the ground. With its tail sticking up, it moved over to the side of the wheelchair and climbed back onto Yao Wenyu’s lap for a petting.

Yao Wenyu stroked Hunu and said, “Commander-in-chief Qi is much obliged to Xue Xiuzhuo for making up for the shortfall in military salaries and provisions this time. If the Empress Dowager keeps up with her wait-and-see attitude, she’s going to lose her chance to make a preemptive strike.”

“This matter is also an easy one to resolve.” Shen Zechuan raised his eyes to look at both of them. “The Empress Dowager only needs to arrange a marriage for Commander-in-chief Qi, and Qidong's military powers can be split into two."

"Marry Commander-in-chief Qi..." Xiao Chiye said, "even so, he has to have a noble title, and the few old men with noble ranks in Qudu at present are all not suitable, nor can they hold her in check."

"Since the Marquis of Helian is already implicated in the City of Chuancheng's saga, might as well kick him out." Shen Zechuan took the chess piece in Xiao Chiye's hand and set it down on the chessboard. "The Junior Marquis, Fei Shi, still doesn't have an official post, does he? Let him marry Commander-in-chief Qi and go over to Qidong to play the role of a pretty 'vase'. Military power that has been divided away to him can then be handed over to the Empress Dowager's charge. What's more, Fei Shi and Pan Lin are bosom friends. With this layer of relationship, Pan Lin will have a chance to stage a comeback as long as he doesn't die."

The Hua Clan had been marrying off their girls for nearly a hundred years, and now, it was finally the Empress Dowager's turn to "marry" off boys. Just as Xiao Chiye had said, abandoning a pawn to protect the rook was a tactic the Empress Dowager habitually used, only that the pawn she was going to cast aside was not just Pan Yi but also the Marquis of Helian. Xue Xiuzhuo already had a handle against the City of Chuancheng in his grasp, and Liang Cuishan had the City of Chuancheng's accounts in his hand. Since it was Chuancheng's accounts, then let Chuancheng bear responsibility for it.

The Empress Dowager was at the mercy of others in the earlier half of her life. Being passive was not necessarily a desperate situation to her. Rather, she was already used to dealing out passive strikes. There was only one supreme ruler in the world. Since the Heir Apparent, Li Jianting, could be one, then why not her, Hua Hewei?

"To date, the Li clan has, through the hands of the Empress Dowager, lost Emperor Guangcheng, Emperor Xiande, Emperor Tianchen, and the Crown Prince of the Eastern Palace during the reign of Yongyi." Xiao Chiye looked at the white piece in his palm. "If she loses again this time, Dazhou will really change hands to a different master."

With her cloak draped around her, Li Jianting stood in the sleet and faced the Empress Dowager from afar through the curtain of snow.

The Empress Dowager looked at the young Heir Apparent and saw shadows of Emperor Guangcheng in Li Jianting's facial features. That was the husband who had held her in check for half her life, and also the shackle who had her trapped in the harem. Now that she stood at the pinnacle of supreme power, she no longer feared these eyes.

The Empress Dowager smiled benevolently at Li Jianting and soundlessly thought, Vile spawn of incest.

CHAPTER 218: PREPARATIONS (FOR A RAINY DAY)

In the blink of an eye, it was already the end of the second month. The Dancheng case became a major case known to all in Qudu. No headway was made even with Pan Lin cooped up for half a month in the joint hearing hall. Discussions were rife among the students on the streets. They pinned their hopes on Xue Xiuzhuo, and the memorials impeaching Pan Xiangjie in the imperial court increased by the day.

When the snow stopped, a row of merchants from Juexi also arrived in Qudu.

Xiaowu<sup>10</sup> was all wrapped like a dumpling, yet he was extremely agile as he leaped from the carriage and stood at the checkpoint to chat merrily with the minor functionary in charge of tax collection. The drapes of the carriage behind him lifted, and Ge Qingqing, who had grown a short beard, stepped off.

Ge Qingqing flicked up a copper coin with his thumb and caught it with a steady hand. He smiled at the minor functionary. “With these goods of ours coming and going all the time, we’ve long grown to be on familiar terms. I hope my lord will grace us with your presence at Donglong Street tonight. I have to thank you properly for looking out for my younger brother last year.”

The minor functionary with the book of taxes under his arm knew that this person was a merchant from Juexi. When Xiaowu had escorted the goods to and fro last year, he had forked out a considerable sum of money. Now that the minor functionary had finally met Ge Qingqing, he was all chummy with him despite it being his first time meeting the latter.

The minor functionary jumped off the wagon with an exclamation of surprise and cupped his hands at Ge Qingqing as he said with a merry laugh, "I'm just a lowly clerk doing menial work. How would I presume myself worthy of being called 'lord' by Master Ge? You are the master—our master!"<sup>11</sup>

Ge Qingqing, having returned to Qudu again after a year, noted the many checks being carried out at the entrance of the city gates in which they were carefully scrutinizing the travel permits and registers of the coming and going companies of merchants. Without batting an eyelid, he said to the minor functionary, "It's such a chilly day. How long do you have to stand here? The queue of merchants in the back still seemed rather long to me."

Standing at the side, the minor functionary accepted the tobacco Ge Qingqing passed him. He had received a substantial amount of "ice respect" bribes<sup>12</sup> from Ge Qingqing, so he was naturally more than willing to socialize with him. He promptly started grousing half in jest. "I have to stand here until the city gates close! If it wasn't for the lack of other capabilities, who would be willing to stand like a pole around here? You may not be aware of this, but around a hundred or so merchants pass through the checkpoints in a single day, and a great number of them resort to various means of skulduggery to evade taxes."

"They are really scums." Ge Qingqing took the opportunity to carry on the conversation. "Isn't this a deliberate attempt to hinder all of you from carrying out your duties?"

"Exactly!" The minor functionary paved the way for Ge Qingqing as he met the latter's eyes. "I've been collecting taxes here for so long. Of all the people that I've met, you, Master Ge, are the most righteous."

Ge Qingqing patted the minor functionary on the shoulder and offered a few words of comfort.

The minor functionary asked, "Did Master Ge make this trip in person this time because of a big deal?"

Ge Qingqing was presently smoking a pipe. He never did so during his time in the Imperial Bodyguards, but these were indispensable tools for socialization in Juexi. He answered in the affirmative, then turned his head aside to exhale smoke. "It's not easy to do business now. The various regions are strict with their checks, so we have to go through the city of Dicheng if not the city of Chuancheng. The taxes for transporting large shipments of goods through the territories are too exorbitant. I've long lost hopes of making a fortune." After he finished, he lamented again, "All of you are in a much better position. You won't go wrong working for the imperial court, and you look mighty imposing doing it too."

"Master Ge hasn't been here much." The minor functionary sucked on a pipe as he continued, "there are some arrogant sons of a bitch that don't even see us as human beings just because they have money. They throw their weight and boss us around when they pass through the checkpoint. There have been many incidents of them trampling all over us."

The words spoken by the minor functionary were laced with half-truths and half-lies. Tax collection was a lucrative job; the people he dealt with day in and day out were all merchants who hailed from various lands. What's more, there were few troublemakers given that it was the honorable capital city of the Son of Heaven, and the slightly more discerning merchants would all take the initiative to grease the officials' palms. That was why the minor functionaries who could be stationed at this checkpoint typically had someone in the higher authorities to look out for them. But it was also true that they could not afford to offend those like the Xi clan when they occasionally came across them.

"It has been hard on all of you, brothers." Ge Qingqing waved his hand at Xiaowu to signal him to bring the goods in. "Then let's do this. I'll host a banquet at Yanyu Tavern on Donglong Street and wait for you there. Once you and the other brothers are off duty, head straight over. We shall drink to our heart's content then."

The minor functionary answered, "Master Ge is too kind. Then I shall not stand on ceremony and accept the invitation!"

Ge Qingqing smiled and followed the company of merchants into the city. Xiaowu led the horse over and asked, "Qing-ge, why are you giving them a treat? They're all rats, and extremely greedy and corrupt ones at that!"

"Master said to go fishing." Ge Qingqing tossed the copper coin between his fingers to Xiaowu. "How are we to hook a fish without bait?"

The tariffs at the city gate checkpoints were administered by the Qudu Commercial Tax Office that fell directly under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Revenue. The minor functionaries were mediocre and unqualified, relying solely on their backers in the higher authorities to vouch for them. Even if they embezzled silver here, they had to consider the gravity of it. For instance, the large shipment of goods that Ge Qingqing had transported last year was easily several thousands in private taxes. How would the minor functionaries have the guts to swallow it all? They only dared to embezzle a small fraction of it, for the majority of the tax still had to be handed over to the “higher-ups”.

It was on Shen Zechuan’s order that Ge Qingqing returned to the capital this time to fish for these “higher-ups”.

“Let’s go,” Ge Qingqing patted Xiaowu on the back as he looked at the fresh snow on the glazed tiles, “and get back our ‘old residence’ first.”

Yao Wenyu’s illness did not take a turn for the better, and taking multiple bowls of medicine did not help any. It was only today when the Imperial Bodyguards were testing out the new horses that he had the opportunity to venture outdoors to enjoy the breeze. Fei Sheng, being meticulous, had already prepared a screen before Shen Zechuan gave his orders. He had also placed a charcoal brazier under the shack to keep Yao Wenyu from freezing.

Shen Zechuan saw Xiao Chiye standing at the very front, saying something to Hairigu about something. Without shifting his gaze away, he simply tilted his head slightly to say to Yao Wenyu, “It’s inevitable for Ge Qingqing to be homesick after having been in Juexi for a long time. As a native of Qudu, he still has kinfolks at home.”

The agate on the Prefectural Lord’s bright and clear earlobe swayed as he moved and brushed against his fur collar, appearing all the more breathtakingly captivating. Red suited him. All those white fur robes of his diminished the dazzling gorgeousness of his facial features, giving him an overly amicable appearance when necessary. Only red could draw out his sharp, penetrating edge. This was a process of “honing the blade”. The higher he sat, the more conspicuous those sharp edges hidden away in the depths would become.

“All the officials in key positions in the Qudu Commercial Tax Office are from the noble clans.” Yao Wenyu was unwilling to reveal even a hint of frailty in the presence of outsiders, so he had a blanket over him and appeared sufficiently spirited. “Since Your Lordship intends for Ge Qingqing to start making his move here, you can make use of Xi Hongxuan's old acquaintances."

"That won't do." Shen Zechuan watched as Hairigu got on the horse. The Imperial Bodyguards on the other end got on their horses too. Fei Sheng was leaning over to speak to Qiao Tianya. He continued, "Most of Xi Hongxuan's old acquaintances are involved with Xue Xiuzhuo. Xi Hongxuan could enter the capital during the reign of Xiande because Xue Xiuzhuo went to a lot of effort. These people are a motley crew, so we have to screen and select them carefully before using them."

"With Pan Lin dismissed from his post," Yao Wenyu said, "Liang Cuishan is now the pawn with the most promising future. I only fear that Ge Qingqing won't be able to make it in time for the Dancheng case if he is to explore a new pathway of clues under his watch."

"We can't intervene in the Dancheng's case." Sensing something moving at his waist, Shen Zechuan lowered his eyes and saw Hunu reaching its paw out for the tassel on his folding fan. "It is of no benefit to me regardless of who wins or loses in this game that is the Dancheng's case. I had Ge Qingqing return to Qudu not to have him stir up a storm in the Dancheng's case, but to wait for a winner to emerge."

Yao Wenyu did not notice Hunu; his eyes were on Qiao Tianya on the riding tracks.

The recruitment criteria of the Imperial Bodyguards of Zhongbo were set according to Qiao Tianya. All dressed in a body-fitting outfit<sup>13</sup> today, he bent over and lowered his arm to pick up a boisterous Ding Tao who was running all over and tossed the latter to Gu Jin, who was behind him. Then he hooked Li Xiong's collar with his horsewhip and tossed Li Xiong to Gu Jin too.

"... The fifth month is when the busy farming season ends," Yao Wenyu said. "Libei is still fighting a war. Your Lordship is planning ahead in preparation for a rainy day."

The end of the busy farming season meant that farm work such as plowing and the like would be wrapped up, and the pressure on the Grand Secretariat would subsequently ease, leaving them with enough energy to start confronting Zhongbo and Libei. Shen Zechuan had to ensure that his supply line would not break. He had to shoulder the military provision supply for three parties this year, but he had lost the Xi Clan's copper mine in Juexi, and the Liuzhou's port which he was planning for with Yan Heru was only in its fledgling stage this year. If they were to get further contained by Qudu, then the battle zone would become even more perilous.

"If Xue Yanqing wins," Yao Wenyu looked at Shen Zechuan, "where will Your Lordship look for his weakness?"

"I can't find one." Shen Zechuan swung the tassel. "I couldn't find Xue Yanqing's weakness even way back in Qudu. There is nothing this person can't forsake. He cut me off from Xi Hongxuan's money vaults, and yet he's still willing to wear old official robes and head down to the local areas to carry out fieldwork. He has my admiration."

Lang Tao Xue Jin sped past the field, and cheers erupted. Xiao Chiye pulled the reins and smiled at Shen Zechuan from afar.

The frostiness in Shen Zechuan's eyes disappeared. He turned the folding fan over.

"He did a clean job with the Quancheng's silk case too. I can't catch him... but no man is an island, himself included."

Xue Xiuyi pressed the handkerchief down to blow his nose. He prided himself on being a virtuous and lofty man of letters, yet his actions were rather crude. His official robe was slovenly worn, with the corners black and wrinkled. Xue Xiuzhuo was now at the height of his career and the peak of his power, but Xue Xiuyi had only muddled his way into a sinecure post. Having squandered away the family fortune in his early years, he now even had to think twice just to eat a bowl of noodles worth a copper coin.

The fellow official at the side was fed up with Xue Xiuyi, but he dared not show it openly and merely said, "You're still sick, so it's fine even if you rest at home for two days. Why push yourself so? I'll call for a physician to take a look at you later."

Xue Xiuyi felt as if he had lost face when he heard that. He was the lawful son of a noble clan, and yet the way his fellow official put it made it seem like he could not even afford to pay the fees of a physician, so he crumbled up his handkerchief and said at the top of his voice, "I have an in-house physician waiting in attendance at home! When have we ever lacked a physician at home? I've just been so busy with my official duties that I forgot about it. I'll call for him to take a look when I get back later."

His fellow officials all knew he was just pretending to be leading an extravagant life when he was, in fact, so poor that he was fighting with his wife over it all day long at home. Furthermore, all his maidservants and whatnot had already been sold off. So they simply mumbled a few vague words in a perfunctory attempt to beg off the conversation and no longer bothered themselves with him.

It was getting dark at this point in time, and people were leaving the office compound one after another. Xue Xiuyi sat on the cold bench facing the stove with the intent to dry his wet boots, but as it turned out, the candle was blown out. He was used to a life of luxury when he was young, and there were always the maidservants – young and old – to accompany him even when he slept. He feared the dark, so on seeing the candle gone, he hastily stood up and hurried outside.

Several fellow officials were standing around in the courtyard smoking their pipes as they made plans to go drinking later. Xue Xiuyi walked over to the door with great haste and heard them say,

“Isn’t it obvious enough? I’ve long heard that the Xue clan treated their common-born sons extremely harshly, especially this Xue the Eldest.” The fellow official said in a hushed tone. “Back then, during the reign of Yongyi, the Old Master of the Xue clan was willing to let His Excellency Yanqing study with him precisely because Xue the Eldest was really not cut out for it. Mister Changzong even called him a hopeless case beyond teaching!”

Xue Xiuyi’s heart went cold. He was particular about his reputation, so he promptly shrank back behind the door and put up with the shame as he listened to them continue the conversation.

“That’s why Xue Yanqing is reluctant to promote him now,” someone said, “and just had him placed in a yamen position with practically no obligations. His monthly salary can’t even be compared to the beggars outside. It would have been fine if the heirs of their clan had noble title to inherit just like the Fei Clan, but unfortunately, that’s not the case.”

“The men Xue Yanqing recommended for office all seemed to me to be unaffiliated scholars<sup>14</sup> from the Hanlin Academy. Most of these people were successful candidates in the imperial examinations held in the spring in the previous years and have passed the palace examinations.<sup>15</sup> They are all virtuous talents. How is this Xue the Eldest going to get promoted? He knows nuts about nothing. I told him to sort out the old court cases, and he can even somehow transcribe eight words on one piece of paper wrong.”

They put their heads together and snickered.

Both of Xue Xiuyi's hands trembled. He gripped his drenched robe, wanting to charge out and rage at these despicable people mocking him behind his back. But he was not the same person as he used to be back then; he had no part of the Xue clan's honor and glory, and he relied on this bit of salary to make a living. He did not dare to shoot his mouth off like he had done so when he humiliated Pan Lin back then.

Who does Xue Yanqing think he is?

Xue Xiuyi craned his neck and spat.

Contemptible common-born son of a concubine!

Author's Notes:

For Li Jianting's background, refer to chapter 120.

For the autumnal rain round-up hunt Hasen spoke of, refer to chapter 151.

Don't quarrel. Don't quarrel. Don't quarrel.

*sends a cosmic wave of love your way*

CHAPTER 219: REWARD

Lang Tao Xue Jin was invincible on the riding tracks. It was the undisputed, uncrowned king of the Hongyan Mountains, and even when faced up against the Biansha battle ponies, those that could rival it were few and far between. After having his fun for two laps, Xiao Chiye called it a day and dismounted to drink up Shen Zechuan's remaining tea on the table. Still lingering on the rim of the cup was the Prefectural Lord's warmth.

"A day like today is hard to come by." Xiao Chiye finished the tea and took a hot handkerchief to wipe his hand. "Let's put up a reward and let them have their fun."

"Ready-made rewards are aplenty." Shen Zechuan turned his head and said to the maidservant before him, "Tell them I have a big reward for them if they win the race."

Xiao Chiye sat down, his long legs crowding up all the space until Shen Zechuan barely had the legroom to put his own. He asked, "What's the reward?"

Shen Zechuan smiled without answering.

The few of them who were riding their horses on the field stopped in their tracks. Tantai Hu was entertained to hear that there was a reward. "This is taking unfair advantage of our Zhongbo."

The various generals of Libei were all adept in the art of horsemanship, but the guards of Zhongbo were not. As far as the prize was concerned, Gu Jin and Wu Ziyu would be expected to win it; there was no suspense at all to this race.

Fei Sheng, who was sitting on horseback, said to Qiao Tianya, “Why not you participate?”

Qiao Tianya pulled the reins, greeted Gu Jin at the back, and answered, “You represent the Prefectural Lord. Aren’t you ashamed to surrender without a fight? Tao-zi, come on up. Do a run with your Laoshi-ge.”<sup>16</sup>

Ding Tao grasped over the reins and said to Fei Sheng, “Don’t be afraid. Jin-ge has never outrun me back in Libei. I’ll block him for you later. You just focus on racing Wu Ziyu.”

“I’m not afraid.” Fei Sheng saw Qiao Tianya withdrawing and hurriedly added, “Then you can’t retreat either. Us brothers have to work as one.”

Qiao Tianya pointed at the back with his horsewhip. Fei Sheng took a look—Huo Lingyun was there too. Qiao Tianya said, “The last track is narrow. Don’t over-engage with Wu Ziyu. Just shut your eyes to everything else and spur your horse on. There will be no lack of people behind you to help you block the others.”

By this, he meant to give Fei Sheng a leg up with Huo Lingyun and hand Fei Sheng the limelight. For a while, Fei Sheng did not know what to feel. He cupped his fists at Qiao Tianya and said, “You’re truly a real brother in my time of need!”

Yao Wenyu could not hear their conversation, but on seeing Qiao Tianya backing away, he understood what they meant to do.

Holding the teacup with his fingers, Xiao Chiye looked at the track and ruminated it over. “This Qiao Tianya is way too self-effacing.”

The horse race was a spur-of-the-moment affair, meant for everyone to just have fun. But it did not mean that the Imperial Bodyguards could lose too badly and make a disgrace out of themselves. The Libei Armored Cavalry and the Zhongbo Garrison Troops were both present too, and yet Qiao Tianya still handed the opportunity to Fei Sheng.

The Second Master was saying that Qiao Tianya had no drive and spirit.

With Hunu in his arms, Yao Wenyu looked at Qiao Tianya and said nothing.

Shen Zechuan spread his folding fan open a little and closed it again. He looked as if he had it all figured out as he maintained his silence and remained calm.

“Xiaosheng!” Yin Chang stepped on the fence and straddled it as he let loose a heartrending shout at Fei Sheng, “Quick, run! Faster! Win, and this old man will take you drinking—”

Before Yin Chang could finish his words, Gu Jin’s horse went racing past like a whirlwind. The old man ate a mouthful of dust and got all so anxious he very nearly bolted to his feet.

Gu Jin and Wu Ziyu worked hand in glove to obstruct Fei Sheng’s path ahead. Fei Sheng was half a step too slow and could not overtake them. Behind him, Ding Tao spurred his horse on and passed by Fei Sheng to block the backside of Gu Jin’s horse from the outer flank. He pressed so close that Gu Jin had no choice but to slow down and give way to Wu Ziyu.

“Jin-ge! Did you hide a tael of silver in your old boots? It’s soaked through! Before I set off, Liu-shen<sup>17</sup> at the entrance of our residence even asked me when you’d be paying for the wine you took on credit. That was so embarrassing!” Ding Tao spoke with increasing gusto as he continued, “So I took the liberty of taking the money out of your boots and paid off half of it. Half! Can you imagine? Exactly how much of a tab did you rack up? My accounts are all a mess now...”

Driven beyond the limit of his forbearance, Gu Jin turned his head aside and yelled, “Shut up!”

The instant his attention was diverted, Fei Sheng took over the inner lane. Gu Jin treasured horses and was unwilling to force his way through. Both of them raced neck to neck with one another for a while and gained in on Wu Ziyu until Wu Ziyu could feel the chill on his ass.

The width of the riding tracks differed. Once they cleared this distance, a slightly wider bend lay ahead. Gu Jin wanted to close in on Fei Sheng and push him back here, while Fei Sheng wanted to overtake Gu Jin here. Both of them shut their mouths tight and galloped in the dust. Seeing as the bend was just right in front, Gu Jin clamped down hard on his horse’s belly. Ding Tao had long withdrawn behind him, and Huo Lingyun had taken over his place now.

As soon as Huo Lingyun approached, Gu Jin realized that this man’s horsemanship was pretty decent; he was a more intimidating rider than Fei Sheng was. The bend turned abruptly, and the head of Gu Jin’s horse veered over. Unexpectedly, Huo Lingyun, who was catching up from the side, suddenly accelerated. His pony's sturdy foreneck turned direction as well, pushing Gu Jin towards the inner lane.

Gu Jin urgently pulled at his reins, but the horse could not brake in time. It was cornered so aggressively that it slanted sideways and was about to bump into Fei Sheng, who was in the innermost lane. With his spot suddenly narrowing, Fei Sheng subconsciously tightened his right grip on the reins in an attempt to avoid a collision. His horse promptly turned its head aside and scraped against the fence, breaking the wooden rails as it tore along it. Alarmed, the horse tripped over the rails in its haste and instantaneously went falling head first.

"Fuck!" Tantai Hu jerked to his feet.

The horse twisted its front knees when it fell over. Fei Sheng acted quickly amidst the kickup of dust and immediately hugged his head to protect it as he rolled on the ground, so startled was he that he broke out all over in a cold sweat.

Gu Jin, having already stopped, dismounted first and pulled Fei Sheng to his feet.

Fei Sheng kicked out his legs as he stood up. His robe was full of mud and soil all over. He wiped the sweat off his face and turned his head aside to spit out a tooth, then assured Qiao Tianya behind them, "I'm fine!"

Huo Lingyun cracked his horsewhip, vaguely looking as if he was going to overtake Wu Ziyu on the gradually narrowing track.

Having heard the commotion, Wu Ziyu said as Huo Lingyun pressed in towards him, "isn't that rather underhanded, buddy?"

Huo Lingyun half-bent his body down as he shot forth like a sharp arrow slicing through the wind. The momentum of his forward charge was too swift and fierce, and he was so bent on overtaking Wu Ziyu that he totally disregarded the fences on both sides of the track and simply let his calves scrape against the railings until they drew blood.

Wu Ziyu's stirrup scraped against the fence until fragments of wood broke off. He cursed gruffly, "motherfucking..."

This half of the fence was already teetering on the verge of collapse after Fei Sheng's incident. Wu Ziyu heard a "crash" as the fence broke apart on impact. Not daring to race to the death with Huo Lingyun, he promptly turned around and led his horse out of the track.

Wu Ziyu gave a light spat and bent over to hug his horse's neck, his voice hoarse as he said comfortingly, "this is so aggravating for my Cangwei!”

Huo Lingyun was unstoppable as he galloped across this last stretch of track. His breathing slightly urgent, he tossed all the noise to the back of his mind as he sped in the wind. All his eyes could see was the finishing line.

He had to fight for his future!

No one here was his brother, and no one was his old acquaintance either. He knew what his placement in the Imperial Bodyguards meant, but it was far from enough. His aspirations lay in the battlefields. He had to fight a path out for himself in Shen Zechuan’s presence, and only then would he be entrusted with heavy responsibilities.

Yin Chang was so antsy that he slapped his thigh. He was burning with the desire to break into a run and chase after this lad. He hollered, “No cheating! How can you do that to your own people...”

Horse hooves suddenly sent mud splattering as they followed hot on Huo Lingyun’s heels, like a bolt of lightning breaking through the dust.

“Qiao Tianya!” Tantai Hu excitedly leaned out of the fence and roared, “QIAO TIANYA!”

Yao Wenyu’s throat was parched. He seemed to hear the sound of solid ice cracking open as he saw Qiao Tianya’s wildly fluttering hair in the gale of wind, as well as the proud and bold spirit in his brows.

Huo Lingyun frowned slightly when he saw Qiao Tianya closing in on him out of the corner of his eye.

Qiao Tianya held back the taste of soil on the tip of his tongue and barked out a short laugh at Huo Lingyun. Both men simultaneously lowered their bodies as they squeezed onto a single track between the unsteady fences.

Qiao Tianya rarely seemed to have the impulse to “win”, but in this boisterous din today, he was once again the lad of the Qiao clan who galloped his horse all over Qudu ten years ago.

A riotous racket of intense shouts thundered through the riding track. The rich multi-colored silk ball was hanging just right ahead. Fences fell over one after another like dominos under the rapid beats of horse hooves.

Huo Lingyun gritted his teeth. The gale whipped the dust all over the sky, where they swirled and danced. His chest was almost bursting with the desire to win. Right at this moment, a horizontal bar of iron suddenly materialized before him. The force of the impact of a direct head-on collision would have been sufficient to knock a person over to the ground.

Huo Lingyun made a split decision and let go of his hand to flip over. As the horse continued sprinting, he dropped and rolled onto the ground, avoiding the iron bar. But after he landed, he heard Qiao Tianya still continuing on his charge ahead. He could not help but blurted in astonishment, “Qiao—”

The burgundy red battle steed charged over the iron bar with no one on its back.

Yao Wenyu gripped the handles of his wheelchair. His breathing came to a standstill.

A brief moment later, Qiao Tianya swiftly flipped back into position from the side of his horse. A hubbub of voices instantly broke out on the field.

Xiao Chiye said, “beautiful.”

As the Imperial Bodyguards pounced at him, Qiao Tianya took down the multi-colored silk ball and burst into hearty laughter. The bright, sunny day dissolved away all that was downtrodden and disillusioned of him into glistening sweat as he sat on horseback, looking the very picture of a valiant, dashing hero.

Yao Wenyu’s calm and composed face betrayed almost nothing as he released his grip, only to realize that Qiao Tianya was looking in this direction.

Qiao Tianya withdrew his gaze and dismounted. He bumped shoulders with Fei Sheng and blocked Fei Sheng’s line of sight that was drifting towards Huo Lingyun. Fei Sheng did not say a word. The race was over, and now they had to go before Shen Zechuan to receive their reward.

Carrying his folding fan in hand, Shen Zechuan cut a tall, graceful figure as he said, “Since I’ve said it’s a big reward, then I naturally can’t use money and material commodities to fob all of you off. The commander-in-chief position of the Duanzhou Imperial Cavalry has been vacated all this time.” He paused for a moment. “Today, this seat shall be handed over to Qiao Tianya.”

Exactly as expected!

Fei Sheng, who was kneeling, lowered his head, all crestfallen. There were people all around here. He could not pull a long face at his master, but his disappointment was real. He could only manage with some difficulty to raise his spirit and maintain the composed expression on his face.

“Fei Sheng is transferred to assume the post of the Imperial Cavalry’s Vice Commander. Same goes for Huo Lingyun. The Zhongbo Imperial Bodyguards are thereby renamed ‘Imperial Cavalry’.<sup>18</sup> You still have the authority to make urgent reports directly, and you are not subordinate to the Duanzhou Garrison Troops.” The tassel of Shen Zechuan’s fan swayed in the wind. He continued, “You belong directly to me, Shen Lanzhou.”

A private cavalry!

Tantai Hu and Gu Jin exchanged glances in slight astonishment. Everyone knew about the preparation for the establishment of the Imperial Cavalry, but they thought that this light cavalry would be merged into the Duanzhou Garrison Troops to be placed under the charge of the Duanzhou Prefectural Prefect’s yamen.

A private cavalry meant that the posts of the Imperial Bodyguards practically remained unchanged; they were still a troop directly under Shen Zechuan’s command. They were not subjected to the supervision and inspection of the Six Prefectures of Zhongbo; in fact, they even had the authority to supervise and inspect the Six Prefectures of Zhongbo. Unlike military forces with progressive ranks like the garrison troops, they would only serve and pledge loyalty to Shen Zechuan.

Xiao Chiye propped up the teapot and drank another cup of hot tea. Seeing as it was already late, he said, “Tend to the horses first before sending them back to the stables. Take good care of them.”

Fei Sheng immediately rose to his feet and instructed the others to clear away the screen and charcoal brazier, while Shen Zechuan and Xiao Chiye took their leave first. Yao Wenyu bent over to take Hunu into his arms. When he straightened up again, he saw Qiao Tianya standing before him.

Blocking Huo Lingyun, Qiao Tianya pointed to Fei Sheng on the other end, and said, “Once you’re done cleaning up, wait in the main courtyard for your orders.”

The atmosphere around Huo Lingyun did not bode well. He gave an indifferent nod of his head and stepped around Qiao Tianya.

Yao Wenyu was looking at the cat when a colored silk ball suddenly fell into his arms. He raised his eyes—Qiao Tianya was still looking at Huo Lingyun. Yao Wenyu grasped that multi-colored ball; it still had Qiao Tianya’s sweat on it.

CHAPTER 220: FIGURE

While the Prefectural Lord and Second Master were having their meal, Kong Ling and the other gentlemen were drinking tea in the side hall waiting for them. Yu Xiaozai said quietly to Kong Ling, “I just hope that everyone will get along today and not dampen His Lordship’s spirits.”

